'Whereas upon the Petition of Thomas Skinner merchant, setting forth his sufferings under the barbarous oppressions of the East India Company, his majesty was graciously pleased by order of the 27th of August last, to defer the clearing of the matter for erecting a court to determine affairs of this nature till the second meeting of this board at Whitehall, and in regard the said Company have slighted the orders of this board, and not complied with any references or mediations, designing to wear out the Petitioners' life in tedious attendances; he did by his Petition this day read at the board, humbly pray that the said court may be now erected, to relieve the Petitioner according to justice, and put a period to his grievances: Whereupon his majesty present in council did order, That his grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Privy Seal, and the lord Ashley do send for the Governor and some of the Members of the East India Company, to treat with them, and to induce them to give the said Mr. Skinner such reasonable satisfaction, as may in some measure be answerable to the loss and damage he hath suffered under them. (Signed)

'JOHN NICHOLAS.'

It appears by the Report of the Lords Referrees, Dec. 6, 1666, that this Order was made on the 23rd of the March preceding.

These Lords Referrees met, took much pains in it, spent several days: Ordered Mr. Ayloff of counsel with Skinner, to give them under his hand a true state of the business, whose Report I will here set down in terminis.

The CASE of THOMAS SKINNER, Merchant, and his Demands against the East India Company, for Damages done him in 1659, in India.

In the year 1657, was a general liberty of trade into the East Indies; then Thomas Skinner furnished and set forth his ship called the Thomas from London, on a trading voyage to the Indies, and arrived there in 1658.

The Company by their letters May the 7th, 1658, which arrived in India in November following, commanded their agents to seize all ships and goods of English trading there, and dispose half to the Commonwealth, and half to the Company.

The agents of Bantam direct those of Jamby to seize the estate of Frederic Skinner in the hands of Thomas; saying, Thomas had nothing there of his own; and that Thomas Leaver, chief of Jamby, should secure in his hands what estate he had of Frederic's, for a debt suggested owing by him to the Company; upon which pretences they seized Thomas Skinner's ship and goods, broke open his warehouse, assaulted him in his house, and dispossessed him of his island Barella; for which injuries he hopes satisfaction, and therefore in particular demands,

For 128 peculls of pepper, 24 peculls of nutmegs, and for beef, strong waters and other provisions and merchandizes, taken out of his ship by the agents of Jamby and the crew of the ship Dragon, then in the Company's service, 3,355 rials.

The Company agree the value 3,160 rials brought to their account, but it being proved, That the rest was laden on board Skinner's ship, this embezzlement or subduction by the agents, is just to lie upon the Company.

For his ship and furniture, sworn by two witnesses to be worth 25 or 26,000*l.* sterling, and that she was worth as much or more in India when taken, yet abate a fifth for ware and tare, rests, 8,000 rials.

For eleven small copper ordnances, and their field carriages, 350 rials, and two quoyles of ropes 80 rials, in all 430 rials.

For 10 barrels of English powder, at 25 rials per barrel, and sword blades, spectacles, prospective glasses, boxes, knives, scissors and other small merchandises, iron works, nails, pistols, pictures and looking-glasses with ebony frames on board, and ship-planks and other wood on shore and in the warehouse; valued by Marinaduke Grimston, and Peter de Barrier purser of the ship, at 1,730 rials.

For monies owing by Thomas Leaver to Frederic Skinner, assigned to Thomas, and accepted by Leaver with promise to pay, but detained by order of the Company, who have in their hands a greater sum of Leaver's to indemnify them against this demand, 1,521 rials.

For his charges at Jamby six months under that trouble and coming home over land from India 19 months travel; the Company's agents refusing to give him passage in their ships, 1800 rials.

Total 16,836 rials.

Interest for 16,836 rials for six years. Rials are valued at Jamby 5s. per rial: But what they produce here, being brought over in black pepper to the company clear of all charges, is expected, they will ingenuously own.

For the assault of his person, loss of six years time, disappointment of his trade, attendance and charge here, disseizin of his island.

Being valuable at more than all the other particulars, are humbly submitted to your lordships discretion.

(Signed) JOSEPH AYLOFF.

The Lords Referrees to this requiring the Answer of the Company, receive this as follows.

To the right honourable the Lords Referrees, concerning the demands of Thomas Skinner upon the East India Company.

"In obedience to your lordships order and direction, the Court of Committees of the said Company have considered of the matter proposed by your lordships, and do humbly offer to your lordships; that for the nutmegs, white pepper and other things, which were seized by the justice of the place in part of a debt due to the Company from Frederick Skinner, which said goods were brought to the Company's accounts, though the same were afterwards lost in the ship Dragon; and in the regard the accounts between the Company and Frederick are concluded, and the said goods not included therein; the said Company have always offered to pay for the said goods, and are now ready to pay 3,160 dollars for the same, which at 4s. 9d. per dollar, amounts unto the sum of 750l. 10s. And concerning the 1,521 dollars demanded by Thomas Skinner, as a debt due unto him from Thomas Leaver; they in compliance with your lordships desires will be ready and willing to pay the said 1,521 dollars, amounting to 361l. 4s. 9d. to the said Thomas Skinner, so as they may be discharged by the administrator of the said Thomas Leaver, to whom only they are liable, it being very reasonable that the Company pay the debt but once. But the Company do utterly disavow, that the Company can by any law or equity be liable for their factors debts.

"Concerning Skinner's other demands for his ship and for other goods pretended to be seized on shore, the Company do humbly offer to your lordships; that the Company are not liable for the debt or action of their factors, unless done by their order; and if the Company should be liable to every one's clamours, and pretences for wrongs done, or pretended to be done by their factors (when if any such thing were done the same was not by their order or knowledge, nor applicable to their use and account) the same will necessarily impoverish and ruin the Company: And the Company gave no order for the seizure of Thomas Skinner's ship, nor nothing else of his; nor was the same brought to the Company's account, and the Agents at Bantam expressly ordered the factors at Jamby not to meddle with the said Thomas Skinner's ship, who acted accordingly: For it appears clearly, that captain Allaut and his mariners had his provisions and stores for their wages, and that the king of Jamby and Jehore seized and kept the ship; And his goods on shore were seized on by Chinese, and other his creditors; and therefore they hope that his continual clamours of oppression shall not take any impression in your lordships' great judgments, the Company not being able to put a price upon an oppression, where none was, at least that they are concerned in: Yet for the procuring of their own peace and quiet, and to prevent all further trouble unto your lordships and the Company, they do submit unto your lordships disposal such further sum as will make the whole amount to 1,500l. which is more than his ship and goods were ever worth, or valued at upon the insurance at her going forth, so as the Company may have thereupon full and final releases and discharges from the said Thomas Skinner and Frederick Skinner. September 23, 1666. By order of the said Company. (Signed) JO. STANYON, Sec."

To which Skinner makes this Reply.

To the right honourable the Lords Referrees, concerning the damages done to Thomas Skinner merchant, by the East India Company.

The humble Reply of Thomas Skinner, to the Proposals of the said Company.

"That since the rapine and spoil of the Company's Agents by their commands, took from me nutmegs, white pepper, provisions, &c. of 3,355 rials value, if but 3,160 rials came to their account, yet are they answerable for the whole, which as the justice of Jamby's attestation, That they took all without reason, monishes them of the duty of restitution, so the perishing thereof in and with the Company's ship Dragon threatens them with the impropriety of ill gotten goods; And then though rials cost put on ship-board in England but 4s. 9d. or 5s. as they go for India, yet they come home at above 15s. clear, as by oath of the Company's own servants appears, that when pepper was sold at London but 11d. a pound, though the Company sold ever since anno 1660 at 11d. 13d. 14½d. and upwards; therefore they are justly so demanded with interest.

"The 1,521 rials owing formerly by Leaver is become the Company's debt, not only because he was their servant and agent, but because it was seized for them, and they have so much in their hands for my satisfaction, and therefore are receivers thereof to my use, and may now pay it as safely, as they ought honestly to have paid it long since with interest in manner as those above mentioned.

"Concerning my ship and goods taken on shore, my persecution in Jamby, and tedious journey home, for which the Company offer payment by fictions and reproaches, the sense which the king of Jamby, (who would have made that factory a public example, had not my importunate intercessions in confidence to find justice at home prevented it) had of the agents inhumanity: and which, as their own letters witness against them, was by their order, what ever pretended against Frederick, executed against myself, and afterward owned by the Company, cannot but goad their private consciences, how insensible soever the politic conscience of a corporation be, as it did Allnats upon his death bed, who confessed and repented sorely, that he had been enticed and incited by the agents unjustly against me, and had nothing of the depredations; with what modesty do the Company then upbraid me with pretended debts, and calumniate the king and people of those parts, and so much undervalue my ship and oppression, when the contrary to the Company's knowledge, is so clearly manifest; nor are they ignorant of the hopeful design in my plantation and valuable trade they have destroyed me of; which, though it plainly appears, that my ship's intended voyage for Maccassar, and freight thence, for which consideration above 2,000 rials is deducted from the ship's worth, and other particulars in a schedule, would have rendered alone above 20,000*l.* sterling yearly: yet I submit that, and my whole sufferings and concerns, to your lordships' determination, in hopes, that if I do not receive an adequate recompence, yet I shall by his majesty's grace, and your lordships direction, be enabled, by the restoring of my island Barella in India, to reap a future benefit without the East-India Company's further molestation or interruption, his majesty's late Charter granted the third of April 1661, prohibiting the Company expressly to undertake any thing against any Christian colony settled in India before the date thereof.

(Signed) "THOMAS SKINNER."

October 6th, 1666.

The Lords Referrees finding this vast disproportion between the demands and pretences of the petitioner, and the real loss and damage which he had sustained; and the offers on the other side of the Company for his reparation and satisfaction, and seeing no possibility of reconciling them, though much pains had been taken in endeavouring it, at last resolved to report it back to the king and council: and made their report as followeth:

"In pursuance of his majesty's order in council dated the 23d of March last; we have treated with the Governor and Company of merchants trading into the East Indies, and have heard the counsel both of the said Company, and Thomas Skinner complainant, in the disquisition whereof we found the said Thomas Skinner to have suffered much wrong by the said Company, and their Agents: and therefore endeavoured to persuade the said Company to give satisfaction to the petitioner: but there being a great difference between the petitioner's demands of reparation for damages, and the Company's offer towards the same, our mediation proved ineffectual therein.

"As to the Island of Barella in the East Indies claimed by the said Thomas Skinner; we conceive that he ought to enjoy the same, and from thence to trade into any part of the world, except into England. Given under our hands the sixth day of December, 1666.

(Signed) GILB. CANT. CLARENDON C.
J. ROBERTS, ASHLEY."

His majesty upon this finding the East-India Company would be brought to no reason, thought fit to recommend the business to the House of Peers, to do the petitioner justice according to the merits of his cause, which message was brought to the House the 19th of January 1666 by the lord privy seal, and all the proceedings in council transmitted thither, and withal a petition from Skinner himself was presented to them, setting forth the wrongs done to him by the East-India Company.

The House of Peers, thus possessed of this business, order a copy of Skinner's Petition to be given to the Governor and Company, and they to bring in their Answer to it upon Friday the 28th of January: they accordingly bring in for answer a Plea to the Jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and say; "That the petition is in the nature of an original complaint, not brought by way of appeal, bill of review, or writ of error, nor intermixed with privilege of parliament, nor having reference to any judgement of that court; therefore offer, if it will please to take any further cognizance of that cause: and then plead over and say, that the Company was incorporated by several charters in the reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James and likewise by a charter from Oliver, which excluded all others not members of the corporation from trading in any part of the East-Indies within the limits of the said charter, and that therefore if any such injuries were done, it was by virtue of the charter, and whether criminal or civil they were for ever released and discharged by the Act of Oblivion."

The Lords, upon debate of this plea, well knowing their own right to retain even original causes, when accompanied with such circumstances, as this then before them had; a poor man oppressed by potent adversaries, by a rich and numerous society, where there was a Peer of the realm, the lord Berckley of Berckley, gentlemen of great estates, very many wealthy merchants incorporated in one body, driving on a great trade in the Indies with one joint stock, resolved to employ that whole stock for the destruction of any man, that should presume but to touch upon that trade without their leaves, which was this poor man's case, and in a time when he had been encouraged thereunto by a general liberty then taken to trade in that country: who after the spoil of his goods and plantation there, to save his life, they having beset his passage by sea, was glad to expose himself to the hazard and charge of a journey of many thousand miles over land, to return into England, that he might here endeavour to get some reparation for all those losses, which that Company with their great purse and power opposed, and had already made him spend that little estate he had left, and seven years attendance to prosecute that reparation without any fruit: so as to go to law with them, and abide all the delays and formalities even of the ordinary proceedings at law, much less what such adversaries would have raised to him, he was no ways able; the Lords I say knowing all this, and that what was pretended of the indemnity by the act of oblivion was of no validity, that act not at all intended for things of this nature, betwixt party and party not relating to the war, made no difficulty to over-rule their plea, and enter into the disquisition of the fact, and to do the poor man justice and give relief if they found cause for it, as a work worthy of them, much conducing to the administration of the public justice of the kingdom, and most agreeable to the constant practice of that House from the very beginning of parliaments: wherefore they appointed Tuesday the 24th of January for the counsel of both sides to be heard at the bar. But such art was used, so many delays cast in by the Company and their counsel, as the cause could not be brought to hearing during all that session of parliament.

At the next meeting of the parliament in the year 1667, Skinner renewed his suit, and presented a Petition the 30th day of October, in hæc verba:

To the Right Honourable, &c.

The humble Petition, &c.

"That in the year 1657, private trade being open in the East Indies, the petitioner set forth his ship Thomas on a trading voyage to the said Indies, where being arrived in 1658 he possessed himself of a warehouse on the river side of Jamby on which his ship rode, wherein he put a great part of his goods, and also had a house at Jamby and goods therein, and purchased of the king of Jamby the island of Barelle, and built a house for habitation, and had contracted for planting of pepper and other commodities thereon. That in May 1659, the Agents of the Governor and the Company of Merchants of London trading into the East Indies, by direction of the said Governor and Company, and of Maurice Tompson, and sir Andrew Riccard, seeing the petitioner's hopeful design in his plantation and way of trade with his ship, did seize for and on the behalf of the said Governor and Company his said ship, goods, houses, islands and 1,521 dollars of the petitioner's in the hands of Thomas Leaver the Company's chief Agent at Jamby, which hath damaged him 17,172*l.* sterling, besides the disappointment of his trade, disseizin of his said island, loss of above six years time with attendance and vast charges here in endeavours for a just satisfaction, &c. being much more valuable than all the other damages; and the said agents used many violences upon his person in the said Indies, notwithstanding that the petitioner proffered bail and good security there, to answer all their pretences; which inhuman and unreasonable dealing, forced the petitioner through infinite hazards and expences to come most over land for England to seek redress.

"That in the year 1661 and continually since he hath humbly besought his majesty for justice against the said Governor and Company, and persons aforesaid; and though his majesty hath been graciously pleased to convene the said Company and persons, and to hear the said matters; and also to refer it divers times to several lords of his majesty's most honourable privy council, to hear them and mediate an end; yet they could not be reduced to reason nor justice, albeit the petitioner's wrongs and damages were made to appear, as well by their own acknowledgment, as other evidence produced before the Lords referees; but endeavoured by the strength of their joint purse to bear down the petitioner's relief, though never so just, by wearying him from further prosecution.

"That the petitioner's whole case not being remediable by the courts below, he is constrained humbly to address himself to your lordships, his majesty's great council and supreme judicature, whom the petitioner most humbly petitioned the last sessions, and your lordships were pleased to order their attendance, but by their dilatory pleas and several non-attendances upon slight excuses at the day appointed by your lordships, they frustrated the petitioner of obtaining your lordships' justice that session.

"Wherefore he most humbly prays, that your lordships will be pleased to cause the said Governor and Company and persons aforesaid to answer the premises before your lordships by a short day, and that he may receive from your lordships such relief as shall be consistent with justice and equity.

And he shall pray, &c.

(Signed)

THOMAS SKINNER."

The Lords, upon this, order the Company to put in their Answer in writing upon Wednesday the 6th of November. They bring in a plea as before; first by way of protestation, "That all the injuries supposed to be committed by them and their factors are untrue;" then plead as formerly, "That the petition is in the nature of an original complaint, not brought by way of appeal, &c." as in their plea of the last session; but add, "And therefore these respondents do humbly demand the judgment of this honourable Court, whether it will please to take any other or further cognizance of the same; the rather, because the matters of complaint in the petition are such, for which remedy is ordinarily given in the courts of Westminster Hall, wherein these respondents have right to be tried, and ought not to be brought hither per saltum, nor drawn ad aliud examen; and so pray to be dismissed.

The Lords having received this plea, to shew the clearness of their intentions, and their tenderness of doing any thing which might but carry a semblance, that they desired to engross to themselves the judging of particular causes, (when determinable elsewhere, and nothing extraordinary in the case to induce their lordships to take cognizance of the matter, which apparently was in this Case of Skinner's, as hath been said before) would have the opinion of all the judges, before they proceeded any further; and therefore made an Order, Monday the 2d of December, "That it be referred to all the judges to consider of Skinner's Petition, and to report to the house upon the Wednesday following, whether the petitioner were relievable upon the matters therein mentioned in law or equity; and if so, in what manner, upon the several parts of the complaints of the said petition."

The day appointed the Judges came, and the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench reported, That all the Judges had considered of the matter referred to them, and having met and considered thereof, were of opinion; That the matters touching the taking away of the petitioner's ship and goods, and assaulting of his person, notwithstanding the same were done beyond the seas, might be determined upon his majesty's ordinary courts at Westminster; And as to the dispossessing him of his house and island, that he was not relievable in any ordinary court of law.

Here then clearly by the Judges' own confession, part of the case was not within the power of Westminster-hall, and under favour of better judgments, I think it will be but a venial sin, if notwithstanding this declaration of our sages in the law, the doubt do still remain with us, if some of the other points also, as that of the taking of his ship, a robbery committed super altum mare, be punishable by the law of Westminster-hall; Nay! may not one be bold to affirm, that it is not? And may it not be doubted further, if any part of Skinner's case be triable there, and if their fiction in law, will reach any part of it? being all for injuries and violence against his person and estate in India: We know, that some judges and lawyers make it to extend to contracts and bonds made beyond the sea, which they ground upon a case in the year book of 48 E. 3, fol. 2, where sir Ralph Pole brings his action against sir Richard Tochester, upon an obligation bearing date at Harfleet in Kent, 'Lou de rei veritate il fust fait en Normandie;' the book saith; and his action was held good; And Brook (who makes it to beat Roan, not Harfleet) gives the reason in his Abridgement, saith 98, 'le lieu n'est traversable,' the place is not traversable; which is to be understood, when it is expressed in the bond, for a man cannot traverse the place against his own-act. But the law was ever understood to be otherwise till then, that the judges would ampliare jurisdictionem.

And (to shew what the law was before E. 3,) it was adjudged, Michaelmas 2 E. 2, That no action would lie for a bond made at Barwick (which did not then belong to England) 'ou cest court nau' conisans,' where the court hath not cognizance, saith Fitzherbert, Obligation 15. And so Perkins, Fautes 121. But both before and since the courts of law were so far from punishing injuries and trespasses done beyond sea, that even treason was not triable till the statute of 26 H. 8, cap. 13, which-saith, "That if any of the king's subjects shall commit treason, though out of the limits of this realm, it shall be tried in any place that the king shall appoint by commission under the great seal:" So a special commission was to be issued for it: And several other statutes were afterwards made of the same nature; But for trespasses, as this of the East India company against Skinner, there is no act of parliament to authorise the prosecution at common law, nor (I think) any book case to warrant the practice of it; Book cases against it there are many, even for trespasses in the king's dominions, because a venire facias could not go thither to summon a jury from thence, Mich. 42, (as Mr. Prynne cites it, or 41, as sir Edw. Coke) E. 3, coram rege, rot. 109. "An inhabitant of Jersey complains to the king and council of false imprisonment and several injuries done him in the island: They send this bill of complaint to the judges of the King's Bench, and there the bill is dismissed, 'quia compertum est,' saith the record, 'quod negotium pradicum in curia hic terminari non potest, ed quod juratores insulæ prædictæ hic venire non possunt,'" &c. Other cases there are of the same nature. And if a fiction could not help for Jersey being part of the king's dominions, much less could it help for foreign parts, where the king had no authority at all. Yet the House of Lords hath in all times exercised jurisdiction upon crimes done and committed in foreign parts, as well as those within the kingdom, both treasons and other offences, as in the cases of the lord Latimer for the loss of St. Saviour in Normandy, and oppressions done by him in Britany, 50 E. 3, n. 21. Of William de Weston, for the surrender of Outhewick in Flanders, 1 R. 2, n. 38. John de Gomeniz for Ardes, 1 R. 2, n. 40. Pierce de Cressingham and John Spickworth, for the castle of Drinkham in Flanders, 7 R. 2, n. 17: The bishop of Norwich, for not doing service beyond seas according to promise, and as he ought to have done, for delivering up Graveling to the French, not mustering his army at Calice, as he should have done, and not having his number compleat, n. 18, Sir William Elinsham, sir Thomas Trevit, sir Henry Ferrers, sir William de Hurnedon, and Robert Fitz-Ralph, for delivering strong holds and fortresses for money, n. 24. John Hall a servant to the duke of Norfolk, for murdering the duke of Gloucester at Calice, 1 H. 4, n. 11*. sir Wm. Richill, for but taking the examination of the duke of Gloucester at Calice, 1 H. 4, n. 93. And multitudes of others, who could not have been tried by the common law, were tried by the House of Lords: And in truth a man may say the whole case of Skinner in every point of it was only cognizable before them; However, it being out of all dispute, even by the confession of the judges, that some things in it are not triable in Westminster-hall, I hope it may be thought reasonable, to leave as great an extent of power to the House of Peers, which is the supreme judicature of the kingdom, as to the court of chancery, where the ordinary practice is to retain a cause, when there is equity in any part of it. The Lords therefore ordered the hearing of the cause, spent several days in it, and having with much patience heard all that could be said on both sides, appointed a day to consider what was fit to be done 'super totam materiam.' Upon which day, after a solemn debate, they came to this resolution only in general, That Thomas Skinner was to be relieved by that House: And referred it to a committee to consider what damages he had sustained by the governor and company trading to the East Indies, and to report their opinions, what recompence was fit to be given him for the same.

Whilst the business was under the consideration of the Committee, and before the House of Peers had made any determination of it, a Petition was said to be presented by the East India Company, unto the House of Commons; which I will set down word for word before I give it any epithet, and upon reading it, I think every unprejudicate man will say, one cannot give it an epithet bad enough; the Petition was thus:

"To the Honourable the Commons of England in Parliament assembled: The humble Petition of the Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the East Indies.

"Humbly sheweth;

"That Thomas Skinner lately exhibited a Petition to the right honourable the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, against your Petitioners (many of which are and were members of this honourable House, when the said Petition was exhibited) for injuries pretended to be done by your Petitioners' factors in the East Indies, in seizing his ship, goods and money, and dispossessing him of a small island there: all which matters (excepting what concerns the island) are matters clearly determinable in his majesty's ordinary courts of law, as by the judges attending their lordships, hath been resolved and reported; And for the island, the same is parcel of the dominions of a foreign prince, and so the right thereof only determinable by the laws of that prince. That though the Petitioners did humbly tender a plea to their lordships, for that the Petition was in nature of an original complaint (concerning commoners only) and not brought to their lordships by Writ of Error, or Bill of Review, or any way of Appeal, and that the matters therein were relievable in the courts of Westminster-hall, and thereupon prayed the judgment of that high court, whether it would please to take further cognizance thereof: Yet their lordships have been pleased not only to give a hearing to all the matters in the said Petition contained, but have denied to grant the Petitioners a commission, or so much as time to send for their witnesses now inhabiting upon the place, where the injuries were pretended to be done, and without whose testimony it was impossible for the Petitioners to make their defence.

"That upon the said hearing, their lordships were further pleased to appoint a Committee to assess damages against your Petitioners, which Committee is now proceeding thereon accordingly, whereby several members of this honourable house, who are of the said Company as well as others your Petitioners, may be highly detrimented. All which proceedings, as your Petitioners humbly submit to your honourable judgments, are against the laws and statutes of this nation, and custom of parliament. In tender consideration whereof, and forasmuch as these unusual and extraordinary proceedings of their lordships are not only grievous to your Petitioners at present, but may also be a precedent of ill consequence to all the Commons of England hereafter, and forasmuch as your Petitioners have no way of relief in this case otherwise than by making their humble addresses to this honourable house, your Petitioners do therefore most humbly pray, That your honours will be pleased to take the premises into your grave considerations, and to interpose with their lordships for your Petitioners' relief therein, in such way and manner as to your great wisdoms shall seem meet. And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, shall pray, &c.

"Signed by the Order and in the Name of the said Governor and Company.

* "Copies of this flew about, were in every man's packet, and in every man's mouth, that the Lords were even forced to take notice of it, yet scarce could believe the House of Commons would receive such a Petition against them, so scandalous and so false; nor did they in the whole debate so much as mention the House of Commons, but looked upon it as a thing done without doors, thrown abroad, only to blast and asperse the House of Lords, and to bring them into the ill-opinion and distesteem of the people; which after a serious consideration and debate, their lordships voted, "To be a scandalous Libel against the House of Peers." And certainly so it was, both in matter and manner, and had the matter been true, yet the manner was scandalous: For though all had been true which was suggested, if the House of Lords had

* See vol. 1, p. 161.

The Lords then fell upon the consideration of the main business in question between Skinner and the East-India Company, and making reflexion upon what had been alledged on committed an error, had done something grievous to the Petitioners, yet was it most unfit for private men to censure their proceedings, declare them "to be unusual and extraordinary, to be against the laws and statutes of the nation, and custom of parliament, grievous to the Petitioners at present, and of ill consequence hereafter to all the Commons of England." Can the tongue of man utter more reproachful and stabbing words against any man or society of men? If this were true, do they deserve to live who are guilty of such things, to continue so much as members of any state or commonwealth, much less to have power and jurisdiction in it? Certainly to revile in this manner, and throw dirt upon the highest judicature of the kingdom, was a most transcendent presumption, and of a most dangerous consequence to the whole nation, even to those Commons of England, whom these Petitioners pretend for so much, making themselves as it were, their patrons and protectors, tribunes of the people, and withal endeavouring to bring an odium upon the whole peerage. What is this but sowing sedition between the two houses of parliament, and between the Peers and the Commons of England? And what can it tend to, but to the very dissolution of the frame of government? The Scripture saith, "Thou shalt not speak evil of the rulers of thy people," and Elihu in Job moves this question, "Is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked, and to princes, Ye are ungodly?" Yet these Rabbakehs dare heap up reproaches against the Lords of Parliament, and bring railing accusations against the highest order of magistracy under the king in the kingdom. And how little cause was given them for this, the preceding narrative of the proceedings of the Lords, is I think an evident demonstration. Their lordships had proceeded with all the tenderness imaginable, nothing of heat, nothing of precipitation had appeared in the whole transaction; They were not come to a full conclusion and determination of the business, which these merchants had no reason to suspect that it would be severe upon them; And they might at least have staid, till it had come, whatever it had been, and not have prejudged a court, before it declared itself, what judgment it would give: All it had then done, was but what the East-India company itself had, by their own offer of reparation for the wrong done, acknowledged to be just; For the Lords had only declared, that Skinner was fit to be relieved; but what relief, how much and in what sort, the Quid and the Quomodo, they had not determined, that was under the consideration of a committee. They themselves in their Answer to the Lords referrees appointed by his majesty in council, had offered to pay unto Skinner for nutmegs, white pepper, and some other things which had been unjustly taken from him by their factors and had been brought to their account, 3160 dollars; And 1521 dollars more they offered, for so many taken from him in specie: And by this they confess they had done him wrong, and were willing to give him some reparation: So without condemning themselves, they cannot say the Lords had as yet done amiss: and notwithstanding all this moderation and circumspection, that opprobrious railing petition was referred against them; and which besides was full of untruths.

"For the main matter in it, and which in truth had carried a shew of injustice had it been true, is absolutely false; And that is, that the Lords denied them a commission, or time to send for witnesses inhabiting upon the place without whose testimony it was impossible for them to make their defence; First it is not true, that the Lords denied them a commission or time to send for witnesses, for they never insisted upon it, which must have brought on a resolution of the House, and have been entered in the clerk's book, which was not: Some such thing was once said by some of the counsel at bar, but themselves went off it, knowing it would have grossly manifested their intent to delay longer a poor man, who had already spent seven years in the prosecution of that suit; And as untrue is it that they could not else make their defence, for multitudes of witnesses were produced by them, and all fully heard with patience, and enough acknowledged even by their own witnesses, and more by their own offer, formerly mentioned, of giving Skinner so many thousand dollars reparation, for the Lords to ground that opinion which they had then declared, which was only, That Skinner should be relieved: A second untruth is; That they say all the matters complained of were clearly determinable in the ordinary courts of justice, excepting what concerns the Island, whereas it appears there was likewise a dwelling house at Jamby, and a warehouse by the river side, of which they dispossessed him, which were not so determinable even by the report of the judges in their opinion (but in truth one may say no part of the complaint was so determinable,) they say untruly then in saying there was only the Island; that he could not be relieved in, and as untruly do they vouch the opinion of the judges for it, who expressly mention the House as well as the Island. A third untruth is, to say the Island was parcel of the dominions of a foreign Prince, and the right to it only determinable by the laws of that prince; Whereas that Prince had made an absolute bargain and sale, and a total alienation of it from his dominion, and so had put it out of the protection of his laws. A fourth (and which they had inserted to be a bait to draw on the House of Commons to espouse their quarrel) is, that they suggest within two days after the serving of this judgment, 2,000*l.* in 3 months after, and 2,000*l.* more in 3 months after that."

And they referred to the Committee for Privileges to examine, who was the publisher, and dispenser of that scandalous Paper or Petition, which they had voted a scandalous libel, and to make report thereof to the House.

The Commons, upon reading the above Petition, and upon its being owned by the Company's deputy governor, sir Samuel Barnardiston and others, ordered the committee recently appointed in respect to the jurisdiction of the Lords in the case of Mr. Fitton* and in similar cases, to consider this case also in point of grievance and extent of jurisdiction; and particularly recommended the dispatch of it to Mr. Solicitor General Finch and all the gentlemen of the long robe. From this committee there soon came a Report, and thereupon the House passed the two following Resolutions against the jurisdiction and proceedings of the Lords.

1. 'That the House of Lords taking cognizance of, and their proceedings upon the matter set forth and contained in the petition of Thomas Skinner merchant against the governor and company of merchants of London trading to the East Indies, concerning the complaint to be concerning commoners only, whereas the Lord Berckley of Berckley a member of the House of Peers, is likewise of that company, which intitles yet more particularly that House to the cognizance of the whole business upon point of privilege, one of their members being a party. All these untruths are in matter of fact. Then for their inference upon them, the judgment they give against the House of Lords, their censure of their proceedings, to be against the laws of the land, and the custom of parliament, to be unusual and extraordinary, to be a precedent of ill consequence to all the Commons of England now and hereafter, this I hope no man will say to have truth in it, but to be a false imputation and a slander, or (as the Lords themselves term it) a scandalous libel against the House of Lords. And as untrue it is, what they say in the close of their petition, and withal most injurious to the House of Peers, viz. That the petitioners had no way of relief in this case otherwise than by making their humble Addresses to the House of Commons: Whereas ever since parliaments have been in England, the constant practice hath been, (and multitudes of precedents there are of it,) of appealing to the next parliament from any judgment given by a former parliament, which was grievous and unjust; And never in this world before was there any appeal to the House of Commons from a judgment of the House of Peers, much less to take a business out of their hands, or give a stop to their proceedings, before they were come to a conclusion; Than which nothing can be a greater violation of the rights and privileges of either House; Nor would the House of Lords ever have endured, that any should have used the House of Commons so in any application unto their lordships. Yet upon the examination it appeared that this petition had been really presented to the House of Commons, and was there received." The Grand Question, p. 38.

* Mr. Hargrave has thus abridged this case. "It arose on petition to the Commons from a Mr. Fitton, complaining of some exercise of jurisdiction by the Lords: and on a report of the case from a committee that the matter of jurisdiction was fit to be argued at the bar of the House of Commons, the House appointed a day to hear it accordingly, and at the same time appointed a committee to inquire into precedents in cases of a like kind; and amongst the committee were named, Solicitor General Finch afterwards lord chancellor Nottingham, Mr. Serjeant Maynard, Mr. Vaughan afterwards lord chief justice, and Mr. Prynne; and the three latter were desired to take special care in the business. What was the precise nature of this case of Mr. Fitton, is not stated in the journal of the Commons or in the printed account of the debate. But from various entries in the journal of the Lords the substance of the case appears on the whole to have been to this effect. Mr. Fitton and three others had been formerly proceeded against before the Lords for contriving and publishing a libel upon lord Gerard of Brandon; and the Lords in July 1663 had sentenced Fitton in a fine of 500*l.* to imprisonment in the King's-bench prison till he should produce Abraham Granger whose name was to the libel, and to find securities for good behaviour during life, with direction to the chief justice of the King's-bench to take such securities. Under this sentence, in a case at least mixed with privilege, Fitton, notwithstanding a prerogation of parliament, which confessedly terminates imprisonment by the House of Commons in privilege cases, still continued in prison; and one William Carr, on his owning the same libel and his having dispersed it, had been recently adjudged by the Lords to pay a fine of 1,000*l.* and to imprisonment in the Fleet during the king's pleasure and to the pillory. Being both thus imprisoned by the Lords, Fitton and Carr resorted by several petitions to the Commons for relief. A committee was appointed upon Carr's petition as well as upon Fitton's. However no report appears to have been ever made upon the petition of Carr, and what became of his case is not mentioned, except that three years afterwards he published a relation of it and of his sufferings, with a plea against the jurisdiction of the House of Lords. But Fitton's petition was reported upon as fit for solemn argument at the bar of the House of Commons as to the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and was ordered to be argued accordingly in the manner before mentioned. It appears also, that the case was argued at the bar of the Commons by Fitton's counsel Mr. Offley, who said some strong things against the jurisdiction of the Lords, but is reproached with having so closely borrowed from a prior argument of the Solicitor General Finch afterwards lord chancellor Nottingham at the bar of the Lords, though in what case is not mentioned, as to have induced the latter to leave the Commons. When the argument was over, the debate was adjourned for a week. But the journal of the Commons is silent as to any further proceeding upon the case. Probably this case became absorbed in the consideration of the great case, which almost immediately followed, and brought the two houses to a direct issue on one great branch of the jurisdiction claimed by the Lords, but denied by the Commons: or perhaps the Commons thought this case of Fitton and that of Carr too much mixed with contempt and breach of privilege to be convenient cases to make their stand upon. However these two cases should not be forgotten. Either they were cases of breach of privilege and contempt, or they were not. If they were, the continuance of imprisonment after the prorogation of parliament, the fining, and every other part of the sentence in both cases, became disputable: for it may be asked, how on breach of privilege are the Lords warranted to do more than can be done by the Commons in a like case? on the other hand, if they were not cases of privilege and contempt, then the proceedings of the Lords against Fitton and Carr were open to the objection of an exercise by the Lords of an original jurisdiction over crime, of having adjudged a commoner for misdemeanor without impeachment of the Commons or the verdict of jury, and of having so expressed the imprisonment part of their sentence in both cases as to make it imprisonment for life, that is, in Fitton’s unless they should interpose to declare it terminated, and in Carr’s unless the king should please to determine it. To some of these objections Mr. Offley did in effect advert in arguing Fitton’s case. In remarking also upon the consequence of such an exercise of criminal jurisdiction by the peers, he pointedly said, the jurisdiction of the Star-Chamber is now transformed into the House of Lords, but somewhat in a nobler way. It did not occur to him to add, that the jurisdiction of the Star-Chamber, though justly odious both for the mode of trial and the excessive punishments it had inflicted, and therefore wisely abolished, was in some degree sanctioned by the statutes of the realm: but that it remained to explain how the House of Lords had obtained the like or any other sufficient sanction

‘the taking away of the petitioner’s ship and goods, and assaulting his person, and their lordships over-ruling the plea of the said Governor and Company, the said cause coming before that house originally, only upon the complaint of the said Skinner, and being a common plea, is not agreeable to the laws of this land, and tends to deprive the subject of his right, ease and benefit due to him by the said laws.’

2. ‘That the Lords taking cognizance of the right and title of the island in the petition mentioned, and giving damages thereupon against the said governor and company, is not warranted by the said laws of this land.’*

Hereupon the Lords came to two Resolutions:

1. ‘That the House of Commons entertaining the scandalous petition of the East India Company against the Lords House of parlia-for exercising the same jurisdiction; and how it could be proper to tolerate that in an hereditary kind of Star-Chamber, without the sanction of statute and without any other limitation than such as their own moderation should prescribe, which the legislature had so indignantly abolished, in the case of a court sanctioned by statute and not pretending to adjudge crime of a higher order than misdemeanor.

“But though these two cases of Fitton and of Carr, which probably are the earliest instances to be met with of direct petitions of complaint to the Commons against the Lords for excessive assumption of judicature by the latter, did not of themselves bring the two houses into actual quarrel with each other: yet there passed enough from the Commons to shew, that they were nearly ripe for serious contest on that head; and that as Fitton’s case had already provoked them to appoint a committee to consider of the exercise of jurisdiction by the Lords in all cases of the kind, and such committee was still existing, so very little of additional matter was requisite to excite the Commons into direct hostility.”

* The Committee had reported the three following Resolutions:

1. “That the proceedings of the House of Lords, upon the petition of Thomas Skinner, Merchant, against the governor and company of Merchants of London trading to the East Indies, Sir William Thompson, and several other members of the House of Commons, being members of the said Company,—are a breach upon the Privilege of the House of Commons.

2. “That the House of Lords assuming and exercising a jurisdiction, and taking cognizances of the matters set forth and complained of in the petition of Thomas Skinner, Merchant, against the Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading to the East Indies; and their lordships over-ruling of the plea of the said Governor and Company, put in to the jurisdiction of the said House of Lords;—the said cause coming before the House originally only upon the complaint of the said Thomas Skinner, and the matters in the said petition complained of, concerning the taking away of the said petitioner’s ship and goods, and assaulting his person, being relievable in the ordinary courts of law;—is contrary to the law of the land, and tends to the depriving of the subject of the benefit of the known law, and the introducing of an arbitrary way of proceeding.

3. “That the House of Lords, in the cause

'ment, and their proceedings, examinations and votes thereupon had and made, are a breach of the privileges of the House of Peers, and contrary to the fair correspondence which ought to be between the two Houses of parliament, and unexampled in former times.

2. 'That the House of Peers taking cognizance of the cause of Thomas Skinner merchant, a person highly oppressed and injured in East India by the Governor and Company of merchants of London trading thither, and over-ruling the plea of the said Company, and adjudging 5,000*l.* damages thereupon against the said Governor and Company, is agreeable to the laws of the land, and well warranted by the law and custom of parliament, and justified by many parliamentary precedents ancient and modern.'

Two Conferences past between the Houses upon this occasion: One asked by the House of Commons, the other by the Lords, and what past at both, the Objections of the one side, and the others Answers, what was said by the Commons against the proceedings of the Lords, and what by the Lords to maintain what they had depending before them, upon the petition of Thomas Skinner, Merchant, against the Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading to the East Indies, allowing of affidavits taken before masters of the Chancery, and a judge of the Admiralty, as proof in the said cause, wherein also the Governor and Company had no liberty to cross-examine the said persons making such affidavits; and the House of Lords not granting a commission to the said Governor and Company for the examination of their witnesses, the same being desired by the said Governor and Company, is illegal, and a grievance to the subjects." 3 Hatsell, p. 337.

"The Lords were much surprised with these votes, which gave them cause to make a serious reflection upon what had passed in the business of Skinner, and to take a due examination of all circumstances, The way that it came unto them at first, upon the king's recommendation, their own right to take cognizance of, judge and determine and give redress in causes of that nature; then the merits of this particular cause, a poor man oppressed by great ones, very unable to contest with them at law, and so very unlikely there to receive relief, and have any reparation from them (admitting it had been in the power of the law to have helped him, which it was not) and the manner of their proceeding in the hearing, examining and determining of it, in which they had used all the moderation imaginable, going by steps and degrees, taking first the opinion of the judges, to know if the man were relievable elsewhere; who said he was but in part, and not for all relievable in Westminster-Hall, which made them undertake it; then giving way to and bearing with many delays of the East-India Company, suffering the business upon several pretences and excuses of theirs to be put off many days, done; the substance of all that was said on both sides, I shall here set down as briefly as I can, as I find them entered in the Journal Book of the House of Lords, where they are now a public record.

The gentlemen of the House of Commons, that managed the Conference on their parts, endeavoured to maintain their votes by shewing the reasons of them.

They said, That pleas being of two natures, common pleas and pleas of the crown, in this case they said they did not meddle with any part of their lordships judicature concerning pleas of the crown, this being of the first sort, and those being of two natures, personal, or real actions, and in both all proceedings must be by the king's original writ. And this being a case between person and person, and so a common plea, ought to be proceeded in the ordinary way by the king's original writ: Precedents were brought for this, ushered in with a preamble "That where the party never pleads to the jurisdiction of the court, it is ordinary for courts to proceed, though in cases not within their jurisdiction." The precedents cited were out of the Placita Parliamentaria, four in Edw. 1's time.

when their lordships were prepared to hear it, and had laid aside other business for it, by which means a whole session was lost to the poor man; and when at the next meeting of the parliament it was heard, in which a great deal of time, and very many days were spent, yet not presently to come to a resolution, but appoint a day for the debate of it, and when that day came, not to give a full judgment, but only pass a previous vote, 'That some relief was fit to be given,' and take longer time to consider what and how much, and refer it to the consideration of a Committee to prepare it for the House; and that then, in that interim of time, before any thing was determined, whilst but in agitation and under consideration what should be done, a scandalous false railing petition to be delivered to the House of Commons against the House of Peers, contrary to all usage, right and privilege of parliament, and what was expressly forbidden, 9 H. 4. n. 22. And this notwithstanding (not knowing upon what mistake, for a mistake it must have been) to be received with approbation by the House of Commons, and seconded and confirmed by those fore-mentioned votes, which were brought up to the Lords, and declared unto them at a public conference: all these things considered, made the Lords very sensible, who thought, if there had been failings, that a gentler application had yet been more convenient: but conscious to themselves of none, and very confident that what they had done was most justifiable by the constant course and practice of their House, and in itself most just and equitable, they conceived it absolutely necessary for the vindication of themselves and the asserting their rights, to pass likewise two Votes in answer to the two of the House of Commons." The grand Question, p. 50.

1 Precedent, 18 E. 1. "Johannes de Insula against the bishop of Winton, fol. 33. John de Insula prosecutes for the king, complains that the bishop had disposed of an Hospital which belonged to queen Eleanor the king's mother, and ejected her tenant, the bishop pleads, that he found his church seised of that advowson, et petit Judicium si debeat sine Brevi Domini Regis inde respondere;" The Judgment is, "Et quia prædictus Episcopus invenit Ecclesiam suam seisitam de prædicta advocacione tempore Creationis suæ, Ideo ipse quoad hoc eat inde sine die ad præsens, et Dominus Rex habeat Breve versus ipsum Episcopum, quod reddat ei Advocacionem, &c. et quoad Ejectionem inquiretur veritas per Patriam."

2 Precedent, in the same parliament 18 E. 1. "The Case of Hugh de Louthor and the heirs of Henry de Edelynthorp, f. 43, Where it was much insisted upon these words, "Nec est Juri consonum vel hactenus in Curia ista usitatum, quod aliquis sine Lege Communi et Brevi de Cancellaria de Libero Teneimento suo respondent, Et maxime in Casu ubi Breve de Cancellaria locum habere potest, Therefore, dictum est prædicto Adæ, quod sibi perquirat per Breve de Cancellaria, si sibi viderit expedire."

3. The Case of William de Valentia earl of Pembroke, Jane his wife and Isabell le Mareschal 18 E. 1. p. 44. "Isabell complains of the earl for assuming jurisdiction in the commote or hundred of Esterlow, (which is in the king's county of Kermerdyn, and not in Pembroke-shire which belongs to the Earl,) and ejecting her; he pleads that he is seised of it in the right of his wife, and they crave judgment, si sine Brevi Domini Regis inde debent respondere; the judgment is, Quia prædicti Willielmus et Johanna sunt in Seisina de prædicta Jurisdictione per discensum hæreditarium, et non per Usurpationem seu Purpresturam, quod eat inde sine die ad præsens, et Dominus Rex habeat Breve si voluerit." The gentlemen of the House of Commons observed upon this, "That if there had been a crime, as usurpation or purpresture, such cases had usually been tried in the Lords House, but then added, That if that had been the case, much might be said now, how the constitution of the government hath been altered since."

The 4th Precedent in the 18th of E. 1. f. 51, was the case of Roger de Somerton and the prior of Buttele; "Somerton follows for the king, and by petition complains, that the prior unjustly withheld from the king the manor of Somerton: the prior answers, that he holds it in the right of his church of Buttele, et petit Judicium si debeat inde sine brevi domini regis respondere; the judgment is, Ideo prædictus prior quoad hoc eat inde sine die ad præsens, et dominus rex habeat breve, &c." And this though the king was concerned, as was observed by them.

By these Precedents they said it did appear, that in cases of freehold there is no proceeding without an original writ, and then necessarily and demonstratively it must follow; that the Lords cannot judge in these cases, for there was never any writ returnable Coram Domini Spiritualibus et Temporalibus, none such is found in the Register, or Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium: and the reason they said was the same for personal actions, as those that concern freehold, that Magna Charta and several statutes made in Ed. 3's time provide for our trial by our peers.

Some other Precedents they mentioned out of the roll of petitions answered in the parliament of 14 E. 2, as that of William le Rous f. 408. Complaining of the kings bayliffs, who had twice dispossessed him of a house in Westminster, and praying remedy; the answer was, Habeat Breve novæ disseisinæ in suo casu.

Then that the bishop of Winton elect in the same page, complaining that the king's officers had cut down the woods of the bishopric during the vacancy, and praying remedy; the answer is, Habeat breve de transgress. in Canc.

Next of Joane the widow of John Fouks, p. 409, by petition complaining of a wast committed in the manor of Radewynter; the answer is, Sequatur ad legem communem.

Another Precedent of Mariote the wife of Robert de Carle in the same page, praying remedy for a breach of the peace by the parson of Wormele and others, the answer is, Adeat cancell. et habeat ibi breve in suo casu.

And to a petition of Robert le Sausser, p. 410, for a debt due to him, answered, Habeat in cancell. breve de debito.

The last Precedent cited was p. 411. Ralph de Draiton parson of Luffenham complaining against Robert de Vere and others for imprisoning him, till he resigned his living, taking away his goods, and committing other violences, for which he had a commission of inquiry in the country of York, and now prayed remedy: The answer is 'quoad resignationem non pertinet ad regem, et quoad commissionem habendam, ostendat in cancellaria primam commissionem et ibi respondeatur. Et habeat similiter in cancell. Brevia de transgressionibus sibi factis contra pacem, &c.'

To this first part of that conference, the Lords when they came to theirs, gave for answer in the first place, that they could not but observe something unusual in the very title of the petition, differing from the ancient stile of those presented to the House of Commons; then that they were much surprised, reading the petition to find so many falsities, and yet to hear the gentlemen that managed for the House of Commons say, that their House had examined it, and found all the allegations in it to be true; whereas in truth there were in it almost as many falsehoods as lines; those falsehoods have been mentioned before, so as it is not needful again to repeat them. The Lords took notice after, of the unusual proceeding of the House of Commons, to take cognizance of any matter depending in their House, before their lordships had given any judgment therin, or communicated the same unto them; and to examine, proceed upon, and censure by vote the proceeding of the House of Peers, which they said the House of Commons could not legally do, because they were not a court of judicature in any case, much less of the House of Peers, which is the highest judicature: and that in truth they had not means to come to the knowledge of the truth, whereby to found a right judgment, because they have not power to give an oath; nor in this particular had they heard any more than one side, having not heard Skinner at all: nor yet had they conferred with the Lords, by which means they might have come to the knowledge of the grounds and reasons upon which their lordships had proceeded; so as the Lords could not but wonder at this judgment, which had been past upon them.

Then they came to that assertion concerning Common Pleas, That they must be proceeded in by the king's original writ, and consequently not before the Lords, for which the House of Commons brought some precedents, to prove that freeholds were never examined in parliament, but always left to the remedy at law; and in the next place the Lords took into consideration how they began their precedents with this preamble; "That where the party never pleads to the jurisdiction of the court, it is ordinary for courts to proceed, though in cases not within their jurisdiction."

To which the Lords said in the first place, as to the assertion viz. "That all Common Pleas must be proceeded in by original writ and consequently not before the Lords," That it was as easy for them to assert the contrary, and upon better grounds; being able to shew precedents all along from the first and the most ancient records we have, down to the latest and most modern ones of the proceedings of parliaments, even within the memory and knowledge of every young man, that the House of Peers have still exercised this jurisdiction, even in particular cases of meum et tuum, between man and man, when they have thought good, (though that but rarely) and when moved to it by something extraordinary in the case; and that no House of Peers hath done it less, and been more tender of entertaining such businesses, and more unwilling to be troubled with them, than this present House of Peers, upon which so much blame is laid, and which is the only House of Peers that ever private persons (found guilty and censured by it for foul oppressions) did presume in that manner to accuse and impeach to any court or council or company of men, no not to the king himself; or that ever were censured, and such votes passed upon before. But we shall hereafter in its due place examine the matter of this assertion, and shall shew that it holds not true even in the ordinary courts of Westminster-Hall, whether of common law, or equity, where cases of mens freeholds are tried every day without any original writ, and much less in parliament. In the mean time we will take things in order as they were delivered.

And to the preamble which ushered in the precedents, "That where the party never pleads to the jurisdiction, it is ordinary for courts to proceed, though in cases not within their jurisdiction," upon which the inference must be, that precedents then signify nothing to prove a jurisdiction though never so many, though a constant series of them in all times be made appear, except there be still a pleading to the jurisdiction, and that plea overruled; the Lords thought this a strange argumentation, and took the force of the argument to lie rather the other way, that it is a clearer proof of a jurisdiction to have it never or seldom questioned, and be still exercised and submitted unto, than if it be sometimes opposed, though it be made good and maintained against that opposition: and they thought, that in this particular case, they had good warrant for their jurisdiction, finding it so seldom opposed, even by the House of Commons own shewing, who could bring but four precedents, where any had pleaded to their jurisdiction, and the plea seemingly admitted, (for it is but seemingly, as will be shewed upon the examination of the precedents themselves:) whereas multitudes were produced of the exercise of their jurisdiction, and some, where the parties had desired a trial at common law, and the Lords would not grant it, as that of William Paynell and Margaret his wife in the Placita Parliamentaria of the 30 of Ed. 1, p. 231: The case was this; Margaret had been formerly the wife of John Cameys, and he yet living had left him, (as she alledged) with his consent, and lived with Paynell as his wife, and was married to him: Cameys dying, Paynell and she sue for the thirds of the manor of Torpell which had been the land of Cameys. It was objected on the other side, that she lived in adultery with Paynell in Cameys life time, and so had forfeited her dower. They upon that desire to be tried by their country, if adultery or no; What say the House of Peers? Do they send them into the country as is desired? No, Videtur curia quod non est necesse contra tantas tamque manifestas evidencias, præsumptiones, probationes, &c. ad aliquam inquisitionem patriæ capiendam procedere, &c. Et ideo consideratum est quod prædicti Wilhelmus et Margareta nihil capiant per petitionem suam, sed sint in misericordia pro falso clamore, &c.

This shews that the Lords sometimes would retain causes, though sometimes they did dismiss them, not for want of jurisdiction, but as it seemed to them convenient, and their occasions would give leave, and as they had or had not leisure for it from the greater affairs of the kingdom, or that some circumstances in the merits of a cause made it more or less worthy of their consideration. As if one of the parties was powerful in his country, and suspected to have an influence upon the juries, the Lords would then sometimes retain a business and determine it themselves.

As in 8 R. 2, N. 24. The Case of John earl of Pembroke and William le Zouch complaining that they were sued for certain lands in Yorkshire by Thomas the son of sir Robert Roos of Ingmanthorp, and alledge, That the said Thomas sought to come to a trial in the country, which he had gained and corrupted. And therefore pray for redress, and a trial by parliament, giving this reason for it, 'Que ils par tels malveis compasemens, et procuremens en pais ne soient desheritez. That they may not lose their inheritance by such wicked contrivances and practices in the country. Do the Lords then suffer it to go on to trial in the country? No, they take the matter into their own hands, appoint John Knevet, and John Cavendish Chief Justice, and John Belknap Chief Justice of the Common Pleas to examine it and make report to them, which they did.

And so likewise in the Case of Pontyngdon and Courtney, 4 H. 4, n 21, Sir Philip Courtney a great man in the country oppresses Pontyngdon, dispossesses him of his land by force, he comes to the Lords, 'praies pur 'Dieu et en œuvre de charite d'ordeigner remede en cell cas.' For God's sake and as a work of charity that they would give remedy in this case. "Sets forth in his petition, that he had before in a parliament held at Winchester made his complaint, at which time sir Philip laid the bastardy of his father as a bar, and that the Lords answer then was, That he should have right done him, and committed the business to the archbishop of Canterbury to take care of it; That before the archbishop, sir Philip and he agreed to go to a trial upon that issue, and that there should be a sufficient jury of the principal knights and esquires of the country, but that sir Philip had named some of those principal men, and withal poor men of less sufficiency, to the intent, that the great men making default, the poor should stand, and that these poor men durst not against sir Philip, maintain the truth, 'les queux pources hommes n'oisent envers le dit sir Philip la verite dire.' That thereupon he petitioned again the Lords in the next parliament sitting at Westminster, and informed them of all these particulars, whereupon they ordered a Writ to go to the judges of Assize of that country, commanding them to admit none to be of the jury, but such as had 40l. a year land, and those to be chosen out of the whole country notwithstanding any usage or challenge to the contrary; But that now sir Philip finding that the charge of Bastardy would not hold, contriving still the wrongful disinherison of the petitioner, had started a release unduly gotten from one Thomas Pontyngdon a parson, whose heir the petitioner is, and the petitioner is thereby like to be ruined, 'si il neit vostre tres hautissime et tres excellent secours et aide.' If the Lords would not afford him their most high and excellent succour and help." This was the effect of the Petition. The Lords upon this make an order to direct the trial, the point in issue to be the bastardy, that the release should be laid aside as null and void, 'that if the bastardy be proved, Pontyngdon shall be for ever barred to sue hereafter, and if not proved, but that his father was mulier, he should then recover the land with costs and damages; And they further order writ to the sheriff to impanel none of the jury, that had not 40l. per annum land. So then three several times, in three several parliaments did the Lords take cognizance of this cause, being a common plea for a man's freehold, and that originally in the first instance, not upon an appeal, or Writ of Error, or any of those ways to which the House of Commons would now limit them; they direct the trial, the issue, the condition and qualification of the jury, and the judgment: and if this be not taking cognizance of a cause, I know not what is: And well was it for that poor gentleman, That the Lords had that jurisdiction that they could take cognizance of his cause, to give him relief then: As now it was well for Skinner, that the Lords took cognizance of his; otherwise this powerful company had trampled him in the dirt and ruined him, as that violent man sir Philip Courtney (for so he appears to have been by several complaints against him in the parliaments of those times) had served Pontyngdon: And well will it still be for many a poor man to have such an asylum, such a city of refuge to fly unto, to save himself from the violence and oppression of power and greatness. And perhaps some of those who now endeavour to lay low the House of Peers, who would make it to be of no signification, to have no power, no influence upon the kingdom, but as salt that hath lost its savour, only 'Magni nominis umbra,' a name of peerage without ability to help themselves or any body else; perhaps I say, even some of them, should they prevail now, may hereafter repent it, and wish they had not removed an ancient landmark, which heretofore was in veneration, and looked upon, as that which bounds both power and liberty, and is a guard to both by keeping both within their due limits, and hath ever been held most necessary to the constitution, the government of this kingdom for the preservation of it, and as serviceable to monarchy for the keeping up of regal dignity and authority, as useful to the subject for the maintaining of his just liberty and freedom.

But let us go on with the Conference, and see what was said by the Lords to the precedents cited by the Commons.

To the first of John de Insula against the bishop of Winchester, the Lords said, it was no dismission of the bishop for want of jurisdiction, for then it would not have been said, 'Ea inde adprovens,' but rather 'ad perpetuum'; this is but a temporary dismission; no more but as if they had said, Well, the bishop saith, he was seized of that advowson in right of his church; Let the king, for whom John de Insula prosecutes, take his writ out of the Chancery, and try for that; And for the ejection tion complained of, let that be tried by a jury of the country, and see if things can be so ended; If not, come again then, and we will hear you; But for the present we dismiss you. So the Lords concluded, That this precedent made nothing against their jurisdiction.

To the second of Hugh de Louthur and the heir of Edelyngthorp, upon which the Commons did so much insist, and particularly upon the expression, 'Nec est juri consonum, nec hactenus in ista curia usitatum,' &c. The Lords said, That neither this precedent well examined would make much against them; For that Adam concerning whom and upon whose occasion that was said, was not at all before the Lords as a party in the cause before them, but came in of himself, unsent for, unlooked for, lays in a claim which the Lords of that parliament had not heard of before, nor did at all then question: so as it cannot be said that there was any dismission of him or of his business; but the Lords say, Let him pursue and recover his land by a writ out of the Chancery if he will, and that he sees it convenient for him 'si sibi viderit expedire,' and they go on to determine the business which was before them: The case was thus, Thomas de Normanvil an escheator, had order concerning Hugh de Louthur for certain lands then in his possession, which had been seised into the king's hands, as held of him in capite formerly by Henry de Edelyngthorp, to whom one Eston had granted them and to the heirs of his body lawfully begotten, and having none to return to Eston, under whom now Louthur claimed. The Order was, That Louthur should give pledge to come and answer at that parliament for the profits of those lands to the king: Louthur comes as he was bound, and at the same time one Adam comes also, pretends himself to be son and heir to Edelyngthorp, and demands the land, Louthur said, He is a bastard, and the lands belong not to him: And the Lords they say, they have nothing to do with him, let him sue for his land where he thinks best, and so send him away, but Louthur they adjudge to do his homage, and to be answerable to the king for the rent: And for the title of the land what do they? do they let it alone, and meddle no more with it, as a thing not at all within their cognizance or jurisdiction? nothing less: they command the escheator Normanvil to make enquiry upon oath, if Edelyngthorp had any heir lawfully begotten, who he was, and upon what title he claimed, and to give an account of it at the next parliament, 'Ita quod idem escaetor ad proximum parlamentum post festum Sancti Michaelis domino regi dictinctè et apertè inde respondeat.' So as the Lords then were far from thinking they must not meddle with such things: And for that expression of 'Non est consonum,' &c. rendered as the ground of that judgment of dismission; first it is answered, it was no judgment at all, not only of dismission, for Adam was no party in the cause; then it is no part of the judgment, if there were a judgment, but precedes it; the judgment, such as it is, or rather the answer to Adam's demand, follows in these words, 'Dictum est prædicto Adæ quod sibi perquirat per breve de cancellaria si sibi viderit expedire,' so as the preceding words may perhaps have been but inserted by the clerk that entered the Order; but take it at the strongest, admit that the Lords then present in the house had inserted those words, as their sense at that time, is that binding to the House, that it may not be of another opinion at another time? In that very parliament of 18 E. 1, how many times have they been of another mind? how many examples are there of particular causes judged and determined by them? And shall one swallow make a summer, one single precedent overbalance multitudes of precedents to the contrary?

In the last place it was said, That this precedent did not quadrare, suit with this present Case of Skinner's, for that was merely concerning a liberum tenementum and within the realm where the law had free course, here is rapine, oppression, spoiling of goods, dispossessing one of an island in foreign parts, extra potestatem legis, assaulting the person of a fellow subject, a violent interruption of the trade and commerce of the nation; which concerns the government of the kingdom, is a matter of state, and highly entrenches upon the authority of the king, which will suffer much, if he suffer one subject to exercise a tyrannical dominion over another, though in another country: And is against the profit of the king, which is much concerned, That no violence be used in the management of trade to bring a scandal upon the nation, make it stink in foreign parts, that none will have to do with us, which must needs become the ruin of our trade and so of all his customs.

If one merchant do that which is prejudicial to another, or to a company, let them complain of him to the king, who will command him home and punish him: And if he will not come, for that may be objected, being so far off, out of reach, then the king will give them leave that are wronged and grieved by him to right themselves. But that they should do it of themselves and in their own case be judges, witnesses and executioners, is against all reason and justice. So the Lords were not at all convinced with this precedent neither, but still thought they had done very well in censuring the East India Company for their misdemeanors and wrongs done to Skinner, and in adjudging them to give Skinner reparation for it.

The third precedent was that of William de Valentia and Isabel de Mareschal, in which the Lords observed the dismission to have been only ad præsens; but withal observed that the bare reading of the case in the book will satisfy one of the jurisdiction of the Peers, to retain such causes: It says, That William de Valentia had at the foregoing parliament been 'ad querelas Isabelle le Mareschall allocutus et ad rationem positus,' impleaded and put to er, by what right he assumed such an office and such power in the hundred of Hosterteth, and that he then alleged he did it in the right of his wife, and that it being his wife's inheritance he ought not to be put to answer without her, 'Ita quod datus fuit dies ei ad hunc diem ad parlamentum domini regis, viz. a die Paschæ in tres septimanas.' And then his wife and he appeared by their attorney, and after pleadings, the Judgment is, 'Quia prædicti Willielmus et Johanna sunt in seisinâ de prædicta jurisdictione et de hæreditate ipsius Johannæ per descensum hæreditarium et non per usurpationem seu purpresturam, &c. Consideratum est, quod eant inde sine die quoad præsens: et dominus rex habeat breve si voluerit,' &c. The Lords knew they had jurisdiction, else they would have dismissed the cause the parliament before, and not have adjourned it to the next parliament upon that ground to make the wife a party, as we see they did: And whereas the Commons had upon this precedent observed, that if there had been crime in the case, as usurpation or purpresture, then they acknowledged that in such cases the House of Lords did usually proceed and try them, but withal added, That if that were the question, much might be said how the constitution of government hath been since altered: so as they soon retracted their admittance of but so much of the Lords' right, and what they had given with their right hand, they would soon take again with their left.

But first, for their concession of judging crime, the Lords say, that suffices for their indemnity as to what they have done in this particular case of the East India Company and Skinner, for here is crime sufficient, and usurpation and purpresture, taking them in the larger sense for invading any other man's right, and not only where the king is concerned, as those terms are taken sometimes: And then for the qualification of their gift upon the change and alteration of the government, the Lords answer, That when they shew the time when that alteration was made, and the persons by whom, and the manner how (if legally done) they shall then believe and submit, and not till then: but they never heard of anything that till now so much as looked that way, except that vote of the assembly called the Rump, which declared the House of Lords useless and dangerous, and therefore to be abolished and taken away; and by a club law they did take it away. But even they that passed that vote, and did make that club law, thought the judicature necessary and fit to be continued, for they immediately assumed it to themselves, and fairly voted themselves into that power by the name of the Commons of England, the very same title that the East India Company do now make use of in their Petition to the House of Commons.

To the 4th of Roger de Somerton prosecuting for the king, and complaining of the prior of Buttele, for unjustly withholding from the king the manor of Somerton; and the judgment upon it, 'Ideo prædictus prior quo ad hoc eat inde sine die ad præsens:' the Lords say, it is but a temporary dismissal as the others were, and signifies nothing as to the point of jurisdiction: and they wish the Commons would have pleased to cast their eye upon the ensuing case in the same leaf, of William de Valentia again, and of him upon the same occasion (concerning his wife's inheritance as formerly,) where there is not a dismissal of the cause as formerly, but a determination of it, and that determination again referred unto and confirmed by a succeeding parliament, to shew that the house of Lords sometimes would and sometimes would not judge and determine such causes as were brought before them: that case was thus, William de Valentia complains of the Lords of the council for admitting, during the king's absence beyond the seas, one Dionisia a pretended daughter of William de Monte Caniso tenant to the king of lands held in capite and formerly enjoyed by her father in his life time, whereas his wife was true heir to that William, and the land belonging to her; the lords of the council justify what they have done, say that Dionisia was notoriously known to be the true daughter of that William, and that the bishop of Winchester, in whose diocese she was born, testified it: the judgment is, 'Ideo videtur domino regi quod prædictus comes, thesaurar. et alii de consilio bene et ritè processerunt.' It is not now 'sibi perquirat per breve de cancel.' They do not refer him to the chancery, as they did in the other case. This was in 18 E. 1. In 20 E. 1. p. 103. he comes again to parliament, and renews his complaint, and that judgment given before is confirmed; the words are these, 'Et de alijs petitionibus suis, viz. De hæreditate Willielmi de Monte Caniso petenda, et etiam quod procedatur juxta Bullam quam idem Willielmus et Johanna impetrarunt ad iniciendum processum, per quod Dionisia filia prædicti Willielmi legitima censebatur, alias eis responsum fuit, viz. in parlamento post natale Domini anno 18. ut patet in rotulis ejusdem parlamenti, ad quam responsum se teneant, &c.' Nothing can be clearer than the continual practice of this jurisdiction in the house of Lords, whensoever they pleased.

Not that it hath always pleased them to trouble themselves with exercising this jurisdiction, their time having been so taken up some times with businesses of a higher nature, that they could not attend it, so as many times they have tied up themselves by an order of the house, not to receive any private business: as in the close roll 18 E. 1. there is a memorable order to that purpose; I will set it down at length in the very words which are these, 'Purtes ke la gent ke venant al parlement le roy sunt sovent destaez et destourbez a great grevance de eux e de la curt par la multiudine des peticions ke suent botez devant le roy, de quevz le plus porreient estre espleytez par chanceler et par justices, purveu est, ke tutes les petitions ke tuchent le sel vegnent primes

'al chancelier, e ceux ke tuchent justices v ley
'veynent a justices, e ceux ke tuchent justice
'veynent a justices de le juerie. Et si les be-
'soings seent si gruns v si de graces, ke le chan-
'celer e ces autres ne le pussent fere sans le rey
'dunk ils les porterunt par lur meins de meine
'devant le roy pur savorer sa volenté. Ensi-
'que nulle petition ne veigne devant le roy e
'son conseil fors par les mains des avaunt ditz
'chanceler e les autres chef ministres. Ensi ke
'le roy e sun conseil pussent sanz charge de
'autre busoignes entendre a grosses busoignes
'de sun reame e de ses foreignes terres.

Thus in English, 'in regard the people who come to the king's parliament, are oft delayed and disturbed to the great grievance of themselves and of the court, by the multitude of petitions exhibited before the king, of which most could be dispatched by the chancellor and justices; it is provided, that all petitions, that concern the seal shall come first to the chancellor, and those that concern the exchequer, to the exchequer, and those that concern the justices, or the law, shall come to the justices, and those that concern the Jews to the justices appointed for the Jews; and if the businesses be so great, or so of grace as the chancellor and the rest cannot end them without the king, then they shall with their own hands bring them before the king to know his pleasure therein; so as no petition shall come to the king and his council, but brought by the chancellor and those chief ministers: that so the king and his council, may without the trouble of other business, attend the great businesses of his kingdom, and of his foreign dominions.'

This is the Order, in which two reasons are expressed, for their not receiving particular petitions, one in the beginning, the other in the end, first the ease of the petitioners, and of the house itself, which for their multitudes could not give every one his dispatch; and secondly, that freed of them it might attend the public business of the kingdom; not for want of jurisdiction. And yet be all manner of businesses so put by? No; Great ones, and such as need grace and favour, are still reserved: but take it at the strongest, admit they had put all out of their own power, yet it will be granted, they had power, till they did in this manner divest themselves of it; It appears they had by the order itself, which mentions such multitudes of petitions; I then ask, if such resolution of the house at that time could be binding to perpetuity? The houses of parliament we know are masters of their own orders, and themselves when they please alter the orders they have made; much less then be they binding to succeeding parliaments. And it is obvious to every man, who will either look into the records of ancient parliaments, or will but recollect his memory and call to mind what hath passed in our late parliaments, that in all times the House of Peers hath acted contrary to this order; taking cognizance even of smaller matters, which the ordinary courts of justice do every day dispatch: and no house of peers did ever do it less than this, which in ruth hath not done it at all, though it be now so quarrelled with for having relieved one poor man from the oppression of the mighty, when no inferior court could do it: and this too the only cause of this nature that they have meddled with during this whole parliament which hath lasted so many years, and hath had so many sessions; and a cause particularly recommended unto them by the king (who is the fountain of all justice;) not one taken up by themselves, which makes not their case the worse, as it may well be hoped.

But suppose there had been no reservation at all in that order of 8 E. 1. of any cause or any business, but that the king and lords had at that time bound up themselves absolutely from meddling with any of those petitioners cases and for the present waved the exercise of their jurisdiction in all such matters, had this been a renouncing of their jurisdiction and quitting it for ever? No court but may upon some particular occasion suspend and wave it's jurisdiction, it doth not therefore follow that it must never make use of it again. The court of chancery doth sometimes appoint a trial at law of points in a cause, which it might have determined itself if it had pleased; and at another time it will determine things of the same nature, the House of Peers may do the same and wave their jurisdiction when they please. It did it 13 R. 2. n. 10. in Changeour's case. Adam Changeour (so is his name in the record though the Exact Abridgment calls him John) petitions the king and lords against sir Robert Knolls, sets forth, how owing 2000*l.* to sir Robert and his wife Constance, he had let him have lands to receive the rent till he was satisfied his debt; that sir Robert had received more than his money due, yet kept the land, so prays remedy. The Answer is indorsed upon the petition, Let a writ be directed to sir Robert Knolls to appear in parliament the Friday after Candlemas next, to answer the things contained in the petition. Upon hearing the business the Lords leave it to be tryed at the common law. This seems a stronger precedent for trying all at law and not in parliament, than any which the gentlemen of the House of Commons urged at the conference; for here was an absolute dismission of the cause, and not ad præsens only, as was in their precedents. But I believe such wise and knowing men could not but see, that this precedent would not so much have helped one way, as done prejudice to their case another way. The prejudice, it would have done had been this, that themselves by their own shewing had overthrown one of their main arguments, which was, that all proceedings in cases of freehold should be by the king's writ, and that no writ was ever made returnable 'Coram dominis spiritualibus et temporalibus;' Whereas here had been in their own precedent mention of a writ returnable in parliament, which is tantamount, and signifies the same thing: but I have in this discourse given examples of several others in the same kind, where writs are issued by order of parliament returnable in parliament: and many more there are, if it were necessary: and worth the trouble to set them down. And then, what had they gotten by telling us, that the Lords once would not retain a cause, which was tryable at law, and would for once waive their jurisdiction in such matters? when it was shewed to them by multitudes of precedents, that the Lords had most frequently done otherwise at other times in cases of the same nature.

And precedents in the affirmative are those that prove a jurisdiction, especially when many in number are produced, and some of all times and in every king's reign (of which the records can be had,) which shews a continuance of, and so an unquestionable right to such a power. One, or two, or twenty then in the negative (that the Lords did not do so in such and such cases) may I say more, were the number equal as many in the negative as in the affirmative, yet it could not disprove their jurisdiction; it would only shew, that their lordships were free agents, to do it or not do it, as they saw cause; but their jurisdiction remained still entire to do it, whensoever they would.

And when all is done, I may say, all this is 'Nihil ad rem,' and concerns not the point in question, which is, if the Lords have done well or ill in relieving Skinner against the East-India Company, for he was not relievable at the common law (as hath been shewed:) and if he had not been relieved, there had been a failure of justice: so as there was a necessity of their lordships acting in that particular, to keep up the public justice of the kingdom. And all precedents, and all that can be said and urged, to shew that the House of Peers ought not to meddle with matters determinable at law, are in truth out of doors, and cannot concern this House of Peers, which never did it, but the contrary; for whensoever it appeared, that any business before them was proper to be tried at law they presently dismissed it: yet since their right is questioned, they must defend it, though they gave no occasion for it, having not at all put that right in execution, nor (as it may well be presumed by their proceedings hereto) ever intending it.

As to the 6 other precedents, of petitions answered in parliament of the 14 of E. 2. which the gentlemen of the House of Commons themselves seemed not to lay so much weight upon; the Lords thought they did wisely in it, for they were not such as would bear weight to build upon; the Lords of that parliament, according to the several natures of the businesses petitioned for, dismissed the petitioners with several directions; which shews they took cognizance of those matters; one was directed to take out his writ 'novæ disseisinæ;' and another to bring his action of trespass; the third they send to the common law; the fourth into the chancery; the fifth they order to bring his action of debt; the sixth who complained of several things, to him they gave particular answers, and particular directions to every point; one of which (they said) pertained not to the king, that is, to his laws, so they could give no order in it; it was concerning the resignation of a living, which was to be tryed by the laws of the church; for the other points, they disposed them into their proper channels. Was this to be done by a court, that had no jurisdiction in these matters? No rational man can think so.

But it would be considered, that in this case of Skinner's the Lords could give none of those answers, neither 'sibi perquirat per breve de cancellaria,' nor 'sequatur ad legem commutem,' or to bring this or the other action. For neither law nor equity in the ordinary way of the inferior courts could relieve him for the loss of his real estate in the Indies: the judges said, he was not relievable for his house and island: So as none of those precedents are applicable to the point in question. Not that the law, even in the ordinary execution of it, provides not for the punishment of all crimes: It declares against and condemns the fact, but can not reach the person to punish him, when he hath committed that fact in a foreign country, 'ubi lex Angliæ non currit.' And the house of peers hath but helped the law to inflict such punishment upon offenders, as by the law was due to them, which otherwise they had escaped. And were it but this, it sufficiently justifies the proceedings of the Lords in that particular case. Then as to the jurisdiction of that house in the general it will be made as apparent as the sun at noon, how they have in all times exercised it to the relief of all persons, who stood in need of their relief, even for things done within the kingdom.

Where the law had provided a remedy, they applied it; Sometimes themselves would take the pains, in cases that deserved it, where there was something extraordinary to move them to it, and when they were at leisure from the more weighty and important affairs of the kingdom. Sometimes they would send it down to the inferior courts, to do it for them, and give them authority for it, (which they could not have done, if they had not had it themselves, for 'nemo dat id quod non habet') as in the case of certain rioters 11 H. 4, n. 38, in the Exact Abridgement, whom they turned over to the King's Bench, and gave those judges authority to end the business, where the law had not provided, there they would not meddle themselves, and declared it so, That none else neither should presume to meddle: As upon the petition of Martin Chamberlain in that 14 E. 2, p. 409, who upon the suppression of the Knights Templars desired to be put into the possession of a manor, which the Templars (whilst they stood) had held of him, The answer is, 'quod non est lex ordinata,' there was no law ordained in the case; And because the law had not determined, how those lands should be disposed of, the Lords would say nothing to it. But will it not be said, that this makes good what the Commons objected, against the Lords retaining this cause of Skinner's, because some parts of it were not determinable in Westminster-hall; whereas, there being no law concerning those points, till there had been one made, their lordships should not have meddled with them? As the Lords in that parliament of Ed. 2, would do nothing in Chamberlain's case, because the law had not provided for it: And as in those two cases mentioned by the House of Commons, that if an inheritrix forfeiting by her husband's default, where (as the statute of Westminster the second expressed it) a durum est was in the case: And that if the hospital of St. Leonards 2 H. 6, n. 37, which had a clear right to a corn rent, yet the Lords could not relieve them, but both were fain to have acts of parliament.

This receives a twofold answer; one, that there are other motives in this case to make the Lords retain it, and give Skinner relief; here is a poor man oppressed by a rich company, with whom he was no ways able to wage law: And that consideration hath in all times prevailed with that house, which is composed of persons of generous and noble spirits, who can not see poor men oppressed without feeling in their hearts an inclination and a desire to relieve them: But secondly we must distinguish between a fact not being a crime in the eye of the law, which is neither 'malum in se,' nor 'malum prohibitum,' and when the fact itself being odious and punishable by all laws of God and man, only a circumstance, as the place where it was committed, puts it out of the power of the ordinary courts of justice to take cognizance of it, which are kept to forms, and may not transgress them; In the first case, the House of Lords cannot punish that for a crime which the law doth not make a crime, but in the second case God forbid there should be such a failure of justice in a kingdom, that fellow subjects should rob and worry and destroy one another (though in foreign parts) and there should be no punishment for the wrong doer, nor relief for the party wronged, when they come home; For then the king might be deprived of many a good subject, the land lose many of her people, trading receive much prejudice, and so king and kingdom suffer great loss, and all without remedy.

But then say the House of Commons, where the law hath provided, and there is an ordinary remedy, an extraordinary ought not to be tried: To this the Lords answer, that their House is not an extraordinary remedy, but the ordinary remedy in extraordinary cases, and this of Skinner's was so, both in point of difficulty, and point of compassion.

And to what is said, That it is the interest of all men in England to be tried by juries, and there is remedy against wilful juries by attain, but here is no remedy nor no appeal, it is answered, That the Court of Chancery disposeth of mens estates without a jury, every court of justice, every judge in his circuit sets fines on mens heads upon several occasions without a jury; Many are tried for their lives and their liberties (which is more than estate) in the House of Peers upon an Impeachment of the House of Commons, who are not a jury, nor are sworn; therefore that assertion holds not, That all men in all cases are tried by juries; And for matters of appeal, there doth lie one to the next parliament, or the next session: but it will be said, that is to the same persons; and what hopes of any remedy? for they will make good their own act: To this is answered, It is what the law of the land hath established; we must not be wiser than the law; It is what our ancestors thought sufficient, what hath been the practice of all times; and if we leave posterity in as good a condition as our ancestors left us, they will have no cause to complain. Then we must presume, that courts of justice will do justice, and will do right; that upon better reason shewed upon the appeal, they will alter their minds, and give another judgment: They have done so heretofore; How many judgments of parliament have been reversed by succeeding parliaments? and where there is cause for it, we must hope, they will do so again.

Then whereas it is said, That the greatness of the charge and the inconveniencies of attending causes in the Lords' House is an argument against their judicature; They answer, That it is not the House of Lords, that appoints such great fees to counsel; it being left to their consciences that take them, and to the will and discretion of their clients who give them, and who (without an act of parliament to restrain it) may give what they will, or rather what they must: However the Lords say, that the charge in Chancery is greater, there having been some times forty, fifty orders made in one cause; and the delay much greater, so as some causes have lasted there very many years: And even at the common law, how many verdicts have been given in one cause, contrary verdicts, one for the plaintiff, another for the defendant? Contrary rules of Court, the judges give a rule one day, and three days after give another clean contrary? As an instance of it can be given but of last Trinity Term in the King's Bench. These are inconveniences, that lie not in the House of Peers. But admit there were inconveniences: Many laws are found inconvenient, which yet are put in execution, and all obedience given to them, whilst they stand unrepealed. And the question is not now of convenient or inconvenient, but matter of right. Is it the right of the House of Peers? hath it still been the custom and usage of parliaments, and consequently the law of parliament, that they should exercise such a power of judicature? If it be so (as it is and will be sufficiently proved) then the point of convenience or inconvenience is out of doors; well may it be a motive to alter it by the law. But we will play with them at their own weapon, and join issue upon that point, that the inconvenience is but imaginary, and so far from an inconvenience, that it is the great advantage of the subject that it should be so: As well to give relief in cases otherwise unrelievable, as to assist and help on the administration of justice, when sometimes the greatness and power of some persons would else bear down, or much obstruct and hinder the proceedings of inferior Courts.

An objection also was raised, "How shall the Lords judgments be executed after the rising of the parliament? For so the subject may be deceived: And when he thinks, that with much charge he hath made an end of his business, he is never the nearer;" And it is answered, that the House of Peers is not as the House of Commons, whose orders are only of force, whilst they are sitting, they have power sufficient to require obedience to their judgments; Nor hath it been known, that ever any judgment of the House of Peers was not submitted unto and obeyed, till now in this Case of Skinner's, that the East-India Company stands out in defiance, and refuseth all obedience to it. In 15 R. 2. n. 17, in the Case of the Abbot of St. Oseches complaining against John Rokell for divers embraceries, and for not obeying an order of the duke of Lancaster's made therein, the Lords confirm that order, and charge the Lord Chancellor to see Rokell perform it. Why may not the Lords do the same still, if they doubt of obedience to their orders? But there was never question made of it before: And there are many precedents of orders given to persons to act something in the intervals of parliaments, and to give an account of it to the Lords at the next ensuing parliament, which shews, that their authority still continues, to empower those persons to act and to execute their orders even when the parliament is arisen; 15 E. 3. n. 48. The bishops of Duresme and Salisbury, the earl of Northampton, Warwick, Arundell and Salisbury are appointed to take the answer of the archbishop of Canterbury, and to report it to the next parliament: And 61 E. 3. n. 96. It is there specified, How in the parliament before, one Hugh Stafford had been accused of divers extortions, and that a commission was then granted to the earl of Suffolk and sir John Cavendish to inquire into it, who so had done, and had found him guiltless by 18 Inquests, which sir John Cavendish did in that present parliament witness to be true: By all this it appears, that the authority of the House of Peers ends not with the parliament, but their judgments still continue in full force and power; and they may appoint persons to see them executed if they please.

And whereas the House of Commons doth not deny them a power of judicature upon Writs of Error and upon appeals, Will not the same objection lie as well against their judgments in those cases? For seldom that they be put in execution before the parliament rise, so it takes away their whole judicature, as in truth all the other objections would do, could they be made good.

And whereas it was said, "That none of the king's courts can give remedy, where the king's writ cannot run; and where his majesty's sovereignty doth not come, the jurisdiction of the Peers can have no place;" It was answered, that there chiefly the power of the House of Peers is to give remedy, because it only can: As for treasons (till the Statutes of 26 H. 8. c. 13. 32 H. 8. c. 2, and 5 E. 6. c. 11, which have made them triable within the realm) and all misdemeanors committed in foreign parts, which never were, nor yet are, triable at the common law: Of this there are multitudes of precedents, Gomeniz, Weston, Segrave, Hall, Richill, &c.

And here within the kingdom the king's writ doth not originally run in all places, as for example, in the counties palatine, yet no man will deny the authority of the Lords in parliament taking place there; 9 R. 2. n. 13. The duke of Lancaster complains of sir John Stanley for not suing out his livery for the manor of Latham in the duke's court of Chancery, and yet entering upon it; they declare his entry unlawful, and order him to sue out his livery in the duke's court. The king's writ did not run there, but the authority of the Lords did.

Another objection was, That all proceedings ought to be in Latin, and no record to be in English: But the Lords had thought, That none had ever yet doubted, but the House of Peers had been a Court of Record, where all the proceedings and orders and judgments have been in English ever since H. 6.'s time. All acts of parliament in English. All impeachments, even those brought up by the House of Commons, the proceedings, and the sentence, all in English. The ancient records were in French, and the pleadings likewise, till the statute of 36 Ed. 3, which appoints pleadings to be in English, and to be entered and enrolled in Latin (so the print saith, but in sir Robert Cotton's Abridgment of the Records it is observed that the record itself warrants no such thing:) Then the Chancery proceedings are all in English, the pleadings, orders, and decrees: yet it will not be denied but that is a Court of Record. Sir Edward Coke, who alone is of another opinion concerning the Chancery, and upon that ground, because the proceeding is in English, yet makes the House of Commons itself a Court of Record, where every body knows all is in English; Inst. 4. part p. 23, so he doth not sibi constare.

The last objection and indeed the chief one (if true) was, That it deprives the subject of the benefit of Magna Charta, which will have all men to be tried by their peers, or by the law of the land; and the 25th of Ed. 3, cap. 4, that none shall be apprehended upon petition to the king or council, (and council here they interpreted to be the House of Lords) but upon indictment or presentment, or by writ original; and the 42nd of Ed. 3, which is to the same purpose; It was urged further that no writ was ever made returnable 'Coram Dominis spiritualibus et temporalibus;' and it was said in regard of the island, being in a foreign prince's jurisdiction, that it ought to have been done by act of parliament, for that no court of his majesty can give remedy, where his majesty's writ cannot run, nor can the jurisdiction of the House of Peers have place there: Another observation they had upon lex terræ in Magna Charta, That in the arguments of the king's learned counsel 3 Car. they made lex terræ to be the pleasure of the king, and the Lords were desired to consider upon this, if by arguing that the proceedings of their house were maintained to be secundum legem terræ, it may not as well be said that Magna Charta will have men to be tried 'Per judicium parium aut per legem terræ,' that is, by the will of the Lords.

It now remains but to set forth the Precedents, which the Lords did on their part alledge, with some few more ancient ones, which shall be added for the vindicating and asserting of their right unto this (never before controverted) point of their judicature, in all cases of what nature soever, when something extraordinary in those cases did induce them to exercise it; of which they were the sole judges, that being a trust lodged in them by the very frame and constitution of the government.

In the black book in the Tower, which is printed by the name of Placita Parliamentaria, 30 E. 1, f. 231, is the case of sir William Paynell and Margaret his wife suing for dower upon the lands of John Cameys, who had been Margaret's former husband, and whom she had left he yet living; and they now desiring to be tried by their country upon the point of adultery, and the Lords not allowing of it; This hath been at large expressed before, therefore I only mention it now.

In the same book p. 266, 33 Ed. 1, the case of Nicholas Segrave, who was tried in parliament for leaving the king's army then in Scotland, and going over into France to fight with one John de Crumbwell upon a falling out between them, they being together in the king's army: This was a case not triable in Westminster-hall, nor punishable in any ordinary court of justice by the common law of England, yet the House of Lords could try him, and adjudge him worthy of death: and one thing more is observable in that record, That a writ is issued to the sheriff of the county to take four knights with him and in their presence to summon Segrave, 'Quod esset coram Domino rege in proximo Parlamento suo apud Westm. ad audiendum voluntatem ipsius regis, et ad faciendum et recipiendum ulterius quod curia Domini regis consideraret in præmissis:' so here is a writ returnable in Parliament, and the sheriff did accordingly make his return, that he had summoned and charged him, 'Quod esset coram Domino rege in isto parlamento nunc juxta formam et tenorem mandati prædicti,' &c. It was therefore a gross mistake to say, That never any writ was made returnable in parliament, as it was likewise one to say, That the House of Peers could give no remedy, where was not remedy at law, this precedent proving the contrary to both.

21 Ed. 1, p. 135, 136, &c. The archbishop of York is questioned in parliament for excommunicating the bishop of Duresme: The ground of the excommunication was, for that the bishop of Duresme had imprisoned two persons employed by the archbishop to cite the bishop to appear before him. The archbishop appeals,

Et dicit quod de sententia a canone lata, et per ipsum declarata, in curia Domini regis non debet respondere.' The House of Lords goes on: The other side alledging, That the bishop in his temporal capacity, as count palatine, had committed those men, and it pertained to the king, and not to the archbishop to take cognizance of the imprisonment, if or no it was lawful; The judgment is, 'Videtur domino regi in pleno parlamento, prædictis comitibus, baronibus, &c. Quod prædictus archiepiscopus quantum in ipso fuit, nitetur usurpare super coronam et dignitatem regiam, &c. Propter quod per comites, barones et justiciarios et omnes alios de consilio ipsius domini regis unanimiter concordatum est, quod prædictus archiepiscopus committatur prisonæ pro offensa et transgressionem prædictis. Et super hoc ante judicium pronunciatum, (licet unanimiter de consilio prædict. Magnatum et aliorum concordatum fuisset tenendum in hoc casu et similiter in casibus consimilibus in perpetuum) prædictus archiepiscopus magnates et alios de consilio ipsius domini regis rogavit, quod pro eo dominum regem requirerent, ut ante pronunciationem judicii ipsum ad gratiam suam admitteret et voluntatem suam.' They interceded for him, and he made fine to the king of 4,000 marks, and was received to favour. They did not only give a judgment in this particular case, (which being 'Contra coronam et dignitatem,' was triable in Westminster-hall) but they declare it to be a standing rule for the judging of all cases of like nature; which shews the absoluteness of that power of judicature, which is lodged in that House.

It was said, that the Lords could not take a cause to themselves per saltum, and before it had passed all the formalities below; that a Writ of Error did not lie from the Common Pleas to the Lords House, but must first be brought to the King's bench; and the case of the bishop of Norwich was urged, 50 Ed. 3. And it is acknowledged, the Lords would not receive that bishop's complaint, but sent him away with that answer, nor could they give him any other: For Writs of Error have their walk, and their gradual proceeding chalked out, and settled by several statutes, and by the common law of the land; but what doth that signify against the judicature of the House of Peers? No man, saith the Lords, can either take cognizance of causes, or judge causes against the law of the land, and take them per saltum, when the law prohibits it: But they do say and affirm, that by all the examples and precedents of former times, it hath been the usage of that house to receive complaints, and give remedy in all cases, where the law hath not expressly otherwise determined; and if there be any thing in the case which merits, or requires, and needs something above the ordinary power and proceeding of the inferior courts of justice, to administer that relief which is just and due. As in cases of difficulty where a court cannot, or of delay where it will not proceed, the Lords, who have a general inspection into the administration of the justice of the kingdom, and into the proceedings of all other courts, have ever, upon application made to them, assumed to themselves the cognizance of such causes. 14 Ed. 3. Sir John Stanton, and his wife, had passed a fine of certain lands to Thomas Cranthorn, who reverts them back, and by that means settled them upon the wife; Sir Jeffry Stanton, as next heir, brings his Formedon en le descender in the Common Pleas, where, after some proceedings, upon a demurrer in law, sir Jeffry could not get the judges to proceed to judgment; upon which he petitions the king in parliament, which no man will deny to have been in the House of Peers. They examine the matter; and afterward order a writ under the great seal containing the whole matter to be sent to the judges there, willing them thereby, if the matter so stood, to proceed to judgment without delay: They not doing it, an Alia is sent; and the judges doing nothing then neither, and sir Jeffry renewing his petition; The Lords commanded the clerk of the parliament, sir Thomas de Drayton, to go to sir John Stoner, and the rest of the judges of the Common Pleas, and to require them, according to the plea pleaded, to proceed to judgment, or else to come into the House with the whole record, so as in parliament judgment might be given for out or the other of the parties. The judges came at the day, and the business was heard, and it was adjudged, That sir Jeffry should recover; and a writ under the great seal was sent to the judges to give judgment accordingly: Here then the king in parliament assembled, that is the House of Peers, upon a petition, assumes the cognizance of a cause, depending in the court of Common Pleas; which was so far from having passed all the formalities below, that is to say, an appeal to the King's bench and Chancery, that it was as yet undetermined in the Common Pleas. Nor did it appear unto them upon what ground it was, that the judges gave not judgment; so they might have answered sir Jeffrey Stanton's petition with saying, that they would first see what the court would determine, and what the King's bench afterwards; But they apply themselves to give him relief: And yet no votes passed against that House for so doing, as now hath been in the case of Skinner against this.

So in the parliament of 18 Ed. 1 p. 16. of the Placita Parliamentaria, William de Wasthul complains of Matthew del Exchequer, for cozening him upon the levying of a fine before the judges of the Common Pleas, by procuring an attorney to slip in other lands unknown to Wasthul, and which he intended not to pass in the fine: This is returned back to those judges, because the fine had been levied before them, 'Et dictum est iisdem iudiciariis, quod re-cordum istud in rotulis suis faciant irrotulare, et tam super recordo isto quam super aliis ipsum Mattheum coram eis contingentibus procedant ad iudicium et debitum et festinum faciant justitie complementum.' True! the House of Lords is not so bound up to forms, but that it may, when it thinks good, to vary, and retain a cause at one time, which it will not do at any other time. Yet we see they were proper judges in this cause, for they order Wasthul's complaint, and the proceedings before them to be entered, as a record in the Common Pleas, and those judges to proceed upon it, which, if they had not had cognizance of the matter, had been all 'coram non iudice,' and could have signified nothing.

And I must observe one thing, which I think will not be denied, that in all those 'Placita Parliamentaria,' whatever is said to be done 'coram rege in parlamento,' is to be understood of the House of Peers, where the king was in those times commonly present, and always understood to be there representatively; So as his name was ever mentioned in the proceedings, even when his person was absent, being sometimes out of the kingdom, sometimes detained away by sickness, or other occasion; As 50 Ed. 3. n. 35, it is said, The king ordains, That from thenceforth no woman should for maintenance pursue matters in the king's courts upon pain, &c. And then was the king sick at Eltham, and could not come to parliament, as appears by n. 42. and it was only the House of Peers that made that order. So in judgments, though in ancient times they were mostly entered as given by the king, yet it was the Lords' House, which was Curia Regis, that gave them.

For we must know the king hath a double capacity of sitting in the House of Peers, a legislative capacity, when he hath in himself a negative voice to what even both houses have concluded and done, which signifies nothing without his assent, and his single dissent makes it all full and void; this is in passing acts of parliament, and making of laws; the other is a judicial capacity, when he will please to assist, and be present at the ordinary transactions of the house, as heretofore was usual; which alters not the constitution of it as it is a court, gives it no more power nor jurisdiction than it had before, he being then but in a manner as chief judge, and not doing any thing singly, but according to the plurality of opinions; as when the kings would in person sit in the King's bench, which they have in former times done, (where still all is said to be done coram rege, though now he never come there) and in our memory king James hath sat in the Star Chamber; I think no body will say the Star Chamber then, or King's bench before, did or could vary from their ordinary forms and rules of proceeding: no more can the House of Peers alter their proceedings, or assume greater authority by reason of the royal presence, to take cognizance of other causes, or do any thing, which by the custom and usage of the house, and the law of parliament, it could not else have done: but their jurisdiction, and their way of exercising that jurisdiction, is still one and the same. And therefore 26 H. 6. n. 52. When the king had given a judgment of himself, without the advice of the Lords, in the case of William de la Pole duke of Suffolk, who stood impeached for treason, banishing him the realm for five years: the Lords entered their protestation against it, as not done by their assent, and so no act of the house. And 5 H. 4. n. 11. The earl of Northumberland coming into the parliament before the king and lords, and by petition acknowledging to have done contrary to his allegiance, in giving of liveries, and gathering of power, for which he prayed pardon, in regard he yielded himself, and came in to the king at York upon his letters; and the king delivering this petition to the justices to be considered, the Lords made their protestation, That the judgment appertained only to them; and therefore as peers of parliament, to whom such judgment belonged, in weighing the statutes concerning treasons, and concerning liveries, they adjudged the fact of the said earl to be no treason nor felony, but only a trespass finable to the king: whereupon the king received him into grace, and pardoned him his fine. All power of judicature in parliament is then questionless in the House of Lords, where the king always is personally or virtually, and the judgment proceeds from them by the authority and in the name of the king; for the power of judicature in parliament is lodged in them, together with the king, as is declared 1. H. 4. n. 80. where it is said, that the Commons were only petitioners, and that all judgments appertain to the King and the Lords, unless it were in statutes, grants, subsidies, and such alike. This hath ever been the practice, and custom, and law of parliament, since there have been parliaments, and when this shall cease to be, the ancient way of free parliaments will cease likewise.

1 R. 2. n. 30. Sir John de Cobham sheweth that by the delivery of a ring of gold for seizin to Edward the 3d, he had settled the reversion of several manors there named in the crown, and now prays it may so remain according to his intention, divers lords are examined, the judges opinions are asked, who declare it to be a good livery and seizin: and so it is settled.

N. 32. William Fitzhugh, a goldfiner and citizen of London, exhibits a bill of complaint in the name of the commonalty of that mystery against John Chichester and John Boleham of the same mystery, for divers oppressions done by them: the Lords send for them, examine them, they deny those oppressions: and Fitzhugh refusing then to avow his bill, the Lords commit him to the Tower.

N. 35. Robert Hawley and John Shakell, are by the Lords sent to the Tower for refusing to bring forth a Spanish prisoner taken in battle, whom they had in their keeping, and others laid claim to.

N. 41. Alice Perrers or Pierce, who had been much in favour with Edw. 3. is questioned in the Lords House, sir Richard Scroope lord steward of the Household managing the trial, for that contrary to an order made by the king and Lords, 50 Ed. 3. n. 35. that no woman, and she by name, should pursue any matters by way of maintenance, upon pain of perpetual banishment, and loss of the whole estate; she notwithstanding had persuaded king Edward to countermand sir Nicholas Dagworth from going into Ireland, when he had been ordained by the council to go thither for urgent business, which would have been profitable for the king and the realm: and another charge against her was, for persuading the king to pardon Richard Lyons, who had been farmer of the customs, and for abuses and extortions had been censured in parliament to forfeit his estate, and be committed to prison; she got all to be remitted, and his estate to be restored unto him, even that part of it which the king had given to two of his own sons for their lives: the hearing of this cause took up several days; many that had been counsellors and officers to the late king were examined as witnesses. At last she is found guilty, and judgment of banishment and loss of estate given upon her.

3 R. 2. n. 24. The case of the earl of Pembroke, and William le Zouch, complaining of Thomas Roos for suing them concerning lauds in Yorkshire, and endeavouring to get a trial in the country, (the record is, 'desirant d'estre a l'issue du pays trop suspectieusement,' his desiring it being suspicious) so they pray, 'que ils par tels malueis compassements & procurements en pais ne soient desheritez,' That they may not lose their inheritance by such wicked practices and procurements; the Lords upon this retain the cause, appoint some persons to examine and report it: but this precedent hath been cited before at large, so I do but touch it here.

N. 22. Sir Philip Darcy complains, That the prior of St. John's of Hierusalem sues him in Chancery for the Manors of Temple-hurst and Temple-newson, which Ed. 3. had granted to John Darcy his father, and produces a deed shewing that the priors' predecessor had passed the fee of them to Ed. 2. The Lords order that deed to be sent to the Treasurer and barons of the Exchequer, to examine the king's title, and in the mean time stop proceedings in Chancery. This is more than taking cognisance of a matter originally, for they take it out of one court, where it depended and was undetermined, and send it to be examined in another court, which shews the ascendant they had upon all other courts.

4. R. 2. n. 17. Sir Ralph de Ferriers had been seized by the duke of Lancaster upon the Marches of Scotland upon suspicion of Treason, for holding intelligence with the French the king's enemies, upon some Letters of his to several French Lords found and taken up by a beggar. He was brought into parliament before the Lords, and put to his answer. He first desired counsel, then offered the combat against ~~any~~ that would accuse him, both were denied him. Then he applied himself to his answer; and after several days hearing, the Lords still remanding him to prison, he so well defended himself, that the Lords suspected the letters to be forged, and therefore committed the beggar, and bailed sir Ralph, delivering him to his Manucaptors.

5 R. 2. n. 45. The Chancellor and university of Cambridge, petition against the mayor, bailiff, and commonalty of the town, for breaking up their Treasury, burning their Charter, and by force compelling them to make releases of some actions they had brought against the town, and enter into bonds to them for great sums. The Lords direct a writ to issue out to the mayor and bailiffs to appear in person, and the commonalty by Attorney. They appear, the Chancellor exhibits Articles against them. They being asked why their liberties should not be seized, plead to the jurisdiction, that the court ought not to have cognizance of them: they are told, judgment should be given, if they would not answer: then they answer, and the business is heard. The townsmen are ordered to deliver up those deeds forced from the university, which are presently cancelled: the town liberties are seized into the king's hands, and part of them granted to the university: some are granted back to the Town, for which they were to pay an increase of rent. Note, here is a plea to the jurisdiction, and that plea over-ruled.

8 R. 2. n. 12. The earl of Oxford complains of Walter Sibell of London for a slander, in having to the duke of Lancaster and other noblemen accused him of maintenance. The Lords hear the business, commit Sibell to prison, and give 500 marks damages to the earl.

9 R. 2. n. 13. The case of the duke of Lancaster complaining, That Sir John Stanley had entered upon the manor of Latham which held of him, and had not sued out his livery in his Court of Chancery. The Lords order him to sue out his livery. But this hath been already mentioned.

15 R. 2. n. 16. The prior of Holland in Lancashire complains of a riot committed by Henry Trebble, John Greenbow and others, and of an entry made by them into the parsonage of Whitwick in Leicestershire. John Ellingham the Serjeant at Arms is sent for them, who brings them into the parliament: the Lords commit them to the Fleet.

N. 17. The abbot of St. Oseches complaineth of John Rokell for Embracery. This case hath been already cited.

N. 18. Sir William Bryan had procured a bull directed to the two Archbishops, to excommunicate some that had broken up his house, and carried away writings. This was read in parliament, and adjudged to be prejudicial to the king, and to be in derogation of the laws; for which he is committed to the Tower.

N. 20. Thomas Harding accuseth Sir John

Sutton and sir Richard Sutton, and layeth to their charge, that by their conspiracy he had been kept prisoner in the Fleet: upon hearing of both parties, for that the two knights were known to be men of good fame, the Lords adjudged him to the Fleet.

N. 21. John Shadwell complains against the Archbishop of Canterbury for excommunicating him and his neighbours wrongfully, for a temporal cause appertaining to the crown and to the laws of the land: the Lords hear the business, find the suggestions untrue, and commit him to the Fleet.

1 H. 4. n. 93. Sir William Richill one of the justices of the common-pleas (who by express order of Ri. 2. went to Calais and took the examination and confession of the Duke of Gloucester, after murdered by Hall) was brought a prisoner into the Lords house, the king present, and by sir Walter Clopton chief-justice opposed: and answered so fully, shewing his sincere dealing, that the Lords one by one declared him innocent: and sir Walter Clopton pronounced him such.

4 H. 4. 21. The Case of Pontingdon and sir Philip Courtney, where the Lords direct the trial, appointing what the issue shall be; and what kind of Jury shall be impannelled to prevent sir Philip's practices in the country: It hath been cited before at large.

1 E. 4. m. 6. n. 16. The tenants of the manor of East-Maine belonging to the bishop of Winchester, the king being in his progress in Hampshire in the summer-time, complained to him of their bishop for raising new customs among them, and not suffering them to enjoy their old ones: The king bids them come to parliament in winter, and they should be relieved: they come, and the king recommends their business to the Lords: they commit it to certain justices to examine. Upon their report, and upon mature deliberation, it was adjudged, That the tenants were in fault, that they complained without cause, and they were ordered to continue their said customs and services. Here observe there was the recommendation of the king in the case, just as now in Skinner's, and this difference that a question of custom betwixt lord and tenants was properly determinable by the common law, and a jury of the visenage, and this of a trespass in the Indies, to be punished in parliament or no where: which justifies the proceedings there.

43 Eliz. Dec. 18th. A complaint was made to the Lords by the Company of Painters against the Company of Plaisterers, for wrong done them in using some part of their trade. Their lordships referred it to the Lord Mayor and Recorder of London, to be heard, examined, adjudged and ordered by them: which was all one as if they had done it themselves: For it was done by their authority and by their order: 'Qui facit per alium, facit per se.'

18 Jac. The Lords took notice of the proceeding of the House of Commons in the case of one Flood, whom they had convented before them for insolent and scandalous words spoken by him against the prince and princess palatine, examined witnesses and given judgment in the cause; which they looked upon as deeply trenching upon the privileges of their House, all judgments properly and solely belonging to them. Thereupon they sent a message to the House of Commons and desired a conference; at which conference the Commons confessed, That out of their zeal they had censured Flood; but they left him now to their lordships, and hoped their lordships would censure him; in order to which they sent up a trunk of writings concerning his case: Then the Lords proceeded to the hearing of it, examined several witnesses and heard all Flood could say for himself: which done they adjudged him, Not to bear longer the arms of a gentleman, to ride with his face to the horse tail, to stand upon the pillory with his ears nailed, to be whipped at a cart's tail, to be fined 5,000*l.* and to be imprisoned in Newgate during life.

21 Jac. Thomas Morley was convened before the Lords, for delivering a scandalous petition to the House of Commons (as himself affirmed) against the Lord Keeper Coventry. Upon examination it appeared, that it had not been presented to the House of Commons, only to their committee of grievances, and that he had published very many copies of it, even since his being convened before their lordships, they adjudge him to be imprisoned in the Fleet, to pay 1,000*l.* fine, to stand with his neck in the pillory, to make his submission and acknowledgment at the bar.

22 Jac. Mary Brocas petitioned the Lords to be relieved for a debt of 1,000*l.* due unto her by bond from the Muscovia company. Upon hearing both sides, their lordships order the company to pay the debt, with 5*l.* per cent. interest out of the levations, which the said company had made among themselves for the payment of their debts.

The same parliament, May 23, Thomas Pinckney petitions the House in the behalf of himself and other creditors of sir John Kennedy, to be relieved for debts owing to them from sir John, by the sale of Barn-elms, lands in the possession of his heir John Kennedy. The Lords upon examination of the business, find cause and so they order it, That Barn-elms should be sold to the best value, and the profits to be sequestered in the mean time into indifferent hands; and that a recognisance of 2,000*l.* in which Pinckney stood bound in Chancery, should be withdrawn and cancelled.

The same parliament again, Grizell Rogers widow, petitions the Lords for the settling her title to certain lands in Heygrove in the county of Somerset, and for quieting and ending divers suits and differences between her and sir Arthur Ingram, sir William Whitmore, &c. they order her satisfaction out of particular lands, and all suits to cease between them. And appointed releases of all differences on both sides to be drawn and sealed.

4 Car. 31 Jan. The Lords' committees for petitions, make report to the House of a petition of Benjamin Crokey against John Smith, in behalf of a grammar-school at Wotton-under-edge in the county of Gloucester, which school was endowed with great possessions by the widow of the lord Berkly in Richard 2nd's time, which were now much abated and brought to an undervalue by the cunning practices of the said Smith. Upon which the Lords awarded a commission to issue out of the Chancery to survey all the said lands; and ordered also a special Habeas Corpus to be directed to the warden of the Fleet (where Crokey was a prisoner) to bring the body of the said Crokey before the Lord Keeper, to the intent he might attend the said commission; and ordered further, That if Crokey did make it appear the value of the lands to be so as he said, and that to be approved by the Lords' committees for petitions, then Smith to repay to the said Crokey such charges as he shall disburse in the prosecution.

In the parliament of 1640, December 16th, upon report from the Lords' committees for petitions, That mistress James complained against sir Edmund Sawyer, for sheltering himself under a royal protection which he had procured, by which means she could not sue him upon a bond of 500*l.* for so much money borrowed of her and two years interest, and so was debarred from helping herself by any legal course; the Lords ordered, That the said Mrs. James should proceed against the said sir Edmund Sawyer for the recovering of her debt in any court where she thought best, notwithstanding his protection.

December 21. The Lords committees report a Petition of Katherine Hadley, complaining that she had been kept a long time a prisoner in the common-gaol in the Old Bride-well, without any cause shewn; the Lords ordered her release.

The 22nd of December. Upon a report from the Lords committees of sir Robert Howard's case, complaining, that he had been committed close-prisoner to the Fleet by the high-commission court, and kept there three months, till he was fain for his enlargement to enter into several bonds with sureties in the sum of 3,500*l.* For which he desired reparations, and his bonds to be cancelled; The parties interested were summoned and heard. And after due consideration, the Lords ordered 1,000*l.* damages to sir Robert Howard, of which 500*l.* to be paid by the archbishop of Canterbury, 250*l.* by sir Henry Martin, and 250*l.* by sir John Lambe, the bonds to be forthwith cancelled, delivered to sir Robert Howard.

The 23d of December. They reported the case of William Dudley, that he having arrested the lord Wentworth (son to the earl of Cleveland) for a debt of 400*l.* entered a caution in Mr. Justice Bartley's chamber for good bail to be taken, yet justice Bartley had released the said lord Wentworth upon such bail, as the said Dudley was utterly disabled to recover his debt. Justice Bartley being called, made no good answer thereunto. The Lords thereupon order, that the said justice Bartley should forthwith assure unto the said Dudley his house and land near Barnet, for securing the said debt with interest and damages.

The same day they report likewise the case of Mrs. Mary Stanhope widow, daughter-in-law to the earl of Chesterfield, complaining, that the said earl refused to assure unto her 40*l.* per annum during her widowhood, according to a former agreement made between them, which appeared to be true by a letter produced under the earl's hand; And his counsel being heard, and no good cause shewn, why the petitioner should not be relieved: The Lords ordered the earl of Chesterfield forthwith to assure to the said Mrs. Mary Stanhope, his daughter-in-law, 40*l.* per annum during her widowhood, and to pay unto her such money as was in arrear of the 40*l.* per annum due to her for the space of two years.

The 30th of December, the Lords committees for examining abuses in courts of justice, report the complaint of Turner, a prisoner in the Gate-house, committed thither by the high-commission court, where he had lain 14 years, for refusing to take the oath ex officio: The Lords ordered him to be forthwith released.

The 21st of January, the committee for petitions, report the complaint of William Waters and Thomas Waters, How they had suffered much by an untrue and false certificate, made by Dr. Clerk and Dr. Sibthorp unto the council-table, for their refusing to pay Ship-money; whereby they were forced to pay the sum of 34*l.* for fees: Upon which Dr. Clerk and Dr. Sibthorp were heard at large: the Lords ordered them to pay back the 34*l.* to the complainants, which they had paid for fees, and 100*l.* damages; And to be turned out of the commission of the peace.

The 22nd of January, the committee for courts of justice reported the complaint of the lady Frances Weld widow, against the archbishop of Canterbury and Mr. Dell, suggesting, that she had been much prejudiced by them in the recovering of a debt of 1,300*l.* due to her upon bond from Mr. Child: Upon hearing of all parties, the Lords find the archbishop and Mr. Dell free from blame, and order them to be discharged concerning that business.

The 5th of February, the committee reports the complaint of Jeremy Powel, That the bishop of Hereford had admitted a clerk to the vicarage of Burknill in Shropshire, though the said Powel in the right of himself and of Mary his wife, had caused a ne admittus to be directed to the bishop. The Lords upon hearing the business, found, that the bishop had done contrary to law, and thereupon ordered him to pay unto Powel, by way of damages, the sum of 30*l.* And the said Powel, as patron, to be left in the same condition for trial of his right, as he was before the bishop had put a stop to his business.

The 9th of Feb, the Committee for Courts of Justice reports the case of Nicholas Bloxam,

That Andrew Sandeland, clerk, had procured a sentence against him in the High Commission Court, by virtue whereof the said Sandeland had violently gained from him the possession of the rectory of Great Waldingfield in the county of Suffolk. The Lords judging this proceeding of the High Commission to be most injurious and contrary to law, ordered, That the cause should be left to a trial at law next assizes for that county; That Sandeland should appear gratis, and plead not guilty that so the cause might come to a final determination that assizes.

The same day the same committee report that John Radway, William Newark, and Walter Cootes, were presented Ex officio mero in the ecclesiastical court of Gloucester, and afterwards excommunicated for going to church out of their own parish, and upon pretence of a Significavit which was imperfect, were arrested and cast into prison, where they continued eleven days, whereas there was no writ justly taken out. The Lords ordered that Dr. Baber chancellor of Gloucester should pay to those three persons 40*l.* for damages, and the undersheriff's deputy Richard Byford 20*l.* upon the account of the arrest.

The 23d of Feb. the same committee report, that Abraham Hill, a poor aged man, was committed to prison in the year 1636, by Robert Buxton then Mayor of Colchester, by verbal command only, without any warrant, or cause shewed and continued a prisoner sixteen weeks to his utter undoing: The Lords ordered, that the said Buxton should pay unto him 16*l.* by way of damages.

The 5th of March, the committee for petitions inform the House, that complaint had been made before them, That Nicholas Haws, gent. an antient man, had not yet sued out his livery in the Court of Wards, the Lords order him to do it without delay.

The 11th of March, the committee for petitions gives account to the House, that according to their lordships direction, there had been a trial at the last assizes for Suffolk, between Bloxam and Sandeland, and that the verdict had passed for Bloxam; whereupon the Lords order, that Bloxam should discharge the cure as lawful incumbent, and that Sandeland should deliver unto him the quiet possession of it. It is worthy observation, that the Lords, after they had referred the decision of the title for matter of fact, as to the forcible entry, to the common law, remained still judges of the cause, and their judgment settled the possession.

The second of April, 1641, The committee reports, that Lambert Osbolstone clerk had complained of a sentence in the Star Chamber, by which he was degraded, and deprived of all his spiritual livings and preferments, being a prebend of Westminster, and parson of Whet-hampstead, fined 5000*l.* to the king, and adjudged to pay the like sum for damages to the arch-bishop of Canterbury, and to be imprisoned; The Lords order, that he shall be freed and discharged of his fine, damages and imprisonment, be restored to his prebendary and parsonage.

The 6th of April, 41. The committee reports, that the lady Dyer had made her complaint, that primo Caroli she had lent Sir Richard Titchbur 400*l.* upon bond, and sued it to a judgment, but Sir Robert Pye, Mr Button, and others, had extended all the lands liable to that judgment at a far undervalue, to deprive her of all the benefit of it: The Lords order that counsel of both sides should agree to draw up assurances for settling the payment of all the parties upon the judgment and extent, to be all signed and sealed by them, and that the lady Dyer should be first satisfied, and enjoy the lands till then. One thing by the way is to be noted, that sir Robert Pye was then a member of the House of Commons.

The 12th of April, 41. The committee reports, a complaint of Dr. Walker, that sir John Lamb had unjustly taken from him his offices of commissary of Leicester, and of official to the archdeaconry there, which he enjoyed by patent for life; That now sir John Lamb took the profits of them to himself, and had forced him by many menaces and oppressions to release all suits and actions to his utter ruin and undoing, and to his loss and damage of above 1500*l.* The Lords order, that sir John Lamb should pay unto the said Dr. Walker, by way of damage, the sum of 1500*l.* to be levied upon his lands and chattels, should be brought to the bar as a delinquent, and there receive a reprehension.

The 12th of June, 41. The committee reports a complaint of Edward Bagshaw, his brother Henry, and sisters Mary and Margaret, against their brother Thomas, concerning portions and annuities given them by their father's will: That all parties have been heard, and their witnesses. Upon hearing the state of the matter, the Lords order Thomas to put in security within four days for the payment of the portions according to the will; and to give security by land for the paying of an annuity of 20*l.* per annum to Edward for term of his life; That then the said Edward shall release by a fine to the said Thomas, all his estate, right, title and interest in the lands and goods of his father deceased: And that a statute of 1,600*l.* entered into by the said Thomas Bagshaw to John Gell, esq. shall be discharged and made void; and that Thomas shall make a release to the said Edward of all debts and demands.

The 16th of June, 41. The lord Audley complains by petition, That the lord Cottington kept from him the manor of Fonhill, and prayed relief therein: upon hearing counsel on both sides, the Lords dismissed the petition.

The 23d of June, 41. The committee for petitions, reports, That Mrs. Walter had preferred a petition setting forth, That William Walter her husband will not permit her to cohabit and dwell with him, nor allow to her and three children anything for their support. The Lords order her to repair to her husband, and offer to live with him, and if he shall refuse to admit her, that then he shall allow her 60*l.* per annum for her maintenance.

The 21st of July 41. A petition was exhibited before the Lords by sundry officers and clerks of the Court of Common Pleas, shewing, That the disposing of the offices of proto-notaries, philizers, exigenters, and other offices of the said court, had time out of mind belonged to the chief justice of that court for the time being, but several grants and patents had been obtained from his majesty for the disposing of the said offices, and therefore they prayed, That all those grants, and letters patents might be recalled. The Lords heard counsel upon it, and after mature deliberation declared, That the said offices do of right belong to the disposition of the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the grants formerly made by letters patents of the said offices to be illegal, and void, and ordered the said patents to be brought into the House.

There is likewise in the journal book of that parliament, mention made of a petition of one Thomas Smithick, preferred the 10th of June, 1641. Complaining of wrongs sustained from the East India Company, and likewise of a petition from the East India Company, full of respect and submission to the House of Lords, and praying a longer day (than it seems was appointed) for hearing the merits of the cause, which the Lords granted, and ordered all such books, certificates, and writings as were in the custody of the Company concerning that business, should be produced, and Smithick to peruse and take copies of them. What was more done upon this petition of Smithick's, appears not by the journal book, probable they compounded the business among themselves. But however it is observable the different spirits of the East India company then and of this now. The modesty of that, and the carriage of this so far differing. In those times no question was made of the power of the Lords in point of their judicature, nor no complaint against their practice of it. Yet we see the frequency of it, in cases of all natures, criminal, civil, mixt, between king and subject, between subject and subject; no protection, no privilege did exempt any body from their jurisdiction.*

But these Conferences between the two houses did not induce either of them to yield an iota of its original resolutions, or in any degree conciliate matters. On the contrary, new heats were generated. The Commons, on the report from their managers of the votes of the Lords, immediately voted negative resolutions, namely, that the petition of the East

* This account of the two Conferences is taken from the Grand Question, &c. It is not easy to say exactly which of the Cases cited or arguments alledged, were employed at the Conferences, and which were suggested by the author himself of that book; who appears to have been lord Holles, perhaps assisted. See Hargrave's Preface, civ. Note.

India Company to the Commons was not scandalous, and that the delivery of it to them and their proceedings upon it were no breach of the privilege or encroachment upon the jurisdiction of the House of Lords. On the very next day also, when both houses were on the point of an adjournment by order of the king, the Commons resolved, That whoever should be aiding, in execution of the order of the Lords in the case of Skinner against the East India Company, should be deemed a betrayer of the rights and liberties of the Commons of England and an infringer of the privileges of the House of Commons; and this with the resolutions of the preceding day was instantly sent to the House of Lords. Nor were the Lords less prompt in their anger. Before their last Conference with the Commons, the Lords had gone great lengths. They had ordered, that except one tax bill before them, no other business should be done till the privileges of their House were fully vindicated and settled, and that their committee for privileges should sit presently: and expecting an order from the king for immediate adjournment, they had moved him to defer it for a few days, in regard that their rights and privileges had been disputed by the Commons, and in order to have time to vindicate those rights and privileges. When also the king had consented to give a few days, with an explanation that he looked upon it as a thing wherein he was much concerned, the Lords were active enough, not only to perform the business of the second Conference with the Commons, but afterwards so to expedite a proceeding against sir Samuel Barnardiston the deputy governor of the East India Company, for a breach of their privilege in promoting the petition against their judgment for Skinner, as before the adjournment, though not time enough for notice by the Commons, to sentence sir Samuel in a fine of 300*l.* with direction that he should remain a prisoner in the custody of the black rod till payment.

When the quarrel had proceeded to these extremities, of all of which Mr. Prynne, on the excess of whose aristocratical principles the Lords seem throughout to have acted, lived to be a witness, both houses, in pursuance of an order from the king, adjourned themselves for three months. But a much longer time passed before their meeting to transact business: for two other adjournments followed by order of the king, and then by a prorogation their meeting was postponed till the 19th of October 1669. However, notwithstanding the long interval of above a year and a quarter, and notwithstanding an earnest recommendation in the king's speech to compose the past differences, hostilities between the two houses about Skinner's case were instantly renewed.

The Commons began. A book, intitled "The Grand Question concerning the Judicature of the House of Peers stated and argued," and both relating the particulars of Skinner's case and vindicating the proceedings of the Lords in it, had been recently published. Angry at its contents, the Commons the very day of the session ordered the publishing bookseller to be sent for. On the same day they appointed a committee to report how the case stood between the two houses in Skinner's business. The third day, upon receiving the committee's report, and finding by it that the Lords had fined sir Samuel Barnardiston, and that an entry had been made in the office of the auditor of the receipt of the exchequer as if the fine had been paid by him, and that he had been thereupon set at liberty, which gave the appearance of submission to the sentence of the Lords, the Commons examined sir Samuel; and discovering this to be a mere contrivance, and his having been mysteriously liberated on one of the adjournment days of the last session without payment of the fine, they resolved, that he had behaved as a good commoner of England. The next day they appointed a committee to bring in a bill for settling the difference in point of jurisdiction between the two houses, and Mr. Solicitor general Finch was desired to expedite it. On the same day they examined the bookseller who published the Grand Question; and found that the book was sent to him by lord Hollis, with direction to print it, and as it was printed without the licence then necessary, they ordered him to be indicted upon the licensing act. At the same time to do justice to their own side of the argument, they desired their managers at the conferences formerly had with the Lords, to perfect the arguments used for the Commons, and to deliver them to be entered on their journals. To shew the fixedness of their determination to have a bill for settling the matter, they stopped all other committees from sitting. In the course of a few days the bill they had ordered was brought in; and upon the second reading, a clause for vacating the judgment against sir Samuel Barnardiston and cancelling the relative proceedings was carried; and though the bill was re-committed, yet such expedition was used, that on the 3d of November the bill was passed, with the title of "An Act concerning certain proceedings in parliament;" and the next day sir Robert Atkins was sent with it to the Lords. Still further also to wound the Lords, the Commons a few days after resolved, that no member of their House and of the long robe should without their leave plead as counsel in any cause before the Lords.

Hitherto the Lords during this session had abstained from touching upon the subject of their contest with the Commons about jurisdiction in Skinner's case; and as if enough gratified by the device practised to give the appearance of submission to their sentence against sir Samuel Barnardiston, had been content with exercising the appellant judicature over equity. But upon receiving the judicature bill of the Commons, the Lords, though they had recently lost Mr. Prynne the indefatigable assertor of their claims, resumed their activity on the subject. Not only did the Lords reject the bill from the Commons, but the Lords on the same day ordered their committee of privileges to prepare a bill "Concerning privilege and judicature in parliament," which, it may be well supposed, was of a very opposite description; and what was remarkable enough, lord chief justice Vaughan, who had been recently placed at the head of the Common Pleas, acted as Speaker of the Lords for lord keeper Bridgman, and so underwent the mortification of putting the question, without being at liberty to say a word against that original jurisdiction which he had in the beginning of Skinner's case, and so long as his being a member of the Commons gave the opportunity, uniformly concurred in resisting. In consequence of this order of the Lords for a bill concerning privilege and judicature in parliament, a bill was soon brought in; and having been read for the third time, it was passed by the Lords with the title of "An Act for limiting of certain trials in parliament and privilege of parliament, and for further ascertaining the trial of peers and all others his majesty's liege people;" and immediately after passing the Lords sent it to the Commons.

Upon receipt from the Lords of this counter-bill to the bill of the Commons concerning parliamentary judicature, the latter were provoked into further activity against the Lords. A day was indeed appointed for reading of the bill; and after one adjournment it was read for the first time. But, upon its being moved the same day for a second reading, it passed in the negative. Nor did the Commons stop here. A few days after, they resolved to desire a Conference with the Lords on their judgment and fine against sir Samuel Barnardiston; and with a view to such request, they appointed a committee to prepare Reasons for the Conference. Upon report also from this committee, the House resolved upon five distinct propositions as proper to be insisted upon to the Lords, namely; 1. That it is the inherent right of every commoner to present petitions to the House of Commons in case of grievance, and of that house to receive them;* 2. That it was the right of the House to determine how far such petitions are fit or unfit to be received; 3. That no court has power to censure a petition to the House of Commons unless transmitted from thence; 4. That the censure and proceedings of the Lords against sir Samuel Barnardiston were in subversion of the rights and privileges of the House of Commons and of the liberties of the Commons of England; and 5. That the continuance upon record of the judgment by the Lords in the case of Skinner and the East India Company was prejudicial to the rights of the Commons of England. Also upon a further report from the same committee, the House of Commons resolved upon several general heads of reasons*

* The heads of Reasons for the first three points resolved on by the Commons were these.—"It hath been always, time out of mind, the constant and uncontroverted usage and custom of the House of Commons, to have petitions presented to them from commoners, in case of grievance public or private; in evidence whereof it is one of the first works done by the House of Commons to appoint a grand committee to receive petitions and informations of grievances.—That in no age that we can find, any person, who presented any grievance by way of petition, to the House of Commons, which was received by them, was ever censured by the Lords without complaints of the Commons.—That no suitors for justice, in any inferior court whatever in law or in equity, exhibiting their complaint for any matter proper to be proceeded upon in that court, are therefore punishable criminally though untrue, or suitable by way of action in any other court whatever; but are only subject to a moderate fine or amercement by that court; unless in some cases specially provided for by act of parliament, as appeals or the like.—In case men should be punishable in other courts for preparing and presenting petitions for redress of grievances to the House of Commons, it may discourage and deter his majesty's subjects from seeking redress of their grievances, and by that means frustrate the main and principal end for which parliaments were ordained."

For the fourth point the instruction was to insist "That no petition, nor any other matter depending in the House of Commons can be taken notice of by the Lords without breach of privilege, unless communicated by the House of Commons."

The House of Commons, as a conclusion to the first four points, added the following instruction.

"Upon conclusion of the four first propositions it is further to be alledged, that the house of peers, as well as other courts, are in all their judicial proceedings to be guided and limited by law: but if they should give a wrongful sentence contrary to law, and the party grieved might not seek redress thereof in full parliament, and to that end repair to the House of Commons, who are part of the legislative power, that either they may interpose with their lordships for the reversal of such sentence, and prepare a bill for that purpose, and for preventing the like grievance for the time to come, the consequence thereof would plainly be, both that their lordships judicature would be boundless and above law, and that the party grieved should be without remedy."

For support of the fifth proposition the reference was to be to the reasons formerly offered against the judgment of the Lords against the East India Company.

* So encouraging is the habit of the House of Commons to receiving petitions of grievance, that at the beginning of every new parliament, they appoint one grand committee for grievances, and another for courts of justice, and both are appointed to sit in the House once a week. See Journ. Comm. Nov. 13. 1761.

to be used at the Conference intended to be desired; and at the same time resolved, That the Lords should be desired to vacate both their judgment against sir Samuel Barnardiston and their judgment against the East India Company.

Thus far had the House of Commons proceeded on the 10th of December 1669. But in this stage of the proceeding, it was thought fit by the king to stop the progress of quarrel between the two houses: and accordingly on that day he prorogued the parliament to the 14th day of February; and so the session terminated without passing so much as one act, and the consequence to the king was disappointment of a supply of 400,000*l.* which had been voted to him by the Commons.

On the day appointed by the prorogation the parliament being again assembled, the king made a speech, one part of which anxiously guarded the two houses against revival of the difference between them. But yet as early as the fifth day of the session the Commons fixed an early time for resuming consideration of the jurisdiction of the Lords. This was enough to convince the king, that unless something beyond a general dissuasion was adopted on his part the dispute would soon recommence; and that the supplies, for which he had urgently pressed in his speech, were in danger of being interrupted. In order, therefore, to prevent the further interruption of parliamentary business, the king made a speech to the Lords and Commons, offering his mediation between the two houses in the case of Skinner. His proposal to them for ending their difference was, that he should give present order to erase all records and entries of this matter in the council books and in the Exchequer; and that the two Houses should do the like; so that no memory might remain of the dispute. This proposal of the king* was instantly accepted by both houses. In the printed journal of the Commons there is an entry of the king's speech, and of their resolution in compliance with it to make a rasure or vacat in their journals of all matters relating to the business between the East India Company and Skinner, and of the making of such rasure or vacat accordingly in the House. But it is observable, that the printed journal of the Lords is with a blank on this part of the business of the day, neither giving the king's speech, nor an entry of their manner of proceeding upon the occasion. In other words, the Lords equally with the Commons accepted the king's expedient, and equally with them complied with the terms of it in point of rasure and obliteration: but the Lords chose to do this in the way, which to them seemed least wounding to their extensive claims of judicature; and for that purpose left their journal without a trace of the cause and manner of obliteration, or scarce a memento of the subject of it.

This Narrative of what occurred subsequently to the Conferences is extracted from the Abridgement of the Case by Mr. Hargrave, who thus proceeds:

Thus at length this great case of Skinner against the East India Company, after engaging the Lords and Commons in serious quarrel during almost two years, was concluded through the source of recommendation whence the case was introduced into parliament: for from the king's recommending the case to the House of Lords their cognizance of it commenced, and from his recommendation also proceeded the compromise by which the quarrel of the two Houses about the case was finally disposed of. Whilst the contention lasted, it was a hard struggle on the part of the Lords to fix their claim of original jurisdiction over civil causes, to fix their claim of assessing damages, to fix their claim of fining and imprisoning at pleasure, and to assist their claim of the sole judicature of parliament. On the part of the king also it was obvious, that he was not averse to all these pretensions of the aristocracy, so far as they tended to exclude the Commons: for he not only first recommended the cognizance of the case to the Lords; but at their request postponed a prorogation to facilitate the completion of their operation of fining and imprisoning sir Samuel Barnardiston; and his ministers afterwards concurred in the contrivance of releasing him, as if he had submitted to the jurisdiction and paid the fine, when according to the reality of the case the payment was a mere juggle, and he was liberated by order of the Lords gratuitously, and without any submission whatever. But the issue was unfavourable both to the king and to the Lords. To the king it was discreditable; because, after having in some measure encouraged the Lords to take cognizance of the case, and avowed himself sufficiently to shew his wish to side with them in the contest, he found himself necessitated for the sake of pecuniary supply to propose a retreat to them. To the Lords the contest was all loss. From the stirring of the question, it was disclosed, that almost all Westminster Hall, except Mr. Prynne, was against the main pretensions of the Lords: and there followed votes of the house of Commons, proclaiming to the people of England, that the claim of exercise of original jurisdiction by the Lords in civil causes was an usurpation; that the supreme jurisdiction was not in the Lords but in the full and whole parliament; and that when the Lords fined and imprisoned persons for complaining by petition to the house of Commons, it was a breach of their privilege and an invasion of the rights of the people at large. In form, indeed the compromise of the quarrel between the two houses was mutual cessation of hostility, with mutual obliteration from their journal. But in substance there was a vast difference between the two obliterations. The obliteration by the Lords included vacating the judgment against the East India company, and the judgment against sir Samuel Barnardiston, without an iota of protestation, exception or reserve; that is, included the whole of the requisition resolved upon by the Commons immediately before the king's mediation. But the Commons in their obliteration only yielded the rasure of their own proceedings, when the object of them was sufficiently accomplished by an-nullation of the judgments they had throughout sought to annul. The Lords gave up their two judgments. The entry, of the vigorous proceedings to obtain that sacrifice from the Lords, was the only concession made by the Commons. The consequences also of the compromise corresponded with these views of it: for it operated as a blow so fatal to the claim of the Lords to an original jurisdiction, that the exercise in civil causes has ever since been relinquished; and it also made such an impression upon the other judicative pretensions of the Lords, that new controversies were soon generated between the houses.

222. The Trial of the Lord MORLEY, for Murder, before the House of Lords: 18 CHARLES II. A. D. 1666.

MEMORANDUM (a) That upon Saturday the 28th of April, 1666, A. D. 18 Car. 2. all the Judges of England, viz. myself, J. K. Lord Chief Justice of the King's-bench; sir Orlando Bridgman, Lord Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas; sir Matthew Hales chief baron of the Exchequer, my brother Atkins, brother Twisden, brother Tyrell, brother Turner, brother Browne, brother Windham, brother Archer, brother Raynsford, and brother Morton met together at Serjeants-Inn in Fleet-street, to consider of such things as might in point of law, fall out in the Trial of the Lord Morley (b); who was on the Monday to be tried by his Peers for a murder: and we did all, una voce, resolve several things following, par. 1. First it was agreed, that upon the letter of the lord high-steward directed to us we were to attend at the trial in our scarlet robes and the chief-judges in their collars of SS, which I did accordingly. But my lord Bridgman was absent being suddenly taken with the gout; the chief baron had not his collar of SS, having left it behind him in the country; but we all were in scarlet, but nobody then had a collar of SS, but myself, for the reasons aforesaid.

2. It was resolved, that in case the Peers who are triers (c) after the evidence given, and the prisoner withdrawn, and they gone to consult of their verdict, should desire to speak with any of the Judges to have their opinion upon any point of law, that if the lord steward spoke to us to go, we should go to them; but when the Lords asked us any question, we should not deliver any opinion, but let them know we were not to deliver any private opinion, without conference with the rest of the Judges, and that to be openly done in court. And this notwithstanding the precedent in the case of the earl of Castlehaven (d) was thought prudent in regard of ourselves, as well as for avoiding suspicion, which might grow by private opinions, all resolutions of judges being always done in public.

3. Although we were not all agreed in the precedent of the Lord Dacre's case, cited by sir Edw. Coke, in the Pleas of the Crown, p. 29. & 30. that the judges may deliver any opinion in open court, in the absence of the prisoner; yet it was agreed, that if the lord-steward should in open court, demand any of our opinions in any thing, though in the absence of the prisoner, we were to give an answer to the question, the lord high steward should demand of us; we being called to assist the court, and the demand of any question in such case being referred to the discretion of the high-steward. (e)

4. It was resolved by us all, That in case any of the witnesses which were examined before the coroner were dead, or unable to travel and oath made thereof, that then the examinations of such witnesses, so dead or unable to travel, might be read; the coroner first making oath that such examinations are the same which he took upon oath, without any addition or alteration whatsoever. (f)

5. That in case oath should be made, that any witness who had been examined by the coroner, and was then absent, was detained by the means or procurement of the prisoner, and the opinion of the Judges asked whether such examination might be read; we should answer, that if their lordships were satisfied by the evidence they had heard, that the witness was detained by means or procurement of the prisoner, then the examination might be read; but whether he was detained by means or procurement of the prisoner, was matter of fact of which we were not Judges, but their lordships.

6. Agreed, That if a witness who was examined by the coroner be absent, and oath is made that they have used all their endeavours to find him, and cannot find him, that is not sufficient to authorize the reading of such examination.

7. Agreed, That no words, be they what they will, are in law such a provocation, as if a man kill another for words only, will diminish the offence of killing a man, from murder to be manslaughter. As suppose one call another son of a whore, or give him the lie, and thereupon he to whom the words are given kill the other, this is murder; but if upon ill words, both the parties suddenly fight, and one kill the other, this is but manslaughter, for it is a combat betwixt two upon a sudden heat, which is the legal description of manslaughter (g); and we were all of opinion that the statute of 1 Jac. for stabbing a man, not having first struck, nor having any weapon drawn, was only a declaration of the common law, and made to prevent the inconveniences of juries, who were apt to believe that to be a provocation to extenuate a murder which in law was not. (h)

8. Agreed, that if upon words two men grow to anger, and afterwards they suppress that anger, and then fall into other discourses, or have other diversions for such a space of time as, in reasonable intendment, their heat might be cooled, and some time after they draw one upon another, and fight, (i) and one is killed, this is murder; because being attended with such circumstances as is reasonably supposed to be a deliberate act, and a premeditated revenge upon the first quarrel; but the circumstances of such an act being matter of fact, the jury are Judges of those circumstances.

(g) Vide Crompton's Justice, 23, a. b. Two play at tables, and fall out suddenly, and one with a dagger kill the other. If there be a quarrel, and a reasonable time before they fight, it is murder.

(h) As to these 7th and 8th Resolutions, see the Cases of Mawbridge, a. d. 1706, and of Onehy, a. d. 1726, post. See also East's Pleas of the Crown, c. 5. sect. 19, et seq.

(i) Two fall out suddenly, and fight presently, and one kill the other, it is but manslaughter: so if after they have quarrelled, they presently go into the field and fight, one kills the other, it is but manslaughter; for all is one continued act of fury. But if two fall out suddenly, and before any blows, presently appoint to go to the field and fight, and one kill the other, this is murder; because it appeareth by choosing a fit place to fight, their reason was above their passion, and so a deliberate act. Vide Crompton's Justice, p. 25.

FANSHAW.

The Lord-Chancellor being then Lord-Steward, came from Worcester-house in his coach, having (besides his usual attendance) sir John Eaton, his majesty's chief gentleman-usber, carrying a white staff nine foot long; and sir Edward Walker, Garter king at arms in his coat of office, attending on him. And he was met at Westminster-hall-gate with five maces more, who all went before him into the court, where he took his place in a chair of state; the five maces placed themselves on each side of the state; and serjeant Lee went into the body of the court, and there laid down his mace; and he supplied the place of marshal or crier of the court. Sir John Eaton with the white staff, and sir Edward Walker stood at the lower-end of the state; sir John Eaton on the right-hand of the lord-steward, and sir Edward Walker on the left.

The Clerk of the Crown in chancery, standing at the lower end of the court, with three obeisances coming up to the Lord-Steward, on his knee presented the Commission unto him.

Sir Thomas Fanshaw, clerk of the crown in the King's-bench, with the like reverence, came and received the Commission from the Lord-Steward, and returned to his place in the midst of the court.

Serjeant Lee, after an O yes, made proclamation, viz. The Lord High-Steward of England doth command all persons to keep silence, while his majesty's Commission is reading. Sir T. Fanshaw read the Commission.

Then sir John Eaton and sir Edward Walker carrying the white staff between them, on the knee presented it to my Lord-Steward, and he delivered it back to sir John Eaton, who placed himself with it on the lower end of the state, on the right hand of the Lord-Steward, and sir Edward Walker on the left, on a seat even with the body of the court, having a space between them for the Lord-Steward to see the prisoner; on which seat also sat the clerk of the crown in Chancery, and Mr. Kips, the seal-bearer, the seal being laid at the lower end of the state before the Lord-Steward.

O-yes again, and proclamation made; The Lord High-Steward of England doth command all persons whatsoever, except peers, and privy-counsellors, and judges, to be uncovered.

Serjeant Barcroft called to make return of the precept to him directed, who came into the body of the court, and delivered it to sir Thomas Fanshaw, and he read the return on the backside of the precept.

O-yes again, and the Lords required to answer to their names.

The Lords Triers called by the list, Mr. Warterhouse, assistant to sir Thomas Fanshaw, reading their names, and Serjeant Lee calling.

John lord Roberts, keeper of the privy-seal.

Edw. earl of Manchester, Lord-Chamberlain.

Henry lord Arlington, Secretary of State.

Aubrey earl of Oxford.

John earl of Bath

Wm. earl of Bedford.

Wm. earl of Craven.

James earl of Suffolk.

T. vis. Falconbridge.

Rich. earl of Dorset.

John vis. Mordaunt.

John earl of Exeter.

Philip lord Wharton.

J. earl of Bridgwater.

William lord Paget.

J. e. of Northampton.

William lord Maynard.

H. e. of Peterborough

Francis lord Newport.

—earl of Thanet.

John lord Lucas.

N. earl of Scarsdale

Charles lord Gerrard.

John lord Berkley. Anthony lord Ashley.

Hon. lord Townshend. John lord Freshville.

O-yes again and the lieutenant-of the Tower called, to make return of his precept, and bring in his prisoner.

The prisoner brought to the bar and the precept delivered to Serjeant Lee, and by him to sir Thomas Fanshaw, who read the return on the backside of the precept.

Then the Lord-Steward made a speech to the prisoner, telling him the cause of his being brought thither.

The Indictment read by sir Thomas Fanshaw and the plea made in the king's-bench, where he had pleaded Not Guilty, and put himself upon his peers.

Then the Lord Steward made a speech (by way of charge) to the peers.

O-yes, and proclamation made; If any will give evidence for our sovereign lord the king against Thomas lord Morley and Mounteagle, they shall be heard; the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance.

Lord-Steward said, he heard the lord Morley was lame, and therefore bid the lieutenant of the Tower set a chair for him to ease himself.

Lord Morley desired to be heard; but the Lord Steward told him, that it was usual to hear the evidence first, and after that he might and should be heard any thing he had to offer; whereupon he sat down.

Serjeant Glyn, the king's eldest Serjeant, opened the Indictment, then Mr. Attorney-General Palmer.

Several witnesses examined; the prisoner asking them what questions he pleased. Two witnesses swore, that the lord Morley run him into the head. One witness swore a former grudge. Another, that when he had run Mr. Hastings through the head, he swore, 'God-damme, I promised thee this, and now I have given it thee.' And that the quarrel begun at the Fleece-Tavern about an half crown that the Lord Morley said he had laid down.

Mr. Solicitor-General Finch desired the depositions of some witnesses taken before the coroner (who were since dead) might be read; which the prisoner opposed, desiring that no evidence might be given against him, but face to face.

The Lord-Steward demanded the opinion of the judges, who by the Lord Chief-Justice Kelyng delivered their opinion; That upon proof made that the witnesses were dead, and oath by the coroner, that the depositions were unaltered, they ought to be read; which was done.

The Depositions of Three Witnesses read.

Serjeant Maynard desired, that the depositions of a material witness taken at the Coroner's Inquest (who had now absented himself so that they could not find him) might be read.

The Prisoner opposed it, and the opinion of the judges being required; the Lord Chief-Justice delivered the opinion, That if the court upon any evidence were satisfied, the witness was withdrawn by the procurement of the prisoner, the deposition ought to be read, otherwise not. Whereupon

Thomas Harding sworn, deposed, That Thomas Snell, his apprentice, was lately run away from him, and that his fellows said, he told them, before he went away, that the Lord Morley's Trial was to be shortly but he would not be there. The court not thinking this evidence sufficient, the deposition was not read.

Lord Morley desired some witnesses might be heard on his side, on his behalf, who were admitted, but not upon oath.* Lord Morley heard to say what he pleased for himself.

* The history of the law concerning the examination of witnesses in behalf of prisoners accused of capital offences, is thus given briefly by Blackstone :

"It was an antient and commonly received practice (derived from the civil law, and which also to this day obtains in the kingdom of France) [Domat. publ. law, b. 3, t. 1, Montesq. Sp. L. b. 29, c. 11.] that as counsel was not allowed to any prisoner accused of a capital crime, so neither should he be suffered to exculpate himself by the testimony of any witnesses. And therefore it deserves to be remembered, to the honour of Mary 1, (whose early sentiments, till her marriage with Philip of Spain, seem to have been humane and generous) that when she appointed sir Richard Morgan chief justice of the common pleas, she enjoined him, 'that notwithstanding the old error which did not admit any witness to speak, or any other matter to be heard in favour of the adversary, her majesty being party; her highness's pleasure was, that whatsoever could be brought in favour of the subject should be admitted to be heard: and moreover, that the justices should not persuade themselves to sit in judgment otherwise for her highness than for her subject.' [Hollingsh. 1112.] Afterwards, in one particular instance (when embezzling the queen's military stores was made felony by statute 31 Eliz. c. 4.) it was provided that any person impeached for such felony, 'should be received and admitted to make any lawful proof that he could, by lawful witness or otherwise, for his discharge and defence: and in general the courts grew so heartily ashamed of a doctrine so unreasonable and oppressive, that a practice was gradually introduced of examining witnesses for the prisoner, but not upon oath [2 Bulstr. 147 Cro. Car. 292.]: the consequence of which still was, that the jury gave less credit to the prisoner's evidence, than to that produced by the crown. Sir Edward Coke [3 Inst. 79.] protests very strongly against this tyrannical practice: declaring that he never read in any act of parliament, book-case or record, that in criminal cases the party accused should not have witnesses sworn for him; and therefore there was not so much as stintilla juris against it. [See also 2 Hal. P. C. 283, and his Summary 264.] And the House of Commons were so sensible of

Mr. Solicitor summed up the Evidence as follows, viz.

April 30, 1666.

The SPEECH of Sir HENEAGE FINCH, Knt. the King's Solicitor-General, at the Trial of the Lord Morley (the Earl of Clarendon, Lord Chancellor, being then Lord High-Steward of England, pro tempore) who summed up the Evidence, &c.*

That a man is slain is not denied by my lord Morley; the manner how it came to pass we have proved for the king. His lordship hath endeavoured by his witnesses to difference this absurdity, that in the bill for abolishing hostilities between England and Scotland [stat. 4 Jac. 1, c. 1.] when felonies committed by Englishmen in Scotland were ordered to be tried in one of the three northern counties, they insisted on a clause, and carried it [Com. Journ. 4, 5, 12, 13, 15, 29, 30 Jun. 1607.] against the efforts of both the crown and the House of Lords, against the practice of the courts in England, and the express law of Scotland [Ibid. 4 Jun. 1607.] 'that in all such trials for the better discovery of the truth, and the better information of the consciences of the jury and justices, there shall be allowed to the party arraigned the benefit of such credible witnesses, to be examined upon oath, as can be produced for his clearing and justification.' At length by the statute 7 W. 3, c. 3, the same measure of justice was established throughout all the realm, in cases of treason within the act: and it was afterwards declared by statute 1 Ann. st. 2, c. 9, that in all cases of treason and felony, all witnesses for the prisoner should be examined upon oath, in like manner as the witnesses against him."

Instances of refusal to hear witnesses for prisoners are to be found in this Collection, vol. 1, p. 885, 1281 (see also 1304) and from other of the early Trials it seems that no thought was entertained of examining witnesses for the prisoners.

The mischiefs attending the practice of not allowing witnesses for a prisoner to be sworn, are noticed by sir John Hawles with his usual spirit. See his Observations on Colledge's Case, infra. They are moreover to be found in the accounts published in this Collection, of Trials which occurred within the period in which that practice prevailed: See also the observations which were made in this very Case, by the Solicitor General on Jackson's testimony. "By the English law," says Fountainhall, writing as it seems in 1678, "no witnesses are examined upon oath against the king's interest, even though they be led by panels to prove their defences; but the witnesses' declaration is alienably taken by the judge who makes of it whatever he pleases." Decisions vol. 1. p. 5.

the case in some circumstances: the question will now be reduced to this; Whether this fact be murder, as it is charged upon him in the Indictment, or any less offence than that; in which I see, my lord Morley placeth his hopes, that it will fall? My lord, that this is a question of law, arising from fact; I will with your grace's permission, and the favour of my Lords the Peers, presume in the first place, to lay down some principles or conclusions in law, wherein I think, I am not deceived; and would be loth to prevaricate in case of blood. And when I have laid down the conclusions, I shall proceed to apply them to the fact now in proof before you, and compare it to such a proof as his lordship hath produced. There are in law but three cases imaginable, which are any way capable of excuse for the death of a man. These are, First, when a man kills another in his own defence. Second, when he doth it upon misadventure and mere accident. Third, when he doth it in heat of passion, or any sudden adventure (for that which is done in prosecution of justice hath no affinity with the present question). The two first of these do excuse à toto, 'tis not so much as felony; the last à tanto, 'tis felony, but within clergy. But yet, my lord, the common law, the ancient common law of England, would not endure to hear of any excuse at all for the death of a man. By the ancient law, before the statute of Marlbridge, he that killed a man in his own defence; and after that till the statute of Gloucester, he that had killed a man by the most innocent misfortune in the world (the glance of an arrow, or any thing else than that) must have died for it, as a murderer. For murder is a sin so contrary to the genius and temper of the English nation, that whatsoever looks but like it, hath ever been prosecuted by our law, by a most strict and speedy vengeance. When the law began to let in some kind of excuses in these cases, yet they were circled in with as wary cautions and observations; and bound and limited with as nice distinctions and differences as could be. And therefore he that kills a man se defendendo, must not plead that he did it so; but he must plead Not Guilty: for it is a maxim in the law, that the death of a man can never be justified; nay, the jury cannot find him to be se defendendo, but they must find the special fact, and leave it to the court to judge, whether it were se defendendo, as in circumstances. For if the fact be so, that the man did not fly to the wall, or his last refuge, before he did give the mortal wound, he is a felon still. He that kills a man by accident or misadventure, must take care that the action he was about were absolutely lawful and necessary too: for if there were an unnecessary meddling with edge-tools, or fire-arms; if there were unnecessary recreation in the act which produced this event, he is responsible to the law for the utmost consequence. And at this day, if a man that kills another in the city escapes out of the city, the city is to be amerced for letting a notorious malefactor escape. Hitherto your lordships see, that in these two cases, which are most pardonable of any, yet the law is very severe; and therefore in cases of an higher nature, it is still more rigorous. Now, because the hope of this case is, that it will end in manslaughter, and because that manslaughter is only distinguished from murder, in that it is not designed, but otherwise, it is in itself an act as wilful and as violent, (though not so malicious) and so borders upon murder: I shall proceed to shew your lordships how the law watches upon manslaughter, with all the jealousies and circumspections imaginable; and therefore it is an undoubted principle of law (and all the men in England hold their lives upon very miserable terms, if it were otherwise), if any man shall meet a man in the street, and kill him without any visible provocation, the law supposeth there was malice precedent, and judgeth this act murder. Secondly, as it is murder, to kill without any provocation, so if the provocation be slight and trivial, it is all one in law, as if there were none. For the law of England allows no man to value himself at such a rate, as if the blood of his neighbour were a fit sacrifice to expiate every mean and slight affront. This was the case that fell out in the time of the most reverend Chief-Justice, the lord Popham: A gentleman of Kent came by another, and made wry mouths and laughed, and made such signs as usually put men into passion; the other presently fell upon him and killed him: and my lord Chief-Justice Popham and his brethren delivered their opinions, that it was murder: for this was not a competent provocation, and the man was hanged upon an appeal of murder. Thirdly, As no provocation makes it murder, and a slight one, is all one with none; so if the provocation be great and high, and such as might be capable of excuse in itself, yet if a man be not slain in the very heat and bent of passion; if there be any interval of time, as a night's rest, and sleeping upon it, the law knows no such period: but if there be such an interval, that the law supposes the blood might and ought to have been cooled again; that a man might have come to himself, and then he falls on the person that gave him the provocation, that which was passion at the first, is malice at the last; and that which would have been manslaughter then, is murder now. This I submit to your lordships judgments, who hear me now; and if I did not think the law was clear in these points, I would not presume to affirm it in so great and solemn an assembly. To come to the matter of fact; I desire your lordships to consider what Mr. Hastings hath done, and what he hath suffered. First, there appears to be so little of provocation, that the poor gentleman that is murdered, offered any man 5*l*. to tell him what the quarrel was. His lordship makes his defence, that he hopes his peers will consider, that there is no other provocation than the half-crown. I am sorry for it. I am sure the laws of England allow no man to take away another's life for half-a-crown, without being guilty of murder. The first thing that is said Mr. Hastings should do is this; he is in a manner suspected, and hears my Lord quarrel about an half-crown, and saith, I wonder a person of honour should make such a-do about an half-crown, and then throws down four half-crowns upon the table to make satisfaction: presently swords are drawn, and Mr. Brommidge draws his first, and hectors it for my lord; then they are put up again: there is one interval and recollection of time. My lord proceeds to quarrel with Mr. Hastings, and calls his sins to remembrance; and knowing that Mr. Hastings had been guilty of killing a man not long before, presently tells him, We come not here to stab folks; which was a bitter reply. Mr. Hastings is grieved to see himself so openly reprov'd by my lord, and could not chuse but tell him, he was a gentleman (and surely Hastings is a confessed gentleman, and a noble name in this kingdom, and always must be); but at last goes a little farther, and saith, as good a gentleman as my lord. This is not comparable to laughing at my lord, nor to making wry mouths; and yet if Hastings had done this, and his lordship had killed him for it, he had stood guilty of murder. Observe, I beseech your lordships, how Mr. Hastings is treated; he is four times drawn upon, twice by Brommidge in the house; in the street, Brommidge draws upon him again; and just under the arch in Lincolns-Inn-Fields he draws the fourth time. Now saith Mr. Hastings, I have no quarrel to you, captain; if there be any, it must be disputed between me and my lord. This is not such a speech to make a quarrel, but to prevent one: What could a gentleman do less, that found himself four times assaulted? For if he would decline the quarrel, the best way was to put Brommidge out of the case, as a likely expedient. When that would not do, to the field they come. And here, my lord Morley hath produced some witnesses, who being not to be sworn, have said freely, that Mr. Hastings pressed my lord to fight, and saw him draw, and attack with the three on the other side. Street said, he resolved to fight my lord; and another, that my lord said he would not fight. This they bring, to make my lord Morley purely passive, and only drawn to fight. Under favour, we must submit to the judgment of your grace and your lordships his peers. The thing that is said here is not probable. 'Tis plain, Mr. Hastings had said, he would give any man 5*l*. that would tell him what the quarrel was: Would he that knew no quarrel have the blood of my lord Morley? But then, compare this with the witnesses, which we have brought and sworn; all three expressly say, they saw the fight and the beginning of it. But with submission to your grace, a fight it cannot be called; in truth, it is a direct assassination: for three witnesses swore, there were two upon one all the while; viz. upon Mr. Hastings. And Mr. Hastings being thus pressed steps back to get a little ground; then my lord takes him at the advantage, and shortens his sword, and runs him in the head. No they that say, my lord Morley went away first towards his own house, have forgot that he came back again and killed the man. I press this case upon the bare want of provocation, because the consequence is great in law: I press it, as if the proof were to be set here, and no more were to be said; and do presume to affirm, it is a malice in the law, and murder in his lordship. But yet we shall not rest here; but if we go a little farther, your lordships will see, here is malice apparent, malice confessed and most evident. As soon as Mr. Hastings was slain, my lord Morley, with a most desperate imprecation, throws the sword upon him, God damn me, there you lie. Another swears his lordship said, I have promised, and now you have it. Can your lordships doubt now, whether my lord killed Mr. Hastings with a deliberate hatred? You see, he confesseth it was in discharge of a promise; and my lord is to be believed against himself. And the brother of this gentleman hath made a sad comment upon these words, and tells us, how the promise arose, and how it came to be performed. Mr. Hastings tells his brother, that he once had the unhappiness to have a quarrel with my lord many years ago, almost 10, and that fighting with my lord, he had the misfortune to give him an hurt; and though the witness speaks only out of his brother's mouth, yet he testifies, that his brother told it him in the anguish of his spirit, as a secret that troubled him, and which he did not tell out of design, but by way of lamentation. And yet if Mr. Hastings had been found bleeding in the field, and been asked who killed him, and had said, my lord Morley had slain him; it had been good evidence, though no other witnesses were, and though it came out of his own mouth. The brother swears farther, that my lord Morley coming by, and his brother paying his lordship due respect, my Lord received it with so much contempt, that his brother said presently, he knew not what it meant, I doubt he bears me a grudge. This was a year and an half before his death; but within a quarter of a year before, the witnesses say, his brother, his father, and my lord, were at an ale-house; no sooner was his brother gone down stairs, but when he came up again he finds my lord with a sword drawn, and swears that his brother then told him, that my lord was always urging him to drink; and then would seek all occasions he could to give and take offence. So then, it seems, it was my lord's custom to urge Mr. Hastings, and to give him frequent provocations, as if he had sought an occasion for manslaughter, that he might kill him within the protection of the law. This is the most desperate complication of malice that can be. To this purpose, I shall presume to put a case (which our books speak,) and which will highly concern the point in this case. If my lord Morley had fled to the wall, and had slain Mr. Hastings when he had fled to the wall, that would not have served his turn, as this case is; for our books tell us of one, who bore malice to another, and then provoked him to draw his sword; seeing the sword drawn, he fled away, to tempt the adversary to pursue, and still retired till he came to the wall; now seeing himself at his last refuge, he thought to kill him legally and safely in his own defence. But since the pretence of law was but an art to disguise the malice of his heart, which he now executed freely, the book says it was murder: so it will be here. Your lordships will give me leave on this occasion to tell you, that it is either the misfortune or the just reproach of some governments in foreign states, that there are places abroad, where murder is a cheaper sin than theft; and the same people, that will rise up in arms as one man to pursue a pilferer, will yet make a lane through the midst of them, for the man-slayer to escape. Hence it comes to pass, that men are slain every day for any thing, for nothing; insomuch that a learned civilian writing of those republics, tells us plainly, 'Frequentiores sunt hominum cædes, quam nativitates.' But however it be in these Commonwealths, yet we, who have the happiness to live under a monarchy, (the best of governments) and under a king, (the best of monarchs) have all our lives secured to us, by his majesty's own royal and immediate protection; and therefore no corruption of manners will ever be able to bring this sin into fashion and credit amongst us, nothing will ever naturalise it here. I do acknowledge to your lordships (for why should I conceal any thing that makes for my lord Morley's advantage?) I do confess that an affront, or indignity offered to a peer, is much more heinous, than that which is offered to a private gentleman. But I must needs say withal, that the law hath provided another manner of reparation for a peer, than that which it gives a gentleman. The same words that being spoken of a gentleman, will bear no kind of action; when they are spoken to a Peer, become scandalum magnatum. The Peer recovers great damage; the king inflicts fine or imprisonment: so that upon the matter the offender is bound in chains, and brought and laid at my lord's feet. Now for him, whose honour is thus guarded by the law, to avenge himself by his sword, is a most unpardonable excuse: I do not pretend, I do not offer to say, that the killing of a man is more capital in case of a Peer, than would be in the case of a private gentleman: but I do presume to affirm, that no provocation in the world, can make that to be but man-slaughter in the case of a peer, that would be murder in the case of a gentleman; that is this case. Will your lordships therefore give me leave to turn the tables, and suppose Mr. Hastings had killed my lord Morley, upon so slight and groundless a pretence; as suppose, my lord Morley, in his life time, had with grief of heart complained to his brother, that Mr. Hastings did bear him a secret hatred, because in a former combat his lordship had worsted Mr. Hastings, and given him an hurt: Suppose, my lord Morley had long before this complained farther, that he saw the effect of Mr Hastings's malice upon every occasion, and when his lordship did but offer to salute Mr. Hastings, and gave him a respect; Mr. Hastings received it sullenly and unmannerly, and returned it with contempt; suppose that his lordship had complained farther, that Mr. Hastings did nothing but seek occasions and pretences of a quarrel; and suppose that within a quarter of a year of my lord Morley's death, Mr. Hastings had been found in an alehouse, with my lord Morley, and had there drawn his sword upon my lord: and then my lord had complained to his brother, that he did believe Mr. Hastings would do him some mischief some time or other: And suppose, after all this, that my lord Morley had been slain just in such a manner, as Mr. Hastings hath been, would your lordship, would the kingdom have thought this a sufficient account for noble blood, if Mr. Hastings had only been found guilty of manslaughter, and escaped by his clergy, and a burning in the hand? My lords, the quality of an offender may serve to enhance the crime; but since the world stood, it never was counted any abatement. The same duty to the king, the same obedience to his laws, the same reverence to human nature, the same care to avoid the effusion of Christian blood, is expected from a lord, which is required from the meanest commoner of England. It is the case of all the people of England, who are highly concerned in the present example; if they put their trust in the law, as the great avenger of blood in the world, and once find themselves deceived, who knows the consequence that may follow; What feuds in private families? What massacres it may produce at last? And therefore, no doubt, but all the kingdom will observe, and mark the issue of this day; and will be curious to know, what will become of a lord, in whose eyes the blood of a gentleman hath been so vile and inconsiderable; if it were possible, I say, if it were possible, that so great a tribunal as this should either mistake the fact, or misunderstand the law, what judicature is there left on this side of Heaven for mankind to rely on? I pretend not to aggravate the matter: this is the place where no detestation of the crime, no passion of the prosecutor, and no compassion of your lordships towards a peer of the realm, is to have any ingredient in the verdict. And therefore, having observed to your lordships, that there is malice implied by the law, and in a manner confessed by the party, besides the direct and formal malice which hath been proved; I shall now submit all to the judgment, which the law hath wisely placed in your lordships most noble breasts; with this only consideration, it is the voice of blood that crieth, I know your lordships will give it such an audience as it ought to have; such an audience as may quiet it, and keep it from crying any more; such an audience as may cleanse the land from blood, and be a means to continue to your lordships that due veneration which all men have to your lordships most righteous and impartial proceedings.

After him Serjeant Maynard spoke.

Lord Steward desired the Lords to withdraw into the Court of Wards, and consider of their evidence; but he did not sum up the evidence.

Lieutenant of the Tower bid to withdraw his prisoner.

The Lords and the prisoner being withdrawn; serjeant Lee brought wine and biscuits to the Lord-Steward, and then round the court.

The Lords stayed about three hours, and then returned into the court, and took their places. Sir Thomas Fenshaw first called them according to their precedence; and all being present, he then called them again, beginning with the lowest, who answering to his name,

The Lord-Steward asked him, saying, My Lord Fresheville, is my Lord Morley Guilty or Not Guilty? Who laying his hand on his breast, answered, Not Guilty of Murder, but Guilty of Manslaughter. And in the same manner asking them all severally, they all gave the same answer, except two, the Lord Wharton, and Lord Ashley, who answered, Guilty of Murder.

The Lords having delivered their verdict, the Lieutenant of the Tower was commanded to bring in his prisoner. The Lord Steward told him, his Peers had found him Guilty of Manslaughter, and asked him, what he could say for himself? He answered, he desired the benefit of the clergy, and the benefit of the statute. Lord Steward said, he must have the benefit of the clergy; and that he conceived the statute was clear in his behalf; and asking the opinion of the Judges, they all bowed in token of consent.*

The Lord-Steward making a short speech of admonishment to the prisoner, told him he was discharged, paying his fees; and then dismissed the Court, and broke his staff.

223. Proceedings* on an Impeachment of JOHN, Lord Viscount MORDAUNT, of High Crimes and Misdemeanors: 18 CHARLES II. A. D. 1666.

December 18, 1666.

SIR Thomas Gower reported to the House of Commons from the committee of Grievances, the State of the Case to them referred, upon the

* This Case is briefly stated in p. xcv. of Mr. Hargrave's elaborate and learned Preface to Lord Hale's Treatise "Of the Jurisdiction of the Lords House of Parliament."

The account which Lord Clarendon gives of Mordaunt's activity in bringing about the Restoration is to be found in the last book of "The History of the Rebellion, &c." The noble Historian likewise mentions in the "Continuation of his Life," Mordaunt's activity in support of the Royal Cause, after he had undergone a severe trial before the High Court of Justice, where, by his own singular address and behaviour, and his friends having wrought by money upon some of the witnesses to absent themselves, he was by one single voice acquitted, and after a long detention in prison, by the indignation of Cromwell, who well knew his guilt, and against the rules and forms of their own justice, he was discharged after most of his associates were publicly and barbarously put to several kinds of death. See Mr. Mordaunt's Trial, ante, vol. 5, p. 907, and Note.

In the "Continuation," &c. Lord Clarendon, while describing the selfish jealous and intriguing courses of the Royal Party after the Restoration, thus mentions the treatment which Mordaunt received from that foolish and profligate set of men:

"Mr. Mordaunt, whom the king had created a viscount before his return into England, and had been most eminent in the other contrivances, in a time when a general consternation had seized upon the spirits of those who wished best to his majesty; for when he resumed his former resolutions, so soon after his head was raised from the block, and when the blood of his confederates watered so many streets in the city and the suburbs, the most trusted by the king had totally withdrawn their correspondence, and desired that for some time no account or information might be expected from them; and therefore it must not be denied, that his vivacity, courage and industry, revived the hearts which were so near broken, before Cromwell's death, and afterwards prevailed with many to have more active spirits, than they had before appeared to have: this gentleman, I say, most unjustly underwent the heaviest weight of all their censures and reproaches. He was the butt at which all their arrows of envy, malice and jealousy, were aimed and shot; he was the object and subject of all their scurrilous jests, and depraving discourses and relations; and they who agreed in nothing else, were at unity and of one mind, in telling ridiculous stories to the king himself of his vanity and behaviour, and laying those aspersions upon him, as were most like to lessen the king's opinion of him, and to persuade him that the recompences he had already received, were abundantly more than the services he had performed: which kind of insinuations from several persons, who seemed Tayleur, complaining of the lord Mordaunt,* and others; together with the Matter of Fact; and Evidence on both sides; and the Votes and Resolves of the Committee thereupon: Which Report and Votes he delivered in at the clerk's table. And the Votes and Resolves of the committee were twice read; and were as followeth; viz.

Resolved, "That this committee doth find it proved, That upon an order from his majesty to the lord Mordaunt, to clear lodgings belonging to the chancellor of the garter in the castle of Windsor, Mr. Tayleur was turned out of certain lodgings in that castle, in March 1660, by soldiers of that garrison. 2. That this Committee do find, That Mr. Tayleur's first imprisonment in March 1660, was illegal and arbitrary. 3. That the second dispossession of Mr. Tayleur out of certain rooms in the timber-yard belonging to the castle of Windsor, by order of the lord Mordaunt, was illegal. 4. That the second commitment of Mr. Tayleur, by my lord Mordaunt, was illegal. 5. That the whole matter of fact be reported to the House togenot to do it by concert, together with some prejudice the noble person did himself by some unseasonable importunities, as if he thought he had deserved very much, did for some time draw a more ungracious countenance from the king towards him, than his own nature disposed him to, or than the other's singular and useful activity, though liable to some levity or vanity, did deserve; and which the same persons, who procured it, made use of against those who were in most trust about the king, as arguments of the little esteem they had of those who had done the king most service, when a man of so eminent merit, as Mr. Mordaunt, was so totally neglected; and did all they could to infuse the same apprehensions into him. When the truth is, most men were affected, and more grieved and discontented, for any honour and preferment which they saw conferred upon another man, than for being disappointed in their own particular expectations; and looked upon every obligation bestowed upon another man, how meritorious soever, as upon a reproach to them, and an upbraiding of their want of merit."

* "This John lord Mordaunt was a younger son of an earl of Peterborough, and had been very active, as appears from Lord Clarendon's account of him, in bringing about the restoration; for which services he was created by Charles the 2d, Viscount Avalon, Baron Mordaunt; but in all the proceedings against him, and in the Lords' Journal, whenever his name is mentioned, it is by the title of Viscount Mordaunt. (Avalon was an ancient name for Glastonbury, so called from the quantity of Avellana, or Filbert-nuts, which grew in that district.) He was father to Charles Earl of Peterborough and Mounmouth, who made so considerable a figure, both in civil and military affairs, in the reigns of Kipp William and Queen Anne." 4 Hatsell, 110.

Mr. Prynne, reports from the Committee appointed to draw up an Impeachment against the lord Mordaunt, That they find the House had not given any opinion in the first part of the Report made yesterday, from the Committee of Grievances, concerning the lord Mordaunt; being as followeth; viz. "That the Committee find it proved, That, upon an order from his majesty, to the lord Mordaunt, to clear lodgings belonging to the chancellor of the garter in the castle of Windsor, Mr. Tayleur was turned out of certain lodgings in that castle, in March 1660, by soldiers of that garrison."

The ingrossed Articles of Impeachment against the lord viscount Mordaunt were read. And some Amendments, upon the question, agreed and made thereto, at the table; The question being put, That the Articles of Impeachment against the lord viscount Mordaunt be agreed to; It was resolved in the Affirmative.

Lowther, be appointed to manage the conference.

January 3, 1667.

This day, the earl of Anglesey reported to the House of Lords the matter of the Conference with the Commons on the 29th of December last, concerning the Impeachment of John viscount Mordaunt: "That Mr. Seymour said, he would not trouble their lordships with a large induction, or preface; but deliver the Articles against John viscount Mordaunt, Constable of the Castle of Windsor; which Articles would speak for themselves."—Then the particular Articles of Impeachment being read by Mr. Seymour, he said, The crimes are so fully expressed, that he had little to add; he expressed, that here is an illegal dispossession and arbitrary imprisonment of William Tayleur, esq. by the lord accused, because Mr. Tayleur's daughter would not prostitute herself to his lust. He said, That all the Commons of England are wounded through the said Mr. Tayleur: for what the lord viscount Mordaunt hath done arbitrarily against one, he may by his power do against as many others as he please; and then concluded, that the Commons would be ready to make good the charge, and attend the prosecution in such ways and time as their lordships shall according to the course of parliament appoint.

Then the Lords commanded the said Impeachment to be read, as followeth:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT, by the Commons assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England, against JOHN Lord Viscount MORDAUNT, Constable of the Castle of Windsor, for several High Crimes and Misdemeanors committed by him.

"I. That the said lord viscount Mordaunt, being a peer of this realm, and constable of the Castle of Windsor and commander of the garrison soldiers there; understanding that one William Tayleur, esq. (who had faithfully served his late majesty king Charles 1, in his wars, and being a great sufferer for his loyalty to him during the time of the usurpation, and by his majesty king Charles 2, since his most happy Restoration by letters patents under his great seal of England, promoted to several offices of trust within the said Castle and Honour of Windsor, and in actual possession of certain lodgings with the said Castle, claimed by him as appertaining to his said offices or one of them), did intend to stand for the election of one of the burgesses of the borough of Windsor, to serve in this present parliament (for which writs of summons were issued); in the month of March, 1660 (some weeks before the time of the election), to disparage and prevent the free election of the said William Tayleur, and strike a terror into those of the said borough which should give their voices for him, and deprive them of the freedom of their voices at the election, by colour of a warrant from his majesty, on or about the 17th of the said month of March, did, by soldiers, forcibly eject the said William Tayleur, together with his wife (then great with child), family, and goods, out of the said lodgings and Castle, the rude carriage of which soldiers then frightened a young child of the said Mr. Tayleur out of its wits, whereof it soon after died; and moreover, on the 23rd of the same month, the said lord Mordaunt did command and cause the said William Tayleur to be forcibly, illegally, and arbitrarily seized upon, by soldiers, in the prison of the said borough, out of the precincts of the said Castle, which soldiers broke open the said prison doors where the said William Tayleur was then prisoner under an arrest for debt, and carried him out of the said prison into the said Castle, without any warrant but their swords, or any lawful cause, and there detained him prisoner, by the said lord Mordaunt's command, from two in the afternoon, till near one the next morning, in a cold low room, some steps under ground, refusing to accept of 2,000*l.* bail, then proffered for his enlargement.

II. That the said lord Mordaunt at the time of Mr. Tayleur's imprisonment, when 2,000*l.* bail was proffered for his release, being told that the said Mr. Tayleur was the king's servant, and had the king's Great Seal for his place as well as he the said lord Mordaunt had for his, in high contempt of his majesty's royal authority and Great Seal, replied, "He would dispose of the said Mr. Tayleur's places, and break the Great Seal, and justify it when he had done."

III. That the said lord Mordaunt in March 1664, by letters and otherwise, made sundry uncivil addresses to the daughter of the said William Tayleur: which she rejecting, and threatening to make the said viscount's lady acquainted with them, the said viscount swore, by a most dreadful oath and imprecation, he would persecute her and her family to all eternity.

IV. That on the 23rd of November, 1665, by order of the said viscount Mordaunt, the said William Tayleur was forcibly and illegally dispossessed, by soldiers, of certain rooms in the Timber-yard belonging to the said Castle, without the walls thereof, claimed by the said William Tayleur as belonging to his offices of paymaster and surveyor of the said Castle.

V. That a warrant, obtained from his majesty by untrue suggestions and misinformations, dated November 30, 1665, but not produced till some months after, upon a Pluries Habeas Corpus, for the restraining of the said

William Tayleur from going out of the said Castle, was directed to the said lord Mordaunt, who, by virtue of his own warrant, not mentioning the said warrant of his majesty, about the 9th of December following, caused the said Mr. Tayleur to be again forcibly and illegally apprehended and taken into custody, in the said borough of Windsor, without the precincts of the said Castle, by one Richard Voyle, then marshal of the said Castle, assisted with a file of musketeers, who, by command from the said lord Mordaunt, carried him prisoner into the said Castle, and there continued and illegally detained him prisoner, during the space of 20 weeks, and 5 thereof a close prisoner, not admitting him to go to church though he desired it; and, locking him up every night, refused to take bail for him, when offered, soon after his imprisonment, whereas his majesty's warrant was only to restrain him within the Castle; at which time Henry Marten, a traitor, one of the late regicides, then a prisoner there, had liberty to go abroad out of the said Castle without a keeper.

VI. That the said lord Mordaunt during the said William Tayleur's imprisonment, illegally refused to return and obey an Habeas Corpus brought by the said Mr. Tayleur for his enlargement; and being afterwards served with an Habeas Corpus by Simondson, servant to the said Mr. Tayleur, for his enlargement, the said lord Mordaunt, in high contempt of his majesty's authority and laws of this realm, gave the said servant reproachful language, calling him 'rogue' for delivering the said writ; and saying, 'that was all the answer he would give to it,' directly refusing to obey the same: and continued the said Mr. Tayleur divers weeks after a prisoner, till set at liberty upon a Pluries Habeas Corpus, by his majesty's Court of King's-Bench.

VII. That the said Mr. Tayleur, soon after his enlargement, hearing and fearing that he should be again illegally imprisoned by the said lord Mordaunt, did hereupon make application to his lordship by his friends, for a reconciliation; who answered them, 'he would never be reconciled to him;' and threatened to imprison him again; and then, if he brought another Habeas Corpus, he would imprison him again and again, and keep him prisoner as long as he lived, and likewise turn him out of all his employments and offices, and dispose of them to others as he pleased; by reason of which threats and menaces, the said Mr. Tayleur was enforced to desert his wife, family, and employments, at the said borough of Windsor, and to obscure himself elsewhere, till this present session of parliament, to prevent future illegal imprisonments by the said viscount.—All and every of which proceedings are contrary to the Great Charter; and other laws and statutes of this realm, and the rights and liberties of all the Commons and Freemen of England: and of dangerous consequence and example if unredressed. And the said Commons by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said viscount, and also of replying to the Answer to the said Articles, or any of them, or of offering proof of the premises, or any other Impeachment or Accusations that shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall (according to the course of parliaments) require, do pray, That the said viscount Mordaunt may be called to answer the said several Crimes and Misdemeanors, and receive such condign punishment as the same shall deserve; and that such further proceedings may be upon every of them, had and used against him as is agreeable to law and justice."

January 17.

The lord Mordaunt gave the house humble thanks, for giving him so long time to advise for the putting in his Answer to the Impeachment: of the House of Commons against him; and, in obedience to their lordships command, now presented his Answer in writing, with a desire that the same may be communicated to the House of Commons. Then the said Answer was read as followeth:

The Humble ANSWER of JOHN lord viscount MORDAUNT, Constable of his majesty's Castle and Honour of Windsor, to certain ARTICLES of IMPEACHMENT, exhibited against him by the Commons assembled in Parliament for several High Crimes and Misdemeanors supposed to be committed by him.

"The lord viscount Mordaunt, not being conscious to himself of any malice or purpose of evil to any man alive, nor having had other displeasure against William Tayleur, in the said Articles named, than what arose from his insolent and provoking deportment towards his majesty in disobeying his warrants and his lordship in the execution of his office (under whose immediate government he is by the offices he holds in Windsor Castle), and from the variety of complaints which have been reiterated to his lordship by the country against him for his oppression in those offices, and from the manifest abuses by him committed, in mis-spending the revenue of the said Castle, and defrauding the artificers, as also clandestinely and fraudulently endeavouring to pass accounts without controul, which matters are now depending in the courts below at Westminster-hall, accounts it a singular unhappiness, that so worthy a body as the honourable House of Commons, for whom his lordship hath ever had so great respect, should think themselves concerned in that one man's person to accuse him, in their names, and in the names of all the Commons of England; and he did well hope that it being offered to that honourable house on his behalf, that he would (with leave from your lordships) be ready to answer Mr. Tayleur in any action at law, and waive his privilege, they would have spared themselves and your lordships the trouble of this examination, and him the misfortune of being accused by them: therefore, praying your lordships that no informality in this his Answer, nor any mistaken word or expression, may be construed to his disadvantage, and saving to himself all privileges and rights belonging to him as a peer of this realm, and all advantages of exceptions to the insufficiency and informality of the said Impeachments, humbly answers:

“To the 1st Article, Which concerns the dispossession of William Tayleur of certain rooms in Windsor Castle, the said lord viscount Mordaunt answereth, That he was very ignorant of those faithful services Mr. Tayleur had done to the late king of ever-blessed memory, or of any sufferings upon the account of his loyalty to him; which had he known, they would have obliged him to a due consideration of him; and doth affirm he is yet as great a stranger to his merits, as he was at that time to his person; and heartily wishes his obedience and integrity to his majesty that now reigns could have justified that character of him: but, to satisfy your lordships how ill he deserved from his majesty and the lord Mordaunt in the matters of this article, saith, That in the year 1660, when his majesty was pleased, on his grace and favour, to confer upon him that important trust of constable and governor of the Castle of Windsor, he found Mr. Tayleur in possession of that house which belongs to the Chancellor of the Garter; that, the first installation being presently to be solemnized, his majesty was pleased by his immediate warrant of the 24th Feb. 1660, to command that within 20 days the possession of that house, in habitable condition, should be delivered to the Chancellor of the Garter; with which Warrant Mr. Tayleur being acquainted, and having perused it, positively refused to remove upon that warrant; but he was advised by the lord Mordaunt to consider better of it: however, he afterwards returned the same answer, with somewhat more stubbornness: and his wife being importuned by his lordship to persuade her husband to yield obedience, she said, she would acquaint her husband with it: all those fair ways being essayed, and finding no obedience, rather than suffer his majesty's commands to be disputed by his servant, and contumaciously disobeyed in his own house, his lordship found it necessary, in observance to the said warrant, to command a serjeant of the garrison, with some few soldiers, to remove his goods and family, yet with all civility imaginable; which they punctually observed, and assisted them in carrying out their goods. As to the affrightment of the child out of its wits, his lordship cannot think the sight of soldiers in Windsor Castle should have such effect, the child having been seen playing and well after that time of removal, and, as his lordship is informed, was sick of the worms, and this affrightment never spoken of till this occasion.—The dispossession was indeed by soldiers; the king's commands not being otherwise to be executed there, no sheriff or other civil officer being permitted to come into the king's house and garrison, by order of the place: and these were the only causes of this dispossession, and not any concernment in his election to parliament, which is most evident, in that he did stand for burgess, wherein the election was free, and was elected by the commonalty of the town; but his election afterwards was avoided by the House of Commons. As to the seizing Mr. Tayleur by soldiers out of the precincts of the Castle, and carrying him into the Castle, without warrant or any lawful cause, his lordship saith, That the time of his securing was 3 weeks before his election; and that the place where Mr. Tayleur was apprehended, was within the jurisdiction of the Castle (as he taketh it), for that the courts were there held by the said William Tayleur as clerk to the constable of the castle, who, being a counsellor at law, would not have kept courts there as his lordship's deputy, if the same had been out of the jurisdiction of the said castle. And his lordship saith, That he being informed and assured that the said Mr. Tayleur was not a prisoner for debt; and the said Mr. Tayleur having insolently disobeyed his majesty's commands concerning his own house, and spoken several scandalous and opprobrious words against his lordship, and his family, his lordship did command an officer and some few soldiers to carry him to the guard, where he was detained some few hours and after set at liberty; and his lordship denies that any bail was tendered to him for his enlargement: and his lordship being constable and governor of the said castle (it being then a garrison for the king), and believing that it might be a great encouragement to others to disobey commands, if this insolence were not taken notice of, and punished: these were the true causes of his being sent for; and hopes it will not be imputed to him as done arbitrarily, or in contempt of the law, to which he hath always shewn ready obedience, and hath asserted its authority in the worst of times, with the hazard of his life.

“To the 2nd Article, he saith, That, as Constable of the said Castle, his lordship claims to have the disposition of several of those offices in possession of William Tayleur, by colour of his patent: but denies any contemptuous words spoken of the king's Great Seal, or otherwise than to the effect and purpose to vacate his patent, which his lordship was informed by his counsel to be void in law.

“To the 3rd Article, his lordship denies any uncivil addresses to William Tayleur's daughter or of any threats of ruin to her family.

“To the 4th, he saith, That there were several rooms in the Timber Yard in the possession of the said William Tayleur, all which (except such as he claimed to belong to him as surveyor of the said Castle) did belong to several artificers, to some by patent, and to others by constant usage and enjoyment; and that, by his majesty's order under his majesty's privy signet of the 28th Februry, 1664, the rooms belonging to the artificers of the said Castle are commanded to be restored to them; and, that his lordship might be sure to do no man injury, he desired several gentlemen of the neighbourhood, who had been well acquainted with the offices and usage of the said Castle (whereof the said William Tayleur was one), to make enquiry, and certify concerning the said rooms: which all of them (except Mr. Tayleur) accordingly returned, 'That the rooms possessed by the said William Tayleur belonged to divers artificers;' whereof Mr. Tayleur having notice left at his house, his wife and family there refused to deliver possession according to his majesty's commands, but instead thereof returned reviling language; and at this time when he was removed from the said rooms, the said William Tayleur was suspended from the place of receiver by an order of his majesty and council, and Mr. Dudley Rouse placed in the said office, the said rooms claimed to belong to the said office were delivered to the said person that was placed in the said office, and the rest to the artificers to whom they belonged; but the rooms as surveyor are still in his possession, without any disturbance.

"To the 5th Article he saith, That the suggestions in his majesty's Warrant of the 30th November, 1665, for restraining William Tayleur from going out of the said Castle, are true; and that he was taken by the marshal and brought into the Castle without any soldiers, and during his restraint there he was not a close prisoner by his lordship's directions, as by his lordship's warrant will appear; neither did he at any time refuse bail for him, for none was tendered. And as for Henry Marten's liberty, his lordship saith, it was not done with his privy or consent; but saith, he hath since enquired thereinto, and finds the fact to be, that the Lord Lovelace, being Lord Lieutenant of the county, coming to Windsor, sent to the officer, to desire leave for Henry Marten (his brother in law) to dine with him, who accordingly gave him leave and sent the marshal with him, who brought him back again.

"To the 6th, he saith, That the first Habeas Corpus was returnable immédiatè and was delivered in his lordship's absence, he being then attending his majesty at Oxford, and did not know of the same till after the return thereof. The 2nd Habeas Corpus was not delivered to his lordship till Saturday afternoon at Windsor, and the term ended on Monday following; so as, by reason of the shortness of the time, he could not make return thereof; and his lordship doth deny that he called the person that delivered the said writ, 'rogue;' or used any reviling or reproachful language against him for the delivery of the said writ; and upon the Pluries Habeas Corpus, his lordship made a return thereof in due time, and the court of King's bench saw cause to hold him bound by recognition to appear the last day of the term, to answer any information that should be exhibited against him for the matters in the Warrant.

"To the 7th he saith, That he knows not what Mr. Tayleur might hear concerning his future imprisonment, nor what his guilt might make him apprehend: but that his lordship had not the least thought of it himself. He assured a noble peer of this House, who writ to him on Mr. Tayleur's behalf, that he would not imprison him; neither was he afterwards imprisoned by his lordship or did any warrant or command from his lordship issue to that purpose. And as to the allegation, that he hath been enforced to leave his wife and family, it is surely a great mistake, for he oftentimes since kept courts publicly at Windsor, without interruption, or cause of fear.—Having thus most plainly expressed to your lordships the truth of his proceedings, he humbly submits the same to your lordships' judgment."

The said Answer was communicated to the Commons.

On the 21st of January, the Commons desire the Lords to appoint a day for proceeding on the Impeachment. The Lords immediately appoint Saturday, the 26th instant; and at the lord Mordaunt's request, assign him counsel with an Order for Witnesses. On the 22nd the Commons appointed serjeant Maynard, sir Robert Atkins, Mr. Prynne, serjeant Seis, Mr. Coleman, sir Thomas Gower, sir Richard Temple, Mr. Seymour, sir Francis Goodrick, Mr. Mountague, Mr. Synfen, to manage the Evidence, at the hearing, upon the Articles of Impeachment.

January 26.

This day being appointed to hear the cause concerning the lord viscount Mordaunt, divers members of the House of Commons were present at the bar, to manage the Evidence on behalf of the House of Commons.

The lord viscount Mordaunt sitting on the form near the bar uncovered, sir Robert Atkins, one of the managers, desired the impeachment of the House of Commons against the said lord viscount Mordaunt might be read; which was accordingly done.

After which, sir Robert Atkins said, "He did observe, that the lord viscount Mordaunt (the person impeached) did sit in this house as a judge, which he excepted against, and did also except against the lord viscount Mordaunt's having counsel at the bar, to make his defence; which, he said, was contrary to former precedents, as that of the earl of Middlesex, Lord Treasurer, 21 Jac. and that of Michael de la Poole, in R. 2's time, who answered for himself."

Upon this the house commanded the company to withdraw, to take this business into consideration. And their lordships considering of the Precedents cited by the members of the Commons, especially that of the earl of Middlesex, which the house inspected in the Journal, the precedent being read; and also the house considering of a standing order of this house, made within one month after the Case of the earl of Middlesex for allowing of counsel in making of defence in cases of misdemeanors; and after a serious consideration hereof:

It is Ordered, That the Committee for Privileges do meet this afternoon, to search precedents, concerning the demeanor of a peer at the time of his defence, being impeached by the House of Commons for misdemeanors, and concerning counsel to be allowed to a peer impeached for misdemeanors; and to report on Monday morning next.

January 28.

The Earl of Bridgewater reported, "That the Committee for Privileges, in obedience to their lordships' order on Saturday last, have perused several Precedents concerning the demeanor of peers impeached by the House of Commons for misdemeanors, and concerning the allowing of counsel to persons so impeached; and, upon search, their lordships find these Precedents following:

"March 24, 1641. The judges impeached by the House of Commons, upon their petition, had counsel assigned them, for putting in their answers, and making their defence. So, the 17th of February, 1641, the king's Attorney General, sir Edward Herbert, being impeached by the Commons for misdemeanors, had several counsel assigned him; and the 9th of March, 1641, when his cause came to hearing, sir Thomas Beddingfield and sir Thomas Gardiner Recorder of London were committed by this house to the Tower of London, for refusing to be of his counsel being assigned."

"Another precedent was the 6th of April, 1642, sir George Benyon's Case; who, being impeached by the Commons for misdemeanors, had counsel assigned him; and his counsel, and a committee of the Commons appointed to manage their Evidence, were present the same time at this bar when the cause was heard.

"So in the Case of sir Richard Gurney, Lord Mayor of London, who, upon his impeachment from the House of Commons, had counsel assigned for his defence the 5th of July 1642; and the 1st of August he was to attend with his counsel and witnesses; and on the 2nd of August his counsel pleaded in his defence at this bar, at which time a committee of members of the House of Commons were present, and did manage the evidence against him in behalf of the Commons.

"The next precedent was in the earl of Bristol's Case, charged with treason by his then majesty, who, on the 8th of May, 1626, sent a message to the House of Peers, against the allowing of counsel to the earl of Bristol: Whereupon the house made an humble address to his majesty, the 15th of the same May, wherein they took notice of their general order, made the 28th day of May, 1624, for allowing of counsel to delinquents, at which time his majesty was present in the house as prince of Wales; to which address his majesty's answer of the 17th of May did allow counsel in all cases of misdemeanors, but not in cases capital; and yet his majesty was pleased, in that particular Case, to allow counsel, and observed, That the general order for counsel, dated the 28th of May, 1624, was made upon the occasion of former proceedings against the earl of Middlesex.

"Another precedent was the earl of Stamford's Case, who, being impeached by the Commons for misdemeanors, made his defence, by his counsel, at the bar, the 30th of September, 1645, in the presence of the Committee of the House of Commons, who managed the evidence against him; and it appears by the presence of Lords that day, that the earl of Stamford was present in the house both forenoon and afternoon.

"As concerning the precedent urged by the Committee of the Commons of Michael de la Pool, in R. 2's time, it appears that he answered in the house, but no mention is made of the bar."

The house entered into a serious consideration of this Report, in relation to the lord viscount Mordaunt's case, concerning his demeanor at the time of his defence upon his impeachment for misdemeanors; and ordered, "That the lower baron's bench should be removed, and a stool set near the bar, where the lord viscount Mordaunt is to sit uncovered, as a peer, but not in the capacity of a judge; and that he shall be admitted counsel for his defence."

A Message was sent to the House of Commons, to let them know, That the Lords are now ready to give an Answer to the two demands made by the Committee of the House of Commons on Saturday last in the case of the proceedings upon the lord viscount Mordaunt's impeachment.

The Messengers return with this Answer: That they had delivered their message to the House of Commons.

The Committee of the House of Commons being come to the bar (the lord viscount Mordaunt sitting on a stool near the bar within uncovered), the Speaker, by the direction of this house, told them,

"That the Lords think fit there should be a difference in the proceedings of cases capital, and crimes and misdemeanors which are not so; and therefore have ordered, the lord Mordaunt shall not sit in his place, but upon a stool within the bar, by his counsel, uncovered.

"As to the second demand, though they find the precedent of the earl of Middlesex as it is cited, yet they find, that about a month after in the same session, there was a solemn Order made by the Lords, That counsel should be allowed for the future unto all persons; pursuant unto which, they find counsel to be assigned by my Lords, who did plead in the presence of a Committee of the House of Commons, on the behalf of persons impeached by them; and those were sir George Benyon, sir Richard Gurney, Lord Mayor of London, and the earl of Stamford; according unto which, my lords have ordered, that the lord Mordaunt's counsel shall be heard, to plead in his defence; for which business their lordships are now ready."

Upon this, sir Robert Atkins, one of the Managers for the House of Commons, answered, "That he craved leave to acquaint the House of Commons with their lordships' Resolutions, because they receive their instructions in this business from the House of Commons." And so departed.

January 31.

The Committee of the Commons that were appointed to manage the Evidence against the lord viscount Mordaunt upon his Impeachment, were admitted to the bar (the lord viscount Mordaunt sitting near the bar upon a stool, uncovered).

Sir Robert Atkins said, "He and the rest were commanded by the House of Commons to attend their lordships concerning those two things desired by the House of Commons lately in the case of the lord viscount Mordaunt: 1. Concerning counsel not to be allowed to the lord viscount Mordaunt. 2. Concerning his standing without the bar.

"Touching the first, the Commons do acquiesce in their lordships' Resolution, for admitting him counsel in this case, that so he may want no help for his defence, though the contrary hath been a favour not denied to the House of Commons formerly.

"But as concerning his sitting within the bar, the Commons are not satisfied that the lord viscount Mordaunt should have such great respect shewed him, in regard their lordships did not mention any precedent for it; and the Commons conceive persons in the like case have constantly used to stand without the bar: Therefore they were commanded by the House of Commons to entreat their lordships to command the lord viscount Mordaunt to stand without the bar."

Upon this, the Committee of the House of Commons withdrew.

And the Lords took this business into serious consideration, as highly concerning the Judicature of their lordships (the lord viscount Mordaunt standing in the place where he sat during the presence of the Committee of the House of Commons): And Resolved, That the Speaker, by the directions of this House, should return this Answer to the Committee of the House of Commons:

"That their lordships have further considered of the desire of the House of Commons, in relation to the place and posture wherein the lord Mordaunt shall appear to make his defence; and judging it a right inherent in every court, to order and direct such circumstances, and matters of form, that can have no influence to the prejudice of justice, in such way as they shall judge fit, where the same are not settled otherwise by any positive rule, do confirm the order already made in this case, as just and equal; and do wish you to proceed to matter of substance."

The Committee of the House of Commons were called in again, and received the aforesaid resolution of this House. Whereupon sir Robert-Atkins begged their lordships' pardon for not agreeing to their lordships herein; but desired leave that they may resort to the House of Commons, for their directions herein.

February 1.

A Message was brought from the Commons, by Mr. Seymour and others: To desire a Conference touching the manner of the proceedings upon the Impeachment against the lord viscount Mordaunt.

The Answer returned was: That their lordships have taken their message into consideration, and will send an answer by messengers of their own.

Upon this Message, it is ordered, That the committee for privileges do meet to-morrow in the afternoon, and consider whether ever the House of Commons desired any Conferences concerning the manner of proceeding upon judicature before their lordships; and to search what Messages and proceedings have been upon cases of judicature: and to report the same to this House.

February 4.

The Lord Chamberlain reported, "That the Committee of Privileges have considered of some Precedents concerning the Message from the House of Commons, concerning the manner of proceedings upon the Impeachment against the lord viscount Mordaunt; and their lordships' opinion is, That none of those precedents they have seen do come home to the business; but the precedents being ready, they leave it to their lordships' pleasure, whether to peruse any of them."

The House commanded these Precedents following to be read; as,

"Primo Jacobi, 26 Maii; a Message from the House of Commons, concerning the bishop of Bristol, who was complained of for writing a book against the Union of England and Scotland; and ultimo Maii, there was a meeting between Select Committees of both Houses about the same; and 5th June, the said bishop made an acknowledgment of his error, before a Committee of both Houses."

Another Precedent was in 12 Jacobi, 28 May; a Message was brought from the House of Commons, against the bishop of Lincoln, for some words he spoke in the Lords' House.

The 4th of June, another Message was brought from the House of Commons against that business.

After a serious consideration and debate;

The question being put, "Whether to grant a Conference with the House of Commons, upon the desire of a late Message from the House of Commons, concerning the manner of proceedings upon the Impeachment of the lord viscount Mordaunt?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

A Message was sent to the Commons, to let them know, that their lordships are now ready to give them a present Conference, in the Painted Chamber, by a Committee of both Houses, touching their Message concerning the Impeachment against the lord viscount Mordaunt.

The Messengers return this Answer: That they have delivered their Message to the House of Commons.

The House of Commons being ready, the House of Lords was adjourned during pleasure, and the Lords went to the Conference; which being ended, the House was resumed.

The earl of Anglesey reported to the Lords the effect of the late Conference with the Commons, concerning the business of the lord viscount Mordaunt's Impeachment:

"The Commons of England, in parliament assembled, desired this Conference, to continue a good correspondency betwixt the two houses, and to preserve the ancient manner of proceedings in parliament, in taking notice of their lordships' last Answer, adjudging it a right inherent in every court, to order and direct such circumstances and matters of form, that can have no influence to the prejudice of justice, in such a way as they shall judge fit, where the same are not settled otherwise by any positive rule.

"The Commons conceive that the first part, the admitting the lord Mordaunt to the place now given him upon his trial, may have influence to the prejudice of justice, by the intimidating of witnesses, when they shall see the lord Mordaunt admitted to so extraordinary a favour, being a person of great command, and divers of the witnesses living under his command.

"As to the other part of the Lords' Answer, That all courts have power to settle circumstances in matter of form, that have no influence to the prejudice of justice, in such a way as they shall judge fit; where it is not settled by any positive rule," the Commons conceive that precedents amount to a positive rule; and the manner of persons accused appearing at their trials was settled in the earl of Middlesex' case before cited, and that was ruled by the search of precedents.

"And they added, that as they are very tender of the rights and privileges of their lordships, so they hope their lordships will be of theirs; and concluded, that when this point of form shall be settled by the lord Mordaunt's coming to the bar, they shall be ready, according to their lordships' wish, to proceed to matter of substance."

Upon serious consideration hereof, the House of Lords resolved, To let the Commons know, the Lords are resolved, that their former Answer, given to the Commons the 23th of January last, and confirmed the 31st of January, shall stand; and a Conference to be desired, wherein the Lords that are to manage the Conference are to signify their lordships' continuance of their former order; in which their lordships are further confirmed by the precedent of the bishop of Landaff's case, 18 Jacobi, and the earl of Stamford's case, 1645; and to let them know further, that their lordships will be ready to-morrow morning, to proceed in the business.

A Message was sent to the Commons, to let them know, that the Lords intend to sit this afternoon, at five of the clock; at which time their lordships desire a Conference, by a Committee of both Houses, in the Painted Chamber, concerning the subject matter of the last Conference, touching the Impeachment of the lord viscount Mordaunt.

February 4.

The Messengers sent to the Commons return with this Answer: That the Commons will give a Conference, as was desired, this morning.

The House was adjourned during pleasure, and the Lords went to the Conference; which being ended, the House was resumed. And the earl of Anglesey reported, "That the Lords that managed this Conference had obeyed their lordships' direction, in urging those precedents as were given them in charge."

February 5.

A Message was brought from the Commons, by sir Robert Holt and others; who said, "He was commanded by the Commons to desire a Free Conference, upon the subject matter of the last Conference, concerning the Impeachment against the lord viscount Mordaunt."

The House taking this Message into serious consideration; and, after a long debate, the question being put, "Whether to grant a Free Conference to the House of Commons in this matter?" It was resolved in the negative.

The Messengers of the Commons being called in; the Speaker, by directions of the House, gave them this Answer:

"That the Lords have already stated the manner of proceedings in the Impeachment of the lord Mordaunt; and have declared it in their last Conference, and in that Conference gave the House of Commons notice that they were ready to proceed this morning in that business; they adhere to their former resolution, and are ready to proceed in the trial."

February 6.

A Message was brought from the Commons, to desire a Conference, upon an Answer delivered to their Messengers who desired a Free Conference with their lordships upon the Impeachment of the lord viscount Mordaunt. The Answer returned was: That their lordships will take their Message into consideration, and will send an Answer by Messengers of their own.

February 7.

A Message was sent to the Commons to let them know, that the Lords will be ready to give a Conference, by a committee of both Houses, at 11 of the clock, in the Painted Chamber, upon the matter they desired a Conference yesterday.

The Messengers sent to the Commons return this Answer : That they will come to the Conference, as is desired.

The Commons being come, the House was adjourned during pleasure, and the Lords went to the Conference ; which being ended, the House was resumed.

The earl of Anglesey reported the effect of the Conference with the House of Commons ; which was managed by sir Robert Atkins, who said, " That the House of Commons ; have desired this Conference concerning their lordships Answer to a Message concerning a Free Conference. In their lordships' Answer in effect, their lordships denied a Free Conference. He said, He was commanded to acquaint their lordships, that Conferences, and Free Conferences, when desired, are essential to the proceedings of parliament, the only means to preserve the good correspondence between the two Houses of parliament : and the denial thereof, destructive to the proceedings of parliament, and unprecedented."

Upon a serious debate hereof ; the Question being put, " Whether to desire a Free Conference from the House of Commons upon the subject-matter of the last Conference ?" It was resolved in the Affirmative.

A Message was sent to the Commons, to desire a present Free Conference, in the Painted Chamber, by a committee of both Houses concerning the subject-matter of their last Conference.

The Messengers return with this Answer : That the Commons will give a Free Conference as is desired.

The same Lords as reported the last Conference, are appointed to manage this Free Conference ; and the House gave them these directions :

" 1. To let the Commons understand, that this Conference their lordships desire, not in reference to the Free Conference lately desired by them, but in relation to the assertion of the Commons in their last Conference, which their lordships can no way allow ; and therefore commanded the Lords that are to manage this Free Conference, as to justify the proceedings of their lordships, so to make it appear to the House of Commons, that what they have done is neither destructive to the proceedings of parliament, nor unprecedented.—Then to shew the precedent of 1 II. 4. No. 79, about judicature in parliament.—And to urge the precedent of 12 Jac. when the Lords denied a Conference to the House of Commons upon the point of Impositions.—And their lordships are to offer what other arguments they think fit to offer to assert the proceedings of this House, and to destroy the assertions of the House of Commons."

Then the House was adjourned during pleasure, and the Lords went to the Conference ; which being ended, the House was resumed.

The earl of Anglesey reported, " That the Lords that were appointed to manage the last Free Conference have kept to their lordships' directions : and did justify the proceedings of their lordships, and made it appear to the House of Commons, that what their lordships had done is neither destructive to the proceedings of parliaments nor unprecedented ; wherein they took this method ;

" First, They took notice, that their lordships desired this Conference, not in reference to the Free Conference lately desired by the Commons, but in relation to the assertion or position of the Commons in their last Conference this morning, which their lordships could no way allow ; for that their lordships had proceeded with great justice and caution in this affair, and little expected that, after their lordships had, upon three solemn Debates, two whereof were upon Conferences, given the same rule thrice, the House of Commons should insist further, and that in so positive a way as their last Conference imported ? whereupon their lordships, being desirous to part with that House in that good union and fair correspondence with which this session began, and understanding that his Majesty intended to prorogue the parliament to-morrow, that there might not want time, but the Commons might have opportunity of free debate, and receive satisfaction, their lordships had thus presently appointed them a Free Conference, upon their own assertion, wherein, by the freedom their lordships shall use, the Commons will have a proof of their kindness, and desire of good intelligence.

" Thereupon their lordships urged, that what they had done in this cause (which the Commons called denying in effect a Free Conference, was so far from being destructive to the proceedings of parliament, that their lordships conceived it essential to the preserving thereof ; judicature in parliament, by the parliament Roll of 1 II. 4. No. 79, belonging only to that House, and not to the Commons ; and this by protestation of the Commons themselves. If judgment the principle, much more all circumstances, and the ruling of proceedings leading thereunto ; a right inherent in all courts, without which no judicature can proceed. And shall this be denied to this, the highest court ? or shall it be in the power of the House of Commons to confer as long as they please upon circumstantial and matters of form, to the losing of the substance ? If this should be allowed, it would render it impossible for the Lords to do justice, either in condemning or acquitting ; but the Commons might, if they please, delay in Conferences upon Forms, until the very delay, by the charge of counsel and witnesses, prove a punishment before trial, and so judicature in parliament prove a grievance and oppression to the subject, instead of justice. If three rules, given solemnly as aforesaid, shall not conclude, where shall debates period ? Their lordships are so far from accounting judicature a right and privilege worth the insisting on upon such terms, that they had rather see it fairly buried, than so to enjoy it, when they can neither justly punish nor acquit persons accused; and, after having delivered their own judgment upon as full and free debates and consideration as they are capable of, to be further pressed, looks too like an importunity that former times have not been so unhappy as to meet with, and they little expected from this House of Commons. And their lordships are confident that House intended no attempt upon their lordships' judicature. Other arguments were used against the first part of the Commons' assertion.

"As to the second part of the assertion, that it was unprecedented, their lordships evinced the contrary by the precedent of 12 Jacobi, produced and urged for the denial of a Conference to the House of Commons upon the point of Imposition, the darling subject of debates in that House, and whereon they might best of any thing insist to confer. Their lordships doubted not, if they had taken time, more precedents would occur; but one was sufficient to destroy their general assertion.

"The Commons hereupon, vid. Sir Robert Atkins, Mr. Waller, sir Thomas Meares, and sir Francis Goodrick, by turns, told us, "It would be too great a disregard to what we had so fully offered, to make any present answer or give their own sense to what their lordships had delivered; besides, they were not provided nor instructed to discourse this matter now, being unexpected; and that they conceived a Conference ought regularly to have been desired by the Lords before this Free Conference, that they might have been convinced with the Lords' reasons, or had some point issued to treat and confer upon."

"To that the Lords replied, "That they were not now to dispute that; the Commons, having agreed to a Free Conference, allowed it to be regular, and they doubted not many precedents warranted it; but, if they had conceived otherwise, the House of Commons might have declined it."

"The Commons acknowledged, 'They had had it in debate in their House; but finding that, if they had refused us a Free Conference, they had done the same thing they took exception at in our proceedings, they had agreed to our desire; and, insisting again that they were not provided to confer upon what we had argued so largely, they desired leave to resort to their house, to acquaint the Commons with the particulars delivered by the Lords, and receive their directions; and according to what further order they should receive, they would attend their lordships.'

"The Lords said, 'They could not but wonder to see them wave a free conferring upon an assertion of their own, stated at the last Conference by themselves, and being the whole matter then delivered, and that so positively, that sure it was done upon some debate and consideration. We conceived we had given them an advantage by appointing a Free Conference immediately upon their own Conference; but were so well assured of our just and warranted proceedings, that they might see we were ready to assert them by arguments, precedents, and debate. If the Commons were not now ready, the failing was not on our part and they might use their liberty; concluding, that we had, by this Conference, manifested our desires of closing with a fair correspondence, when we undertook a Free Conference on the sudden, upon some disadvantage.' And so, with mutual expressions of kindness, we parted; the Commons desiring to have the liberty to peruse the Journal of 12 Jacobi, wherein the precedent is that was cited by their lordships; which we promised them.

But the whole of this dispute was put an end to by the king's coming, on the following day, to the House of Lords and proroguing the Parliament.

On the 25th of October, 1667, Mr. Tayleur, in a subsequent session, exhibits another Petition, with Articles of Impeachment annexed, against the lord viscount Mordaunt; which were read, and Mr. Tayleur was called in and affirmed he was ready to make out the matter contained therein.—A Committee is appointed to consider of this Petition and Articles, and to examine, what new matter is in them, not contained in the Articles and Petition formerly exhibited, and to state what that new matter is*, and the progress and proceedings in this business in the former session.—This committee are ordered, on the 7th of December, to compare those Articles with the former; and on the 14th of December, they are directed to hear and examine witnesses on behalf of the lord Mordaunt, and all others concerned, before they make their report.

* "The direction to the Committee to examine, what new matter is in this Petition and Articles, not contained in those formerly exhibited, implies, that it could be only in this new matter, that the House could be now interested—every thing, which was alleged in the former Petition and Articles, remaining in the state, in which it was interrupted by the prorogation; and, as far as that complaint extended, liable to be proceeded in whenever the Commons should please, without any further enquiry or examination.—In the first volume of Grey's Debates, page 3, it is expressly stated, that it is only the new matter of the Petition and Articles, which was referred to the committee." 4 Hatsell.

† "Nothing further appears in the Journal relating to this matter; it should seem (from what lord Danby says, in his speech in the court of king's bench on the 27th of May 1682, which is reported in the State Trials, vol. II. p. 744) that about this time, lord Mordaunt was advised to take out a pardon from the king for these offences." 4 Hatsell.

"The House of Commons impeached the lord viscount Mordaunt, constable of Windsor castle, for imprisoning Mr. Tayleur, who intended to stand for one of the burgesses for Windsor; which I mention, because the said Tayleur was a prisoner for debt in the town prison, when he intended to stand for a member of this parliament, and was taken thence by the lord Mordaunt's soldiers, to be put in hold in the castle; which lets us a little into the truth of the archdeacon's rich and wise men before spoken of. The Impeachment of the lord Mordaunt, who was the king's servant, disgusted the king, according to Echard, though Tayleur was his servant also. The greatest importance of it was, that it caused a misunderstanding between the two Houses, which lasted to the end of the sessions, when the Speaker, Turner, made a speech of unconscionable length, February the 8th, at which time the king also spoke almost as long; and then the lord Roberts, lord privy-seal, prorogued the parliament to the 10th day of October." 224. EXAMINATIONS CONCERNING THE FIRING OF LONDON 18 CHARLES II. A. D. 1666.*

UPON the second of September 1666, the fire began in London at one Farryner's house, a baker, in Pudding-lane, between the hours of one and two in the morning, and continued burning until the 6th of September following; consuming, as by the Surveyors appears in print, 373 acres within the walls of the city of London, and 63 acres 3 roods without the walls. There remains 75 acres 3 roods yet standing within the walls unburnt. Eighty-nine parish churches, besides chapels, burnt. Eleven parishes within the walls yet standing. Houses burnt, 13,200.

Per JONAS MOORE, } Surveyors.
RALPH GATRIX, }

Upon the 18th of September, 1666, the Parliament came together: And upon the 25th of

* From a Pamphlet, entitled, "A True and Faithful Account of the several Informations exhibited to the Hon. Committee appointed by the Parliament to enquire into the late dreadful Firing of the City of London. Together with other Informations touching the Insolency of Popish Priests and Jesuits; and the Increase of Popery, brought to the Hon. Committee appointed by the Parliament for that purpose." Printed in the Year 1667.

How this calamity was brought upon the City of London will probably never be ascertained. The following is Burnet's account of the matter:

"To compleat the miseries of this year: the plague was so sunk in London, that the inhabitants began to return to it, and brought with them a great deal of manufacture, which was lying on the hands of the clothiers and others, now in the second year of the war, in which trade and all other consumptions were very low. It was reckoned, that a peace must come next winter. The merchants were upon that preparing to go to market as soon as possible. The summer had been the dryest that was known of some years. And London being for the most part built of timber filled up with plaister, all was extreme dry. On the second of September a fire broke out, that raged for three days, as if it had a commission to devour every thing that was in its way. On the fourth day it stopt in the midst of very combustible matter.

"I will not enlarge on the extent nor the destruction made by the fire; many books are full of it. That which is still a great secret is, whether it was casual, or raised on design. The English fleet had landed on the Vly, an island lying near the Texell, and had burnt it; upon which some came to De Witt, and offered a revenge, that, if they were assisted, they would set London on fire. He rejected the proposition: for he said, he would not make the breach wider, nor the quarrel irreconcilable. He said, it was brought him by one of the Labadists, as sent to them by some others. He made no farther reflections on the matter till the city was burnt. Then he began to suspect there had been a design, and that they had intended to draw him into it, and to lay the odium of it upon the Dutch. But he could hear no news of those who had sent that proposition to him. In the April before, some common-wealths-men were found in a plot, and hanged; who at their execution confessed, they had been spoken to, to assist in a design of burning London on the second of September. This was printed in the gazette of that week, which I myself read. Now the fire breaking out on the second made all people conclude, that there was a design some time before on foot for doing it.

"The Papists were generally charged with it. One Hubert, a French Papist, was seized on in Essex, as he was getting out of the way in great confusion. He confessed, he had begun the fire, and persisted in his confession to his death, for he was hanged upon no other evidence but that of his own confession. It is true, he gave so broken an account of the whole matter, that he was thought mad. Yet he was blindfolded, and carried to several the same month, the House of Commons appointed a Committee to enquire into the causes of the late Fire, before whom the following informations were given in, and proved before the Committee; as by their report will more clearly appear, bearing date the 22nd of January 1666. And upon the 8th of February following, the parliament was prorogued; before they came to give their judgment thereupon.

places of the city: and then, his eyes being opened, he was asked, if that was the place: and he being carried to wrong places, after he looked round about for some time, he said, that was not the place: but when he was brought to the place where it first broke out, he affirmed that was the true place. And Tillotson told me, that Howell, then the recorder of London, was with him, and had much discourse with him; and that he concluded, it was impossible that it could be a melancholy dream: the horror of the fact, and the terror of death, and perhaps some engagements in confession, might put him in such disorder, that it was not possible to draw a clear account of any thing from him, but of what related to himself. Tillotson, who believed that the city was burnt on design, told me a circumstance that made the Papists employing such a crazed man in such a service more credible. Langhorn, the Popish counsellor at law, who for many years passed for a Protestant, was dispatching a half-witted man to manage elections in Kent before the Restoration. Tillotson, being present, and observing what a sort of man he was, asked Langhorn, how he could employ him in such services. Langhorn answered, it was a maxim with him in dangerous services to employ none but half-witted men, if they could be but secret, and obey orders: for if they should change their minds, and turn informers instead of agents, it would be easy to discredit them, and to carry off the weight of any discoveries they could make, by shewing they were madmen, and so not like to be trusted in critical things.

"The most extraordinary passage, though it is but a presumption, was told me by Dr. Lloyd and the countess of Clarendon. The latter had a great estate in the New River that is brought from Ware to London, which is brought together at Islington, where there is a great room full of pipes that convey it through all the streets of London. The constant order of that matter was, to set all the pipes a running on Saturday night, that so the cisterns might be all full by Sunday morning, there being a more than ordinary consumption of water on that day. There was one Grant, a papist, under whose name sir William Petty published his Observations on the Bills of Mortality: He had some time before applied himself to Lloyd, who had great credit with the countess of Clarendon; and said, he could raise that estate considerably, if she would make him a trustee for her. His schemes were probable: And he was made one of the board that governed that matter: And by that he had a right to come as often as he pleased, to view their works at Islington. He went thither the Saturday before the fire broke out, and called for the key of the place where the heads of the pipes were, and turned all the cocks that were then open, and stopt the water, and went away, and carried the keys with him. So when the fire broke out next morning, they opened the pipes in the streets to find water, but there was none. And some hours were lost in sending to Islington, where the door was to be broke open, and the cocks turned. And it was long before the water got to London. Grant indeed denied that he had turned the cocks. But the officer of the works affirmed, that he had, according to order, set them all a running, and that no person had got the keys from him, besides Grant who confessed he had carried away the keys, but pretended he did it without design. There were many other stories set about, as that the papists in several places had asked, if there was no news of the burning of London, and that it was talked of in many parts beyond sea, long before the news could get thither from London. In this matter I was much determined by what sir Thomas Littleton, the father, told me. He was a man of a strong head, and sound judgment. He had just as much knowledge in trade, history, the disposition of Europe, and the constitution of England, as served to feed and direct his own thoughts, and no more. He lived all

WM. GOLDESBROUGH, Cler. Dom. Com.

The honourable committee, according to the forementioned orders of the house, did meet in the Speaker's chamber, and having chosen Sir Robert Brooke for their chairman, proceeded to receive many considerable informations from divers credible persons, about the matter where-with they were intrusted, and thereupon did at last agree that sir Robert Brook should make the ensuing Report to the honourable House of Commons.

the summer long in London, where I was his next neighbour, and had for seven years a constant and daily conversation with him. He was Treasurer of the navy in conjunction with Osborn, who was afterwards Lord Treasurer, who supplanted him in that post, and got it all into his own hands. He had a very bad opinion of the king; and thought, that he had worse intentions than his brother, but that he had a more dexterous way of covering and managing them; only his laziness made him less earnest in prosecuting them. He had generally the character of the ablest parliament man in his time. His chief estate lay in the city, not far from the place where the fire broke out, though it did not turn that way. He was one of the committee of the House of Commons, that examined all the presumptions of the city's being burnt on design: And he often assured me, that there was no clear presumption made out about it, and that many stories, which were published with good assurance, came to nothing upon a strict examination. He was at that time, that the inquiry was made, in employment at court. So, whether that biassed him, or not, I cannot tell. There was so great a diversity of opinions in the matter, that I must leave it under the same uncertainty in which I found it. If the French and Dutch had been at that time designing an impression elsewhere, it might have been more reasonable to suppose it was done on design to distract our affairs. But it fell out at a dead time when no advantage could be made of it. And it did not seem probable, that the Papists had engaged in the design, merely to impoverish and ruin the nation; for they had nothing ready then to graft upon the confusion that this put all the people in. Above twelve thousand houses were burnt down, with the greatest part of the furniture and merchandize that was in them. All means used to stop it proved ineffectual; tho' the blowing up of houses was the most effectual of any. But the wind was so high, that fleaks of fire and burning matter were carried in the air cross several streets. So that the fire spread not only in the next neighbourhood, but at a great distance. The king and the duke were almost all the day long on horseback with the guards, seeing to, all that could be done, either for quenching the fire, or for carrying off persons and goods to the fields all about London. The most astonishing circumstance of that dreadful conflagration was, that, notwithstanding the great destruction that was made, and the great confusion in the streets, I could never hear of any one person that was either burnt, or trodden to death. The king was never observed to be so much struck with any thing in his whole life, as with this. But the citizens were not so well satisfied with the duke's behaviour. They thought he looked too gay, and too little concerned. A jealousy of his being concerned in it was spread about with great industry, but with very little appearance of truth. Yet it grew to be gradually believed, chiefly after he owned he was a Papist." Burnet.

"It was upon the first day of that September, in the dismal year of 1666 (in which many prodigies were expected and so many really fell out) that that memorable and terrible fire brake out in London, which begun about midnight, or nearer the morning of Sunday, in a baker's house at the end of Thames-street next the Tower, there being many little narrow alleys and very poor houses about the place where it first appeared; and then finding such store of combustible materials, as that street is always furnished with in timber-houses, the fire prevailed so powerfully, that that whole street and the neighbourhood was in so short a time turned to ashes, that few persons had time to save and preserve any of their goods; but were a heap of people almost as dead with the sudden distraction, as the ruins were which they sustained. The magistrates of the city assembled quickly together, and with the usual remedies of buckets, which they were provided with; but the fire was too ravenous to be extinguished with such quantities of water as those instruments could apply to it, and fastened still upon new materials before it had destroyed the old. And though it raged furiously all that day, to that degree that all men stood amazed, as spectators only, no man knowing what remedy to apply, nor the magistrates what orders to give: yet it kept within some compass, burned what was next, and laid hold only on both sides; and the greatest apprehen-

THE REPORT OF SIR ROBERT BROOK, Chairman to the Committee that was appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the Firing of the City of London; made the 22nd January, 1667.

In a letter from Alanson, of the 23rd of August, 1666, New Stile, written from one Dural to a gentleman in lodging in the house of one of the ministers of the French Church in London, called M. Herault, there were these expressions :

“ Pray acquaint me with the truth of certain news which is common in this country, that a fire from heaven is fallen upon a city called Belke, situated on the side of the River of Thames, where a world of people have been killed and burnt, and houses also consumed” which seemed a word of Cabal, cast out by some that were knowing, and others that might be ignorant of the signification of it.

Mrs. Elizabeth Styles informs, That in April last, in an eager discourse she had with a French servant of sir Vere Fan, he hastily replied, You English maids will like the Frenchmen better when there is not a house left between Temple-Bar and London-Bridge. To which she answered, I hope your eyes will never see that : he replied, This will come to pass between June and October.

William Tisdale informs, That he being about the beginning of July at the Greyhound in St. Martins, with Fitz-harris an Irish Papist, heard him say, there would be a sad desolation in September, in November a worse, in December all would be united into one. Whereupon he asked him, where this desolation would be? he answered, in London.

Mr. Light of Ratcliff, having some discourse with Mr. Langhorne of the Middle-Temple, Barrister, (reputed a zealous papist) about February 15 last, after some discourse in disputation about religion, he took him by the hand, and said to him, You expect great things in 1666, and think that Rome will be destroyed, but what if it be London.

sion was of the Tower, and all considerations entered upon how to secure that place.

“ But in the night the wind changed and carried the danger from thence, but with so great and irresistible violence, that as it kept the English and Dutch fleets from grappling when they were so near each other, so it scattered the fire from pursuing the line it was in with all its force, and spread it over the city : so that they who went late to bed at a great distance from any place where the fire prevailed, were awakened before morning with their own house's being in a flame ; and whilst endeavour was used to quench that, other houses were discovered to be burning, which were near no place from whence they could imagine the fire could come ; all which kindled another fire in the breasts of men, almost as dangerous as that within their houses.

“ Monday morning produced first a jealousy and then an universal conclusion, that this fire came not by chance, nor did they care where it began ; but the breaking out in several places at so great distance from each other made it evident, that it was by conspiracy and combination. And this determination could not hold long without discovery of the wicked authors, who were concluded to be all the Dutch and all the French in the town, though they had inhabited the same places above twenty years. All of that kind, or if they were strangers, of what nation soever, were laid hold of ; and after all the ill usage that can consist in words, and some blows and kicks, they were thrown into prison. And shortly after, the same conclusion comprehended all the Roman Catholics, who were in the same predicament of guilt and danger, and quickly found that their only safety consisted in keeping within doors ; and yet some of them, and of quality, were taken by force out of their houses and carried to prison.

“ When this rage spread as far as the fire, and every hour brought reports of some bloody effects of it, worse than in truth there were, the king distributed many of the privy council into several quarters of the city, to prevent, by their authorities, those inhumanities which he heard were committed. In the mean time, even they or any other person thought it not safe to declare, “ That they believed that the fire came by accident, or that it was not a Plot of the Dutch and the French and Papists to burn the city :” which was so generally believed, and in the best company, that he who said the contrary was suspected for a conspirator, or at best a favourer of them. It could not be conceived how a house that was distant a mile from any part of the fire, could suddenly be in a flame, without some particular malice ; and this case fell out every hour. When a man at the farthest end of Bread-street had made a shift to get out of his house his best and most portable goods, because the fire had approached near them ; he no sooner had secured them, as he thought, in some friend's house in Holborn, which was believed a safe distance, but he saw that very house, and none else near it, in a sudden flame. Nor did there want in this woful distemper, the testimony of witnesses who saw this villainy committed, and apprehended men who they were ready to swear threw fireballs into houses, which were presently burning.

“ The lord Hollis and lord Ashley, who had their quarters assigned about Newgate Market and the streets adjacent, had many brought to them in custody for crimes of this nature ; and saw, within a very little distance from the place where they were, the people gathered together in great disorder ; and as they came nearer saw a man in the middle of them without a hat or cloak, pulled and hauled and very ill used, whom they knew to be a servant to the Portu-

Mr. Kitley of Barkin in Essex, informs, That one Mrs. Yazley, a papist, of Ilford in the said county, came unto his house, August the 13th, and being in discourse with his mother, said, They say the next Thursday will be the hottest day that ever was in England. She replied, I hope the hottest season of the year is now past: to which she answered, I know not whether it be the hottest for weather or for action. This Mrs. Yazley coming to the same house the week after the fire, Mr. Kitley said to her with some trouble, I have often thought of your hot Thursday; to which she replied, It was not indeed upon the Thursday, but it happened upon the Sunday was sen'night after. Mrs. Yazley hearing this evidence produced against her, endeavoured to avoid the words, saying, That upon the 13th of August she did tell Mrs. Kitley, that they say the next Thursday will be the darkest Thursday that ever was in England, but not otherwise; which she affirms to have received from one Finchman, an old woman of Ilford; who being examined by a justice of peace to discover the truth thereof, denied that gal ambassador, who was presently brought to them. And a substantial citizen was ready to take his oath, 'That he saw that man put his hand in his pocket, and throw into a shop a fire ball; upon which he saw the house immediately on fire: whereupon, being on the other side of the way, and seeing this, he cried out to the people to stop that gentleman, and made all the haste he could himself;' but the people had first seized upon him, and taken away his sword, which he was ready to draw; and he not speaking nor understanding English, they had used him in the manner set down before. The lord Hollis told him what he was accused of, and 'that he was seen to have thrown somewhat out of his pocket, which they thought to be a fireball; which was now on fire;' and the people had diligently searched his pockets to find more of the same commodities, but found nothing that they meant to accuse him of. The man standing in great amazement to hear he was so charged, the lord Hollis asked him, 'what it was that he pulled out of his pocket, and what it was he threw into the house:' to which he answered, 'that he did not think that he had put his hand into his pocket; but he remembered very well, that as he walked in the street he saw a piece of bread upon the ground, which he took up and laid upon a shelf in the next house;' which is a custom or superstition so natural to the Portuguese, that if the king of Portugal were walking, and saw a piece of bread upon the ground, he would take it up with his own hand, and keep it till he saw a fit place to lay it down.

"The house being in view, the lords with many of the people walked to it, and found the piece of bread just within the door upon a board, where he said he laid it; and the house on fire was two doors beyond it, which the man who was on the other side of the way, and saw this man put his hand into the house without staying, and presently after the fire break out, concluded to be the same house; which was very natural in the fright that all men were in: nor did the lords, though they were satisfied, set the poor man at liberty; but, as if there remained ground enough of suspicion, committed him to the constable, to be kept by him in his own house for some hours, when they pretended they would examine him again. Nor were any persons who were seized upon in the same manner, as multitudes were in all the parts of the town, especially if they were strangers or Papists, presently discharged, when there was no reasonable ground to suspect; but all sent to prison, where they were in much more security than they could have been in full liberty, after they were once known to have been suspected; and most of them understood their commitment to be upon that ground, and were glad of it.

"The fire and the wind continued in the same excess all Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, till afternoon, and flung and scattered brands burning into all quarters; the nights more terrible than the days, and the light the same, the light of the fire supplying that of the sun. And indeed whoever was an eye witness of that terrible prospect, can never have so lively an image of the last conflagration till he beholds it; the faces of all people in a wonderful dejection and discomposure, not knowing where they could repose themselves for one hour's sleep, and no distance thought secure from the fire, which suddenly started up before it was suspected; so that people left their houses and carried away their goods from many places which received no hurt, and whither they afterwards returned again; all the fields full of women and children, who had made a shift to bring thither some goods and conveniences to rest upon, as safer than any houses, where yet they felt such intolerable heat and drought, as if they had been in the middle of the fire. The king and the duke, who rode from one place to another, and put themselves into great dangers amongst the burning and falling houses, to give advice and direction what was to be done, underwent as much fatigue as the meanest, and had as little sleep or rest; and the faces of all men appeared ghastly and in the highest confusion. The country sent in carts to help those miserable people who had saved any goods: And by this means, and the help of coaches, all the neighbour villages were filled with more people than they could contain, and more goods than they could find room for; so that those fields became likewise as full as the other about London and Westminster.

"It was observed that where the fire prevailed most, when it met with brick buildings, if it was not repulsed, it was so well resisted that it made a much slower progress; and when it had done its worst, that the timber and all the combustible matter fell, it fell down to the bottom within the house, and the walls stood ever she said any such words to Mrs. Yazly, or that she had discoursed with her about any such matter; and as to the subsequent words, she saith Mrs. Yazly denies ever to have spoken them; but Mr. Kitley offered in her presence (if it should be demanded) to bring his mother and wife to testify the same.

and enclosed the fire, and it was burned out without making a further progress in many of those places; and then the vacancy so interrupted the fury of it, that many times the two or three next houses stood without much damage. Besides the spreading, inasmuch as all London seemed but one fire in the breadth of it, it seemed to continue in its full fury a direct line to the Thames side, all Cheapside from beyond the Exchange, through Fleet-street; inasmuch as for that breadth, taking in both sides as far as the Thames, there was scarce a house or church standing from the bridge to Dorset-house, which was burned on Tuesday night after Baynard's Castle.

"On Wednesday morning, when the king saw that neither the fire decreased nor the wind lessened, he even despaired of preserving Whitehall, but was more afraid of Westminster-abbey. But having observed by his having visited all places, that where there were any vacant places between the houses, by which the progress of the fire was interrupted, it changed its course and went to the other side; he gave order for pulling down many houses about Whitehall, some whereof were newly built and hardly finished, and sent many of his choice goods by water to Hampton-Court; as most of the persons of quality in the Strand, who had the benefit of the river, got barges and other vessels, and sent their furniture for their houses to some houses some miles out of the town. And very many on both sides the Strand, who knew not whither to go, and scarce what they did, fled with the families out of their houses into the streets, that they might not be within when the fire fell upon their houses.

"But it pleased God, contrary to all expectation, that on Wednesday, about four or five o'clock in the afternoon, the wind fell: and as in an instant the fire decreased, having burned all on the Thames side to the New-buildings of the Inner-Temple next to White-Friars, and having consumed them, was stopped by that vacancy from proceeding farther into that house; but laid hold on some old buildings which joined to Ram-alley, and swept all those into Fleet-street. And the other side being likewise destroyed to Fetter-lane, it advanced no farther; but left the other part of Fleet-street to the Temple-bar, and all the Strand, unburnt, but what damage the owners of the houses had done to themselves by endeavouring to remove; and it ceased in all other parts of the town near the same time: so that the greatest care then was, to keep good guards

Chippenham in the county of Wilts, coming from market with one John Woodman of Kelloway in the same county, the Thursday before the fire began in London, they had some discourse about the buying of a yoke of fat bullocks, wherein they differed, because Woodman who was to sell them was desirous to keep them awhile in his hands; But the said Woodman denied so to do, for that as he alledged, to watch the fire that was upon the ground, that it might not break out again. And this was the better performed, because they who had yet their houses standing had not the courage to sleep, but watched with much less distraction; though the same distemper still remained in the utmost extent, 'that all this had fallen out by the conspiracy of the French and Dutch with the Papists;' and all gaols were filled with those who were every hour apprehended upon that jealousy, or rather upon some evidence that they were guilty of the crime. And the people were so gullish, that they believed that all the French in the town (which no doubt were a very great number) were drawn into a body, to prosecute those by the sword who were preserved from the fire; and the inhabitants of a whole street have run in a great tumult one way, upon the rumour that the French were marching at the other end of it; so terrified men were with their own apprehensions.

"When the night, though far from being a quiet one, had somewhat lessened the consternation, the first care the king took was, that the country might speedily supply markets in all places, that they who had saved themselves from burning might not be in danger of starving; and if there had not been extraordinary care and diligence used, many would have perished that way. The vast destruction of corn, and all other sorts of provisions, in those parts where the fire had prevailed, had not only left all that people destitute of all that was to be eat or drank; but the bakers and brewers, which inhabited the other parts which were unburnt, had forsaken their houses, and carried away all that was portable: inasmuch as many days passed before there were enough in their wits and in their houses to fall to their occupations; and those parts of the town which God had spared and preserved were many hours without any thing to eat, as well as they who were in the fields. And yet it can hardly be conceived, how great a supply of all kinds was brought from all places within four and twenty hours. And which was more miraculous, in four days, in all the fields about the town, which seemed covered with those whose habitations were burned, and with the goods which they had saved, there was scarce a man to be seen: all found shelter in so short a time, either in those parts which remained of the city and in the suburbs, or in the neighbour villages; all kind of people expressing a marvellous charity towards those who appeared to be undone. And very many with more expedition than he could not stay in the country till that time, which Baker would have them delivered to him in, and being asked whither he was going, he refused to tell, asking what he had to do to can be conceived, set up little sheds of brick and timber upon the ruins of their own houses, where they chose rather to inhabit than in more convenient places, though they knew they could not long reside in those new buildings.

"The king was not more troubled at any particular, than at the imagination which possessed the hearts of so many, that all this mischief had fallen out by a real and formed conspiracy; which, albeit he saw no colour to believe, he found very many intelligent men, and even some of his own council who did really believe it. Whereupon he appointed the Privy Council to sit both morning and evening, to examine all evidence of that kind that should be brought before them, and to send for any persons who had been committed to prison upon some evidence that made the greatest noise; and sent for the Lord Chief Justice, who was in the country, to come to the town for the better examination of all suggestions and allegations of that kind, there having been some malicious report scattered about the town, 'that the court had so great a prejudice against any kind of testimony of such a conspiracy, that they discountenanced all witnesses who came before them to testify what they knew;' which was without any colour of truth. Yet many, who were produced as if their testimony would remove all doubts, made such senseless relations of what they had been told, without knowing the condition of the persons who told them, or where to find them, that it was a hard matter to forbear smiling at their evidence. Some Frenchmen's houses had been searched, in which had been found many of those shells for squibs and other fireworks, frequently used in nights of joy and triumph; and the men were well known, and had lived many years there by that trade, and had no other: and one of these was the king's servant, and employed by the office of ordnance for making grenades of all kinds, as well for the hand as for mortarpieces. Yet these men were looked upon as in the number of the conspirators, and remained still in prison till their neighbours solicited for their liberty. And it cannot be enough wondered at, that in this general rage of the people no mischief was done to the strangers, that no one of them was assassinated outright, though many were sorely beaten and bruised.

"There was a very odd accident that confirmed many in what they were inclined to believe, and startled others, who thought the conspiracy impossible, since no combination not very discernible and discovered could have effected that mischief, in which the immediate hand of God was so visible. Amongst many Frenchmen who had been sent to Newgate, there was one Hubert, a young man of five or six and twenty years of age, the son of a fa-make that question: But riding a little further, the said Woodman expressed these words. "You are brave blades at Chippenham, you made bonfires lately for beating the Dutch, mous watchmaker in the city of Roan; and this fellow had wrought in the same profession with several men in London, and had for many years both in Roan and in London been looked upon as distracted. This man confessed 'that he had set the first house on fire, and that he had been hired in Paris a year before to do it: 'that there were three more combined with him to do the same thing, and that they came over together into England to put it in execution in the time of the plague; but when they were in London, he and two of his companions went into Sweden, and returned from thence in the latter end of August, and he resolved to undertake it; and that the two others went away into France.'

"The whole Examination was so senseless, that the Chief Justice, who was not looked upon as a man who wanted rigor, did not believe any thing he said. He was asked, 'who it was in Paris that suborned him to this action: 'To which he answered, 'that he did not know, 'having never seen him before;' and in the enlarging upon that point he contradicted himself in many particulars. Being asked 'what money he had received to perform a service of so much hazard,' he said, 'he had received 'but a pistole, but was promised five pistoles 'more when he should have done his work;' and many such unreasonable things, that nobody present credited any thing he said. However they durst not slight the evidence, but put him to a particular, in which he so fully confirmed all that he had said before, that they were surprized with wonder, and knew not afterwards what to say or think. They asked him, 'if he knew the place where he first put 'fire;' he answered, 'that he knew it very 'well, and would shew it to any body.' Upon this the Chief Justice, and many aldermen who sat with him, sent a guard of substantial citizens with the prisoner, that he might shew them the house; and they first led him to a place at some distance from it, and asked him 'if that 'were it;' to which he answered, presently, 'No, it was lower, nearer to the Thames.' The house and all which were near it were so covered and buried in ruins, that the owners themselves, without some infallible mark, could very hardly have said where their own houses had stood; but this man led them directly to the place, described how it stood, the shape of the little yard, the fashion of the door and windows, and where he first put the fire; and all this with such exactness, that they who had dwelt long near it could not so perfectly have described all particulars.

"This silenced all farther doubts. And though the Chief Justice told the king, 'that 'all his discourse was so disjointed that he did 'not believe him guilty;' nor was there one man who prosecuted or accused him: yet upon but since you delight in bonfires, you shall have your bellies full of them ere it be long, adding, That if he lived one week longer, he should see London as sad a London as ever it was since the world began. And in some short time after, he should see as bloody a time, as ever was, since England was England." This discourse was not much taken notice of at that his own confession, and so sensible a relation of all that he had done, accompanied with so many circumstances (though without the least shew of compunction or sorrow for what he said he had done, nor yet seeming to justify or to take delight in it; but being asked whether he was not sorry for the wickedness, and whether he intended to do so much, he gave no answer at all, or made reply to what was said; and with the same temper died), the jury found him guilty, and he was executed accordingly. And though no man could imagine any reason why a man should so desperately throw away his life, which he might have saved though he had been guilty, since he was only accused upon his own confession; yet neither the judges nor any present at the trial did believe him guilty, but that he was a poor distracted wretch weary of his life, and chose to part with it this way. Certain it is, that upon the strictest examination that could be afterwards made by the king's command, and then by the diligence of the House, that upon the general jealousy and rumour made a committee, that was very diligent and solicitous to make that discovery, there was never any probable evidence (that poor creature's only excepted) that there was any other cause of that woeful fire, than the displeasure of God Almighty: the first accident of the beginning in a baker's house, where there was so great a stock of faggots, and the neighbourhood of much combustible matter, of pitch and rosin and the like, led it in an instant from house to house through Thames-street, with the agitation of so terrible a wind to scatter and disperse it.

"Let the cause be what it would, the effect was very terrible; for above two parts of three of that great city were burned to ashes, and those the most rich and wealthy parts of the city, where the greatest warehouses and the best shops stood. The Royal Exchange with all the streets about it, Lombard-street, Cheapside, Paternoster-row, St. Paul's church, and almost all the other churches in the city, with the Old Bailey, Ludgate, all Paul's church-yard even to the Thames, and the greatest part of Fleet-street, all which were places the best inhabited, were all burned without one house remaining.

"The value or estimate of what that devouring fire consumed, over and above the houses, could never be computed in any degree: for besides that the first night (which in a moment swept away the vast wealth of Thames-street) there was not any thing that could be preserved in respect of the suddenness and amazement (all people being in their beds till the fire was in their houses, and so could save nothing but themselves), the next day with the violence of the wind increased the distraction; nor did many believe that the fire was near them, or that they had reason to remove their goods, till it was upon them and rendered it impossible. Then it fell out at a season in the year, the beginning of September, when very many of the substantial citizens and other wealthy men were in the country, whereof many had not left a servant in their houses, thinking themselves upon all ordinary accidents more secure in the goodness and kindness of their neighbours, than they could be in the fidelity of a servant; and whatsoever was in such houses was entirely consumed by the fire, or lost as to the owners. And of this classis of absent men, when the fire came where the lawyers had houses, as they had in many places, especially Serjeants-inn in Fleet-street, with that part of the Inner Temple that was next it and White Friars, there was scarce a man to whom those lodgings appertained who was in the town: so that whatsoever was there, their money, books, and papers, besides the evidences of many men's estates deposited in their hands, were all burned or lost, to a very great value. But of particular men's losses could never be made any computation.

"It was an incredible damage that was and might rationally be computed to be sustained by one small company, the company of stationers, in books, paper, and the other lesser commodities which are vendible in that Corporation, which amounted to no less than 200,000*l.*; in which prodigious loss there was one circumstance very lamentable. All those who dwelt near Paul's carried their goods, books, paper, and the like, as others of greater trades did their commodities, into the large vaults which were under St. Paul's church, before the fire came thither: which vaults, though all the church above the ground was afterwards burned, with all the houses round about, still stood firm and supported the foundation, and preserved all that was within them; until the impatience of those who had lost their houses, and whatsoever they had else, in the fire, made them very desirous to see what they had saved, upon which all their hopes were founded to repair the rest.

"It was the fourth day after the fire ceased to flame, though it still burned in the ruins, from whence there was still an intolerable heat, when the booksellers especially, and some other tradesmen, who had deposited all they had preserved in the greatest and most spacious vault, came to behold all their wealth, which to that moment was safe: but the doors were no sooner opened, and the air from without fanned the strong heat within, but first the dryest and most combustible matters broke into a flame, which consumed all, of what kind soever, that till then had been unhurt there. Yet they who had committed their goods to some lesser vaults, at a distance from that greater, had better fortune; and having escaped from the second ruin of their friends to have more patience, attended till the rain fell, and extinguished the fire in all places, and cooled the air: and then they securely opened the doors, and received all from thence that they had there.

"If so vast a damage as 200,000*l.* befel that little Company of Stationers in books and paper and the like, what shall we conceive was lost in cloth (of which the country clothiers lost all that they had brought up to Blackwell-hall against Michaelmas, which was all burned with that fair structure), in silks of all kinds, in linen, and those richer manufactures? not to speak of money, plate, and jewels, whereof some were recovered out of the ruins of those houses which the owners took care to watch, as containing somewhat worth the looking for, and in which deluge there were men ready enough to fish.

"The lord mayor, though a very honest man, was much blamed for want of sagacity in the first night of the fire, before the wind gave it much advancement: for though he came with great diligence as soon as he had notice of it, and was present with the first, yet having never been used to such spectacles, his consternation was equal to that of other men, nor did he know how to apply his authority to the remedying the present distress; and when men who were less terrified with the object pressed him very earnestly, "That he would give order for the present pulling down those houses which were nearest, and by which the fire climbed to go farther" (the doing whereof at that time might probably have prevented much of the mischief that succeeded), he thought it not safe counsel, and made no other answer, "Than that he durst not do it without the consent of the owners." His want of skill was the less wondered at, when it was known afterwards, that some gentlemen of the Inner Temple would not endeavour to preserve the goods which were in the lodgings of absent persons, nor suffer others to do it, "because," they said, "it was against the law to break up any man's chamber."

"The so sudden repair of those formidable ruins, and the giving so great beauty to all deformity (a beauty and a lustre that city had never before been acquainted with) is little less wonderful than the fire that consumed it."—Clarendon's Life, p. 347.

"There came a most dreadful calamity upon the city of London, of which, this account was given by authority. On September 2, at 1 of the clock in the morning, there happened to break out a sad and deplorable fire in Pudding-lane near New-Fish-street, which falling out at that hour of the night, and in a quarter of the town so close built with woode-

Robert Hubert of Roan in Normandy, who acknowledged that he was one of those that fired the house of Mr. Farryner a baker in Pudding-lane, from whence the fire had its beginning, confessed, that he came out of France with one Stephen Peidloe about four months pitched houses, spread itself so far before day, and with such distraction to the inhabitants and neighbours, that care was not taken for the timely preventing the farther diffusion of it by pulling down houses, as ought to have been: So that this lamentable fire in a short time became too big to be mastered by any engines or working near it. It fell out most unhappily too, that a violent easterly wind fomented it, and kept it burning all that day and the night following, spreading itself up to Grace-Church-street, and downwards from Cannon-street to the water-side as far as the Three Cranes in the Vintry. The people in all parts about it distracted by the vastness of it, and the particular care to carry away their goods: many attempts were made to prevent the spreading of it, by pulling down houses, and making great intervals, but all in vain; the fire seizing upon the timber and rubbish, and so continuing itself even through those spaces, and raging in a bright flame all Monday and Tuesday, notwithstanding his majesty's own, and his royal highnesses indefatigable and personal pains to apply all possible remedies to prevent it, calling upon and helping the people with their guards, and a great number of nobility and gentry unweariedly assisting therein, for which they were requited with a thousand blessings from the poor distressed people. By the favour of God the wind slackened a little on Tuesday night, and the flames meeting with brick buildings at the Temple, by little and little it was observed to lose its force on that side, so that on Wednesday morning we began to hope well, and his royal highness never despairing or slackening his personal care, wrought so well that day, assisted in some parts by the Lords of the Council before and behind it, that a stop was put to it at the Temple Church, near Holbourn-Bridge, Pie-Corner, Aldersgate, Cripple-gate, near the lower end of Coleman-street, at the end of Basing-hall-street, by the Postern, at the upper end of Bishopsgate-street and Leaden-hall-street, at the Standard in Cornhill, at the church in Fan-Church-street, near Clothworker's-Hall in Mincing-lane, at the middle of Mark-lane, and at the Tower-dock."

"On Thursday by the blessing of God it was wholly beat down and extinguished; but so, as that evening it unhappily burst out again afresh at the Temple, by the falling of some sparks (as is supposed) upon a pile of wooden buildings: but his royal highness who watched there that whole night in person, by the great labours and diligence used, and especially by applying powder to blow up the houses about it, before day most happily mastered it.

before the fire, and went into Sweden with him, where he also staid with him as his companion four months, and then they came together into England in a Swedish ship called the Skipper, where he staid on board with the said Peidloe till that Saturday night, in which the fire brake out. When Peidloe taking him out of the ship' carried him into Pudding-lane, and he being earnest to know whither he would carry him, he would not satisfy him till he had brought him to the place, and then he told him, he had brought three balls, and gave him one of them

“ ‘ Divers strangers, Dutch and French, were during the fire apprehended, upon suspicion that they contributed mischievously to it, who are all imprisoned, and informations prepared to make a severe inquisition thereupon by my Lord Chief Justice Keeling, assisted by some of the Lords of the Privy Council, and some principal members of the City; notwithstanding which suspicions, the manner of the burning all along in a train, and so blown forward in all its way by strong winds, makes us conclude, the whole was the effect of an unhappy chance, or to speak better, the heavy hand of God upon us, for our sins, shewing us the terror of his judgment in thus raising the fire, and immediately after his miraculous and never-enough-to-be-acknowledged mercy in putting a stop to it, when we were in the last despair; and that all attempts for the quenching it, however industriously pursued, seemed insufficient. His majesty then sat hourly in council, and ever since hath continued making rounds about the city in all parts of it where the danger and mischief was greatest, till this morning, September 8, that he hath sent his grace the duke of Albemarle, whom he hath called for to assist him on this great occasion, to put his happy and successful hand to the finishing this memorable deliverance.’

“ Such was the account given by authority the same week wherein this conflagration happened. Various were the opinions how this fire began. Most people did then look upon it to be the hand of God in a terrible judgment upon a wicked city: Some said, it was contrived and carried on by a conspiracy of Papists, which was offered to be made appear in the Popish Plot. Others did suspect it an insidious way of the Dutch and French making war upon us, their two fleets being nearest to join at that very time. There was but one man tried at the Old-Bailey for being the incendiary, who was convicted by his own confession, and executed for it. His name was Robert Hubert a French Hugonot of Rohan in Normandy. Some people shammed away his confession and said he was non compes, and had a mind it seems to assume the glory of being hanged for the greatest villain: Others say, he was sober and penitent, and being after conviction carried through the rains to shew where he put fire, he himself directed through the ashes and rubbish, and pointed at the very spot whereon the first burning house had stood. It was soon after complained of, that Hubert was not sufficiently examined, who set him to work, or who joined with him. And Mr. Hawles, in his Remarks upon Fitz-Harris's trial, is bold to say, that the Commons resolving to examine Hubert upon that matter, next day Hubert was hanged before the house sat, and so could tell no farther tales. But among all the proofs or conjectures, nothing more certain than this, that in the beginning of this very year, John Rathbone, William Sanders, and six others, formerly officers or soldiers in the great Rebellion, were tried, convicted and executed for conspiring the death of his majesty, and the subversion of the government; in order whereunto the city of London was to be set on fire by them on Sept. 3, which by some astrological scheme they pitched upon as a lucky day for such an enterprize. So as the fire being afterward at the height of that very day, made people call that late trial to remembrance, and sent them hack to a public gazette of April 30, 1666, Numb. 48, wherein a notorious account of the discovery and evidence of that plot to fire the city is delivered in print. And it so far increased a suspicion of the malice of our foreign enemies, that those conspirators so condemned and executed were said to be under the direction of a committee who sat constantly in London, and received orders from another council in Holland.” Kennett.

“ The misfortune which this year befel the city of London, I mean the Fire which laid so great a part of that vast city in ashes, gave a fresh occasion to the enemies of the republicans, to charge them with being the authors thereof. This was only because the fire happened to break out the 3d of September, a day esteemed fortunate by the republicans, on account of the victories of Dunbar and Worcester, obtained by Oliver Cromwell, when general of the armies of the commonwealth of England. Men failed not to give a scope to their imagination, and to form conjectures upon the causes and authors of this fire. The pious and religious ascribed it to the just vengeance of heaven, on a city, where vice and immorality reigned so openly and shamefully, and which had not been sufficiently humbled by the raging pestilence of the foregoing year. Some again, as I have said, ascribed this misfortune to the malice of the republicans; others to the papists. And there were some so bold, as even to suspect the king and the duke of York. But though several suspected persons were imprisoned, it was not possible to discover, or prove, that the baker's house, where this dreadful calamity first broke out, was fired on purpose. However, one Robert Hubert a French hugonot, native of Roan, and a lunatic, confessing himself guilty of this fact, was condemned and executed. But it appeared afterwards, by the testimony of the master of the ship, who brought him from France, that though he was landed at the time, he did not arrive in London till to throw into the house, and he would have been further satisfied in the design, as he said, before he would execute it: But Peidloe was so impatient that he would not hear him, and then he did the fact, which was, that he put a fire-ball at the end of a long pole, and lighting it with a piece of match, he put it in at a window, and staid till he saw the house in a flame. He confessed that there were three and twenty complices, whereof Peidloe was the chief.

Mr. Graves a French merchant living in St. Mary Axe, informed this committee, that he had known Hubert ever since he was four years old, and hath ever observed him to be a person of a mischievous inclination, and therefore fit for any villainous enterprize; And because of his knowledge he had of him, he went to visit him in prison, where when he saw him, he could not but commiserate the condition whereinto he had brought himself. And two days after the fire began. It is pretended likewise, that a Dutch boy, ten-years of age, confessed, that his father and himself, had thrown fire-balls into the baker's house, through a window that stood open. But, besides the objection which may be made to this testimony from the boy's age, there must have been some circumstance in his narrative, not agreeable to the fact, since it was not thought proper to make a farther enquiry. Perhaps this was only a groundless report.

“But that which gives most cause to believe this fire did not happen casually, is the testimony of Dr. Lloyd, afterwards bishop of Worcester. That prelate told Dr. Burnet, ‘That one Grant, a papist, had some time before applied himself to Lloyd, who had great credit with the countess of Clarendon (who had a large estate in the New River that is brought from Ware to London) and said, he could raise that estate considerably, if she would make him a trustee for her. His schemes were probable, and he was made one of the board that governed that matter; and by that he had a right to come as often as he pleased to view their works at Islington. He went thither the Saturday before the fire broke out, and called for the key of the place where the heads of the pipes were, and turned all the cocks that were then open: and stopped the water, and went away, and carried the keys with him. So when the fire broke out next morning, they opened the pipes in the streets to find water, but there was none. And some hours were lost in sending to Islington where the door was to be broke open, and the cocks turned; and it was long before the water got to London. Grant indeed denied, that he had turned the cocks. But the officer of the works affirmed, that he had, according to order, set them all a running, and that no person had got the keys from him besides Grant; who confessed, he had carried away the keys, but pretended he did it without design.’

“This is Dr. Burnet's account, and agrees in the main with Echard's in his History of England. However, an anonymous author, who has writ against Dr. Burnet's history, accuses him directly of falsehood, and asserts that ‘Grant was not one of the board till after the fire.’ But it is difficult to know, what regard is due to the testimony of this anonymous writer, whereas one can hardly help crediting that illustrious prelate, when he says, he had it from Dr. Lloyd, that Grant was made one of the board before the fire, and that it was by his means. However, this great fire was generally imputed to the papists, and the rather, because several other things afterwards helped to confirm this suspicion.” 11 Rapin 285.

“The very great wickedness of introducing the Fire of London, with a tale of a plot carried on by Dissenters, is fit for no History but the Compleat one, and its copy the Archdeacon's. It is done to throw off any suspicion of guilt from the Papists. I have set the negotiation with general Ludlow in a fair light. Echard has his Memoirs before him, in which he had read, that Ludlow would not engage with the Dutch, but on certain conditions, which they did not think fit to comply with, and he blesses God that he had not engaged with them; since, by the Treaty of Peace soon after concluded, they obliged themselves to deliver up the very man whom they so much courted to serve them. Yet does Echard with unparalleled assurance affirm that Rathbone's plot was a concatenation with Ludlow's, and to honour Rathbone, and make somebody of him, gives him the command of a regiment. His fellow plotters were, Thomas Flint, William Saunders, Henry Tucker, Thomas Evans, John Myles, William Westcott, who besides killing the king, were to kill general George Monk, alderman sir John Robinson, and alderman sir Richard Browne, and when they had knocked them on the head, they were to declare for an equal division of lands. Mr. Ludlow was to put himself in arms, and come over to fight for some land. He had enough of his own, if they would have let him enjoy it; he had Maiden-Bradley in Wiltshire, but sir Edward Seymour kept it from him, and several other manors in Wiltshire and Somersetshire, a fairer inheritance than his countryman Hyde was born to; and if he fought for any lands, they must have been for less than his own, since upon an equal division, so much would not have come to his share; and because he was a half-witted credulous creature, he will do nothing but on some lucky day. Rathbone and he will have a planet on their side, and therefore they have the nativity of their plot cast in April, and found by Lilly's almanack also, that the 3rd of September was a day of luck. As to these plotters intending to join the Dutch if they had landed, I doubt it not, and that a great many thousands would have done the same, for one cannot think that the late acts of parliament and government had made the people in love with it. The French king said of king Charles for his better discovery of the fact, he told him the said Hubert, that he did not believe he had done that of which he confessed himself guilty; To which Hubert replied, 'Yes sir, I am guilty of it, and have been brought to it by the instigation of M. Peidloe; But not out of any malice to the English nation, but from a desire of a reward, which he promised me upon my return into France.'

at this time, 'The king of England has no friend nor ally, and is obliged to carry on the war, with the forces of a kingdom only, divided into several sects, all disaffected to his government.' These plotters doubtless would have joined Ludlow, or Doleman, or the first commander that offered to lead them; they might intend it, they might talk of it, and say enough to be hanged for it; but that Mr. Sidney, and lieutenant-general Ludlow, would engage with such fellows is incredible and monstrous in imagination.

"I have mentioned the wickedness of joining Mr. Ludlow's negotiations with the Dutch with Rathbone's plot, and Rathbone's plot with the fire of London; and to prove it, I need only repeat the archdeacon's words: 'The third of September was a day auspicious, and full of expectation from one party, but at this time ominous and direful to the nation; and though the hand of justice laid hold of these last criminals, yet the city was burnt at the very time thus projected and prognosticated; which gave a strong suspicion, though not a full proof of the authors and promoters;' and that by concatenation, colonel Adney, lieutenant-general Ludlow, colonel Doleman, Mr. Say, &c. were concerned with Flint, Tucker, &c. who were hanged six months before, for a plot to set London on fire on the third of September. I might here make use of the strong phrase used by bishop Burnet before mentioned; but though such histories little deserve it, I will observe more decorum, and to shew I might make use of it, read what Echard says of the duke of York's diligence to put out the fire: 'He was as diligent as possible; he commended and encouraged the forward; he assisted the miserable sufferers, and gave a most generous example to all, by the vigorous opposition he made against the devouring flames.' Contrary to all which, it is known that the gaiety of his look and air discovered the pleasure he took in that dreadful spectacle. Bishop Burnet tells us, 'The citizens were not well satisfied with the duke's behaviour; they thought he looked too gay, and too little concerned.'

"On September the 2d, after midnight, London was set on fire. On September the 3d, the Exchange was burnt, and in three days almost all the city within the walls. The season before had been exceeding dry, and the wind in the east, where the fire began. The people having none to conduct them right, could do nothing to resist it, but stand and see their houses burn without remedy, the engines being presently out of order and useless. The streets were crowded with people and carts to carry away what goods they could get out. They who were most active, and had also most money to pay cartage at exorbitant prices, as five, ten, twenty, and thirty pounds for a cart, saved much, and the rest lost almost all. The loss in houses and goods is scarcely to be valued; and among the rest, the loss of books was an exceeding great detriment not to the owners only, but to learning. Almost all the booksellers in St. Paul's Church-yard, brought their books into vaults under St. Paul's church, where it was thought almost impossible that fire should come. But the church itself being on fire, the prodigious weight of stones falling down, broke into the vaults, let in the fire, and the booksellers could not come near to save their books. The library at Sion college, and most private libraries in London were burnt; inso-much that the one article of books only, lost in the fire, amounted to 150,000*l*.

"The fire broke out in Pudding-lane, at the house of one Fariner a baker, and spread itself, besides breadth, from almost Tower-hill to St. Dunstan's church in Fleet-street. After it had burnt almost three days and nights, some seamen taught the people to blow up some of the next houses with gunpowder, which stopped the fire; so that contrary to the inscription on the Monument, 'there were human counsels' in the stopping of the fire, though these counsels must be acknowledged as the will of Heaven. It stopped at Holborn Bridge, and near St. Dunstan's church in Fleet-street, and at Sepulchre's church, when the church was burnt; and at Christ church, when the church was burnt; and near Aldersgate and Cripplegate, and other places at the wall; and in Austin-Friars, the Dutch church stopped it, and escaped. It stopped in Bishopsgate-street, and Leadenhall-street, and Fenchurch-street, in the midst of the streets, and short of the Tower. All beyond the river, and Southwark, escaped. There perished in the flames 13,200 houses, valued one with another at no more than 25*l*. yearly rent, amount at 12 years purchase to 3,900,000*l*. The 87 churches, the spacious cathedral of St. Paul's, the 6 chapels, the Exchange, Custom-house, Guildhall, the magnificent halls of companies, the several principal city gates, with other public edifices and colleges, may be well valued at 2,000,000*l*. The wares, household goods, money lost and spoiled by the fire, or pilfered away by those wretches that made their gains of the common calamity, may modestly be computed at above, 2,000,000*l*.

Lion prison was appointed to set him upon a horse, and to go with him, and to see if he could find out the place where he threw the fire-ball. Upon which, Hubert, with more

The money spent in general removing of goods into the fields, during the fire, and bringing them back afterwards, in the hire of boats, carts, and porters, may be reckoned at least 2,000,000*l.* the total of which is 10,050,000*l.*, of which general loss, alderman Jefferies had a particular loss in the one commodity of Tobacco, to the value of 20,000*l.*

"I have not made use of the account given by public authority, printed in the Compleat History, because I think my historian's authority, Mr. Baxter's, much better. He informs us, 'The great talk at that time was, who were the burners of the city? And there came in so many testimonies to prove it was the plotted weapon of the papists as caused the parliament themselves to appoint a committee to enquire after it, and receive information; upon which one Hubert, a French papist, confessed openly and constantly, to the last, that he began the fire.' The Compleat Historian and Archdeacon Echard are positive he was a French presbyterian, they say, Hugonot; for which we must in charity say, the Lord forgive them! Bishop Burnet assures us he was a French papist. Let us repeat what he says: 'The papists were generally charged with it. One Hubert a French papist was seized on in Essex, as he was going out of the way in great confusion. He confessed he had begun the fire, and persisted in his confession to his death, for he was hanged upon no other evidence but that of his own confession. It is true, he gave so broken an account of the whole matter, that he was thought mad. Yet he was blindfolded, and carried to several places of the city, and then his eyes being opened, he was asked if that was the place; and he being carried to wrong places, after he looked round about for some time, he said, that was not the place: But when he was brought to the place where the fire broke out, he affirmed that was the true place. And Tillotson told me that Howel, then the Recorder of London, was with him and had much discourse with him, and that he concluded it was impossible it could be a melancholy dream. The horror of the fact, and the terror of death, and perhaps some engagements in confession (remember Echard and the Compleat Historian call him a Hugonot or French presbyterian) might put him into such disorder, that it was not possible to draw a clear account from him; but of what related to himself, Tillotson, who believed the city to be burnt on design, told me a circumstance that made the papists employing such a crazed man the more credible, &c.' I omit several other circumstances in Burnet and Baxter, which corroborate the evidence against the papists, and shall only add the inscription about the plinth of the lower pe-readiness than those that were well acquainted with the place, went to Pudding-lane, unto the very place where the house that was first fired stood, saying, Here stood the house. The jailor lestial of the monument, which is designedly omitted by Echard, who has printed the large inscription on the pedestal itself.

"This pillar was set up in perpetual remembrance of the most dreadful burning this protestant city, begun and carried on by the treachery and malice of the popish faction, in the beginning of September, in the year of our Lord 1666, in order to the carrying on their horrid plot for the extirpating the Protestant religion, and old English liberty, and introducing popery and slavery."

"This inscription was erased by king James, upon his accession to the crown, but re-inscribed presently after the happy Revolution, in such deep characters as are not easily to be blotted out again.

"In direct opposition to these authorities, public and private, the archdeacon closes his wild account of the fire thus: 'That he will judge on the charitable, and perhaps probable side, that neither the beginning nor the end of this dreadful fire, were the effects of human means or counsels.' While the terrors occasioned by this conflagration remained on the minds of men, the persecuting bishops and magistrates suspended their rage against the Protestants who had not conformed, and many of their ministers preached in the midst of the burning ruins, to a willing attentive people; as Dr. Manton, Mr. Thomas Vincent, Mr. Wadsworth, Mr. Janewyn, Mr. Thomas Doolittle, Dr. Annesley, Mr. Chester, Mr. Franklin, Mr. Grimes, Mr. Watson, Dr. Jacob, Mr. Nathaniel Vincent, Mr. Turner, Mr. Griffiths, Mr. Brooks, Dr. Owen, Mr. Nye, Mr. Caryl, Dr. Goodwin, Mr. Barker. Many pious, learned, and eminent divines of the Church of England, were more than ordinarily diligent in the discharge of their holy function in this calamitous time; as Dr. Tillotson, Dr. Stillingfleet, Dr. Whitcho, Dr. Horton, Dr. Patrick, Mr. White, Dr. Outram, Dr. Horton, Mr. Gifford, Mr. Nest, Dr. Meriton, &c. Divines of equal merit and moderation, ornaments of their sacred profession and the established Church. When I am to speak of such men as these, I begin with pleasure and end with pain.

"On the 21st of September the parliament met at Westminster. They were, says Echard, the life and expectation of the nation; and to shew it in their actions, they gave the king 1,800,000*l.*, and thanked him for his great care in the management of the war, which they did in return for his majesty's most acceptable speech, wherein he told them, 'I wish with all my heart that I could bear the whole charge of the war myself, and that my subjects should reap the benefit of it to themselves.'" Oldmixon.

"We are now to cast our eyes on one of the endeavouring to draw him from that belief, and putting him upon seeking another place, but he positively persisted in what he had first said; and affirmed that to have been the said house. It being intimated to the committee, That notwithstanding the confession of the said Hubert, it was confidently reported, the fire in the forementioned Farryner's house, began by ac-most striking objects in our whole story; the Fire of London: The particulars of which terrible calamity it is needless to recount; they are already well known; and, as to the horror and confusion attending upon them, they are easier imagined than described.

Both the king and the duke, in person, beheld from time to time the amazing progress of the flames, and contributed all in their power to put a stop to their fury. For three whole days, however, they continued irresistible; and on the fourth, as if satiated with destruction, left the whole space from the Temple westward, to the Tower Dock, and from Pye-corner northward, to the water-side, a desolate chasm of smoking ruins. But, as nothing is better understood than the fact, nothing is more controverted than the cause.

"In the preceding April, the nation had been alarmed with a new Republican plot; of which, and the execution of those concerned in it, the following account was published in the Gazette of April 30:

"At the sessions in the Old Bailey, John Rathbone, an old army colonel, William Sanders, Henry Tucker, Thomas Flint, Thomas Evans, John Myles, William Wescot, and John Cole, formerly officers or soldiers in the late Rebellion, were indicted for conspiring the death of his majesty, and the overthrow of the government; having laid their plot and contrivance for the surprisal of the Tower, the killing his grace the lord general Monk, sir John Robinson, lieutenant of his majesty's Tower of London, and sir Richard Brown, and then to have declared for an equal division of lands, &c. The better to effect this hellish design, the city was to have been fired, and the Portcullises to have been let down, to keep out all assistance; the horse guards to have been surprised in the Inns where they were quartered, several ostlers having been gained for that purpose: The Tower was accordingly viewed, and its surprize ordered by boats over the Mote, and from thence to scale the wall. One Alexander who is not yet taken, had likewise distributed sums of money to these conspirators; and for the carrying on of the design more effectually, they were told of a council of the great ones, that sat frequently in London, from whom issued all orders; which Council received their directions from another in Holland, who sate with the States; and that the 3d of September was pitched on for the attempt, as being found by Lilly's Almanac, and a scheme erected for that purpose, to be a lucky day; a planet then ruling, which prognosticated the downfall of Monarchy. The evidence against these persons was very full and clear, and they accordingly were found guilty of High-Treason, and suffered accordingly."

"Of this circumstance, advantage has been taken by Mr. Echard and others, to insinuate, that this enormous mischief took its rise from that quarter: But how unreasonably, and unjustly, appears from the very event itself; since no other part of the plot took effect; and, according to the very letter of this paragraph, the city was not to have been fired, merely for the sake of perpetrating so prodigious a piece of villany, but to facilitate a change of the government.

"Besides: In July, lord Arlington, writing to sir William Temple, declares, That no discontented party shewed itself. And again, in August (the 23d) to lord Sandwich: 'I can assure you, with all truth, that, since you left us, we have had less trouble and alarms from the discontented party than ever we had in any year, since it hath pleased God to restore his majesty: On the contrary, upon the noise of the intentions of Holland and France to invade us, his majesty had the offer of having 20,000 men raised in fifteen days, by his own party, without a penny of expence to himself; and had the satisfaction of seeing the effect of those promises, by some troops that he thought fit to call for in the like manner: the suspected party concurring avowedly in the same resolution, have as frankly offered their estates and persons, in opposition to any invasion from abroad or insurrection at home, as if they did not differ in any degree from us, in their zeal to serve the king.' And what is still more conclusive, the Account of the Fire, published by authority, concludes in the following remarkable manner:

"And we cannot but observe, to the confusion of all his majesty's enemies, who endeavour to persuade the world abroad, of great parties and disaffection here at home, against his majesty's government, that a greater instance of the affections of this city could never be given than hath now been given, in this sad and deplorable accident; when, if at any time, disorder might have been expected from the losses, distraction and almost desperation of some persons in their private fortunes; thousands of people not having had habitations to cover them. And yet in all this time it hath been so far from any appearance of designs or attempts against his majesty's government, that his majesty and his royal brother, out of their care to stop and prevent the fire, frequently exposing their persons with very small attendance, in all parts of the town, sometimes even to be intermixed with those who laboured in the business; yet, nevertheless, there hath not been observed so much as a murmuring word to fall from any; but on the contrary, even those persons whose losses rendered their conditions most desperate, and to be fit objects of others' prayers, ident. The committee therefore sent for him the said Farryner before them, who being examined, said, That it was impossible any fire should happen in his house by accident: For beholding those frequent instances of his majesty's care of his people, forgot their own misery, and filled the streets with their prayers for his majesty, whose trouble they seemed to compassionate before their own.'

"We have here, therefore, the most full and authentic testimonials, that neither the hated Nonconformists, nor even the more hated Republicans (if we may take leave to separate those whom church-policy hath always so carefully and artificially joined) are answerable for, nor chargeable with, so heinous a wickedness: And it may be yet further urged, that disposed as their adversaries were to accuse them of criminal designs, neither the ministers in their letters to each other, nor the public writings of those times, ever so remotely intimate, that they were even suspected of being concerned in it.

"On the other hand, the State-Narrative just quoted declares, that divers strangers, Dutch and French, were, during the fire, apprehended upon suspicion that they contributed mischievously to it; and were all committed, in order to farther examination: But, in the very same paragraph, these strangers are in a manner disculpated: For the said Narrative proceeds thus: 'Notwithstanding which suspicions, the manner of burning all along in a train, and so blown forward in all its way by strong winds, makes us conclude the whole was an effect of an unhappy chance, or to speak better, the heavy hand of God upon us for our sins.'

"Bishop Burnet, indeed, tells us, without specifying his authority, that, in resentment of the burning of the island Vlie, on the 7th of August, by the English, a project for the burning of London was communicated to Mr. de Witt, by whom it was rejected; notwithstanding which, so immediately after as the 2d of September, that very event took place.

"And, in Mr. d' Estrades's Memoirs, we have a letter to him from the king his master, concerning the joint operations of the two powers during the winter, which contains the following passage:

"However, as there is no room to think of a junction, the opportunity being slipt, for which I am the more sorry, on occasion of the fire of London, which, had our forces been joined, might have been a means of our putting a glorious end to the war, I give orders for disarming my ships, &c.'

"This is all the evidence which occurs with respect to the concern of any foreign power in this dreadful visitation; and out of this, even a decypherer could scarce torture any solid conclusion either against France or Holland. Of these strangers, it is moreover remarkable, that the gazette never makes any farther mention: and, had any circumstances arose upon their examination, tending to inflame the na-be had after twelve of the clock that night gone through every room thereof, and found no fire but in one chimney, where the room was paved with bricks, which fire he diligently tional resentment at that time, it is not to be imagined, that those at the helm would have let slip so favourable an opportunity.

"The populace, however, whether influenced by their own credulity, or misled by the artifices of their betters, were strongly persuaded, that the Papists were the incendiaries: and this conceit took so deep a root, and spread so far, that when the parliament met, a committee was appointed by the House of Commons to take examinations; who finding it unsupported with rational, sober, and consistent evidence, suffered it to drop, as a vulgar error.

"It is true, the committee presented their report, but without an opinion of the particulars it contained: nor did the house countenance it with any vote; nor, when the torrent ran highest against the Papists, does it appear that this report was printed; but, on the contrary, the scandal was propagated, though the evidence was suppressed.

"Even the wretch that was hanged (Hubert) on the presumption of having fired the City, was hanged on his own frantic confession: not one witness appearing against him: and it is remarkable, that Hawles, in his remarks upon Fitzharris's Trial, takes occasion to say 'that the Commons resolving to examine Hubert upon the matter, next day Hubert was hanged before the House sat, and so could tell no farther tales.' Whereas, on the very face of the report it appears, that Hubert was examined both leisurely and fully; and, upon the whole, as there is room to think the man was mad, it is matter of wonder that the man was hanged at all.

"In truth, if the destruction was vast, if it began suddenly, and lasted long, it seems to have nothing, very surprizing or unaccountable in it: it began in a bake-house, where the buildings almost touched each other; the streets were every-where exceedingly close; the whole city was in a manner composed of lath and timber; the season had been exceedingly dry; and the wind blew very fresh. In overgrown cities, where the like circumstances meet, the like accidents are familiar; and those who are most injured by the effect, scarce enquire after the cause.

"To close upon this head: Edmundbury Godfrey, esq. afterwards rendered so famous by the Popish plot, and his tragical death, who had greatly distinguished himself during the fire, and had as greatly contributed towards the suppressing it, was presented to the king, by the duke of York: upon which occasion, his majesty was not only pleased to give him his public thanks and acknowledgments, but also to confer on him the honour of knighthood.

"Unless, therefore, it can be supposed, that raked up in embers. He was then asked, Whether no window or door might let in wind to disturb those coals? He affirmed there was no possibility for any wind to disturb them; and that it was absolutely set on fire of purpose.

Dawes Weymansel, esq. one of his majesty's justices of the peace, informed, That he saw a man apprehended in the time of the fire, near the Temple, with his pockets stuffed with combustible matter, made of flax, tow, and such-like materials.

Doctor John Packer informs, That he saw a all this was grimace and hypocrisy, which would be an affront to human nature, there is no more reason to suspect any great individual of conspiring against the city, than any body of men: and we must be forced to conclude, that next to the being guilty of so black a villainy, there is scarce any wickedness greater than the charging it on the innocent.

"But, if we are not to condemn without evidence, we are not to acquit where there is: though the parliament was to meet on the 21st of September, upon the 13th his majesty was pleased to put forth a declaration, relating to the rebuilding of the city, which partook more of the air of the monarch, and shewed less regard to the absolute dominion which every free subject has over his property, than was consistent with the constitution; by which, the execution of the laws only is left to the king, and he is never authorised to assume the legislative power himself.

"The very words of the Declaration here alluded to, are as follow:

"We have therefore thought fit, most necessary and agreeable to the great and constant affection we have always had, and always shall retain for this our native city, to use this expedition in publishing our thoughts, resolutions, and intentions, upon this great affair, that, though such present rules and directions cannot be formed, as must upon more mature deliberation, be established for the re-edification: yet such inconveniences may and shall be prevented, which may arise by the hasty and unskilful buildings many may propose to erect, for their present conveniences, before they can know how the same will suit and consist with the design that shall be made: And if this candor of ours, which resolves, with the blessing of God, so to provide for the just right and interest of all, that no man shall have cause to complain of wrong and oppression; and if this our reasonable animadversion shall not meet with that prudent submission we expect, but that some obstinate and refractory persons will presume to erect such buildings as they shall think fit, upon pretence that the ground is their own, and that they may do with it what they please, such their obstinacy shall not prevail, to the public prejudice; but we do hereby require the lord-mayor, and the other magistrates person in the time of the fire, throw some combustible matter into a shop in the Old Bailey, which he thinks was the shop of an Apothecary, and that immediately thereupon he saw a great smook, and smelt a smell of brimstone, the person that did this immediately run away; but upon the out-cry of the people he was taken by the guards.

Mr. Randal, Mr. Hanslam, Mr. Humphrey Bowyer, do all agree, That they saw a person flinging something into a house near St. Antholin's church; and that thereupon the house was on fire, and the smook intested the adjacent

'of the city of London, in their several limits, to be very watchful in such cases, and 'speedily to pull down whatsoever such men 'shall presume to set up, so much to the disturbance of public order and decency; and 'that they forthwith give notice to us, or our 'privy council, of such their proceedings, 'and return the names of such refractory persons, 'who presume to contemn this our injunction; 'and we shall give order for their exemplary 'punishment, without the violation of the public justice.'

"Again, proceeding to particulars; 'In the 'first place, the woeful experience, in this late 'heavy visitation, hath sufficiently convinced 'all men of the pernicious consequences which 'have attended the building with timber, and 'even with stone itself, and the notable benefit 'of brick, which in so many places hath resisted 'and even extinguished, the fire. And we do 'therefore hereby declare our express will and 'pleasure; that no man whatsoever shall presume to erect any house or building, great or 'small, but of brick or stone: And, if any man 'shall do the contrary, the next magistrate 'shall forthwith cause it to be pulled down; 'and such further course shall be taken for his 'punishment, as he deserves.'

"It must however be acknowledged that this dictatorial power was exerted by the king, at the instance of the lord-mayor and aldermen; that, if ever such a strain of the prerogative would admit of palliation, it was now, when the city lay in ruins, when all were in haste to rebuild, and the mistakes, trespasses, and injuries, which were like to follow thereupon, would probably create as much confusion as the fire had left: And that the king sweetened the harshness of this decree, with a signification of his intention to part with any thing of his own, which might render the city more commodious or beautiful, and to remit the earth-money duty to all those who should conform to the terms prescribed by it.

"Till the 30th of October, however, it did not appear, that any persons seem'd disposed to submit their property to be thus modelled after the king's good will and pleasure; and, by the manner in which the first act of conformity to it was made public, there is good reason to conclude, that it was not without much difficulty submitted to at all." Ralph, houses. And when this was done, there was no fire near the place.

Mr. Michael March, an officer in the trained bands in a company of sir Richard Brown's, apprehended a Walloon in the time of the fire, at the Nag's-head in Leaden-hall Street, with an instrument like a dark-lantern, made (as is conceived) to lay a train of powder, and it was filled with gun-powder. There were two more of the same nation in his company. They being asked to what use they employed the same instrument, would give no account thereof.

Newton Killingworth esq. informed, That he apprehended a person during the fire, about whom he found much combustible matter, and certain black things, of a long figure, which he could not indure to hold in his hand, by reason of their extream heat. This person was so surprized at first that he would not answer to any question; but being on his way to White-hall, he acted the part of a mad-man, and so continued while he was with him.

Sir John Maynard, a member of this house, affirms, That he had some of that combustible matter in his hands; and though it were in its natural substance, and unfired, yet the heat of it was scarcely to be endured by the touch.

Mr. Freeman of Southwark brewer, (whose house was lately fired) informs, That on the day his house was fired (about a quarter of an hour before that happened) a paper with a ball of wild-fire, containing near a pound weight wrapt in it, was found in the nave of a wheel, in a wheeler's yard, where lay a great quantity of timber. How his house was fired, he knoweth not; but this he affirmed to the Committee, that it could not be by accident, because there had not been any candle or fire in the house where the hay lay, that whole day; and that the hay being laid in very dry, and before Midsummer, could not possibly be set on fire within itself. Moreover he said, that the hay loft was on fire on the top of the house, and that the fire spread from the one end of the roof to another in an instant.

Mr. Richard Harwood informs, That being near the Feathers Tavern by St. Pauls, upon the 4th of September, he saw something through a grate in a cellar, like wild-fire: by the sparkling and spitting of it, he could judge it to be no other; whereupon he gave notice of it, to some soldiers that were near the place, who caused it to be quenched.

I had order from the Committee to acquaint you, that we traced several persons upon strong suspicion (during the fire) to the guards, but could not make further discovery of them.

Thus far was the Report.

What follows was given in to the Committee, but not by them reported to the House at that time.

In obedience to an order directed to me, from the honourable committee of the House of Commons, then sitting in the Speaker's Chamber, on the 2nd of Oct. 1666. I did carry Robert Hubert to St. Katherine's Tower by water, to let me know the place where the Swedish ship lay, that brought him and other French-men from Stockholm, and he brought me to the dock over against Mr. Corsellis his brew-house, and did then verifie to me and Mr. Corsellis, that the ship lay there, until such time as he with Mr. Peidloe and others did go and set fire to a house. And this Hubert did then further say, That Mr. Peidloe did fix two fire-balls to a long pole, and put them into a window, and that he the said Robert Hubert did fire one in the same manner, and put it in at the same window. But with all the inquiry and diligence that I could use, I could neither find nor hear of any such vessel. And from thence I carried the said Robert Hubert to Tower-hill, and did then desire them to shew me the house that they did fire, and he said that it was near the bridge. So we went along Thames-street towards the bridge; but before we came to the bridge, the said Robert Hubert said, that the house was up there (pointing with his hand up Pudding-lane:) So I bid him go to the place; and he went along the bricks and rubbish, and made a stand: Then I did ask one Robert Penny, a wine-porter, which was the baker's house; and he told me, that was the house where the aforesaid Robert Hubert stood. So I went to Robert Hubert, and stood by him, and turned my back towards the baker's house, and demanded of him which house it was that he fired, (directing to other houses contrary to that house) but he turning himself about, said, This was the house (pointing to the baker's house) that was first fired. Then by reason of his lameness, I set him on a horse, and carried him to several other places, but no other place he would acknowledge; but rode back again to the baker's house, and said again, That was the house (pointing at the baker's-house.) And this I humbly certify to this honourable committee.—By me JOHN LOWMAN, Keeper of his majesty's County-gaol for Surry.

Sir; Hearing that you are Chairman to the Committee for examining the fire of London, I thought good to acquaint you with this information that I have received. William Chapneys, a hatband-maker, now living upon Horslydown, was upon Tuesday morning, Sept. the 4th, 1666, in Shoe-lane, and there met with a constable who had apprehended a Frenchman whom he took firing a house there with fire-balls, and charged the said Chapneys to assist him, who carried the said Frenchman to Salisbury-court, hoping there to have found a justice; but finding that place burning down, returned into Fleet-street, who was presently called upon by the commander of the Life Guard, to know what the matter was: the constable told him, he had apprehended a Frenchman firing a house in Shoe-lane, he examined the person, and committed him to the guard, and told the constable, he would secure him, and carried him along with him. The constable asked him, whether he should go along with him, to give in his evidence: He replied, that he had done enough, and might go home. But what became of the Frenchman, he knoweth not.—Your humble servant, S. G.

In a letter directed from Ipswich, for the honourable sir Robert Brook, it is intimated, That about the 30th of August, 1666, one of the constables of Cotton of Hartsmer Hundred, being about the survey of that town, about hearth-money, was told by one Mr. William Thomson, a Roman Catholic in that town, That though times were like to be sad, yet if he found any cause to change his religion, he would see he should not want: And further said to him, What will you say, if you should hear that London is burnt?

The AFFIDAVITS touching a Frenchman, that said there were Three Hundred of them engaged in Firing the City.

The Informations of Richard Cound of St. Giles in the Fields, Ironmonger; William Cotes, Samuel Page, Francis Cogny, Edmond Daikins, and Richard Pardoe, taken the 8th day of September, 1666, by sir Justinian Lewen knight, one of his majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, upon oath, as followeth:

Richard Cound saith, That upon Tuesday night last about twelve or one of the clock, there was a Frenchman brought by the watch to this Informant's father's house, being at the sign of the White-hart in King-street, taken as a suspicious person; the said person being questioned by them, whether he was not one of those that fired the city, or had any hand therein, or any privy or knowledge of any that had designed the same, or words to that effect; the said person answered a great while in a perverse manner, quite different from the question. But being further pressed to tell the truth, and being told, that if he were guilty, it would be the only way to save his life; he did at first obstinately deny, that he knew any thing of any plot. Whereupon a young man took the prisoner aside, to the end of the room, and after some private discourse between them, they both returned to this informant and the rest of the company, and the said young man spake openly to us, in the hearing of the prisoner, That the said Frenchman and prisoner had confessed, there were 300 Frenchmen that were in a plot or conspiracy to fire the city. Upon which this informant and others spake to the said Frenchman in these words, or to the same effect: Well, Monsieur, you have done very well to confess what you have done, and no doubt but you may have your pardon, if you will confess all you know of this plot: and thereupon further asked him, Are there no more than 300 persons in the said Plot? He answered, There are no more than 300 persons. Then we enquired who they were, and how he came to know they were 300? To which he would give no direct answer, but put it off with other extravagant discourse. And being asked why he came to St. Giles's parish (where he was apprehended.) He told a story, that he came from Islington Fields, where his master's goods were; but the goods were now removed, he could not tell whither; and that his master bid him go up and down the fields, but would not declare upon what occasion, or for what end he was so to do; and being asked whether there were 300 persons engaged in this design or plot? He replied that there were 300 engaged in it.

The several Informations of William Cotes of Cow-lane of London, painter; of Samuel Page of St. Giles in the Fields, weaver; of Edmund Dakins of St. Giles aforesaid, book-seller; of Francis Cogny of St. Andrews, Holborn; of Richard Pardoe, victualler, taken upon oath, &c. tend to the confirmation of the foregoing relation.

An Extract of a Letter from Hydleburgh in the Palatinate, Sept. 29, 1666.

Sir; Your's of the sixth current came on Wednesday to me, and brought the ill tidings of the burning of London, constantly expected and discoursed of amongst the Jesuits to my knowledge for these fifteen years last past, as to happen in this year. In which they do also promise to themselves and others introduction of the public exercise of the Catholic religion.

This letter was sent to Mr. Alton, who lives in New Gravel-lane in Shadwel, who negotiates the business of the Palatinate, and will produce the original if there be occasion.

The Information of JOHN CHISHUL, School-master in Enfield.

Upon Friday August 31, Mrs. St. George, and her eldest daughter Susanna St. George, both Popish Recusants, came to visit Mrs. Rebecca Eves, widow, at her house in Enfield; where speaking concerning the session of parliament drawing nigh, Mrs. St. George told her, that some would hereafter be called to account for a plot. Being asked for what? She told her in her ear, For burning the city. Mrs. Eves afterwards hearing of the firing of London, (and going to a place where she might behold it) met with Mrs. Susanna St. George, (and amongst other discourse) told her how much her mother's words, which she spake the Friday before, did run in her thoughts; which she repeated to her daughter, who made this reply, That her mother was very apt to talk, and that she had been fain to keep her mother within doors during the fire, fearing lest she should talk.

After this (during the fire) Mrs. Eves met with Mrs. Cook, another Popish Recusant, and of the same family; to whom she also related Mrs. St. George her words: who made this return, that she was a worthy woman to keep counsel

Also the lady St. George at Enfield, in the Lord of Lincoln's house, declared to Mrs. Rebecca Eves of the said town, that within a few days, the city of London would be laid in ashes. This was spoken about two days before the fire happened.

Mrs. Eves of Enfield her EXAMINATION before Mr. Jolliff and Mr. Marvel, December 20, 1666, concerning Mrs. St. George.

Mrs. Rebecca Eves of Enfield, three or four days, or within a week before the fire, receiving a visit in her own house, from Mrs. St. George (amongst other discourse) Mrs. St. George asked her, what news she heard? And if she knew when the parliament sat? Mrs. Eves replied, She thought, shortly. The other asked, if she heard of any that were to be called in question before the parliament? Mrs. Eves said, About what? Mrs. St. George said, About a plot. Mrs. Eves asked, What plot? Mrs. St. George answered, About firing the city. Mrs. Eves said, I hope God will preserve the city; but people use not to be questioned before the fact he committed. So the discourse was waved for that time.

At the time of the fire, Mrs. Eves went out to look towards the fire; and mentioning Mrs. St. George, one in the company replied behind her, (but she cannot certainly fix the person) a prime woman to keep counsel! After the fire, Mrs. St. George her daughter came to Mrs. Eves, who asked her, if she remembered what her mother had said? She said, My mother is such a woman, she will speak what she thinks. Afterwards she said, That she had much ado to keep her mother in at the time of the fire, lest she should speak some things she should be questioned for.

At the first discourse, Mrs. Eves, her daughter, and others of the family were present. Mr. St. George, his wife, and family, have since left Enfield. They are all great Papists, and there are many more in the neighbourhood.

A LETTER directed, and sent by the post to Mr. Samuel Thurlton, in Leicestershire, from a person unknown, as followeth: dated October, 1666.

My friend; Your presence is now more necessary at London, than where you are, that you may determine how to dispose of your estate in Southwark: for it is determined by human counsel (if not frustrated by Divine Power) that the Suburbs will shortly be destroyed. Your capacity is large enough to understand: proceed as your genius shall instruct you.—Cave, Cave, Fuge, Vale.

Saturday the first of September, 1666, the day before the fire in London, came one Urnstraw from Ireland, with a letter from thence, to one esquire Holcroft, at Eastham in Essex, (being related to that family by marriage;) where he supped. After which he asked the esquire, if he had heard any thing of the firing of London? Who answered No. But Urnstraw said, he would shortly; for it was, or would be so that night. The esquire answered, if it were, he hoped it might be quenched again; as it had been many a time. But Urnstraw answered, No, it would not be quenched; for it should be said of it, as of Troy: repeating a Latin verse, Nunc Seges est ubi Troja fuit.

Now corn grows where Troy-Town stood.

This discourse was managed pleasantly by him; after which they went to their beds: and in the morning, this Urnstraw enquires earnestly, Whether they had heard of the firing of London that night? They answered, No. But he prayed him to send one of the family out, to enquire; and, doubtless, they would hear of it. Upon which a messenger was sent; who brought word from a man that travelled upon the road, that it was on fire indeed. After dinner, this Urnstraw desired his horse to be saddled that he might be gone. The esquire intreats him to stay till next morning: but he answered, Therefore I would see London before it be quite burnt; for I shall never see it more.

Sunday morning, the fire being begun in London, a person coming from Deptford, when he came to Barnaby-street end in Southwark, hears a woman cry out against a Frenchman, for throwing fire-balls; he runs after him and lays hold of him. He asked him, what commission he had for so doing? He answered, that his commission was in his constancy. The people coming in, they searched him, and found fire balls in his pockets. He was delivered to the guard in Southwark, but heard of no more.

A Citizen being fired out of his house, had hired a lodging, in Queen street in Covent Garden; and going up Holborn, there being a crowd of people, steps in amongst them, hears a woman say, that she had a hand in firing the City. The people asked her, whether she was an Anabaptist? she said, no. Are you an Independent? She said, no. Are you a Presbyterian? She said, no. Are you a Roman Catholic? To which she would give no answer. The Citizen asked her, But, Mistress; had you a hand in burning the City? She answered, what would you have me to say? I have confessed it already, and do deserve to die for it. This she said, with great trembling; and seeming to be much troubled. The Citizen enquired for a constable: the people reply, there was one gone for. But a gallant comes and takes her by the arm, and leads her away: saying, he would have her examined: and forthwith, another gallant closeth with him; and they both carried her to the Griffin-Tavern in Holborn. The Citizen follows them, to see the result of the business: but they with the master of the house shut out the company (all but the Citizen, supposing him to be one of their own company), but asking one the other concerning him, and finding him not of them put him out again. Whereupon, he goes to the next company of soldiers, and enquires for their captain : who replied, he was not there but told him, yonder is my L. C. Unto whom the Citizen repaired ; and acquainted his lordship, that there was a woman apprehended (and rescued by a couple of gallants) that had confessed she had a hand in burning the city, and was at such a tavern. Whereupon the L. C. called to a captain in the street and ordered him to go with that man, and apprehend the woman that he should direct him to. Whereupon, he goes with the Citizen, and takes her with the first gallant, who stood up highly in her defence, and carries them both to an ale-house on the other side of the way. The Citizen perceiving that nothing would be done with her, leaves his name with the captain, and where he might be found ; but was never called for, to justify the words spoken by her.

A woman standing in Whitt-Chapel with a company about her, was asked what the matter was ? She said, that she met two young men in that place, and asked them how it was with the fire : they answered, It is now almost out, if it can be kept so ; but the rogues renew it with their fire-balls. As saith another woman young men if you have a heart to it, you may be hired to throw them. It was asked her, what was become of the woman that spake thus ? She answered, that she had apprehended her, and delivered her to the under-beadle of White-Chapel Parish. The woman falling under the accusation (not being able to deny it) there being many witnesses at that time that heard it ; she was delivered to sir John Robinson, but heard of no more.

One from France writes to his Correspondent in London, to know the truth of what was muttered in Paris, whether London was laid in ashes or no. The letter being dated a week before the fire began.

From Surrey in or near Darkin, a person in ordinary habit, who was yet observed to take place of all the nobility and gentry among the papists, seeing the people of Darkin mourn for the burning of the City, he spake slightly of it, telling them they should have something else to trouble-themselves for ; and that shortly Darkin should be laid as low as London.

Whereupon the people made at him, and one Tr. H. a great Papist, rescues him, and sends him away in his coach to London. This was deposed before sir Adam Brown, a justice of peace and a member of parliament.

These following RELATIONS (for substance) were delivered to sir Robert Brooks, chair-man of the committee, a little before the prorogation of the parliament.

A true Relation made by one of the grand jury at Hick's-Hall, at a general Quarter-Sessions presently after the Fire in London, who was upon Trial of some of those that fired the City.

That near West-Smithfield in Chicklane there was a man taken in the very act of firing house, by the inhabitants and neighbours ; and carrying him away through Smithfield, to have him before a justice for the fact committed, the king's life guard perceiving it, made up unto them, and demanded their prisoner from them ; but they refused to let him go. The life-guard men told them, that he was one of the king's servants, and said, we will have him. And thereupon they drew out their swords and pistols, and rescued him out of the people's hands by force of arms.

A bill of indictment was brought against him, and two or three witnesses did swear unto it, and the bill was found by the grand-jury, who did carry it to the Old Bailey, and presented it to the Lord Chief Justice ; but it came to no further trial, nor was ever seen after at the Old Bailey, so far as this person, upon his best enquiry, could ever hear, or learn.

Concerning an House-keeper at Solio, who fired his own dwelling-house.

First he secured all his goods in his garden, and then went in and fired his house ; which when he had done, he endeavoured to get away out at his fore-door. A neighbour demanded of him, who had fired his house ? He answered, The Devil. Upon that, his neighbour bad him stand, or he would run his halbert into his guts. His answer was, if you do, there are enough left behind me to do the work. Whereupon he was secured, and a bill of indictment brought against him, and about three witnesses did swear to it : and his son came in as witness against him ; who was demanded by the foreman, what he could say as to the firing of his father's house ? He said, that his father did fire it with a fire-ball. It was demanded of him, whether he did fire it above stairs, or below ! He answered, above stairs. The Bill was likewise found, but the petty jury did not find him guilty.

A maid was taken in the street, with two fire-balls in her lap : some did demand of her, where she had them ? she said, one of the king's life-guard threw them into her lap. She was asked, why she had not caused him to be apprehended ? She said, that she knew not what they were. She was indicted for this, and the bill found against her, and turned over to the Old Bailey ; but no prosecution upon it.

In the time of the fire, a constable took a Frenchman firing an house, seized on him ; and going to a magistrate with him, met his R. H. the Duke of York, who asked the reason of the tumult. One told him, that a Frenchman was taken firing a house ; his H. called for the man, who spake to him in French : The D. asked, who would attest it ? the constable said, I took him in the act, and I will attest it. The D. took him into his custody, and said, I will secure him. But he was heard of no more.

On Monday the third of September, there was a Frenchman taken firing a house ; and upon searching of him, fire balls were found about him. At which time four of the life-guards rescued the Frenchmen, and took him away from the people, after their usual manner in the whole time of the fire.

One Mr. Belland, a Frenchman, living at Marylebone, who bought great store of paste-board for a considerable time before the fire of the city of London, to the quantity of 20 gross in one shop, and much more elsewhere, was asked by a citizen, What he did with all that paste-board? He answered that he made fire-works for the king's pleasure. The citizen asked him, What doth the king give you? He replied, Nothing, only I have respect at court: The citizen said, Take heed, Mr. Belland, you do not expend your estate, and then lose your respect at court, for you are at a great charge. Belland answered, Sir, do you think this a great matter? I use all this myself; But if you did see all the great quantities I have made elsewhere in three several places, three, four, and five miles off, you would say something. Another time the stationer with whom he dealt for the pasteboard, being at his house at Marylebone, and wondering at the many thousands of fire-works, that lay piled up of several sorts, he said, Sir, do you wonder at this? If you should see the quantity that I have made elsewhere by other men you would wonder indeed.

The Sunday before the fire began, this Belland came to the shop where he was wont to buy his pasteboard, but the stationer being not there, he desired a citizen (the stationer's neighbour) to speak to him, and to let him know that he had much wronged him in disappointing him of the four gross of pasteboard which he should have had of him, and said that he should not do his work by the time; and that if he had it not by Tuesday night, it would come too late, he should have no occasion for it after that (which was the Tuesday night before the fire) Mr. Belland, said the citizen, What is the reason of your haste? Have you any shew suddenly before the king? At which he blushed, and would give no answer. Says the citizen, What kind of fireworks do you make? only such as will crack and run? Belland answered, I make of all sorts; Some that will burn and make no crack at all, but will fly up in a pure body of flame, higher than the top of Paul's, and waver in the air. Says the citizen, Mr. Belland, when you make your shew, shall I see it? Yes, said Belland, I promise you, and gave his hand upon it. Which citizen in the time of the fire being upon the Thames in a boat, saw to his great amazement, sundry bodies of fire, burning above the fire of the houses as high again as Paul's, wavering in the air, directly according to Belland's description.

And after the burning of the city, some citizens agreed to go to Marylebone, to speak with this Belland; and by the way, met with his two maids and his boy; and having some knowledge of them, asked for young Mr. Belland: who told them he was not at home, neither knew they where he was. But the citizens observing, that they carried with them rabbits and capons ready dressed, concluded they were going to him, and told them so, whereat they were surly, and bade them go look him, for they would not tell them where he was. Upon that, the citizens resolved to follow them, and did, till they came to Whitehall. The servants went up stairs, and down stairs, on purpose to have lost them, but could not, for they kept close to them: And at last, one of the maids went to a door, and knocked; crying out, they were dogged by two men, that they could not be rid of. With that, young Mr. Belland opened the door, saying to one of the citizens, Sir, your servant: How do you do? One of them answered, Both I, and many thousand families more, are the worse for you; for you, under pretence of making fireworks for the king, have destroyed a famous city, and ruined a noble people. To which Belland replies, I make nothing but innocent things, that will do no harm; for which I have a patent from the king. But the citizen answered, if the king gave you a patent, it was but for yourself. Who answered, No. Said the citizen, what made you then to employ so many men, in so many places? No, said Belland, I set no man to work; neither know I any man that makes of them, but myself; though he had often before said otherwise. While they were thus discoursing, old Belland looks from under the hangings; Sir, said he, I hear you charging my son with suspicion of burning the city; I pray you speak lower (casting his eyes about, fearing the ladies, passing by, might hear;) and said, My son doth nothing, but what he hath a patent from the king for; and shall have an order to sue any man that shall accuse him. And he said, my son is no prisoner, but lodged here, to prevent him from the rage of the common people. Well, said the citizen, you must give an account for what you have done: And so they shut the door upon them. The citizen went, and enquired whose lodgings they were; and were told, they belonged to a lady.

The Information of THOMAS MIDDLETON, chyrurgeon, late inhabitant of St. Bride's, London.

I the said Thomas Middleton do hereby certify, That upon the Sunday in the afternoon, the day wherein the dreadful fire brake out in Pudding-lane, which consumed the city, hearing the general outcry that the city was fired by Papists and French, I repaired to the top of a church steeple near the Three Cranes in the Vintrey; where myself and several others, observed the motion of the fire for two or three hours together: And we all took notice, that the fire did break forth out of several houses, when the houses which were then burning were at a good distance from them every way. And more particularly, I saw the fire break out from the inside of Lawrence-Poultney steeple, when there was no fire near it. These and such like observations, begat in me a persuasion that the fire was maintained by design. Upon Monday I repaired again into the city, and found, as the day before, that the fire did break forth in fresh houses, at a great distance one from another. And as I was returning home, passing through Watling-street by a tobacco merchant's house, I saw the master of the house come down stairs, driving a young fellow before him; saying to him, 'You rogue, do you come to rob me? what did you do in my garret?' or words to that purpose; and pushed him out of doors: All which I observed, and he seemed to be a Frenchman; he was a short, black fellow, of about 22 years of age: And as soon as he was out of the house, he having a loose coat on in a way of privacy, shuffles something under his coat; whereupon I laid hold of him and said, 'Sirrah, what have you there?' The fellow replied, 'What is that to you; the master of the house knows me.' Upon that I asked the master of the house whether he knew the fellow? he answered, he knew him not. Whereupon I searched the fellow, and found a horn of powder about him; and as soon as the powder was discovered, he fell a rubbing of his hands, they being all black with powder. He had also about him a book intituled, The Jewish Government. I charged him that he was a Frenchman, because he spake broken English, but he denied it and did much vaunt himself. There coming a constable by with his staff, I required him to carry him to prison, and I would assist him: So we conveyed him to Old-Bridewell; and by the way the people were ready to kill him, calling him French rascal. I prayed them to forbear, for justice would give him reward. I told the fellow he would be hanged; he made slight of it, saying, 'If I die my soul shall be saved, but yours shall be damned.' And when he was put into Bridewell, I desired that he might be secured, and none suffered to speak with him till he were examined before a magistrate, because the tobacco merchant's house was presently burned upon it. But so it happened on the next day, that the fire came on and consumed my house and goods; so that I was forced, with my family, to flee into the country; and what became of the fellow I know not, Old Bridewell being burnt also. And understanding that the Parliament hath appointed a Committee to enquire after the actors in, and fomenters of that terrible fire; I thought good to inform the honourable Committee thereof, that they may send for the keeper of the said Bridewell, to know what became of the fellow, that he might receive justice according to his demerit. Thus much I thought myself obliged to do, as in duty bound to God and my country; all which I am ready to affirm upon oath, when I shall be thereunto called.

THO. MIDDLETON.

In the time of the fire near Bridewell, there was a man sadly bemoaning the great loss he was like to sustain (the fire then being within five or six houses of him) did beseech the people for God's sake (they having no goods of their own in danger) to come in and help him to throw out trunks, chests, beds, &c. out at a window, having procured two carts or waggon:

to carry them away. Whereupon I ran into his house with several others, broke down his windows, threw out his goods and loaded the carts; and there being some interval of time before the return of the carts, and seeing a room wherein were many books and loose papers, which seemed to be a library, I went in and took down a book, which proved to be Ovid's Metamorphosis; and while I was looking upon it, there came into the same room an old man of low stature with a white frock, who looked also on the book as it was in my hand; I took him in my mind to be some groom come out of a stable, and thought him to be presumptuously foolish, supposing such a mean-like old man ignorant of that language in which the book was written, it being Latin; but I spoke not to him. In the mean time there brake forth a fire amongst the papers which were behind us, there being none in the room but he and I. Whereupon the rest of the people coming in, cried out, 'We had set the room on fire;' and rushing in upon us, put out the fire with their feet. Whereupon I took hold of the old man by the buttons under the throat, and said, 'How now, father! it must either be you or I that must fire these papers.' There was a small thing of a black matter, which looked like a piece of link burning, which questionless set fire on the papers, but it was immediately trod out. A tumult of people thronged in; and when I said, 'How now, father!' and took hold on him, he said, Parce mihi, Domini: The people which did not understand it, cried out, 'He is a Frenchman, kill him;' and with pulling of him his peruke fell off; then appeared a bald skull, and under his frock he had black cloaths, I think of hishop-sattin; whereupon he seemed to be a grave ecclesiastic person. I had much ado to save him from the people, but at last brought him before the Duke of York. We found in his pockets a bundle of papers closed up with wax like a packet, which was delivered to the D. of Y. I know not what was written in them, neither do I know what countryman he was; but methought he looked something Jesuit-like. This I am certain of, that when I went into the room there was no fire in it, and it was fired when there was none but he and I in it, yet I cannot say I saw him do it, though I cannot but suspect he did it, and the rather because there were several houses untouched betwixt this house, and where the fire was coming on, when the papers in the library were thus on fire as I have related. What became of this fellow, after we had delivered him to his royal highness, I have not heard.

JOHN STEWART.

Thus far concerning the Report and Informations about the Fire: now follows a true Account of what was represented to another Committee of Parliament, touching the Insolency of Popish Priests and Jesuits and the Increase of Popery, &c.

At the Committee appointed to certify Informations touching the Insolency of Popish Priests and Jesuits, and the Increase of Popery.

Ordered, That these several Informations proceeded on, in pursuance of the said power of the Committee, be reported to the House in reference to the Insolency of the Popish Priests and Jesuits, and the Increase of Popery.

As to the Increase of Popery, Mr. Hancock, minister of Chilmoth in Wilts, informs, That meeting with one Mr. Thomson about a month since, coming from Mass out of Somerset-house chapel, and discoursing to him about his religion, asked him if there were many lately turned to it? Thomson answered, 'Thousands.' And being demanded what encouragement there was to it? Replied, 'There would be a change suddenly.' (Report his carriage to the Committee.)

Mr. Thomson being summoned before the Committee, did behave himself very insolently: they have commanded me to report it. Being asked, Whether he had not a shop in Somerset-house where Popish books and Popish knacks were sold? He said he had; and that his man sold such books and beads, and other things. And said, There was one crucifix, no relics; but wished he had some good one. He said that he was a Roman Catholic, and thanks God for it. He said he was no priest, but wished he were in a capacity to be one. He said he had not taken the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, nor would do it. He said he would take any oath that any Christian prince should require, but not the Oath of Allegiance, intimating some mixture in it. He said he had taken the Oath of Allegiance to the king of Spain, and was a subject to the king of Spain.

One Mr. Ash a minister, late of Capel in Surrey, informed, That being at Caulfield in Lancashire this last summer, he saw great resort on Sundays to Caulfield-house, the house of a Papist; and asking some that were going thither, what the occasion was of their resort thither, they told him they were going to Mass, and that one Mr. Robiusion a priest did say Mass. Mr. Ash did likewise inform, that he thought the number of those that went to Mass to that house on Sundays, was as great as the Protestants that went to the parish church.

One Mr. Welden, deputy-ordinary for Middlesex, did inform, That in his accustomed attendance on the prisoners at Newgate, about the time of execution, Romish priests, and particularly one Mr. Harvey a Jesuit, hath constantly used to resort to the prison at those times, and doth persuade the prisoners to become Papists; and that divers have been altered in their religion by them, and turned to Popery.

Mr. Wootten informeth, That on Oct. 16th he went to Newgate, and meeting with one Howard an under-keeper at the door, desired to speak with Mr. Hubert the Frenchman, who was then condemned: Howard told him that he could not speak with him yet, for Mr. Harvey, the queen-mother's confessor, was in private with him; and said, this Harvey used frequently to come to the prison after condemnation, and that where one prisoner died a Protestant, many died Papists. Mr. Wootten said, that after some stay he saw Mr. Harvey come out from Mr. Hubert, and then he was admitted to have speech with him.

Mr. Cawdry, keeper of Newgate, did inform, That Mr. Harvey the Jesuit did frequent the prison at Newgate about the times of the execution, upon the pretence of the queen's charity, and did spend much time with the prisoners in private, and particularly did so before the last execution, night after night. Mr. Cawdry said likewise of the nine that suffered, eight died Papists, whereof some he knew were Protestants when they came into the prison.

It appeared upon several informations, that Mr. Harvey and other priests, did not only resort to Newgate at times of execution, but likewise to the White Lion in Southwark, and other places in the country, and used their endeavours to pervert dying prisoners.

Thomas Barnet, late a Papist, informed, That when he was a Papist, and resorted to gentlemen's houses in Berkshire that were Papists; there was almost in every gentleman's house a priest, and instanced in divers private gentlemen in that county. Others inform the like in Surrey.

Mr. Cottman did inform, that one Mr. Carpenter, late a preacher at Colledge hill, did in discourse tell Cottman, "That the judgments of God upon this kingdom by the plague last year, and lately by the fire in London, were come upon this land and people, for their forsaking the true Roman Catholic religion, and shaking off obedience to the pope, and that if they would return to the church of Rome, the pope would rebuild the city at his own charge." Carpenter said likewise to Cottman, "That if he would come and hear him preach the next Sunday at his house in Queen street, he would give twenty reasons to prove, that the Roman Catholic was the true religion, and his the false; and that our bible had a thousand falsities in it, and that there was no true scripture but at Rome, and their church." Carpenter at the committee confessed, that he had formerly taken orders from the church of Rome to be a priest, but said he had renounced that church and taken orders in England.

The next thing is the Information of their Insolency, and I shall begin with their scorning and despising the Bible.

One Thomas Williams an officer in sir William Bowyer's regiment, informed, that one Ashley a Papist, seeing a woman read in a bible, asked her why she read in that damnable presbyterian bible, and said, a play book was as good.

Thomas Barnet of Bingfield in Berkshire, informed, that being at one Mr. Young's house in Bingfield, at Bartholomew-tide last, Mr. Young said to the brother of this Thomas, in his hearing, that within two years there should not be a protestant in England. Thomas Barnet, informed further, that being at Mr. Doncaster's house in Bingfield, one Mr. Thural, son-in-law to Mr. Doncaster, (and both Papists) said to this informer, (who was then likewise a Papist,) The people take me for a poor fellow, but I shall find a thousand or two thousand pounds to raise a party of horse, to make Mr. Hathorn's and Mr. Bullock's fat guts lie on the ground; for it is no more to kill an heretic, than to kill a grass-hopper, and that it was happy for him that he was a Catholic, for by that means he shall be one that shall be mounted.

Mr. Linwood, scrivener in White-chapel, informed, That about the 20th of October last, meeting with one Mr. Binks a Papist, and discoursing with him, Binks told him, that there was amongst the Papists as great a design as ever was in England, and he thought it would be executed suddenly. Being asked how many Papists there were about London? he answered, about seven thousand, and in England an hundred thousand were armed.

Mr. Oaks a physician dwelling in Shadwell, informed, That a little after the burning of London, one Mr. Carpenter, a minister, came to his house in Tower-wharf, and spake to him to this purpose: I will not say that I am a Papist, but this I will say, that I had rather die the death of the Papists, and that my soul should be raised with their resurrection, than either to be Presbyterian, Independant or Anabaptist; and I tell you, the Papists have hitherto been his majesty's best fortification; for when Presbyterians, Independants and Anabaptists forsook and opposed him, then they stood by him, and helped him; and he is now resolved to commit himself into their hands. And take it upon my word in a short time, the Papists will lay you as low as that house (pointing to an house that was demolished) for they are able to raise forty thousand men, and I believe, the next work will be cutting of throats. This was sworn by Mr. Oaks, before sir John Frederick, a member of the house.

Mirian Pilkington being present when the words were spoken, doth affirm them all, save only those, That the king is resolved to commit himself into the Papists hands. Those she doth not remember.

Henry Young, a distiller of hot-waters, informed, that about, April 1661, being in the Jesuits College in Antwerp, one Powell, an English Jesuit, persuaded him to turn a Roman Catholic, and said, That if he intended to save his life and estate he had best turn so, for within seven years he should see all England of that religion. Young replied, that the city of London would never endure it. Powell answered, that within five or six years they would break the power and strength of London in pieces, and that they had been contriving, it these twenty years; and that if Young did live, he should see it done. The said Young did likewise inform, that shortly after his coming into England, one Thomson and Copervel, both Papists, did several times say to him, that within five or six years at the furthest, the Roman Catholic religion should be all over in this kingdom.

Jasper Goodwin of Darking, in the county of Surry, informed, That about a month since one Edward Complin, a Papist, said to him, you must all be Papists shortly; and that now he was not ashamed to own himself a Roman Catholic, and to own his priest (naming two that were in Darking in the houses of two Papists;) and likewise said, that in twenty four hours warning, the Roman Catholics could raise thirty thousand men, as well armed, as any men in Christendom.

William Warner of Darking informed, That the said Edward Complin did tell him, that the Roman Catholics in England, could in twenty four hours, raise thirty thousand horse and arms: and upon saying so, pulled out his crucifix and beads, and said, He was not ashamed of his religion.

John Grawnger of Darking, informed that about a year since being in his house, reading the bible, one Thomas Collins, a Papist, said to him, Are you still a church-goer? had you not better turn Roman Catholic? if you stay till you are forced none will abide you. And said further, that there was a man beyond sea had prophesied, that in sixty six, if the king did not settle the Romish religion in England; he would be banished out of the kingdom, and all his posterity. And Collins further said, that he being lately turned a Roman Catholic, he would not be a Protestant for the world. He wished Grawnger again, in the hearing of his wife, (which he affirmed to the committee) to turn his religion; for all the said prophecy would come to pass in sixty six.

Robert Holloway of Darking aforesaid informed, That one Stephen Griffin, a papist, said to him, That all the blood that had been shed in the late civil war, was nothing to that which would be shed this year in England. Holloway demanded a reason for these words, in regard the kingdom was in peace, and no likelihood of trouble; and said, Do you Papists intend to rise and cut our throats when we are asleep? Griffin answered, That's no matter, if you live, you shall see it.

Ferdinand de Massido, a Portuguese, and some years since a Romish priest, but turning Protestant, informed, That one father Taff, a jesuit, did the last year tell him at Paris, That if all England did not return to the church of Rome they should all be destroyed the next year.

Mr. Samuel Cottman of the Middle-Temple, barrister, informed, That about two years since, one Mr. Jeviston, a Popish priest, and called by the name of father Garret, did persuade him to turn papist, and he should want neither profit nor preferment. Mr. Cottman objected, that he intended to practise the law, which he could not do if he turned papist, because he must take the oath of Supremacy at his being called to the bar; and if he were a papist he must not take it. Mr. Jeviston replied, Why not take the oath? It is an unlawful oath, and void ipso facto. And after some pause, said further, first take the oath and then I will convert you. He said further, The king will not own himself to be head of the church. And said further, You in England that set up the Dutch to destroy our religion, shall find that they shall be the men to pull down yours.

Mr. Stanley, an officer to the duke of Ormond in Ireland, informed, That coming out of Ireland with one Oriel (who owned himself of the order of the Jesuits, and commissioned from the pope to be lord primate of Ireland, and archbishop of Armagh) and falling into some discourse with him, he told him, "That there had been a difference between him and some other of the jesuits in Ireland, and that part of the occasion was, that one father Walsh, and some other of the jesuits there did dispense with the papists in Ireland, to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, by virtue of a standing commission from the pope which he had to do it, during this king's life; and Oriel thought they ought not to do it by virtue of the standing commission, but should take a new commission from the pope every year to do it." And likewise, "That he brought eight boys out of Ireland, whom he intended to carry to Flanders, to breed up in some of the colleges there." And at his taking shipping to go for Flanders, he shook his foot towards England, terming it Egypt, and said "He would not return into England, till he came with 50,000 men at his heels."

A French merchant being a papist living in St. Michael's lane, London, writes in a letter to his friend, That a great number of men and arms were ready here, if those he wrote to were ready there. He being upon the intercepting of this letter, searched; forty fire-locks were found in his house, ready loaden; which were carried to Fishmongers-hall, a month or more before the fire, and he committed to prison, but since released.

A poor woman retaining to one Belson's house, a papist, about Darking in Surrey, was solicited, that she and her husband would turn Roman catholics; which if they did voluntarily now, they would be accepted of; but if they staid a little longer, they would be forced whether they would or no; and then they would not be esteemed. This was deposed before sir Adam Brown, a member of parliament.

A complaint being made against a sugar-baker at Fox-hall, his house was searched by lieutenant colonel Luntly, who found there several guns, with such locks, as no Englishman (who was at the taking of them) could discharge; together with brass blunderbusses and fire-works, of a furious and burning nature: Trial being made of a small part of them, the materials were discerned to be sulphur, aquavivæ, and gun-powder, whatever else.

In a letter to sir John Frederick and Mr. Nathaniel Heron, from Horsham in Sussex, the 8th of September, 1666. Subscribed Henry Chowne. Wherein is mentioned, that the said Henry Chowne had thoughts to come to London that week, but that they were in distraction there concerning the papists, fearing they would shew themselves all that day; and that he had been to search a papist's house within six miles of that place. He, with another justice of peace met the gentleman's brother (who is a priest) going to London, whom they searched and found a letter about him, which he had received that morning from his sister, twenty miles off from him; wherein is expressed, That a great business is in hand, not to be committed to paper, as the times be.

Your Committee have thought fit to give no opinion upon these Informations; but leave the matter of fact to your judgments.

I am commanded to tell you, That your Committee have several other things of this nature under their Inquiry.

As a further instance of the audacious and insolent behaviour of these Popish Recusants, take the following Copy of Verses made, and then scattered abroad by some of their party in Westminster-hall, and several other places about the city, and elsewhere in the kingdom:

Covre la feu, ye Hugonots,
That have so branded us with Plots,
And henceforth no more bonfires make,
Till ye arrive the Stygian Lake. I | E
For down ye must yee Hereticks, —
For all your hopes of Sixty-six. 7
The hand against you is so steady,
Your Babylon is fallen already.
And if you will avoid that bay,
Return into your mother's lap;
The Devil a mercy is for those,
That Holy Mother Church oppose.
Let not your Clergy you betray;
Great eyes are ope, and see the way.
Return in time, if you will save
Your souls, your lives, or ought you have.
And if you live till sixty-seven,
Confess you had fair warning given.
Then see in time, or aye be blind,
Short time will shew you what's behind.

Dated the 5th day of Nov. in the year 1666, and the first year of the Restoration of the Church of Rome in England.

Not long after the burning of London, Mr. Brook Bridges, a young gentleman of the Temple, as he was going to attend Divine Service in the Temple church, in a pew there found this following Paper, which immediately either by himself, or a relation of his, was delivered to sir William Morrice, one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state; the contents of the Paper are as follows :

A Warning to Protestants.

I, who have been a Papist, from my infancy, till of late, and in zeal for their horrid principles, had too great a share in the firing of the city. And did intend to do further mischief to the Protestants (of which I am now and ever shall be a member) do upon abhorrence of that villainy, and religion that hath moved me to it, declare to all Protestants, the approach of their sudden ruin, that it may be prevented, if it be not too late.

When I, together with other Papists, both French, Irish, and English, fired the city; others were employed to massacre the Protestants, we thinking thereby to destroy the heads of your religion; but the massacre was disappointed by the fear of him, who was the chief agent in this villainy. And the fire not having done all its work, they have often endeavoured to fire the remaining part. They intend likewise to land the French upon you: to whose assistance they all intend to come, and for that purpose are stored with arms: and have so far deceived the king, that they have the command of most part of the army, and the sea ports. The French intend to land at Dover, that garrison being most Papists; and the Papists in England, have express command from Rome, to hasten their business before the next parliament; and to dispatch. Therefore as you love your lives and fortunes, prevent your ruin, by disarming all the Papists in England, especially C. L.—from the Tower, and the L. D—, and all his adherents and soldiers, from Dover, and by disarming all Papists. I have such an abhorrence, that I would willingly undergo any punishment for it; and declare myself openly, were I not assured that I could do you more good in concealing my name for the present. Delay not from following these directions, as you love your lives; and be not deceived by any pretences whatsoever.

An Impartial Account of some Informations taken before several Justices of the Peace, concerning the several Fires happening of late in and near the City of London.

About the latter end of June, and in July, one Joseph Harrison came several times to the Greyhound-inn, in Holborn, pretending to enquire for letters for himself; and about the beginning of July comes into the said inn, and meeting Mr. Atkins, the master of the said inn, he the said Harrison asked him for a can of beer; whereupon Mr. Atkins ordered his man to draw two cans, drinking one himself, and giving the other to Harrison. After which, the said Harrison took Mr. Atkins by the hand, and led him out of his own yard into Holborn, and by the rails in the street, the said Harrison advised the said Atkins to put off his house and dispose of his goods as soon as he could; for within three weeks or a month, there would be great and dreadful fires in and about London. Mr. Atkins asked him, How he knew so? The said Harrison replied, If you will not believe me, you may choose: and so left him.

One Monday, July the 25th, Mr. Atkins's wife hearing of the fire at the George-inn, in Southwark, went to her mother at the Talbot-inn, in Southwark; the back part of which said inn is adjoining to the George-inn, and was likewise on fire; and being there, she espied the aforesaid Joseph Harrison in the yard, and remembering the aforesaid advice to her husband, desired some persons that were next her, to lay hold of him; which being done, he was conveyed to a foot company that stood in arms near the said inn, judging that the nearest place to secure him. After which, sir John Smith, one of the sheriffs of London, was acquainted with the whole matter. Upon which he, with the L. C. went to the said company, and in the hearing of several, gave charge to the captain of the said company to keep him safe until they had time to examine him. After the fire was put out, some went to enquire after the prisoner, and the captain told them, the L. C. had discharged him.

The next day being Tuesday, a person was informed that the said Harrison taught school in Threadneedle-street, and that he boasted of his deliverance, and said, That the L. C. was pleased to honour him so far as to take him in his barge with him to Whitehall, and bid him but be patient a while, and he should have satisfaction from the persons that had troubled him. But hearing where to find him, endeavours were used to retake him, and accordingly was accomplished on Wednesday, July 27, and had before the worshipful sir John Frederick, who sent him to Bishopsgate, and ordered him to be brought before the lord mayor and court of aldermen the next day to be examined. Before whom were these following things proved against him upon oath.

“1. That he hath had frequent correspondence with jesuits and papists. 2. That he hath spoken to several of his acquaintance to go with him to popish meetings, declaring that he knew of many. 3. That he hath been persuaded to turn Mendicant Friar, and hath been offered a stipend to turn to the Romish Religion. 4. That he knew there would be divers great and dreadful fires in and about London within a month. 5. That he advised friends to rid their hands of all their concerns in and about London, for there would be a great consumption of houses there. 6. That when he was in the custody of the Foot-Company aforesaid, Mr. Atkins aforesaid, affirming to swear the former Article; he threatened him, if he did, it should cost him the best house he had. 7. That he said there were 40,000 French Papists lately come over, to his knowledge; besides, many that were amongst us already. 8. The Lord Mayor asking him, who persuaded him to turn catholic? He answered, The king's under-barber, Phillips."

After which, he told the Court, That when he was apprehended for these things, my L. C. discharged him, and took him with him in his barge to White-hall. He further told the Court, That he was some time an assistant to Mr. Lovejoy, schoolmaster at Canterbury, and that he had letters testimonial of his good behaviour from the dean of Canterbury: Upon which my Lord Mayor remembering that he had seen him with Mr. Lovejoy, and said, that Mr. Lovejoy told him, That he was an idle rogue. And so he was committed to Newgate.

On Saturday the 30th of July, it was further deposed upon oath by Thomas Roe, before sir John Frederick, as follows:

The INFORMATION of Thomas Roe of Bernard-Inn, Gent. taken the 3d of July, 1670, by sir John Frederick, Alderman, one of His Majesty's Justices of Peace in the City of London, upon Oath, as followeth:

Thomas Roe saith, that he hath for at least 12 or 13 years last past been acquainted with one Joseph Harrison, who was examined lately at the Guild-hall, London, before the honourable the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, upon suspicion of his being a conspirator in the firing the city and suburbs in several parts thereof.

Thomas Roe, and Joseph Harrison, having been school-fellows at Eton College, and being thereby acquainted; Joseph Harrison hath several times lately been with him, and advised him to with-draw his concerns, and remove above twenty miles out of the city; for that the city, and twenty miles round, would be suddenly destroyed and laid waste (or to that purpose.) Whereupon Thomas Roe asked him, Whether he were privy to any such conspiracy, or concerned in its agitation? pressing him with divers arguments to discover what he was acquainted with of that kind. Harrison replied, That he had no personal and positive knowledge thereof. Thomas Roe demanded upon what ground then he did thus advise him? Joseph Harrison replied, That he was sometimes conversant among some Papists, and perceived a plot or design was carrying on by them against the city of London, and the Protestant Religion; which plot or design, said he, the Papists call, The Game of Trap, or, do you understand Trap ad Crucem, which is the watch-word amongst them. Further, Joshua Harrison said, that he was informed of those things by some German Protestants, and that he had offers of 50*l.* per annum, made him by some Jesuits and Papists to turn to their religion; but he had refused it, and would not embrace the Romish religion.

Thomas Roe further saith, That above five weeks since, he walked through New-Cheapside, and from thence into Mark-Lane, with Joseph Harrison, in company with Mr. Mosely (a gentleman belonging to Bernard-Inn likewise) and one of his acquaintance, together with another man, a stranger to Thomas Roe. Upon their first associating, Harrison said unto him, That he would not discover himself to be an Englishman, but pretend himself to be a German or Italian (whether of the two he doth not well remember) and that he might not detect himself, spake in the Company as occasion offered in Latin. But leaving the place where they tarried in Mark-laue, going towards Bishopsgate-street, Mr. Harrison told Mr. Roe secretly, That he believed that Mr. Mosely understood the Game of Trap by some signs he had observed from him, and that he would try him. Then going altogether into a house, about the end of Threadneedle-street, Mr. Harrison (having by this time discovered himself to be an Englishman, said Trap, and made a cross over his face with his finger, directing himself to Mr. Mosely: Whereupon Mr. Mosely did also say Trap, crossing his forehead and face two or three times, and with a quick motion drew his finger over his own throat. Upon which Mr. Roe asked Mr. Mosely what was the meaning of Trap? But he refused to tell. Mr. Roe urging him again, He replied, He would not; saying, You are not of my religion. Then Mr. Mosely asked Mr. Harrison what his name was? (for he knew him not by name) he answered, Harrison. Mr. Mosely replied, I never saw your name. Mr. Harrison made answer, It is Don Olanso del Harrisonio; if so, saith Mr. Mosely, I have seen your name.

After this, Mr. Mosely and the other stranger being parted, and Mr. Roe and Mr. Harrison being alone: said Harrison, I told you Mr. Mosely did understand Trap; you may see there is a list of the Trap-Gamesters. Now whether Mr. Mosely's imitation of Mr. Harrison was feigned or real, Mr. Roe could not distinguish: But as they two were passing through Cheapside homewards, Mr. Harrison looking upon the New-Buildings, said, To what purpose do they build this poor city, it will be again destroyed; at the same time he pointed at two several persons, saying, That is a Trap-Gamester, and there goes another Trap-Gamester.

Mr. Roe further informs, That since the last Term, Mr. Harrison told him, he would write all the rogueries of the Trap-Game and Gamesters in a Play; and that he would undertake to shew him 26 papists meetings in and about the city and suburbs of London; but, said he, some of them are very private, and if you be discovered not to be a papist, (you will peradventure) be poisoned or stabbed.

Mr. Roe doth further say, That when the said Harrison advised him to remove with all his concerns about 20 miles from London, that the said Roe asked him if Windsor were not far enough, it being both their native place, and about the distance? The said Harrison answered, Not; reflecting upon the Castle. And further, Harrison told Mr. Roe that the jesuits could, by a composition of ingredients, make such a matter, the fume of which would corrupt any man's intellects; and that he the said Harrison could do it.

A Scotchman pretending great respect he had for William Colburne aforesaid, came to him and advised him, That by all means he should remove his goods out of London, and dispose of his house. William Colburne asked him, For what reason? The Scotchman replied, Because that he, with many others, were employed to set the remainder of London on fire; and that they would set it on fire in several places at one time: And Chancery-lane end (which is near the aforesaid Colburne's house (they intended to set first on fire. Upon which, William Colburne apprehended him; and being brought to his trial, he was sentenced to stand in the pillory; and did accordingly, three times; once at the end of Chancery-lane, and twice in, or about the Old Exchange.

Much more might be said, but that our aim is, to be as brief as is consistent with the truth of the matter of fact in our narrative. Therefore we refer any that desire further satisfaction, in every particular, to William Colburne aforesaid, who will fully inform them.

An Account of the Firing of Mr. Delanoy's house, near Pepper-alley, in Southwark, January 1666-7, by John Satterthwait, a Papist, as appears by the oath of Margaret Clarke, then servant to Mr. Delanoy, who was in by the said Satterthwait, to assist him in the burning of her master's house, and suffered death for the same.

I Margaret Clarke, being shortly to suffer death for that which I have deserved, and am much humbled for, and desire to lie low before God, under the sense of my own guilt, do give the world an account of the truth of my case; for I would not be guilty of a lie, now I am to appear before my Judge within a few minutes. Therefore I do say, and shall declare the truth of the matter, as I shall answer it before my Lord and Judge.

Upon the 26th of January 1666-7, John Satterthwait came to me, as I was going out of my master's gate, and did desire me to tell him whether my master and mistress were at home? And I answered him, No. And he told me, That he hoped he should have an opportunity to speak with me, for he had something to say. And I answered him, if he had any thing to say, I should be so civil to give him the hearing when I had time (for then I was in haste.) Then he came, the next day, with the same request; and I returned the answer. Then the third time being Wednesday, he came again, and used great importunity; and expressed some kindnesses, as if he had been a suitor; and prevailed with me to go into the Borough with him to an ale-house, where were two men more of his company: And after some little discourse, he propounded to me this wicked and horrid design, which I was to have been engaged in with them; that is, to let them into my master's house, to set it on fire: And for a reward, they promised me 2,000*l.*; which sum I was to receive at the Fleece-Tavern in Holborn, enquiring for a room in the said Tavern, called the figure 9. Then coming out of the ale-house, they would have had me away with them; saying, Come let us take coach, and go into Fleet-street; for, said they, there we have a priest of ours, who lodges at a grocer's, that shall confess you, and give you the sacrament. I told him, I could not possibly go then.

So this John Satterthwait went homewards with me, almost to my master's house, and as we went along, he charged me that I should not divulge it to any person in the world living; for if I did, I should certainly die for it (and that quickly) in this world, and be damned in the other.

Then he came on the next day, and gave me the same charge to keep it secret.

And then, on Saturday he came and enquired of me, the best time that he might come to do this most horrid and devilish action; saying, Would not 4 or 5 of the clock be a good time? And I said, Yes.

Accordingly he came, and conveyed himself into the dye-house, or thereabout, while 9 or 10 of the clock that evening; about which time the fire was discovered.

Whereupon, with the fear and dread he had put upon me, I did deny it to the company that came in to quench it; but after that, he was there, whom I saw amongst the rest of the company: But I had much horror upon my conscience, and after some short time, I confessed the whole crime, for which I now die. And my examination before justice Reading, and justice Freeman was all true.

And this I affirm, and do desire all Protestants to believe, that John Satterthwait kindled those three fires in my master's house: First, in the dye-house, by the pump: Secondly, in the buttry; and thirdly in the garret. Which last fire he kindled, whilst the people were putting out the other.

See the large account of this, called, 'A Warrant to Servants, and a Caution to Protestants,' printed in the year 1680.

An Account of the firing Mr. Robert Bird's house, in Fetter-lane, April the 10th, 1679, by the persuasion of Nicholas Stubbs, a Papist.

Elizabeth Orley, servant to Mr. Robert Bird, upon her examination saith, That about Michaelmas last, she was acquainted with Nicholas Stubbs, who had several times used many persuasions to turn her Papist; and after her shewing a liking to it, and that he supposed she embraced that persuasion, in his discourse to her at several times, he told her, that before the 28th of June next, she should see all the Protestants destroyed that were in England; that the Pope should be king over England, that all that would turn to the Popish religion should live far better than now they did; that all the land were heretics, and it were a meritorious act to destroy them; and that all such as were Papists should have marks upon their hats whereby to distinguish them from Protestants, that they might not be destroyed amongst them: Adding, that the nation do believe that all things will be over before the 23d day of June, but they would be deceived, for all should be destroyed at or before that time. That the duke of York was the bravest prince living, and that he was gone out of the kingdom lest the hereticks should cut off his head, and he would not return till they were destroyed; that the lords in the Tower would not one of them suffer, for they would come off well enough, being to be tried by the lords; and that the scaffolds were set up for fashion sake. That she telling the said Stubbs that she was hired to live with one Mr. Bird about the middle of Fetter-lane, he used persuasions to her at several times to set fire on her master's house; telling her, if she would do it, he would give her 5*l*. and gave her half a crown, and said, he would have other houses in Holborn fired at the same time by others: That she being with the said Stubbs on Sunday before the said fire, promised to fire her master's house on Thursday or Friday night following, and accordingly on Thursday night she took a candle and set fire to her master's papers in his study, which were in a kind of a press; and they being on a light fire, she shut the doors and went up stairs into her own chamber in the top of the house, and packed up her own things, and undressed herself, lest her master should suspect her, and there stayed till a great knocking was at the door, and the watch-men crying out fire; whereupon she run down stairs and cried fire, and her master gave her the keys to open the door; which done, all hands were employed to quench the fire. And she saith, she did not set fire on her master's house out of any malice to him, nor with intent to rob him, but merely to carry on the design which Stubbs had proposed to her, and out of hopes of his reward.

Nicholas Stubbs upon his examination, owns, and sets forth to have used discourses to the said Elizabeth as she declareth in her examinations; and saith, he did persuade her to fire her master's house, and was to give her five guineas for doing it, besides half a crown in hand: And saith, that one father Gyfford a Priest and his confessor had put him upon this business, and told him it was no sin to fire all the houses of heretics and hugonots.

That he acquainted Flower alias Darby, and one Roger another Irishman that lodged at the Coach and Horses in the same street. That the said father Gyfford promised him 100*l*. for the same, and told him he was to have the money from the church. That they used to meet the said Gyfford and the other two persons in St. James fields in the dark of the evening, and to discourse of these matters; and that the several informations that he had given the said Elizabeth Oxley, he had from the said father Gyfford; and saith Flower and Roger told the said Stubbs, they would carry on the said fire, and that they had fire balls for that purpose, and that they would fire other houses in Holborn at the same time: That he was at the fire in the Temple, but was not engaged to do any thing in it. And said, that Gyfford told him that there were English, French and Irish Roman Catholics enough in London to make a very good army; and that the king of France was coming with 60,000 men under pretence to shew the dauphin his dominions; but it was to lay his men at Diep, Bulloign, Calais and Dunkirk, to be in an hour's warning to be landed in England, and he doubted not but it would be by the middle of June, and by that time all the Catholics here will be in readiness; all were to rise in order to bring him in. That the papists here were to be distinguished by marks in their hats; that the said father Gyfford doubted not but he should be an abbot or a bishop, when the work was over, for the good service he hath done. That at their meeting father Gyfford used to tell them, it was no more sin to kill a heretic than a dog, and that they did God good service in doing what mischiefs they could by firing their houses. That it was well sir Edmondbury Godfrey was murdered, for he was their devilish enemy; that Coleman was a saint in heaven for what he had done. And saith, he is fearful he shall be murdered for this confession, father Gyfford having sworn him to secrecy, and told him he should be damned if he made any discovery, and should be sure to be killed; and that he should take the oaths, because he was a house-keeper; and that it was no sin. And saith, that Gyfford and Roger — told him when their forces meet, about the middle of June, then have at the —.

Round the Pedestal.

This Pillar was set up in perpetual remembrance of the most dreadful Burning of this City; begun and carried on by the treachery and malice of the Popish Faction, in the beginning of September, in the year of our Lord 1666, in order to the effecting this horrid Plot, for the extirpating the Protestant Religion, and English Liberties, and to introduce Popery and Slavery.

To which Pope alludes in his opening of the story of Sir Balaam:

“—London’s column pointing to the skies,
Like a tall Bully lifts its head and lies.”

November 13, 1667.

A REPORT being made to the House of Commons by Sir Robert Brookes, from the Committee of Miscarriages, in reference to Commissioner Pett; Resolved, &c. “That the matter concerning Commissioner Pett be recommitted to the committee appointed to inquire after the Miscarriages of the late War; to hear such witnesses, as shall be offered to them; and to expedite their report.”

November 14.

A motion being made, and a debate arising, upon the vote made yesterday, for recommitting the matter concerning Commissioner Pett to the Committee appointed to inquire after Miscarriages, to hear such witnesses as should be offered, and expedite their report; Resolved &c. “That leave be given to speak against the Order made yesterday, concerning Commissioner Pett.—That the Order made yesterday, concerning Commissioner Pett, be discharged.—That it be referred to the committee appointed to examine Miscarriages to draw up an Impeachment against Commissioner Pett, upon the whole matter before them.”

November 28.

Sir Robert Brookes reports Articles of Impeachment agreed on by the committee appointed.

pointed to inquire into Miscarriages, against Commissioner Pett, late one of the Commissioners of his majesty’s navy; which he read; and after delivered the same in at the clerk’s table.

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT of several High Crimes and Misdemeanours against PETER PETT, Gentleman.

December 19.

The Articles of Impeachment against Peter Pett gentleman were severally agreed to; and are as followeth, viz.

“I. That the said Peter Pett, being one of the Commissioners of the Navy, especially authorized and intrusted with the charge and care of his majesty’s yard stores, and provisions, and the Navy royal, at Chatham; and having received orders from his royal highness the duke of York, Lord High Admiral of England, about the 26th day of March, requiring him, in pursuance of his trust, to bring and moor his majesty’s ship, called the Royal Charles, and other ships did, contrary to his trust and orders, wilfully neglect and refuse so to do: whereby the said ship, being one of the most important strength of this kingdom, became lost, and made a prey to the enemy.

“II. That his majesty having, upon the 11th of June last, appointed the duke of Albemarle Captain General of all his majesty’s Armies and land forces, to repair to Chatham, upon the invasion of the Dutch, to secure his majesty's ships and forts there; he the said Lord General did repair thither on the 11th of June: where, finding the said Royal Charles not brought up, but lying below, in a place of danger, subject to be surprized by the enemy who had then invaded the kingdom, and entered into the rivers Thames and Medway, he the said Lord General gave present orders to the said Mr. Pett, to cause the ship to be immediately brought up as high as he could, into a place of safety: but he the said Pett altogether neglected the doing thereof.

"III. That captain Brookes, one of the masters attendants at Chatham, under the care and direction of the said Peter Pett, knowing that the said Lord General had given express orders, on the said 11th day of June, to cause the said Royal Charles to be brought up, did prepare anchors, and other tackling, ready for the same; and desired the said Pett to give him orders for his so doing: which he refused so to do.

"IV. That his royal highness having given orders to the said Peter Pett to provide, and make ready, thirty boats for the defence of the said river, and navy; he the said Peter Pett, contrary to his trust, did not only himself misemploy some of the said boats, for the carrying away of his own particular goods; but suffered the rest to be, in the like manner, misemployed and diverted; and did also seize, and take away, a boat, particularly belonging to Sir Edward Sprague; so that, for want of the said boats, many of his majesty's ships were lost, and the defence and security of the rest was hindered.

"V. That the commissioners of his majesty's navy having, by their letter of the 4th of June signified to him, the said Peter Pett, that the Dutch were out; and thereupon, gave him special charge to command all captains on land to their ships; and to be vigilant and careful in the rest of the charge committed to him; but he the said Pett was so negligent therein, that, of 800 persons, or upwards, that were under his care and command in his majesty's pay, when the Lord General repaired thither the said 11th of June, there were not above ten ready, upon the invasion of the enemy.

"VI. That the said Lord General having appointed soldiers to raise batteries for the defence of his majesty's navy royal, there being few of those in his majesty's pay in his yards, to be employed; he the said Pett, to obstruct the service, refused to give them the number of tools required for the use aforesaid; notwithstanding that he had a sufficient quantity in his majesty's stores; as it appeared, when, by command of the said Lord General, the said stores were broke open.

"VII. That the said Lord General having about the said 11th day of June, sent orders to the said Peter Pett to send, out of his majesty's yards, some oaken planks for the platforms and batteries, to oppose the enemy; he the said Peter Pett sent only deal boards: which were very prejudicial for the service; for that, upon the discharge of the guns, the carriages broke through the planks; notwithstanding that there were in his majesty's yard there, several oaken planks, fit for their service."

A Petition of Peter Pett gentleman was read.

Ordered, That the lieutenant of the Tower have leave to repair to the council; and acquaint them, that this house, upon reading the petition of Peter Pett gentleman, is content he should have his liberty, on good bail, if the council think fit.

April 23, 1668.

Resolved, &c. That the Articles against Peter Pett be ingrossed.

Articles of Impeachment against Peter Pett ingrossed, were read; and, upon the question, severally agreed to;

And the title of the said Articles, and also the close of them, being altered, and some additions made thereto; the title, and close, and prayer of the Articles were as followeth; viz. "Articles of Impeachment, by the Commons of England assembled in parliament, in the name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England, against Peter Pett gentleman, late one of the commissioners of his majesty's navy, for several high-crimes and misdemeanours committed by him.

"All and every of which Crimes and misdemeanours are of dangerous consequence and example, if unredressed.

"And the said Commons by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter, any other accusation or impeachment against the said Peter Pett; and also of replying to the answer of the said articles, or any of them; or of offering proofs of the premises, or any other impeachment or accusation as shall be exhibited by them, as the case, according to the course of parliaments, shall require.

"And do pray that the said Peter Pett may be called to answer the said several crimes and misdemeanours, and receive such condign punishment as the same shall deserve: and that such further proceedings may be had upon every one of them, and used against him, as is agreeable to law and justice."

Which were again read;

Resolved, &c. That the whole Articles, as now amended, be agreed to: and that Mr. George Weld do carry up the Articles of Impeachment against Peter Pett, to the Lords.

It does not appear that this matter proceeded further.

April 14, 1668.

SIR Thomas Lee presented to the House of Commons a second Narrative and Report from the Commissioners for taking the Public Accounts: which was read: and the first Narrative sent from them again read; and the matter of the Narratives relating to sir William Penn, as to the Embezzlement of Prize-Goods, being debated;

Ordered, That time be given to Sir William Penn till Thursday to make his Answer. Also, Ordered, That the Commissioners of Ac-

* Sir W. Penn was Vice-Admiral of England, and father of the founder of Pennsylvania. "From a common man he had grown up, under Cromwell, to the highest command, and was in great favour with him till he failed in the action of St. Domingo, when he went admiral at sea, as Venables was general at land, for which they were both imprisoned in the Tower by Cromwell, nor ever employed by him afterwards." Lord Clarendon's Life, p. 239. He died in 1670, aged 49.

Bishop Burnet's account of the transaction out of which this Case arose, is as follows:

"A great fleet was set out, which the duke commanded in person; as Opdam had the command of the Dutch fleet. But as soon as the war broke out, a most terrible plague broke out also in the city of London, that scattered all the inhabitants that were able to remove themselves elsewhere. It broke the trade of the nation, and swept away about an hundred thousand souls; the greatest havoc that any plague had ever made in England. This did dishearten all people: and, coming in the very time in which so unjust a war was begun, it had a dreadful appearance. All the king's enemies, and the enemies of monarchy said, here was a manifest character of God's heavy displeasure upon the nation; as indeed the ill life the king led, and the viciousness of the whole court, gave but a melancholy prospect. Yet God's ways are not as our ways. What all had seen in the year 1660 ought to have silenced those, who at this time pretended to comment on Providence. But there will be always much discourse of things that are very visible, as well as very extraordinary.

"When the two fleets met, it is well known what accidents disordered the Dutch, and what advantage the English had. If that first success had been followed, as was proposed, it might have been fatal to the Dutch, who finding they had suffered so much steered off. The Duke ordered all the sail to be set on to overtake them. There was a council of war called, to concert the method of action, when they should come up with them. In that council Penn, who commanded under the Duke, happened to say, that they must prepare for hotter work in the next engagement. He knew well the courage of the Dutch was never so high, as when they were desperate. The earl of Montague, who was then a volunteer, and one of the Duke's court, said to me, it was very visible that made an impression. And all the Duke's domestics said, he had got honour enough: why should he venture a second time? The Duchess had also given a strict charge to all the Duke's servants, to do all they could to hinder him to engage too far. When matters were settled, they went to sleep: and the Duke ordered a call to be given him, when they should get up to the Dutch fleet. It is not known what passed between the Duke and Brounker, who was of his bed-chamber, and was then in waiting: but he came to Penn, as from the Duke, and said, the Duke ordered the sail to be slackened. Penn was struck with the order; but did not go to argue the matter with the Duke himself, as he ought to have done, but obeyed it. When the Duke had slept, he, upon his waking, went out on the quarter-deck, and seemed amazed to see the sails slackened, and that thereby all hope of overtaking the Dutch was lost. He questioned Penn upon it. Penn put it on Brounker, who said nothing. The Duke denied, he had given any such order. But he neither punished Brounker for carrying it, nor Penn for obeying it. He indeed put Brounker out of his service; and it was said, that he durst do no more, because he was so much in the king's favour, and in the mistresses. Penn was more in his favour after that, than ever before, which he continued to his son after him, though a Quaker; and it was thought, that all that favour was to oblige him to keep the secret. Lord Montague did believe, that the Duke was struck, seeing he earl of Falmouth, the king's favourite, and two other persons of quality, killed very near him; and that he had no mind to engage again, and that Penn was privately with him. If Brounker was so much in fault, as he seemed to be, it was thought, the Duke, in the passion that this must have raised in him, would have proceeded to greater extremities, and not have acted with so much phlegm. This proved the breaking the designs of the king's whole reign: for the Dutch themselves believed that, if our fleet had followed them with full sail, we must have come up with them next tide, and have either sunk or taken their whole fleet. De Wit was struck with this misfortune; and, imputing some part of it to errors in conduct, he resolved to go on board himself, as soon as their fleet was ready to go to sea again."

counts be desired to transmit all such evidence which they have in the matter relating to sir Wm. Penn, as to the Imbezzlement of Prize-Goods, against Thursday next.

April 16.

Sir Wm. Penn having tendered and delivered in an Answer in writing, as to the matter of Imbezzlement of Prize-goods objected against him in the Narrative of the commissioners of Accounts; the Answer of Sir Wm. Penn was read.

A Letter of the Commissioners of Accounts, directed to Mr. Speaker, was read.

Sir Nicholas Carew reports from the Commissioners of Accounts, that they had transmitted the original depositions and evidence relating to the Imbezzlement of Prize-goods, having not time to make extracts; but had sent a calender to direct to such particulars as did relate to sir Wm. Penn: which he delivered in:

And the Evidence concerning Sir Wm. Penn's Imbezzlement of Prize-goods being read; and sir Wm. Penn, in his place, giving Answer in several particulars which did arise upon debating the matters in the house.

A motion being made to call in sir Joseph Jordan, to testify his knowledge in this matter;

Resolved, &c. That sir Joseph Jordan be called in to the house.

Sir Joseph Jordan was called in, and examined. And the matter to sir Wm. Penn's Imbezzlement of Prize-goods being further debated; the question being propounded, that an Impeachment be had against sir Wm. Penn; the question being put, that the question be now put: it was resolved in the affirmative.

The main question being put, That an Impeachment be had against sir Wm. Penn; it was resolved in the affirmative.

April 21.

Sir Robert Howard reports from the Committee appointed to draw up an Impeachment against sir Wm. Penn, several Articles of Impeachment, of high crimes and misdemeanours committed by him: which he read in his place.

He also reports a precedent, in the case of sir Gyles Mompesson, 27 Feb. 18 Jac. viz.

"February 27, 1620, Resolved, &c. That

'sir Gyles Mompesson be called in to the bar; and Mr. Speaker let him know the pleasure of the house, that, for his offences and faults, he shall, for the present, remain with the Serjeant: who is required to keep him safe, at his peril.'

Resolved, &c. "That the said Articles of Impeachment against sir Wm. Penn be ingrossed: That sir Wm. Penn be suspended from sitting in the house, whilst the Impeachment against him is depending. That the Committee do sit this afternoon, and search precedents touching the suspension or expulsion of members impeached, from sitting."

April 24.

A Message was brought to the House of Lords from the Commons, by sir Robert Howard knight and others: "That he was commanded by the House of Commons to desire a Conference, touching Articles of Impeachment against sir William Penn."

The Answer returned was: "That the Lords have considered of their Message, and agree to give a Conference, as is desired; and do appoint the same to be presently, in the Painted Chamber."

Then the House was adjourned during pleasure, and the Lords went to the Conference; which being ended the House was resumed.

And the Lord Chamberlain, the earl of Auglesey, and the other lords appointed, reported the effect of the aforesaid Conference: "which was managed by sir Robert Howard, who acquainted their lordships with the occasion of this Conference, which would shew itself in the mention of the crime. The accident was in September, 1665, when there was an offer of the greatest happiness to this kingdom, if we had had courage or wisdom to have made use of it: But a bribe was interposed by fortune; two rich ships, the Golden Phoenix and the Slothany, belonging to the Dutch East India company: This stopt the victory; and sir William Penn looked upon something better, as he counted, than danger, the plunder of the said two ships, of which a great part was distributed to him.

"The pretence of excuse was, that he had the command of a superior officer for what he did; and something there was of this: But this should not make one forget his allegiance to his prince, and good of his country; if any officer would attempt a fact so contrary to his duty, and the laws of the land, even a law of this parliament. After he had seized the Goods, he sold them, and (which shewed the unjustifiableness of the action in the opinion of both Buyers and Seller) was fain to warrant the sale; yet all was done with this caution, that the sale should be good, if the king should allow it. And afterwards sir William Penn addressed himself to the king, for an order of gift of those goods he had sold and disposed before; which was obtained. The goods consisted of divers bales of silks, nutmegs, and rich spices. First he plundered, and then cheated the king; for the king granted, on his and others application, a distribution, after they had distributed the goods.

"The House of Commons think such corruptions and mal-administration of those men have drawn on the miseries and necessities of our nation, and produced but an inglorious success at best, after the vast expence of the kingdom in so just and hopeful a war.

"He said, This shews the impartial justice of the House of Commons stops nowhere; that they spare not their own members, but proceed against them in chief.

"Then sir Robert Howard read the Articles against sir William Penn; and after he said, he had forgot one thing he intended to say, which the close of the Articles reminded him of, that if many such conspiracies should escape unpunished, it may be more powerful to destroy the king and kingdom than all counsels and assistances to preserve them."

This Report being ended, the Articles were read, as followeth:

"ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT, by the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England, against sir WILLIAM PENN knight, one of the now Commissioners of his majesty's navy, for several High Crimes and Misdemeanors committed by him.

"I. Whereas, in or about the month of September, in the year of our Lord 1665, the Golden Phoenix and the Slothany, two ships belonging to the subjects of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, were taken at sea as prize, during the late war, by his majesty's fleet then under the command of Edward earl of Sandwich, in which said fleet the said sir William Penn was the vice admiral, and commander in chief under the said earl, in the actual pay and service of his majesty; he the said sir William Penn did, contrary to his allegiance, duty, commission, and the articles of war established by an act of this present parliament made in the 13th year of his majesty's reign that now is, intituled, 'An Act for the establishing articles and orders for the regulating and better government of his majesty's navies, ships of war, and forces by sea, and other good laws of the land,' for his singular lucre, and with intent to share the same, conspire and advise with several persons, to open the holds of the said ships, divers and sundry times, before judgment thereof first passed the admiralty court, and from thence to take out and embezzle great quantities of rich goods, whereby his majesty was defrauded to the value of 115,000*l.* or thereabouts, besides great quantities of jewels and other rich commodities, of which no certain estimate can be made.

"II. That the said sir William Penn, in pursuance of the said conspiracy, did, on or about the 14th day of the said month of September, repair on board the said prize ship the Slothony, in the company of sir William Berkley, then commander of his majesty's ship the Swiftsure, and vice admiral to the white squadron commanded by the said sir William Penn, and did then and there give order and command unto captain Robert Worden unto whose charge the said ship the Slothony was then committed, to follow such directions as he should receive from the said sir William Berkeley; who immediately thereupon caused the hatchways of the said ship to be broke open, and took out of the said ship several bales of Silk, Mace, and other Goods to a great value, and carried them away; and afterwards, at several other times, caused the hatchways of the said ship to be broken open, after they were closed and sealed up; at every of which times he took and carried away great quantities of rich goods, he the said sir William Penn having sent several men on board the said ship the Slothony, to assist the said sir William Berkeley therein.

"III. He the said sir William Penn got a considerable part of the said goods into his possession and converted them to his own use; and, on or about the latter end of the said month of September, or the beginning of October then following, did sell divers parcels of the said goods, and further warranted the sale thereof.

"IV. The better to colour the said fraud and embezzlement, Orders were obtained from the said earl of Sandwich, bearing date the 15th and 21st of September, 1665, for the taking and distributing of some part of the said Goods among several officers, whereof the said sir William Penn was one, and had a great proportion thereof allotted to him, submitted, as was pretended, to his majesty's further pleasure; although he the said sir William Penn very well knew that the said orders of him the said earl of Sandwich were void, and contrary to the commission of the said Earl, the Articles of War, and the law of this land; and afterwards a warrant, dated the 17th of October, 1665, was unduly procured from his majesty for distributing the said Goods, whereas in truth he the said sir William Penn had before the said warrant of his majesty, possessed himself of divers of the said Goods, and sold and warranted the same, as in the third Article is expressed; and further did take, sell, and dispose of, a far greater quantity of Goods than was contained either in the orders of the said earl of Sandwich or his majesty's said warrant, to the value of 2085*l.* or thereabouts.

"All and every which proceedings are contrary to the Articles of War abovementioned, and to the laws of the land, and of dangerous consequence and example if unredressed.

"And the said Commons, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said sir William Penn, and also of replying to the Answer of the said Articles, or any of them; or of offering proofs of the premises, or any other impeachment or accusation that shall be exhibited by them, as the case (according to the course of parliaments) shall require; do pray, That the said sir William Penn may be called to answer the said several crimes and misdemeanors, and receive such condign punishment as the same shall deserve; and that such further proceedings may be upon every one of them had and used against him as is agreeable to law and justice."

Upon this, the Lords made this following Order:

"Whereas, at a Conference desired by the House of Commons, and had this day in the Painted Chamber, between Committees of both Houses, Articles of Impeachment, by the Commons of England assembled in parliament, in the name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England, against sir William Penn knight, one of the now Commissioners of his majesty's Navy, for several high crimes and misdemeanors committed by him, were transmitted from the House of Commons to this House: It is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the said sir William Penn be, and is hereby, required to appear at the bar of this House, on Monday the 27th day of this instant April, at 10 of the clock in the forenoon, to hear the said Articles of Impeachment against him read, and that he the said sir William Penn may be heard what he shall say for himself thereupon."

Ordered, That the Committee for Privileges do meet to-morrow in the afternoon, to peruse the Journals, and see what hath been the manner of proceedings formerly against persons that have been impeached by the House of Commons upon misdemeanors, and make report thereof to this House on Monday morning next.

April 27.

The earl of Bridgewater reported, "That the Committee of Privileges have perused several Precedents concerning the manner of proceedings against persons impeached of misdemeanors by the House of Commons; which they offer to their lordships, consideration."

The Precedents were:

The Case of sir Francis Michell and Foulcs, 22 March, 18 Jac. who, being charged by the House of Commons for misdemeanors, were committed by them before, and committed again by this House.

Also the Case of the Lord Chancellor Bacon, complained of by the House of Commons, 20 Martii, 18 Jac. but was never committed thereupon.

The Case of Norton and Unwood, who were committed upon complaint of the House of Commons, 26 Maii, 18 Jac. and afterwards bailed.

Likewise the Case of sir John Bennett, complained of by the House of Commons, 25 April, 18 Jac. He was committed before his charge, and afterwards bailed by the Lords.

The Lord Treasurer, 31 Jac. was summoned to appear, and answer his charge; and the 7th of May he was brought to the bar, and kneeled, but was not committed.

Dec. 22, 1640, the judges who were complained of by the House of Commons, upon desire of the Commons, did enter into security to appear upon summons.

The 3rd January, 1666, the lord viscount Mordaunt was impeached by the House of Commons of misdemeanors, but was not committed.

Upon this, the House gave order, that sir William Penn should be brought to the bar. Which accordingly was done, by the gentleman usher of the Black Rod; he kneeling until the Lord Keeper bid him stand up.

And then his Lordship told him, "He was impeached, by the Commons of England assembled in parliament, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England, for several high crimes and misdemeanors committed by him; which charge should be read unto him."

Then the Articles against him were read; and the Lord Keeper asked him, "What he said to them?"

He said, "He looked upon himself as a very unhappy man, to be brought up hither upon this account; but it was his comfort, that he should have such honourable judges. He desired a short day might be given him, to put in his Answer in writing; and that counsel might be assigned him."

Upon this, sir William Penn withdrew,

And the House, taking into consideration what he desired, directed he should have a copy of his Charge, and that he should put in his Answer in writing on Wednesday morning next. He being called in again, the Lord Keeper told him, The Lords have appointed him to have a copy of his Charge, and Wednesday morning next to be the time for him to put in his Answer in writing; and asked him what counsel he desired to have."

Whereupon he named sir William Scroggs, Mr. Warrington, Mr. Jones, Mr. Offley, sir Anthony Morgan, and sir Walter Walker, to be his counsel in this business. Which this House ordered accordingly.

April 29.

Sir William Penn, according to the order of this House the 27th instant, being appointed to put in his answer to the Impeachment of the House of Commons against him, was brought to the bar, by the Gentleman Usher; and having kneeled until the Lord Keeper commanded him to stand up, he humbly presented his said Answer; which was read, as followeth:

"The humble ANSWER of sir WILLIAM PENN knight, Defendant, to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him by the Commons of England assembled in parliament, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England, for several High Crimes and Misdemeanors committed by him.

"The said defendant, by protestation, saving to himself all advantages of exceptions that may be taken to the manifold incertainties and insufficiencies of the said Articles of Impeachment, for answer to so much thereof as he this defendant is advised in any way material for him to make answer to :

"To the first Article of the said Impeachment, (doth say,) That he this defendant is not guilty of any crime objected against him in the said first article.

"To the second Article of the said Impeachment, he this defendant saith, That, on or about the 14th day of the said month of September, this defendant did go on board the said Slothany, in company of the said sir William Berkeley, being required so to do by the said earl of Sandwich ; but doth deny that he did then, or at any other time, go on board the said Slothany in pursuance of the said conspiracy in the said first Article of the said Impeachment mentioned, or that he this defendant did command the said captain Worden to give way to, or permit, the said sir William Berkeley to take away any of the said goods, or that this defendant sent any men on board the said Slothany, to assist the said sir William Berkeley in breaking open the hatchways of the said ship, and taking out of the said ship and carrying away any bales of silk, mace, or other goods whatsoever.

"To the third Article of the said Impeachment, this defendant doth answer and say, That true it is, that 19 bales and one half of silk, 10 bales of cinnamon, 12 cernes of mace, two bags of nutmegs, eight bags of pepper, and one puncheon of cloves, did, some time after the same were taken out of the said Phoenix, or the said Slothany, by way of distribution among the flag officers, come into the hands and possession of him this defendant, and were by him, as his share and proportion, sold and converted by him this defendant to his own use, by virtue of the said orders of the said earl of Sandwich, bearing date the 15th and 21st September 1665, in the fourth Article of the said Impeachment mentioned ; and by virtue of his majesty's said Warrant, dated the 17th October, 1665, in the said fourth Article likewise mentioned ; and by virtue of his majesty's letters of privy seal, bearing date the 26th day of January, in the 17th year of his majesty's reign : but this defendant doth deny that he had or sold to his own use, any other goods than those abovementioned ; or that the said goods, so by him sold, were taken out of the said Phoenix, or the said Slothany, by him this defendant, or any other person or persons by his appointment or procurement.

"To the fourth Article of the said Impeachment, this defendant answers, That the said orders of the earl of Sandwich, in the said fourth Article of the said Impeachment mentioned, were not obtained from the said earl by this defendant, or by the procurement of this defendant, to colour any fraud or embezzlement done or committed by him this defendant, or for any purpose whatsoever. And this defendant doth deny that his majesty's warrant, in the said fourth Article of the said Impeachment mentioned, was by him this defendant, or by any other person by his direction, procured from his majesty. And this defendant doth further deny that he, or any other by his appointment, did take the said four bales or eight suckles out of the said Phoenix, or the said Slothany, or that he did sell or dispose of the same, or any part thereof, to his own use, benefit, or advantage. And this defendant doth deny that he did take, sell, or dispose of, any greater quantity of goods than was contained either in the said order of the said earl of Sandwich, or his majesty's said warrant in the said fourth Article mentioned, other than is in this defendant's Answer to the fourth Article of the Impeachment expressed. Without that, that any other matter, thing or things, Article, or allegation, in the said Articles of Impeachment contained, material or effectual in the law to be answered unto by this defendant, and not here in this his Answer sufficiently answered to, confessed, and avoided, denied, or traversed, is true.

"All which matters he this defendant is ready to prove, as this high and honourable Court shall award.
WM. PENN."

Then the Lord Keeper asked sir William Penn, whether he owned this to be his Answer. And he confessed and owned this to be his Answer.

It is ordered, That a copy of this Answer of sir Wm. Penn be sent to the House of Commons.

A Message was sent to the House of Commons, by sir John Coel and sir Walter Littleton : To let them know, that sir William Penn hath this day put in his Answer in writing to their Impeachment against him ; a copy whereof the Lords have sent to the House of Commons.

May 4.

Ordered by the Commons, That it be referred to the committee formerly appointed to bring in an Impeachment against sir Wm. Penn, to consider of the Articles of Impeachment, and the Answer of sir Wm. Penn, and the Evidence from the Committee of Accounts ; and to draw up a Replication upon the whole matter, to be sent up to the Lords.

It does not appear that this Committee made any Report, or that this matter proceeded further.

227. The Trials of PETER MESSENGER, RICHARD BEASLEY, WILLIAM GREEN, THOMAS APPLETREE, JOHN EARLES, WILLIAM WILKS, WILLIAM FORD, RICHARD FARRELL, EDW. COTTON, EDW. BEDLE, RICHARD LATIMER, JOHN SHARPLESS, RICHARD WOODWARD, THOMAS LIMERICK, and JOHN RICHARDSON,* at the Old Bailey, for High Treason, in tumultuously assembling themselves in Moorfields, and other Places, under Colour of pulling down BAWDY HOUSES : 20 CHARLES II. A. D. 1668.

UPON Easter-Monday last, being the 23d day of March, in the 20th year of the reign of our sovereign lord the king that now is, it being the usual time of the Apprentices liberty for their civil recreations, a rude multitude of people met together in Moorfields; where being so assembled, were instigated by some factious persons amongst them; who, to colour their design, insinuated into the rabble the pulling down of Bawdy-Houses, under which colour of reforming Bawdy-Houses, they at length raised a great hubbub; and so increasing in their disorders, in a tumultuous manner committed many notorious crimes. But by the vigilancy of the magistrates of the city, with the assistance of his majesty's guards, were at last reduced: Some of the ringleaders whereof were apprehended, and committed to the gaol for their offences, to receive their Trials according to the known laws of the land.

And having been several times examined, upon confession of some, and pregnant proof against others, by a special jury of several knights, esquires and gentlemen, of very great worth and esteem, of the county of Middlesex:

liam Wild, Recorder of the city of London; these prisoners following, viz. Peter Messenger, Richard Beasley, William Green, Thomas Appletree, were first called to the bar to receive their Trials; where, after proclamation being made, they severally pleaded to their Indictments, and put themselves for their Trial upon their country.

The names of the Jury sworn, were, Anthony Hall, William Knight, Henry Francis, John Baker, Robert Shaw, Thomas Constable, Thomas Jennins, John Nichols, Ralph Bradshaw, John Saving, John Marsh, Henry Kent.

The Jury being sworn, the Court proceeded to Trial.

Mr. North. You gentlemen of the jury, these four, Peter Messenger, Richard Beasley, William Green, and Thomas Appletree, stand indicted for High-Treason; having left their obedience to our sovereign lord the king, and being instigated by the devil, upon the 24th day of March last past, did contrive a design to levy war and rebellion against the king, being at the head of four or five hundred armed and arrayed. If this matter be proved against them, you must find them Guilty.

Mr. Pemberton. You gentlemen of the jury, these prisoners at the bar did contrive and levy war, and fell upon the king's officers, and beat them, and broke the prison, and let out the prisoners, some for felony: Among the multitude these were four of them, as we shall endeavour to prove.

The Names of the Witnesses called and sworn, were Richard Dowson, John Cowley, Henry Bull, James Martin, Abraham Brookes.

Counsel. Sir, pray tell my lord what you saw these do on Easter-Tuesday.

Witn. My lord, I saw this Richard Beasley at the head of four or five hundred; he had a sword, and I took his sword from him: he had colours, a green apron upon a pole. I heard some of them cry, 'Down with the Red-coats;' and I did see William Green there too, but not Appletree.

L. C. Justice. Did they go with the multitude or no, or were they with them?

Witn. They were with them; but I cannot say they went along with them.

Couns. Pray tell my lord what the multitude said at that time.

Witn. When we fell on them, they ran away.

L. C. Just. Did Beasley lead them on?

Witn. They said he was their captain.

* See in the Case of William Maclauchlan, A. D. 1737 infra, and Maclaurin's Arguments and Decisions, 633, an argument founded on the decisions, that the offences in this case and that of Dammaree and others, A. D. 1710, infra, amounted to treason.

This Case is thus mentioned by Mr. Hampden: "A few Apprentices for pulling down Bawdy Houses were hanged for Treason." See Mr. Hampden's Speech on the King's Message of Jan. 7th 1681, 4 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1483.

John Cowley, second witness.

Couns. Mr. Cowley, tell my lord what you saw.

Cowley. My lord, he cut me and wounded me on the hand. The constable charged them to be gone, and disperse themselves; with that they struck at the constable, and knocked him down.

L. C. Just. Under what pretence did they pull down any house?

Witn. The constable and some more of us beat them up Nightingale-lane; I know not what their pretence was: I saw Appletree there, for he was the first that struck at the constable. This was on Easter-Tuesday.

L. C. Just. Did you see Green there?

Witn. I cannot tell.

L. C. Just. Did you see them pull down any house? What did you hear them say?

Witn. They said, Down with the bawdy-houses.

L. C. Just. Did you hear them talk of the Red-coats there? Was Green amongst them, as one that helped and acted with them?

Witn. I saw him in Moorfields on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, shout and throw up his hat.

Third Witness.

L. C. Just. What did you see them do?

Witn. All that I saw, was, that Peter Messenger came along with the colours in his hand, and I took him and carried him to prison myself: I did not hear them cry, Down with honest houses, but bawdy houses: I did not see all those, but only these two (pointing to two at the bar.)

L. C. Just. Ay, That was the captain and the ensign.

Fourth Witness.

Henry Ball. My lord, I saw this Beasley and Messenger in Moorfields, pulling down houses on Monday, and on Tuesday at the head of three hundred; and at that time we routed them. On Wednesday they came with four or five hundred, and cried, Down with the Red-coats.

James Martin, fifth Witness.

L. C. Just. What can you say?

Witn. All that I know is, Beasley made a blow at our ensign, and struck at him with his sword.

L. C. Just. What was their presence?

Witn. I cannot tell that.

Another Witn. I say Thomas Appletree help to pull down Peter Burlingham's house, and broke another.

Serj. Wild. What company had they?

Witn. About three hundred.

L. C. Just. Had they any colours? what did you hear them declare?

Witn. I heard them declare nothing, for I had like to have been knocked on the head.

L. C. Just. To the prisoner Beasley. Well, what do you say for yourself? You hear it is sworn against you, that you were at the head of this rabble, and they called you captain, and you led them up; and when the constable came to command peace in the king's name, you fell on him, and wounded him, so that he is hardly able to be here this day: Why did you gather this multitude together? It will be-hove you to make your answer; what reason had you for it?

Beasley Pris. I do not know the reason.

L. C. Just. I speak to you that you should give a reason: After all this trouble that we have had in this nation, it is a sad thing that a great number of giddy headed people must gather together under pretence of reformation, to disturb the peace of the nation again: if you can say no more for yourself, there will be little trouble with you.

Serj. Wild. What was the meaning of your gathering together?

Beasley Pris. We went to pull down bawdy-houses.

L. C. Just. How did you know which were bawdy-houses? If you had known them, you might have indicted them, there is a law against them; but this is a strange kind of reformation, if a rabble come, and say, This man is a papist, and this keeps a bawdy-house, and would pull it down; this is a mad reformation.

Messenger Pris. My lord, that man has sworn I was out on Tuesday, it was Wednesday before I came forth; but staid at home with my wife, because I would not be among them.

L. C. Just. Did not you carry a green apron on a pole for your colours?

Pris. My lord, as I passed along by the rout they flung a bottle at me, and had like to have knocked me down, and tore my apron off, and charged me to carry it on a pole; and I would fain have come away from them, and could not.

L. C. Just. Make this appear, that you would fain have got away, and that they did force you to do what you did, and I shall be glad of it.

Pris. There is none of them here now that were there then.

L. C. Just. Then all that you say is of little use; for it is no great thing to make a lye to save one's life.

Pris. God is my witness——

L. C. Just. Have a care what you say.

A Constable (witness) sworn.

L. C. Just. What say you of these four at the bar?

Const. My lord, I heard they were pulling down houses, and I did what I could to preserve the king's peace; and that day I did save a great many houses and goods. The next day they were near my own house, and I did endeavour to do the same, and this fellow with his company did surprise my men, and knocked me down; yet I commanded the peace, and they beset me round about, and cut me over the hand: I do remember that Beasley. We were in a place where there were three turnings, but they knocked me down, and beat me so, that I could not tell who it was that did hurt me.

L. C. Just. Do you know any more of this company?

Const. No, my lord: For if the soldiers had not come, they would not have left till they had killed me.

Couns. Had you your staff?

Const. Yes; but they took it away from me.

Another Witn. I saw Messenger on Tuesday, though he says to the contrary.

L. C. Just. Messenger, you hear what is said against you; you say you were not out on Tuesday: He hath sworn you were at the head of a company, with a green apron on a stick, and led them up.

Pris. I was not there.

Henry Bull, Wit. I saw him, my lord, on Tuesday, he and Blasley, about eleven of the clock in Moorfields, and they had gathered a great multitude of four or five hundred, and then they made an attempt to come into our parish, and they cried, Down with the Red-coats.

Messenger, Pris. Pray, my lord, let my witnesses be called in, for they swear false.

L. C. J. Your witnesses shall be called. A little of due consideration before-hand would have done you more good than now.

Mr. Glover and Mr. Bennet, the Prisoner's Witnesses.

L. C. J. What say you concerning the prisoner?

Glover. I can say, my Lord, he was until five of the clock on Wednesday at Mr. Bennet's house in Golden-Lane.

L. C. J. Where was he on Monday and Tuesday?

Glover. I know not.

Bennet. On Wednesday he was at a kinsman's house.

L. C. J. These two witnesses give no account at all of you, where you were on Monday and Tuesday.

L. C. J. Greene, what say you?

Greene. I was not among them.

L. C. J. It is sworn you were amongst them, and threw up your cap. Were you not knocked down?

Prisoner. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. How could you be knocked down if you were not amongst them?

John Cowley witness.

L. C. J. Did you not see Greene in the multitude?

Cowley. I saw him do nothing; but I saw him with a staff in his hand. I did not see him act any thing but follow the colours.

Greene, Pris. I was not among them but as I came home.

L. C. J. You mean you did not take part with them, but you were there; it is sworn you were upon Tuesday following your captain and the colours; it is sworn by Mr. Bull you were among the rabble, and were knocked down: now if the jury do not believe that you did act among them, we will leave it to them.

L. C. J. Appletree, what say you?

Appletree. As I was passing along (my lord) I saw a croud, and I went to know what was the matter, and there came a company down, and some running after me did me a mischief; I did not see the constable, nor say, knock him down.

L. C. J. It is sworn that you were the first man that struck the constable, and that you were at the pulling down of Burlingham's house.

Pris. I did not offer to pull down his house, nor strike the constable.

Brooks, witn. My lord, he was in Peter Burlingham's house, and broke it down so that you might have ridden a horse through it; I spake to him two or three times to leave off, and if I had not stooped suddenly he had struck me down with a bedstaff.

Cowley, Wit. I did see him on Tuesday with their company, and I did see him strike at the constable.

L. C. J. to the Jury. Gentlemen of the jury, you have heard what these say; the prisoners are indicted for High-Treason, for levying of war against the king. By levying of war is not only meant, when a body is gathered together, as an army is, but if a company of people will go about any public reformation,* this is High-Treason, if it be to pull down inclosures, for they take upon them the regal authority; (3 Co. Inst. 9.) the way is worse than the thing. These people do pretend their design was against bawdy-houses; now for men to go about to pull down houses, under the pretence of Bawdy-houses, with a captain, and an ensign, and weapons, if this thing be endured, who is safe? It is High-Treason, because it doth betray the peace of the nation, for every subject is as much wronged as the king; for if every man may reform what he will, no man is safe: therefore this thing is of desperate consequence, we must make this for a public example: there is reason we should be very cautious, we are but newly delivered from rebellion, and we know that that rebellion first began under the pretence of religion and the law, for the devil hath always this vizard upon it; we know that, that rebellion began thus, therefore we have great reason to be very wary that we fall not again into the same error, but it should be carried on with a watchful eye. And because apprentices hereafter shall not go on in this road, we will have the solemn resolution of all the judges, and therefore you are to find it specially. You must find the matter of fact, and we will assemble all the judges together in a sober way, to give their judgment, whether it be high-treason or no; not that we do doubt of it now, for we know it is high-treason, but for general satisfaction. It is proved that Beasley went as their captain, with his sword, and flourished it over his head; Messenger was there with his green apron on a pole in Moorfields on Tuesday, and on Wednesday he was in the same posture again.

Prisoners. My Lord, we would have our witnesses heard.

L. C. J. You shall have no wrong done to you. As for Green, it is proved he was with them shouting, and casting up his cap: now the act that any one does in such a tumult is the act of all, if they all join together. He was on Tuesday following there, and on Wednesday he was taken. And then for Appletree, he was the first man that struck the constable, and pulled down Burlingham's house.

Edmund Bedle, Richard Latimer to the bar.

Bill of Indictment. 'You that are now called, being moved through the instigation of the devil, and having not the fear of God before your eyes, have withdrawn your obedience to our sovereign lord the king, and against him did imagine and contrive war and rebellion the 21th day of March, with four or five hundred persons in a warlike manner, arrayed with long pikes and other arms there met and assembled against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, &c.'

Witnesses sworn. William Badley, William Riggs, John Maldey, John Williams.

King's Counsel. Gentlemen of the Jury, Bedle and Latimer stand indicted for high-treason; wanting that love and obedience that every man ought to have of his king, did, the 24th of March, assemble themselves together, to the number of four or five hundred persons to levy war and rebellion: if we prove this, you must find them guilty of high Treason.

Gaoler of Finsbury Prison, Witness, sworn.

Counsel. Tell my lord what you saw.

Witnesses. I can charge no particular person, I was from home; and when I came home I found the prison-doors open, and they had let out their own company and two others: and I locked up the prison doors, and they gathered together about the prison, and there came their captain with his half-pike, and commanded me to open the door. I told them I would not open the door. They told me, We have been servants, but we will be masters now; and if you will not open the door, we will do your business for you by and by. They had swords, and belts, and half-pikes, and they did push at me; and I came to a parly with them when I saw there was no remedy. I let their captain in, and when he could find none of his company there he went away; but had it not been for the company that stood without I would have kept him fast enough.

Another Witness sworn.

L. C. J. Were any of these that stand at the bar, at Clerkenwell, with a stick in his hand?

Witness. Yes, my lord, I saw Latimer there knocking at the gate, and the p. broke open, and there came down Justice Welsh to them to disperse them; but they let out two of their own rabble, and two of the felons.

Another Witness sworn.

Nine of the clock on Friday, I went to the gate of the New-prison, and they came and clapt a bar in between the gates to open them, and I saw Latimer throwing stones at the windows. Justice Welsh being there would have taken some of them; and they cried, One die and all die.

William Riggs, Witness, sworn. I saw Bedle, and took him; their number was about four or five hundred; and I got out two files of men, and took four men more, whereof this Bedle was one of them.

Judge. What do you say to this?

Latimer. This man hath a spite against me, my lord; for getting up behind the coach, I let my whip fall and gave him a lash.

L. C. J. But what says the other against you? What made you there? And Bedle, what do you say for yourself?

Bedle, Pris. My Lord, I was in Southwark, and came from thence to Bishopsgate-street, and met with a friend, and we drank four flaggons of beer, so that I got a little too much drink in my head, and I stood and looked awhile at the prisoners at Bishopsgate; and my uncle coming along, I went with him a little way, and then turned about and left him, and there was a man came and said, Brother, will you not go and see what they do in the fields, and it was my hard fortune to be among them, but did not any hurt, blessed be God: but I followed them without doing any harm, and they went down Old-street to Clerkenwell; but I did not break the prison, nor do not know where the prison is; for there was a company made up to them, and they began to run.

L. C. J. What did you say when they run away? Did you not say, Face about?

Pris. Your lordship heard so, but I did not say, Face about.

L. C. J. You gentlemen of the jury, you see what their indictment is: they gathered a multitude together at Clerkenwell, and they had a captain with a half-pike, that came to the prison and forced open the door, and brought out two of their own crew, and two of the felons; and they said, They had been servants before, but now would be masters; and they cried out, One die, and all die. And you have three witnesses that swear, that these two were there, Latimer especially. The keeper says he was forced to come to a parly with them, and took in their captain, to give him satisfaction that there was none other there of their gang. Bedle says, he was there, but he was drunk, which is no sufficient excuse.

Richard Cotton, John Earles, William Wilde,

Richard Farrel, William Ford, called to the bar. Their Indictment read.

Sir Philip Howard, Witness, sworn.

L. C. J. Sir Philip, speak what you know of these men.

Sir Ph. I delivered these men into the constable's hands.

Counsel. Did not see a Multitude of these people gathered together in a warlike way? If so, tell my lord.

Sir Ph. There came some sober people and told me that the Tumult was greater than it was when my lord Craven was there, and they did desire my assistance; and so I went into the fields, and divided my men, half on the one side and half on the other: and the people looked upon us so contemptibly that they told us we should quickly be unhorsed; therefore I charged my men not to let any man come within my arms.

L. C. J. Had they any colours?

Sir Ph. They had a sheet for their colours, and when they saw my horse they got into the field, and stood as if they did not fear us; and I ordered some of my men to go and take him that had the colours, and so our men did, and I called for a constable but there was no constable to be found; and I thought myself to govern them, and to bring them into better order. At length this man came with his watch and I delivered them into his hands, and I believe these are the men that I delivered to the constable.

Sir Edvard Fish, Witness, sworn.

Counsel. Pray, sir, look upon the prisoners, and see if you know any of them.

Witness. I cannot say that these were any of the persons that we did take, but there was a Multitude of them gathered together, and we did desire them to go home; and they took up brickbats in their hands, and said, they had as much to do there as we had. I took a hanger from one of them myself, which is here in the court.

Robert Hoydon, Witness, sworn.

Couns. Tell my lord what you heard this rabble of people say.

Witn. There came a troop, and they thought it had been the duke of York's troop, and they ran with brickbats in their hands to them, and said, That if the king did not give them liberty of conscience, that May-day must be a bloody day.

Another Witness sworn.

L. C. J. Speak what you know of these people.

Witn. My lord, they asked if the duke of York was there, and answer was made, Yes, thinking they would have been satisfied and dispersed: but notwithstanding they came up to the Wind-mills, and flung stones amongst us.

Capt. Wilding, Witness, sworn.

My lord, we did desire them, by fair means, to disperse themselves, and go home; they told me, No, They would be with us ere-long at White-hall.

Another Captain sworn. My lord, I was forced to make some resistance, but they flung stones very thick at us, saying, These Life-Guard rogues are but few; and because I commanded one of my officers to seize on one of them, they cried, Knock down the rogue.

Another sworn. My lord, I desired them to go home; their answer was, That we were rogues and dogs, and ere-long they would come and pull White-hall down: and their word was, Hey, now or never.

Constable sworn. My lord, I had these three at the bar, but Wilde was none of them, pointing to the third.

L. C. J. You say the other were.

Constable. Yes.

Pike and Gillington, Witnesses, sworn.

Pike. I did see this Cotton breaking down Burlingham's house.

Gillington. I can speak of the tall man, Cotton, I will swear he was one of them.

Ld. Ch. J. Sir Philip Howard says he delivered 5 to the Constable, and the Constable says he does not know whether these be the persons or no, but it is the same thing if they were among those that did it.

Serj. Wilde. Yea, the thing is the same.

Ld. Ch. J. You hear the Indictment is for High-Treason, you are persons of the same company, what do you say for yourselves?

Prisoners. We were not there.

Serj. Wilde. The Constable swears it.

Constable. I cannot say, these were they, but two of them, Farrel is one.

Pris. I was walking to Islington, and I did march a little way with them, but did nothing.

Ld. Ch. J. Where were you taken?

Pris. By Hollowell-Lane, and I was all alone, and a horseman rode after me, and asked me, if I were not one of them.

Ld. Ch. J. All the Constable can say, is this, There were men delivered to him from the guard, and this man does not deny but that the guard took him, but he did nothing; but many people are walking abroad in the holiday; it is pity to take away a man's life without sufficient evidence.

Ld. Ch. J. Farrel, what do you say?

Farrel. I was with my father and mother all the holidays.

Ld. Ch. J. Cotton, what say you?

Cotton. I came through Moorfields about noon, and I was taken by one of the Life-Guard.

Serj. Wilde. But you were pulling down a house.

Witn. He was pulling down a house on Monday, I was informed, and he was commonly among the players at Pigeon-holes; and after he had been pulling down a house, he was looking about to see what he could light of.

Pris. As I have a soul to save, he swears falsley.

Ld. Ch. J. Have a care what you say.

You gentlemen of the Jury, here are five men more that are indicted for the same disorder, that the rest were, and we have now a little more discovery of their rising, and we have discovered other colours, for they thought the duke of York had been in the fields, and that enraged them the more, they taking sir Philip Howard for the duke of York; and when they did desire them to disperse themselves and go home, they said, They would not for such rogues as the king's Life-Guard were, but they would soon be at White-hall: but you shall see what a disguise is put upon it: If the king will not give us liberty of conscience, May-day shall be a bloody day. This is, gentlemen, to give us an alarm, that we may not be too secure: And this must be punished as High-Treason, else we do destroy all. I think nobody would have the innocent to suffer: I had rather a guilty person should escape, than a guiltless person suffer. You hear the Constable cannot swear that all those were the men, and some others, because in such a hurry a particular person cannot be known: Except you know any of them by sight, I cannot see how you can find them Guilty; God forbid.

John Richardson, Thomas Limerick, Richard Woodward, to the bar.

Couns. You gentlemen of the Jury, these three that were called last to the bar stand indicted as the others, for levying war and rebellion in Holbourn; you shall hear the evidence, and if we make good the evidence you must find them guilty.

W. Rogers, sworn Witness. My Lord, I found this man at the head of a party, and I took him, and committed him to the charge of a company.

Ld. Ch. J. Was he leading them on? are you sure he was there?

Witn. He will not deny that he was there, but he made no resistance at all; for we had three or four companies ready to surprise them.

Mrs. Burlingham, Witness sworn. My Lord, this was the first man that laid hands to pull down my house.

Serj. Wilde. Mistress, was yours a bawdy-house?

Mrs. Burlingham. No, but they dragged me out of it.

Ld. Ch. J. Was your house pulled down?

Husband's Answ. Yes: And all my goods destroyed, and ten pounds in gold taken out of my wife's pocket.

Another Witness sworn.

Judge. What can you say, of Woodward?

Witn. I cannot say he did take any thing out of the house that I know of.

Ld. Ch. J. I do not you ask that; but did he go along with them, or had he a staff in his hand?

Witn. That John Richardson, my Lord; is a tapster; I heard him say he had made work for us, for he had helped to pull down a house.

John Hand, Witness sworn. My Lord, on Saturday last at six of the clock, I heard him in the red hair say, 'I have made work for you all;' I do not know what he is,

Ld. Ch. J. What do you say for yourself?

Limerick, Prisoner. My Lord, I went up to see what the tumult was doing, for I lodged hard by; and when they had pulled down the house, some run one way, and some another: and I was going to Westminster, and as I was walking up Holbourn, the rest of them were at my heels.

Ld. Ch. J. That was because you was their Captain, and dragged the woman out of the house that says she hath lost all she had. Woodward, what say you?

Woodward. My Lord, Mr. Brooks gave me a black pot to drink, and I staid no longer than the drinking of that.

Ld. Ch. J. What do you say that Richardson pulled down the woman's house?

Pris. My Lord, there was a whore that clapped hands on me, and I wrung myself from her, and told her that her house should be pulled down.

Ld. Ch. J. Truly I see scarcely an apprentice among you all, and I am glad of it there is no more.

Witn. I dogged him home to his master's house, but did not lay hold on him.

Pris. I am very innocent of any thing of hurt that I did.

Ld. Ch. J. Prove it.

Pris. I was alone, how can I prove it? I was not all the holidays abroad.

The Apprentice's Master. All Monday he was at home, and on Tuesday he was at home.

Serj. Wilde. It is impossible for him to be one of them; you might mistake.

Ld. Ch. J. You gentlemen of the jury, in this case take notice: as for Woodward, they say he was there with a stick in his hand. I would have you take notice that there is but one witness: for the other you have his own brags, if you will believe him, that he pulled down a house, you have no other; if you will believe him to be a bragging fool you may. And now for Limerick's witness, he shall be heard.

The Prisoner's Witness.

Ld. Ch. J. What do you know of the Prisoner at the Bar?

Witn. This man, my Lord, did lie in my house, and he did never stay out after nine or ten of the clock: he was at home every night betimes, and did give me all his money to lay up, and he did earn sixteen pence a-day.

Another Woman, Witness, sworn.

Ld. Ch. J. What can you say?

Witn. My Lord, I can say nothing but that he is a very honest man.

John Sharplesse, Prisoner at the Bar.

His Indictment read.

Couns. Gentlemen, he at the bar stands indicted for High-Treason, and stirring up rebellion in Poplar at the head of 500 persons, and pulling down houses in Hatchliff-Highway, which we shall endeavour to prove.

John Harding, Owen Maxum, witnesses called, but came not in against the prisoner.

Ld. Ch. J. Gentlemen of the jury, you know for Matter of Fact you are judges: if you are not satisfied in the evidence, then you cannot find them Guilty. Consider who those persons are, where the evidence have not given sufficient satisfaction.

The Sum of the Jury's Verdict.

The Jury being dismissed to consider of their Verdict, after a short stay they returned, and found as to Messenger, Appletree, Beazley, and Greene, that according to the time in the Indictment mentioned, they were met together in a riotous manner in East-Smithfield in Middlesex, and about Moorfields, under colour to pull down the Bawdy-Houses. That their captain was Beasley, who led them on with his sword drawn, and that they had their ensign carried by Messenger, which was an apron carried upon a pole, and so they marched with their conductor. That they resisted the constable who charged them in the king's name to keep the peace, and struck him, and took away his staff; and that these several persons were abettors in that tumult.

And as to Bedle and Latimer, they found that a great number of people were met together armed with swords, clubs, and staves, &c. at Clerkenwell-green, to break New-Prison there; and had their commander, who had a pike in his hand, and came to New-Prison, and released the prisoners, some whereof were committed for felony; and that when they were commanded to be gone, they cried out that they had been servants, but now they would be masters; and that these persons were seen acting in the tumult, and there taken.

As for Cotton, they found, that the riotous persons were met together upon the 24th of March with a great number of people armed with their swords, and such-like warlike weapons, for pulling down Bawdy-Houses: that when sir Philip Howard with the king's guards came up to them, and commanded them to depart, they refused; and when it was given out that sir Philip Howard was the duke of York, thinking thereby they would be appeased, they were enraged the more, and declared, that if the king would not give them liberty of conscience, they would make May-day a bloody May-day, threatening to pull down Whitehall; and very contemptuously slighted the king's guards, because they were but a small number: and this Cotton was proved to be one of them in the action, and all along acting in the riot.

And further, as to Limerick, he was met with the same pretence of pulling down of Bawdy-Houses, being armed as the rest were, and was owned by the rabble to be the Captain of their Company: That he with his companions pulled down the house of Peter Burlingham, and stole his goods. The rest were found Not Guilty.

The Jury having thus found it specially, my Lord Chief Justice commanded the prisoners again to the bar, to whom he spoke to this effect: That we all now see what great cause we have to bless God, that we live under so merciful a Prince, and so good a law as we now find we do live under; and that not only one Prince hath been so merciful, but such has been the graciousness of other former kings of England, that we shall rarely find any severity used in the execution of penal statutes, where any fair means (which constantly hath been used) could have any effect at all. That our justice is not privately but publicly administered in the sight of all people, like a beacon that gives warning to all; so that all might take notice thereof, and avoid the like danger that others have fallen into. That the prisoners more especially ought to bless God, and seriously to reflect within themselves this great mercifulness of our king, and law: for hereby they see they have not been served so as they have served others (for then upon the very apprehending of them they might have received their execution;) but contrariwise, they have had a fair trial, not by strangers, but by their own country and neighbours, having had the liberty to speak what they could for themselves, and witnesses for them, so that if it were possible all might have been found innocent; and he heartily wished all could have been so found; and that some, blessed be God, are not found Guilty, and to them he hoped this would be a sufficient warning, &c.

Now as to all these eight, against whom the Verdict was specially found, the Court took further time (because they would advise thereof) before they would give their judgment whether High-Treason or no, it being declared by my Lord Chief Justice to be matter of law; and in the mean time these persons are to remain in safe custody in his majesty's gaol at Newgate.

And for the other six, viz. John Earls, William Wilks, Richard Woodward, Richard Farrel, John Richardson, William Ford; The Jury found them Not Guilty, and so acquitted them of the offence whereof they stood charged, who after several admonitions by the Court for their future good behaviour, were discharged.

* Foster who considers at some length most of the cases of this class (Disc. 1. ch. 2) does not enter into any of the particulars of this case of Messenger and others, nor does he mention it by name.

With respect to the universality or generality of intention which has been held to give king Charles 2, several dissolute persons having on Easter Tuesday and Wednesday next before assembled together, and led by persons whom they called captains, and having co-

to such riotous proceedings as had been had in this case the character of treason, it may be observed, that Messenger and his associates, and likewise Dammaree and his associates (See the Case, A. D. 1710, infra) do appear to have intended to destroy all houses of a particular description which were in their neighbourhood or at which they could easily get, as in the Weaver's Case, it appears that the offenders intended to destroy all engines of a particular description which were in their neighbourhood, or at which they could easily get, but in neither of the Cases does it appear that the offenders in general had any thought of hostility towards the princes respectively upon the throne, or towards their respective governments. It may therefore seem to be not easy to reconcile with the decisions, in the Cases of Messenger and others, and of Dammaree and others, which are approved by Foster, the opinion of five of the judges, which likewise is approved by Foster, that the offence in the Weavers' Case was not Treason. This last Case was as follows:

“ A great number of the weavers in and about London, being offended at the engine-loom, (which are instruments, that have been used above these sixty years,) because thereby one man can do as much in a day, as near 20 men without them, and by consequence can afford his ribbands at a much cheaper rate, after attempts in parliament and elsewhere to suppress them, did agree among themselves to rise and go from house to house to take and destroy the engine-loom; in pursuance of which they did on the 9th, 10th, and 11th of this instant, August assemble themselves in great numbers at some places to an hundred, at others to four hundred, and at others, particularly at Stratford-Bow, to about fifteen hundred.

“ They did in a most violent manner break open the houses of many of the king's subjects, in which such engine-loom were, or were by them suspected to be, they took away the engines, and making great fires burnt the same, and not only the looms, but in many places the ribbands made thereby, and several other goods of the persons whose houses they broke open; this they did not in one place only, but in several places and counties, viz. Middlesex, London, Essex, Kent, and Surrey, in the last of which, viz. at Southwark they stormed the house of one Thomas Bybby, and though they were resisted and one of them killed and another wounded, yet at last they forced their way in, took away his looms and burnt them; the value of the damage they did, is computed to several thousand pounds.

“ This they did after several proclamations made and command given by the justices of peace and the sheriffs of Middlesex to depart, but instead of obeying they resisted and affronted the magistrates and officers: it is true they had no warlike arms, but that was supplied by their number, and they had such weapons, as such a rabble could get, as staves, clubs, sledges, hammers, and other such instruments to force open doors.

“ There was this further evil attending this insurrection, that the soldiers and officers of the militia were so far from doing their duty in suppressing them, that some, though in arms and drawn up in companies, stood still looking on while their neighbours houses were broken open and their goods destroyed, others encouraged them, and others, to whose custody some of the offenders, who were taken, were committed, suffered them to escape, so that during all the time of the tumult little or nothing was done to suppress them, until the Lords of the council were constrained at a time extraordinary to assemble, by whose directions and orders as well to the civil magistrates, as to the king's guards, they were at last quieted.”

“ Five of the judges seemed to be of opinion that this was treason within the act of 25 E. 3, upon the clause of levying war against the king, or at least upon the clause of the statute of 13 Car. 2, cap. 1.

“ 1. In respect of the manner of their assembling, who, though they had no weapons or ensigns of war, yet their multitudes supplied that defect, being able to do that by their multitudes, which a lesser number of armed men might scarce be able to effect by their weapons; and besides, they had staves, and clubs, and some hammers or sledges to break open houses, and accordingly they acted by breaking open doors and burning the engine-loom and many of the wares made by them.

“ 2. In respect of the design itself, which was to burn and destroy not the single engine-loom of this or that particular person, but engine-loom in general, and that not in one county only, but in several counties, and so agreeable to Burton's Case.

“ The other five judges were not satisfied, that this was treason within the clause of 25 E. 3, against levying of war, nor within the statute of 13 Car. 2, for conspiring to levy war.

“ 1. It was agreed, that if men assemble together and consult to raise a force immediately or directly against the king's person, or to restrain or depose him, whether the number of the persons were more or less, or whether armed or unarmed, though this were not a treason within this clause of the statute of 25 E. 3, yet it was treason within the first clause of compassing the king's death, and an overt-act sufficient to make good such an indictment, though no war was actually levied; and with this accord the resolutions before cited, especially that of the insurrection in the north at Farley wood; but no such conspi-down some houses, and broke up the prison at Clerkenwell and let out four prisoners there; were, by the direction of the king's counsel, viz. Mr. Attorney sir Jeffery Palmer, having order to proceed against them, he directed four In-racy or compassing appears in this case, and so that is not now in question, but we are only upon a point of constructive or interpretative levying of war.

"2. Here is nothing in this case of any conspiring to do any thing, but what they really and fully effected; they agreed to rise in multitudes to burn the looms, and accordingly they did it, but nothing of conspiring against the safety of the king's person, or to arm themselves; therefore if what they did were not a levying of war against the king within the statute of 25 E. 3, here appears no conspiring to levy such war within the statute of 13 Car. 2, cap. 1, for, for what appears, all was done, which they conspired to do.

"It seemed very doubtful to them, whether in the manner of this assembling it was any levying of war, or whether it were more than a riot, for in all indictments of this kind for levying of war it is laid, that they were 'more guerrino arraiati,' and upon the evidence, that they were assembled in a posture of war 'armis offensivis et defensivis,' and sometimes particular circumstances also proved or found, as banners, trumpets, drums, &c. and where they were indicted for conspiring only to levy war, yet there was this circumstance accompanied it, viz. a confederacy to get arms and arm themselves, as in Grant's case, and Burton's case.

"4. It seemed very doubtful to them, whether this design to burn engine-loomes were such a design, as would make it a levying of war against the king, for it was not like the designs of altering religion, laws, pulling down inclosures generally, as in Burton's case, nor to destroy any trade, but only a particular quarrel and grievance between men of the same trade against a particular engine, that they thought a grievance to them, which, though it was an enormous riot, yet it would be difficult to make it treason. Vide statutes 8 H. 6, cap. 27, 9 H. 6, cap. 5.

"Many of them therefore concluded, that if Mr. Attorney should think fit to proceed as for a treason, the matter might be specially found and so left to farther advice, or rather that according to the clause of the statute of 25 E. 3, the declarative judgment of the king and both Houses of Parliament might be had, because it was a new case and materially differed from other cases of like nature formerly resolved.

"Upon the conclusion of this debate we all departed, and Mr. Attorney upon consideration of the whole matter, it seems, thought fit to proceed for a riot, and caused many of them to be indicted for riots, for which they were convicted and had great fines set upon them, and were committed in execution and adjudged to stand upon the pillory." 1 Hale, 143.

dictments to be preferred against them who were taken, viz. one Indictment against Peter Messenger, Richard Beasley, William Green and Thomas Appletree, and another Indictment against Edward Cotton, and a third against Edward Bedle and Richard Latimer, and a fourth against Thomas Limerick. All the Indictments were, that they with other persons to the number of 500, unknown to the jurors, being armed in a warlike manner with swords, half-pikes, halberts, long staves and other arms offensive and defensive, with force and arms, unlawfully and traitorously assembled themselves together, and levied war against the king, &c. And first I told them they had not done well to make so many several Indictments, for by that means the king's evidence would be broken; whereas if all had been put into one Indictment, the evidence as to the main design would have been entire against all: and then the assembling in several places to the same intent had made the matter more foul, and would have been aptly given in evidence against them all to the same jury, and the several acts which each of them did, would have come in better. But however we proceeded upon the Indictments as they were; and after the evidence given against the four in the first Indictment, when I came to give directions to the jury, I told them, that although I was well satisfied in my own judgment that such assembling together as was proved, and the pulling down houses on pretence they were bawdy-houses, was high-treason, because they took upon them regal power* to reform that which belonged to the king by his law and justices to correct and reform; and it would be a strange way and mischievous to all people to have such a rude rabble without an Indictment to proceed in that manner against all persons' houses, which they would call bawdy-houses, for then no man were safe; therefore as that way tore the government out of the king's hands, so it destroyed the great privilege of the people, which is not to be proceeded against, but upon an Indictment first found by a Grand Jury, and after upon a legal trial by another Jury, where the party accused was heard to make his defence; yet I told them, because the kings of this nation had oftentimes been so merciful, as when such outrages had been heretofore done, not to proceed capitally against the offenders, but to proceed against the offenders in the Star-chamber, being willing to reduce their people by milder ways, if it were possible, to their duty

* So Chief Justice Parker, directing the Jury, in Dammuree's Case, A. D. 1710, infra, tells them, That assembling to pull down meeting-houses, if the intention be general, is levying war, and is assuming royal authority; but half correcting himself, he adds, 'Nay more, for the queen cannot pull them down till the law is altered, therefore he has here taken on him not only royal authority, but a power that no person in England has.'

and obedience; yet that lenity of the king in some cases did not hinder the king, when he saw there was need to proceed in a severer way, to take that course which was warranted by law, and to make greater examples, that the people may know the law is not wanting so far to the safety of the king and his people, as to let such outrages go without capital punishment, which is at this time absolutely necessary, because we ourselves have seen a rebellion raised by gathering people together upon fairer pretences than this was: For no such persons use at first to declare their wickedest design; but when they see that they may effect their design, then they will not stick to go further, and give the law themselves, and destroy all that oppose them. But yet because there was nobody of the long robe there but my brother Wilde, then Recorder of London, and myself, and that this example might have the greater authority, I did resolve that the Jury should find the matter specially, and then I would procure a meeting of all the judges of England, and what was done should be by their opinion, that so this question might have such a resolution as no person afterwards should have reason to doubt the law, and all persons might be warned how they for the time to come mingle themselves with such rabble on any kind of such pretences: and thereupon the Jury as to the first four in the Indictment, gave a special verdict to this effect, &c.

They find that the 24th of March last, a great number of persons, to the number mentioned in the Indictment, were assembled in East-Smithfield and Moor-fields, in the county of Middlesex, with arms mentioned in the Indictment, on pretence of pulling down bawdy-houses; that Beasley led them, and was called their captain, and had in his hand a naked sword which he brandished over his head; and that Messenger had a piece of green apron on a staff, which he flourished as colours in the head of the company; and that Beasley and he led the company as their leaders; that they did the like on Wednesday the 25th of March and were breaking down houses. That Peverell, one of the constables of Middlesex, having a constable's staff in his hand, came to them with other persons to aid him, and charged them to depart and keep the peace, and thereupon Beasley with his sword struck him, and wounded him; and several persons assembled with him, struck him down and took away his constable's staff. That the said William Green was among them, casting up his cap, and hollowing, with a staff in his hand; and that whilst he was amongst them he was knocked down by a party of the king's soldiers that came to suppress them, and was then taken. That Beasley struck at the ensign that led those soldiers. That the said Appletree was amongst them both days, and was the first that struck at Peverell the constable, and was amongst them at Burlingham's house on Saffron-hill in the county of Middlesex, and pulled part of the house down and the next house to it, and struck at one that admonished him to be quiet. And if upon the whole matter, it shall seem to the court that they are guilty of the offence mentioned in the Indictment, then they find them guilty, &c.

On the second Indictment as to Cotton alone, the jury did find that at the time and place mentioned in the Indictment, a great number of persons, to the number mentioned in the Indictment, met together armed with swords, clubs, staves, and other weapons, under pretence of pulling down bawdy-houses, and had a cloth on a staff for an ensign carried before them. And that Sir Philip Howard, with a troop of the king's guards, found them armed in such a seditious manner, and commanded them to disperse; that they refused so to do, and threw stones at him; that some of them enquired who it was that led those guards, whether it was the duke of York? and being told it was, they presently threw stones at sir Philip Howard who led the horse; and some of them said, that unless the king would give them liberty of conscience, May-day should be a bloody day; others bid kill the guards, and others said, that they would come and pull down Whitehall; and others said, they would be with them at Whitehall, (the king's capital palace) and that they cared not for the guards, for they were but two or three hundred, and they could easily knock them on the head; that they continued many hours till they were dispersed by the guards. That Cotton, who was indicted, was one of them assembled in this manner, and that Cotton was amongst them the next day when they were assembled in the same manner, and was pulling down a house in the parish of St. Leonard Shoreditch, in the county of Middlesex; and if on the whole matter, &c.

On the third Indictment against Bedle and Latimer, the jury find that the day and place mentioned in the Indictment, a great number of persons, to the number mentioned in the indictment, armed as in the Indictment, did meet together on Clerkenwell-Green, in the county of Middlesex, on pretence of breaking open prisons, and releasing prisoners; that one of them who had a half-pike in his hand, owned himself to be their captain; that they came so assembled together to a place there called the New-prison, being a public prison of the county of Middlesex, and then and there said, that they came to search for prisoners: and brake open the prison-doors, and let out four prisoners, two whereof were committed thither for felony, and two for other offences: and that they being charged to depart, replied they had been servants long, but now they would be masters; that some being taken, they cried, One die, and all die. That Latimer was amongst them, and active in breaking of the prison, and was with the rest in the prison after it was broken open; and that Bedle was there, and being pursued by one of the king's soldiers, called out to the rest of the company to face about, and not to leave him: and if on the whole, &c.

On the fourth Indictment against Limerick, the jury find that the day, year and place in the Indictment mentioned a great number of persons, to the number, &c. assembled together on pretence of pulling down Bawdy-houses; and being armed prout in the Indictment, they marched in warlike manner, and the said Limerick led them as their captain with a club in his hand, and was owned by the company to be their captain: that the said Limerick had the said persons to the house of Peter Burlingham, and they pulled down the said house, and destroyed and took away divers goods of the said Burlingham's, to the value of 50*l*. and if on the whole matter, &c.

And in Easter Term following, all the Judges met at my chamber, there being then but eleven. My Lord Bridgeman, who was Chief Justice of the common pleas, being then Lord Keeper, the judges were myself, chief justice of the king's bench, sir M. Hale the chief baron, and my brothers Atkins, Twisden, Tyrell, Turner, Wyndham, Archer, Rainsford, Morton, and Wylde.

And on the whole matter the chief baron Hale delivered his opinion, that there was no treason in the case, because he said that the Stat. 1 Q. Mary, cap. 12. is, That if any persons, to the number of twelve, or more, assemble to the intent to pull down inclosures, &c. with force, and continue together an hour after proclamation made for their departure, it shall be felony; and if those actions had been treason at common-law, it had been to no purpose to make it felony.

But all the other Judges answered, That this was the objection made by some Judges in the case of Bradshaw and Burton,* which is re-

* Case of Bradshaw & Burton, 39. Eliz. [Poph. 122, 2 and 66, 3 Co. Inst. 10.] “At the same time (an Assembly of all the Judges in Serjeants Inn for consultation) it was also resolved by them all (except Walmesley, Fennor and Owen) in the case of one Richard Bradshaw and Robert Burton, who with others lately by word entered themselves into an agreement one with another, to rise and put themselves in arms, and so to go from one gentleman's house to another, and so from house to house, to pull down inclosures generally. And this so appearing, by their own confession or by two witnesses, according to the statute, is High-Treason, by the statute of 13 Eliz. ch. 1. The words of which statute are “That if any intend to levy war against the queen, and this maliciously advisedly and expressly declare or utter, by any words or sayings, that this shall be ‘High-Treason.’” [These are only a few of the words of the Act.] For all agreed that Rebellion of subjects against the queen, hath been always High-Treason at the common law. For the statute 25. E. 3, ch. 1, is that levying of war within the realm against the king is treason; and rebellion is all the war which a ported by Popham in his Reports, p. 122, and there it was resolved, that if any persons assembled with force to alter the laws, or to set a price on victuals, or to lay violent hands on subject can make against the king. But Walmesley and the others with him said, that the statute 12 Mar. ch. 13, 10. That if any to the number of 12 or more, assemble themselves to the intent to pull down inclosures, pales and the like with force, and continuing together, after proclamation according to the statute to go away, by the space of an hour, or do any of the offences mentioned in the statute, that this is felony. So that if these actions had been treason at the common law, it had been to no purpose to have made it felony. And it seemed to them that the resistance ought to be with force to the queen, before that such acts shall be said treason.

“But all the other justices agreed (and so it was put inure lately in the case of the Apprentices of London) That if any assemble themselves with force to alter the laws, or to set a price upon victuals, or to lay violent hands upon the magistrate, as upon the Mayor of London, and the like, and with force attempt to put it in action, that this is rebellion and treason at common law, and this statute of 1 Mar. makes it in such a case but felony. And they put a diversity between the cases of pulling down inclosures, pales, &c. comprised in the statute of 1 Mar. For those are to be understood where divers to the number of 12 or more, pretending any or all of them to be injured in particular, as by reason of their common, or other interest in the land inclosed, and the like, and assembling to pull it down forcibly; and not to the cases where they have a general dislike to all manner of inclosures. And therefore the assembling in a forcible manner, and with arms to pull them down, where they have any interest, whereby they were in any particular to be annoyed or grieved, is not treason. But the case here tending to a generality, makes the act, if it had been executed, to be High Treason by the course of common law. And therefore the intention appearing as the case is here, it is treason by the statute of 13, aforesaid.

“Periam in some manner doubted of the principal case: But to intent to rise with force to alter the laws, to set a price upon any victuals, or to use force against a magistrate for executing his office of justice and the like, he said, that they were clearly treason by the statute of 13, aforesaid, if it may appear by express words or otherwise, as the said statute mentions: For all these tend against the queen, her crown and dignity; and therefore shall be as against the queen herself. And if it had been put in practice, it had been treason at the common law.

“Anderson's Report of this case is shorter, and somewhat different. He says the design was to kill several gentlemen, and to come to London, where they expected reinforcement, the magistrate, as on the Mayor of London, and the like, and with force attempt to put the same in execution, this is rebellion and treason at the common law; and they there resolved, that that statute of 1 Mary was to be intended, where persons to the number of 12, or more, pretending any or all of them to be injured in particular, as by reason of their common, or other interest in the land inclosed, and the like, assemble to pull it down forcibly in cases where they have an interest, or where in particular they are annoyed or grieved, that is not treason: But in case their act goeth generally to pull down inclosures, in which they, or any of them, are not particularly concerned, this act, if it be put in execution by force, is treason at common law. And it was agreed by us all, that the statute of 13 Eliz. which maketh the intention in many cases treason, extends to nothing, but where if the act had been done, it had been treason at the common law.

And therefore all the rest of the judges did unanimously agree, that this rising with intent to pull down bawdy-houses in general, or to break open prisons in general, and let out prisoners, and putting their intention in execution by force, any of these instances was a levying war against the king and High Treason at common-law, within the declaration of the statute of 25 Edw. 3. and for that, besides the resolution in Popham's Reports before cited, we considered the Case of the Apprentices * reported in the second part of Anderson's Reports, p. 4. 5. where it was resolved, that by the statute of 13 Eliz. if any intend to levy war for anything which the queen by her laws and justice there were arms for 300 persons, and to furnish themselves with them. Afterwards divers of the apprentices devise labels, moving others to take part with them in their designs, and to assemble at Bunhill and Tower-hill. And accordingly divers assembled at Bunhill and 300 at Tower-hill, where they had a trumpet, and one who held a cloak upon a pole by way of flag. And in going to the mayor's house, the sheriff's and sword-bearer and others offered to resist them; whom the Apprentices treated with force and violence.

"Upon this matter the question was, if it were Treason or not. And the abovementioned agreed that it was treason by 13 Eliz. ch. 1. That if any intend, &c. And they held that when any one intends to levy war, for any thing which the queen by her law or justice, might or ought to do in government as queen, this shall be construed to intend to levy war against the queen. And it is not material whether they intend any harm to the person of the queen: But if they intend to levy war against the office and authority of the queen, it is within the words and intent of the statute. And afterwards Grant and others were indicted and executed on this statute."

Mr. Luders in his valuable and learned "Considerations on the Law of High Treason in the article of Levying War," after stating these cases as above, says, "I shall consider these two cases together, because the principle of both is the same: Many of the same judges presided, and the same arguments prevailed in both. First, it is clear that the decision of the first of them led to the second as a precedent, and that they arose altogether out of the statute of Elizabeth; and therefore ought to furnish no rule of construction upon the statute of 25 Edw. 3. Whatsoever doctrine was advanced upon these trials, affecting the law of treason defined by this act, was extrajudicial, and as such can derive no support from these cases: Although the arguments of the judges were strained to that effect. The statute of Elizabeth was a temporary law for the purposes of her government, and security of her person, and limited to her life only. Sir E. Coke takes particular care to express this by a marginal note, for a caution that "The indictments and attainders of treason by force of this statute are not more to be followed, because the statute which made them good is expired." The effect of these cases, as precedents in judgment, is likewise extinguished, together with that of any doctrine to which they gave rise. Any opinions of the greatest judges preserved in them only, ought to have no authority, beyond that of any other opinions of the same men upon any other occasion; and are not intitled to the same respect as their writings would claim, because they were not free and

He does not mention the difference of opinion among the judges: Confines the case to the statute of the queen, and makes the principal question to have consisted in the method of proving the guilt, according to that act.

"Sir E. Coke's account of this case, adds the design to get armour and artillery. He says expressly, it was resolved by all the justices to be no treason within the 25 Ed. 3, and that the offenders were punished by the statute of 13 Eliz. In the margin of the page are the words "I being Attorney General and present" [3 Inst. 10.] But in the former part of the case he states, that the judges did also resolve that a rising to cast down inclosures generally, would have been to levy war under the statute of Edw. 3, because the pretence is public and general and not private in particular. He says nothing of the difference of opinion among the judges." Luders.

* Case of Grant and the Apprentices, 37 Eliz. [2 Anderson, 5.]

"After Trinity 37 Eliz. this case was moved before the chief justices, master of the Rolls, baron Ewens and baron Clarke, by command. Divers apprentices of London and Southwark were committed to ward for riots and making proclamations about the price of victuals; some of whom were adjudged in the Star Chamber to be whipped and pilloried. After which divers other apprentices and one Grant conspire together, to deliver those apprentices out of ward, to kill the mayor of London, burn his house, and break open two houses near the Tower, where ought to do, and reform in government as queen, this shall be an intendment to levy war against the queen within that statute of 13 Eliz. And as we said before, nothing can be treason by the impartial, but affected by circumstances of time and place.

"2dly. The reasoning of the judges is ill founded, as far as it appears to rely upon the common law of treason, for a connection with these cases. Treason is to be taken from the statute of Edward the 3rd alone; which not only declared what treason was, but what it should be in future. It fixed the period beyond which the judges should not extend their researches for the rule of law, without first consulting the legislature.

"3dly. These cases are liable to the objection before made to those of Henry the 8th's reign. The principle and disposition by which the judges were actuated, were such as no man would venture to rely upon in Westminster-hall, since the crown has lost its false and glaring jewel of right divine; being founded manifestly upon the notion of an absolute power in the crown. How else can we account for the following expressions, which are current in them, and made essential to the judgment? viz. "Intention to levy war for any thing which the queen by her law or justice might or ought to do in government as queen, shall be construed to intend to levy war against the queen"—"To set a price upon victuals, to use force against a magistrate for executing his office,—tend against the queen, her crown and dignity," "levying war against the queen because the pretence was public."

"This doctrine supposes that the queen by her law, &c. might set a price upon victuals, or level all inclosures. Some of her proclamations did in fact exercise a power of that sort: But is it the law, or justice, or government, of our present constitution, which the Bill of Rights declares to be the undoubted right of the subject? It is with peculiar propriety that the phrase, The queen by her law and justice, &c. was introduced into the case: For these were indeed altogether the sovereign's own, and not her subjects. It was the law and justice of the Star Chamber here, against whose sentence these disorderly apprentices had raised the tumult. The argument drawn from the offence to the royal crown and dignity is equally applicable to every trespass prosecuted by indictment; for the law declares it in those very words.

"I do not mean to class the law proceedings of Elizabeth's reign with those of her father's, for their ordinary course was much to her honour and to the honour of the profession, nor her government with his. But I risk nothing in asserting that her maintenance of all the oppressive branches of the prerogative, was as firm and absolute as his, and more dangerous because more systematic. Her attention to misapportion profits of the revenue is well known; and the forfeitures in high treason, which made a intention within this statute, which had not been Treason by the common-law, if it had been actually put in execution. And see the same book of Anderson, Part 2. pag. 66. and considerable addition to it, were a temptation to prosecute with rigour, at a time when the administration of justice was too much in the power of the crown. Add to this, that during her whole reign, and from the time of her father's breach with Rome, there was a degree of irritation on the part of the crown, upon all occasions of popular outrage or commotion; from the well-grounded fear of mischief from papists and sectaries, under religious causes or pretences.

"4thly. Passing by the objection that might be made to the dangerous practice then usual, of which we have an example here, of consulting the judges ex parte for state prosecutions, the judges were not fairly consulted in the first of the two cases. Only the two chief justices and two others, with the Master of the Rolls, are said to attend upon command. In the second, four of the number (whether in all they were more or less than twelve, does not appear) dissented from the rest. Three of the four denied the doctrine in question absolutely, whose arguments are fair and sensible. They were adopted by sir Matthew Hale afterwards in their full extent, and were enforced by him in his place, on a similar question proposed to the judges in the time of Charles the 2nd. But they failed then in the same manner, being too reasonable for the government of that reign. Although to an impartial mind capable of understanding them in the present day, they afford satisfactory grounds of assent, and of regret for their want of success.

"5thly. Admitting for argument's sake the wisdom and justice of these decisions, and of the extrajudicial doctrine attending them, they do not strain the construction of Treason, to the extent of Danmarea's case. These were cases of armed insurrections; at least the resolutions were formed upon that fact: And one of them had a formidable appearance of regular contrivance and association, widely different from the transports of a midnight riot.

"Chief Justice Kelyng, in the Report of Messenger's case, advances a rule of construction, which may indeed be found in the foregoing cases, by which he would preserve their currency and authority still, notwithstanding the expiration of the law that occasioned them; namely, 'That the intention to levy war could not be treason within the statute of Elizabeth, unless the execution of that intention would have been levying war, within the statute of Treasons; and so these cases become indirectly constructions of the general statute.'

"I think this a very fallacious method of connecting the two statutes, as well as of stating the question. First, because it supposes the intention to be a matter for the judge to proceed upon, as a point of law; whereas it is a question of fact to be collected from the of-

by the case of several persons in Oxfordshire rising to pull down inclosures in general, resolved accordingly; in which case it was also resolved, that if any persons rise and assemble together with intent to levy war, the justices of the peace and sheriffs may use force to suppress such rebels, without any special commission or warrant, and this by the common-law.

sensitive acts by the Jury, not the judge. Thus certain treasonable consultations, or outrageous acts of riot may be presumed by a Jury to shew an intention of levying war, if they were continued; which yet in the first instance, and of themselves would not amount to levying war. There might likewise be some small and feeble efforts made, from which a Jury might infer an intention of rebellion, though they might not be in their nature capable of being executed according to the intention.

“Secondly, because it assumes the unjust and ill-founded constructions of this article of the statute of Treasons, (which derive their only authority from the questionable decisions) to have made the just and true construction of that law; and then applies this as the law, to the fact of the intention, before it is so found by the Jury.

“The prosecution of the Apprentices seems to have proceeded according to my mode of reasoning: For if the contrary doctrine had prevailed, their conduct would have been held to be levying war itself. Yet the indictment against them was confined to the statute of the Queen; and the judges decided upon the intention, which it made treason, from that conduct. Whereas, according to Kelyng, they might have been indicted upon the statute of Edward the third. But the course then taken by the Attorney General, and the resolution of the judges, are a stronger proof of the rule of law than the reasoning of Kelyng. He urges the same arguments in pp. 20, 21, 22, of his Reports, against the opinion of Coke before mentioned, who holds the case of Bradshaw and Burton not to be treason by the statute of Edw. 3. Such artificial deductions of guilt are too dangerous to be followed.

“The next case is Bensted's, reported in Cro. Car. 583, for a tumult at archbishop Laud's palace in 1610, designed against his life, when he was of the Privy Council. It is not necessary for me to argue against this case, because that has been already done by higher authority. Mr. Justice Foster takes pains to prove it deficient, and formally rejects it. [Disc. pp. 211, 213, 345.] He is so far on my side in this argument. Yet to me it seems as reasonable in its principles as any of the foregoing, and perhaps better intitled to rank as a precedent; because of later date, and founded, as we may presume, on a consideration of them. Then by not depending on a temporary statute, it becomes a more direct decision upon the statute of Edward the third. Nor can I see why it should be less respected than Messenger's case, if that is to hold; for the Judges of the latter expressly approved of it. Sir Matthew Hale refers to it without censure, [1. Hal. P. C. 141, 152.] and with as much respect as to the rest. It happened during his practice at the bar, and is noticed in abstract in the proper section of his common-place book, which I have seen.

“Thomas Bensted, die Jovis post clausum termini, was indicted and arraigned before special Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer in Southwark, wherein all the justices and barons were in commission and present. At which time upon conference with all the justices it was resolved, First that going to Lambeth house in warlike manner, to surprise the Archbishop, who was a Privy Counsellor, (it being with drums and a multitude, as the indictment was, to the number of 300 persons) was Treason.”

“It is not said of what species of treason, and is as good for the first clause of the statute, as the second. Foster in treating of another point of this case (p. 345.) says it was for levying war, but does not refer to his authority.

“The rest of the report relates to other matters; but shews a strange negligence in the reporter, who was one of those judges. He makes one of the points resolved, to arise out of a statute; whereas it was a case in the Year Book: And the statute referred to was not in force, if the application were just. On one of those likewise Mr. Justice Foster disapproves of their judgment. [P. 344, 5. See also 1. Hal. P. C. p. 269, and the note there.] The learned judge, among his objections to this case, takes no notice of the one which weighs strongest with me, viz. That the Ship Money judges were not fit to be trusted with the determination of constructive treason, or of any point of constitutional law, in the year 1640, or in which the Court and archbishop Laud were parties. I appeal to lord Clarendon's History for this part of their characters.

[For the Case of Ship Money, and the opinions of the judges thereon, see vol. 3, p. 825, of this Collection. Whitelocke, in his Memorials, A. D. 1636, has the following passage respecting Croke: “Judge Croke (of whom I speak knowingly) was resolved to deliver his opinion for the king, and to that end had prepared his argument: Yet a few days before he was to argue, upon discourse with some of his nearest relations, and most serious thoughts of this business, and being heartened by his lady, who was a very good and pious woman, and told her husband upon this occasion, That she hoped he would do nothing against his conscience, for fear of any danger or prejudice to him, or his family; and that she would be contented to suffer want, or any misery with him, rather than be an occasion for him to do, or say any thing against his judgment and conscience. —Upon these and many the like encourage-

"This tumult is mentioned by the archbishop in his Diary, in general terms. He speaks of 500 persons there. Lord Clarendon says some thousands. Whitelock, treating of it more like a lawyer, considers the judgment to have depended on the circumstance of warlike manner with a drum.

[The following is Foster's account of this Case:

"It was adjudged in the 16 Charles 1, a season of great agitation, that going to Lambeth-house in a warlike manner to surprize the archbishop, who was a privy-counsellor, it being with drums and a multitude to the number of 300, was Treason."

"This is a very imperfect account of an insurrection which hath found a place in the best histories of that time. The tumult happened on Monday the 11th of May 1640 about mid-night. On the Thursday following the special commission, under which the judges sat, was opened and proceeded upon; and Benstead a ring-leader in the tumult was convicted, and within a very few days afterwards executed.

"It is not easy from the short note of the case given by the reporters to collect the true grounds of this resolution: but the history of the times will enable us to form a probable conjecture concerning them.

"On the 5th of May the parliament was dissolved to the general dissatisfaction of the nation: and, which greatly increased the ill-humour of the people, the convocation was, by a new commission, impowered to continue sitting, notwithstanding the dissolution of the parliament. And the blame and odium of both these unpopular measures were laid upon the archbishop.

"On Saturday the 9th of that month a paper was posted up at the Exchange exhorting the apprentices to rise and sack the archbishop's house upon the Monday following; and accordingly on that very day an attempt was made upon Lambeth-house by a rabble of some thousands, with open profession and protestation, that they would tear the archbishop in pieces.

"It were to be wished, that the full import of the libel posted at the Exchange, in consequence of which the attempt was made, had been set out; and also that we were informed what was the cry among the rabble at the time of the attempt, more than that they would tear the archbishop in pieces. These circumstances, could we come at them, would probably let us into the true reason and motives of the rising, and consequently into the reason and grounds of the opinion of the judges: for if it did appear by the libel or by the cry of the rabble at Lambeth-house, that the attempt was made on account of measures the king had taken or was then taking at the instigation, as they imagined, of the archbishop; that the rabble had deliberately and upon a public invitation attempted by numbers and open force, to take a severe revenge upon the privy-counsellor for the measures the sovereign had taken or was pursuing; if this may be supposed to be the case, I think the supposition is not very foreign, the grounds and reasons of the resolution would, in my opinion, be sufficiently explained, without taking that little trifling circumstance of the drum into the case. Upon such a supposition, the case came within the reason of Talbot's case 17 R. 2, cited by Hale, and I think too within the rules laid down in the two preceding sections. But without the help of some such supposition, I see nothing in the case, as stated by the report, which can amount to High Treason."]

"The case of Messenger for pulling down bawdy houses, is the next in order of time, and the most extraordinary of all these constructions of the law. It happened in 1668, and is reported at length by Chief Justice Kelyng, who presided at the trial. The following is the construction of the statute of treason, established on this occasion, viz. That a tumultuous rising of four or five hundred persons some of whom have clubs and swords, with a green apron borne on a pole for an ensign, led by one with a drawn sword, who cry Down with the bawdy-houses, and proceed to pull them down tumultuously, and beat a constable who opposes them, is levying war against the king, and high treason within the statute of treasons. Eleven judges, upon full consideration of a special verdict, were of this opinion, contrary to that of Sir M. Hale then Chief Baron, who was the only dissentient. The ruling opinion was founded upon the cases and authorities before related. The statute 13, 14 Cha. 2, of the same sort as that of 13 Eliz. does not appear to have been resorted to upon this occasion. The Chief Justice states their resolution in these words, "This rising with intent to pull down bawdy-houses in general, or to break open prisons in general and let out prisoners, and putting their intention in execution by force, any of these instances is a levying war against the king, and high treason at common law, within the declaration of the statute 25 Ed. 3."

"If any of the arguments before urged against the former cases, have induced the reader to to attend and assist the justices in such case, or other ministers of the king in doing it : And Coke, Pl. Cor. 9. If any levy war to expulse strangers, to deliver men out of prison, to redoubt of their authority, he will not be inclined to respect the present, which was founded upon them. It seems likewise to be as obscure as to its external history, as that of Bensted, which for this defect is specially objected to by Mr. Justice Foster.

"The title which it bears in the State Trials is thus, "The Trials of P. M. &c. for high treason, in tumultuously assembling themselves in Moorfields, and other places, under colour of pulling down bawdy-houses." In Kel 70, it is "on pretence to pull down bawdy-houses and break open prisons, and set prisoners at liberty." The Chief Justice in summing up to the Jury says, "These people pretend their design was against bawdy-houses."

"The account of the trial begins thus, "Upon Easter Monday last, the usual time for the apprentices liberty for their civil recreations, a rude multitude of people met together in Moorfields, where being so assembled, they were instigated by some factious persons among them; who, to colour their design, insinuated into the rabble the pulling down of bawdy-houses. Under which colour of reforming bawdy-houses, they at length raised a great hubbub, and so increasing in their disorders in a tumultuous manner, committed many notorious crimes." If we may rely on the short account given of the speech of the king's counsel, they made little or no mention of pulling down bawdy-houses, but most of the falling upon the king's officers and beating them, and breaking the prison and letting out prisoners. The evidence shews that the cry of the mob was, 'Down with the red coats,' as well as 'Down with the Bawdy-houses,' and the most prevailing; and 'if the king did not give them liberty of conscience, that May day must be a bloody day;' and that 'they would come and pull Whitehall down,' (at that time the king's residence.)

"Upon seeing sir Philip Howard at the head of the guards, they took him for the Duke of York, and were on that account more irritated, and threw stones at him. The Chief Justice dwells upon these circumstances, in his address to the Jury. Other parts of his speech deserve consideration—as 'After all this trouble we have had in this nation, it is a sad thing that a number of giddy-headed people must gather together under pretence of reformation, to disturb the peace of the nation again.' And again, 'This thing is of desperate consequence. We must make this for a public example: There is reason we should be very cautious. We are but newly delivered from rebellion; and we know that that rebellion first began under the pretence of religion and the law: For the devil hath always this vizard upon it.' In his own report he uses similar expressions.

"These circumstances being considered, it is fair to argue, that there was something more in this case than the forensic accounts of it import; and that it may have been considered to be an insurrection against the government; at that time become unpopular on account of the recent disgrace of the Dutch war, and the loose manners of the court. The cry for liberty of conscience, may lead to one cause of the disturbance. The king had then lately issued a proclamation upon the address of parliament, against conventicles, which woefully disappointed the dissenters: For they had flattered themselves with hopes of indulgence, after the earl of Clarendon's fall, which was then recent. The earl's great enemy, the duke of Buckingham, become chief minister, is said to have encouraged them in these hopes. Perhaps this riot was the first outward shew of public discontent, and therefore was thought to require suppression with extreme rigour. The Chief Justice seems to have been actuated by some such principle.

"The state of men's minds within so few years after the Restoration, of the Cavaliers especially and their connections, who had suffered severely from popular assemblies, and still felt the smart of their oppression, should be taken into the account. Most of the judges had been of the suffering party. The Chief Justice had the character of a violent Cavalier; an excusable fault in one who had suffered under the Usurpation. But I am afraid he carried this quality too far, and exercised his power arbitrarily. He was accused in the House of Commons, in the year next before this trial, of fining jurymen, and brought to answer for it at their bar. Yet he was only censured in the committee, by a vote which was never confirmed by the House. [9 Com. Journ. 35, 37.]

"The above circumstances may have operated in part, to bring about the decision of this case. But such a decision ought not to have outlived its generation. It will not bear the scrutiny of cool reflection, and is unworthy of appearing as a precedent under that happy administration of justice which we have enjoyed since the Revolution; and more especially under the government of the house of Hanover, which that glorious event procured to us. It is fit only for the Star-chamber, and such ministers and magistrates as a race of Tudors and Stuarts would employ to pervert the laws.

"Sir Matthew Hale's learning and eminence confirm this observation with the force of legal argument and authority. His opinion is worth that of a host of his brethren. He differed from them in this judgment; and if weight and not number will establish truth, his reasoning must prevail. His argument is modestly stated by himself thus. [1 Hale H. P. C.

And Moor's Reports, pag. 620, 621. in the case of the earl of Essex, in which, amongst other things, it was resolved, that his attempt with force to remove the queen's counsellors was High-Treason: and likewise that the earl of Southampton, who adhered to him, although he knew of no other purpose of the earl of Essex,* but a private quarrel against some of the queen's servants, yet this was treason in him, the act of the earl of Essex being rebellion and treason; and so it was also resolved that all those who went with him out of Essex house in aid of him, it was Treason in them whether they knew any thing of his intent or not. And Cro. part 1. 583, in Benstead's case, it was resolved by all the Judges, that going to Lambeth-house in warlike manner with drums, and a multitude, as in the Indictment, to the number of three hundred, &c. to surprize the archbishop, who was a privy counsellor, was treason. And, 2dly, It was resolved that the justices of Oyer and Terminer may sit, enquire and try prisoners all in one day. 3dly, It was resolved, that the breaking of a prison, wherein traitors were in durance, and causing them to escape, was treason, although the parties did not know that traitors were there. And so to break a prison whereby felons escape, this is felony, though they do not know them to be in prison for such offence. Note, That resolution as to breaking a prison where felons, &c. are, must (as I think) be intended only where the intent was only to break open one prison, and no more; for if the design was to break open prisons in general, and they put that in execution as to one prison, that is High Treason according to the books before cited; but then on the evidence it must be proved that their intent was such, and by such proof as satisfieth the jury.

After this Resolution in general, we went to consider the particular cases as they were found upon the several special verdicts; and thereupon it was agreed by all of us, except the Chief Baron, who said he doubted on the main; that as to Messenger and Beasley in the first verdict, and to Cotton in the second special verdict, and as to Limerick in the fourth special verdict, that the matter, as it was found against these four, was high treason in them

134.] He dissented, "First, because it seemed but an unruly company of apprentices. Secondly, because the finding To pull down bawdy-houses, might reasonably be intended two or three particular bawdy-houses; and the indefinite expression should not, in materia odiosa, be construed either universally or generally. Thirdly, because the statute 1 Mar. c. 12, though now discontinued, makes assemblies of above twelve persons, and of as high a nature, only felony. And that not without a continuance together an hour after proclamation made; as namely an assembly to pull down, &c.—And the statute 3, 4 Ed. 6, c. 5, is to the same purpose."

all, and accordingly they had judgment, and were executed: but as to Appletree in the first special verdict, and as to Latimer in the third special verdict, there was difference in opinion amongst us, whether the verdict was sufficiently found against them to judge it high-treason or not. For besides the Chief Baron, who was against all, my brother Atkins, Tyrell, Windham, and Wylde, held that the verdict was not sufficient against those two, for to give judgment that they were guilty of treason; because, they said, it was not expressly found that they were aiding and assisting. But myself, brother Turner, Twisden, Archer, Raynsford, and Moreton, thought the verdict, as it was found against them, to be as full and plain as any of the rest. For first, as to Appletree, the verdict first finds in general, that the number in the indictment were assembled, as in the indictment, with an intent to pull down bawdy-houses: that Beasley led them as their captain; that Messenger had a green apron upon a staff, which he flourished as colours; and then that Appletree, the person now in question, was amongst them both the days, and was the first that struck at Peverell the constable, and was amongst them at Burlingham's house at Saffron-Hill, and pulled part of that house down; and the next to it, and struck at one that admonished him to be quiet; so that here are several acts of force found to be actually committed by him in pursuance of their design, and then there is no need to find him to be aiding and assisting: for that clause, we said, was only necessary to be found where the jury find a person was there among them, and find no particular act of force done by him, but only his presence, there it is necessary that they find he was present aiding and assisting. And for the same reasons we held the verdict to be full also against Latimer, because it was first found that the multitude was assembled, as in the indictment, on pretence of breaking prisons and releasing prisoners in general, which is agreed by all (except the Chief Baron Hale) to be treason; and then they find that Latimer was amongst them, and active in breaking open the prison at Clerkenwell (where prisoners, some for felony, and others were let loose), and that he was with the rest in the prison after it was broken open, and so an act fixed upon him. But although six of us were well satisfied in our judgments as to them, yet when I waited on the king, I acquainted him there was some difference in opinion as to those two, upon finding of the special verdict; and although the greater number of us were of opinion, that the verdict was well found as to those also, yet I intreated his majesty to make use of that difference in opinion to shew his mercy towards them, the rather because we had agreed, that as to four of them the verdict was clearly good as to proceed to judgment against them, and that I hoped would be example enough to deter others from the like practices; and besides it would appear an instance of his majesty's great mercy that he would not proceed to the last extremity against any, where there was not a full concurrence of all his judges: which his majesty was pleased to take very graciously, and ordered me to proceed accordingly, and so they two were spared. But as to Green in the first special verdict, and Bedle in the third special verdict, we all agreed, that the verdict was not full enough as to them,* for us to judge it treason, in them, because the verdict only finds that they were present, and finds no particular act of force committed by them, and doth not find that they were aiding and assisting to the rest; and it is possible one may be present amongst such a rabble only out of curiosity to see: and whether they were aiding and assisting is matter of fact which ought to be expressly found by the jury, and not be left to us upon any colourable implication; and accordingly these two were discharged.*

November 25, 1669.

A PETITION of sir Edward Fitzharris, bart. and Philip Alder, gent. against the earl of Orrery* was read in the House of Commons, containing in substance, raising of monies by his own authority, upon his majesty's subjects; demanding the king's subjects of their estates. The money raised was for bribing hungry courtiers to come to his ends, and if the king would not, he had 50,000 swords to compel him.

Mr. Garraway moves to have the point of time asserted when these things were done: if the Petitioners had concealed it long, then his majesty was in danger. The Petitioners were then called in, and affirmed the words spoken and things done, since the Act of Indemnity.

Colonel Sundys moved it to be taken into consideration; and attributed our misfortunes to monies so disposed of.

Sir R. Carr moves that the treasonable words may be read, and the gentlemen of the long robe may give their judgments what they amount unto.

Serj. Maynard. The charge is general, treason and misdemeanor. He thinks the words are treason. 25 Edw. 3rd, is the measure of treason.

Sir Fr. Goodrick. Words make not a treason, but this is by act 25 Edw. 3rd.

Mr. Edw. Seymour. We have found that a charge of high treason in the House of Commons, is a remedy for the gout. Wonders that the words have been called in question, 'reflecting on the duke of Ormond.' This had never been brought in question, if those had been silenced—Would have him summoned; but if he cannot come, would have his charge sent him.

Colonel Sundys. Would know who the persons are Seymour mentions.

Sir R. Howard. No discourses of well or ill men should come before us, when a person is accused. It is a hard thing these words should have been concealed thus long; no man can make this treason by 25 Edw. 3.

Lord Cavendish takes him down to the Orders. Not proper to launch into any thing that is not in the business before us.

Mr. Edw. Seymour. The charge had not been brought against lord Orrery, if one had been brought against the duke of Ormond.

Sir R. Howard. The earl of Meath came to acquaint him with his business, which he will tell you more of hereafter—Moves that the business may be prosecuted, and that if lord Orrery cannot come he may be brought in a chaise. What way would you go, pray resolve on presently: on 25 Edw. 3rd he cannot be accused; if on 13 Car. 2, it lies at their doors that so long have concealed it.

Sir Tho. Lee. Common fame has made these two great lords enemies. He hopes, by their falling out, the king and his subjects may be the better for it.

Sir R. Temple thinks the words are a misprision of the king's government: words though not treason, may be evidence of treason; if they do design to perpetrate some treason, they are treason: would have the Petitioners called in, to know whether they have two witnesses to prove these words. By too long silence, they might have time to execute their treason. If you conclude it treason, the person must hear his charge read in his place, and his answer, and then withdraw.

Sir Job Charlton cites Pine's case, 'That the king was a fool, and unfit to govern.' The Irish Friar at Lisbon, who said, 'He would come over to kill king James,' was guilty of treason.

Mr. Swynfin would be informed how you will proceed, in order to information where he may be tried, the treasonable words being said to be spoken in Ireland. He must first be heard, and witnesses must be examined. The words may be treason, or not treason, according to circumstance: Thinks it a parliamentary way to appoint some short time for examination of witnesses, and then call it what you will, and draw up the charge.

Mr. Garraway would not have him committed, but heard in the house: would have the Petitioners give security to prosecute, and the member likewise be secured to appear.

* Neither the Petition nor the Articles of Impeachment are entered in the Journals.

Sir R. Howard. If they be trucking witnesses, to keep this in the dark so long, they deserve a rebuke, and at least to give security to prosecute. Lord Orrery will undergo any torture rather than the torture of not answering his charge.—On a division it was resolved, that Treasonable Matter was contained in this Charge, 182 to 144.

Sir Winston Churchill knew not how we could proceed against lord Orrery being a privy counsellor. But it was averred he had no Privilege in that case. It was then resolved, "That lord Orrery be sent for in custody of the serjeant at arms." It was also ordered, That a copy of the Articles against lord Orrery be sent him by the serjeant at arms, and his attendance required, to give his Answer to them; if he be not able to come, then that the serjeant is to leave a keeper with him, to attend him till he is.*

THE EARL'S DEFENCE.

December 1. The earl of Orrery, in his seat near the bar, answers his charge. Because of his indisposition of the gout † sir Robert Howard asked leave that he might sit, which was granted.—The earl began with acknowledging, with all humbleness, the justice and favour of the house, in having the ten Articles sent him. The Articles bring no less than his life and estate, and, what should be more than both, his loyalty, in question; but he has innocence, without which he durst not appear before the House. He should be unworthy to serve his country in this place, should he fly your justice. In some places the Articles are dark, in some places intricate and immethodical. If, by reason of some months sickness, and a spirit wounded with such a charge, he mis-express himself, he hopes he shall be pardoned.

Art. 1. He thinks rather a narrative than a charge. The Charge says not that those he corresponded with were traitors or rebels. It is no crime to hold correspondence with the militia, for if they had power to do ill, they had power to keep from ill; they were the interest the king took care of. Should he say, 'England lies a bleeding now London is burning,' these were words to stir up compassion rather than rebellion. They (the petitioners) accuse him of no bad intention in what he did, and no ill consequence followed upon it.

To Art. 2. "That he gained to his own use great sums of money, to raise up sedition, and told the purchasers, that unless money was raised to feed the hungry courtiers nothing would be done, and levied 13,750*l.* to obtain his end, by corrupt means, which moneys were converted to his own use." Answers, It is not his custom to use uncivil language to any, much less to a courtier. The king will find those who exhibited the Articles more apt to rebel than the Irish interest. There were voluntary subscriptions of one penny per acre towards the charge of getting an Act of Settlement. Is it a likely thing that he should put them into rebellion, and not head them; cheat them of their money, and think to have an interest in them? If this Article were true, he was fitter to be sent to Bedlam than to answer it here: he protests he lost 300*l.* by that business: desires that he who received the money, may certify what he received. It is as ordinary to take subscriptions of this nature, as for the fens. This has been these 9 years, and no complaint made: denies the black list: it is strange that 700*l.* raised voluntarily in 1661, should beget a rebellion in 1663: another penny per acre was raised by act of parliament: it is not likely he should refuse what is given him by act of parliament.

To Art. 3. "Imprisoning of people for bringing certioraries." Answers, If any were punished it was for some insolence done, not for bringing certioraries. Denies letters for non-appearance. He has granted many petitions: denies incroaching upon any man's freehold, unless in forcible detainers. His court of precedence never meddles with it; but they have power to quiet possessions, after 3 years quiet possession. Fitzgerald* was a person who forfeited his estate by rebellion. There was a letter from a high-sheriff, directed to the lord president of Munster, and, in his absence, to the vice president, complaining of Fitzgerald's forcible detaining a castle, and resisting the sheriff's power, defying his power in open words, as if running into rebellion. The lord chief justice of Ireland said to him, 'he was obliged to assist the

* During the Debate no member was suffered to go out, without leave asked, and when obtained, was enjoined by the Speaker not to communicate any thing that passed in the House.—"It was the sentiment of a great and dangerous minister, sir Thomas Clifford, that he should be able to do nothing in Ireland, while Orrery was president of Munster; and this is the secret of bringing the impeachment against him into parliament. The earl having had timely notice of the design of his enemies, came over, and took his seat in the English House of Commons, but being seized with a violent fit of the gout, that opportunity was taken by his adversaries to bring on his affair, and to get him committed." Love's Memoirs of the earl of Orrery.

† "As the earl of Orrery, being scarce half recovered from his gout, was going up the stairs leading from Westminster-hall to the court of requests, one of his friends observing to him that he ascended the steps with great difficulty and pain, 'Yes,' said he 'my feet are weak, but if my heels will serve to carry me up. I promise you my head shall bring me safe down again.' Morrice's Memoirs of the earl of Orrery, chap. 6. His lordship prophesied right.

* The charge was, "That he, by a paper order, dispossessed one Edmund Fitzgerald of a house and 2000 acres of land: slew one of Fitzgerald's servants, and mortally wounded others, &c."

sheriff, and his forces to be subservient to the sheriff, and this in a time when we feared invasion from the French, and a strong place, and the best port in Ireland. Never heard complaint against any man, nor ever hindered due prosecution of law.—To

Art. 4. The Article before was of protecting English, now of an Irish murderer * 'that he should get him bailed, and so he escapes.' If the justice, upon his letter, do bail a man not bailable by law, it was his fault; he knows not for what the man was committed.

To Art. 5. † Has witness to clear this. Sir John Broderick and sir Richard Osborne will prove the action to be voluntary; that land in his possession, and had set it for 99 years.

To Art. 6. † Denies any trust from either soldiers or adventurers, but as a friend to both and a privy-counsellor of England and Ireland.

To Art. 7. § Denies any creatures of his own to have taken to farm the King's revenue. The revenue is openly set at the council-board in Ireland: never saw the lord lieutenant, nor any counsellor, refuse the larger offer. Only the Excise beginning in 1663 and ending 1664 it was not valued at above 20,000*l.* But the aldermen of Dublin proffered, if he would take it, they would give 30,000*l.* rent, and if they might take it, they would secure the rent to lord Kingston and him. The Article mentions not in what kingdom. It is obscure, as if it meant more than it does express. By this they got but 150*l.* a-piece. They had a warrant after a full hearing to set it for 36,000*l.* and they gave 39,000*l.*

To Art. 8. || Answers, He paid arrears to the army, according to the king's Declaration at Breda: knows not to have done it either to those out of the army, or to such as opposed

* This was one John Mac Davey Mulcahill who, being committed by the governor of Waterford for treason, murder, &c. was bailed by a justice of peace (as the Article recites) 'at the earl's direction.'

† Art. 5. This was 'for compelling one Thomas Walsh, of Piltown, esq. to convey to him lands of inheritance to the yearly value of 600*l.* under pretence of procuring witnesses to prove him guilty of the late rebellion.'

‡ Art. 6. This was 'for prejudicing the adventurers and soldiers, to whom the marquis of Antrim's lands were allotted, by granting a lease of a part of them to colonel Talbot, who married his sister.'

§ Art. 7. This was 'for causing some of his own creatures to take and farm several branches of the revenue, at far lower rates than others had offered.'

|| Art. 8. This was 'for converting several sums of his majesty's treasury in Munster to his own use, for ordering payment of arrears for service done for the late usurpers, and for employing some of the guard of halberdiers, who assisted at the late king's murder.'

the king's Restoration: only one gentleman of quality turned out of the army, for being an Anabaptist, a little before the king's Restoration. This was the man that came eight-score miles to discover the plot at Dublin, to whom he gave 100*l.* which he looked upon with contempt, and protested he would never serve any farther, if rewards were offered him: denies the 'employing the halberdiers that were the guard of the king's murder.' He turned out a nephew of his own, who had married a daughter of one of the king's judges.

To Art. 9. * Denies the selling of a foot of land to any Irish rebels: Denies the buying of any lands of any Irish Papist, except 15 acres near Dublin, for which he paid 400*l.* for the convenience of his horses; had the seller of it been judged nocent, he had lost his title: One acre of land in Limerick is valued at eight in Kerry, and his lot happened to be in Kerry, and so his troop after that rate were satisfied in Kerry, according to the claim; but they have lost both their time and money, for want of due claim by the Act.

To Art. 10, and last. † This Article, if true, would strike him dumb with its weight. The charge is general, and he denies it. All these look rather like aspersions than accusations, and so this general Article he must answer generally, No. He, being one of the council, advises one way for the farming of the king's rents; another, another way. He had nothing to do with what the king would do in mercy; they are only to do what law enjoins them. It is not crime, but difference of opinion, he is charged with. The great point is of 'compelling the king with 50,000 swords;' had it entered into his heart, he durst not have appeared here; and he wishes those 50,000 swords in his heart, if he said the words; hopes that his judges will consider the accusers, and the accused. At least it is not a probable thing he should utter such words in 1659; they had then such tumblings and tossings as were in England. He had then sent a letter to his brother, lord Shannon, then with the king, viz. 'That if your majesty will be pleased to transport yourself into Ireland, to your protestant subjects, we will receive you, and do our best to restore you to the rest of your dominions.' This was as early as any. If doubted, the king will clear it. If this be true, and whilst uncompelled by necessity, and out of choice and duty, is it likely that when the king was actually restored he should say these words? Fitter for Bedlam, if ever he said them, than to be here, and is it likely than in six or seven years he should put nothing in action? 50,000 swords must surely be meant English. He has done several services since the words, but no overt act since the saying them. That a man, at the head of an army seven years, should not do some overt act, is strange. That these words should lie seven years concealed is a misprision of treason. Not accused of any overt act, since only men say it. What he can say in point of law will be ridiculous; yet though the words that were asserted, the judges declared formerly not treason, yet he trusts more in the judgment of the house. 'Concealing his majesty's affairs, and advancing his private fortune,' are generals: Humbly desires no more to be done for him than your justice will put you upon; and so beseeches God to direct the house, and withdraws.*

* Art. 9. This was 'for purchasing lands, before trial, of persons pretending to innocence, and then concealing and withdrawing the evidence against them; and for procuring lands to be assigned to himself and his troop, for service done to the usurped powers.'

† 10. This was 'for committing several breaches of trust to his majesty, and tempting the officers of the Treasury by bribes; and evidencing a great ambition and scorn to his majesty's power, by threatening, 'that if his majesty did not confirm the estates of a party, 'at that time headed by the said earl, that his majesty should be compelled to do it with '50,000 swords;' and for exercising high oppressions and extortions; and also for giving his majesty false informations and suggestions.'

Sir Wm. Lewis moved to have the Accusation remitted to the King's Bench.

Sir Tho. Clifford. Would not have the sword of this house of Impeachments be blunted upon offences of this nature: stars, in their courses, do not amaze us; but comets give us apprehensions. Would have impeachments of this nature upon great and considerable occasions.

Serj. Maynard, considering the time, and the thing, if ever it was, and the petitioners must go into Ireland for their witnesses, and this noble lord's reputation suffer in the mean time, would have it referred to the law. One of the king's council once under the gallery, he remembers, desired, in another case, this might be the question. If any man in his conscience thinks this to be treason, let him say Aye.

Mr. Solicitor Finch. There is little foundation in lord Orrery's Answer made, to build upon. We may say by his Answer, that the greatest part is not probable, and some things impossible to be true. He affirms words may be treason, or not, according to circumstance and in a case of blood infinitely to be considered before acted—To say, 'I will kill the king,' ever was treason. By a statute of Hen. 8. it was felony to scatter papers that such and such a man has spoken treason. The words to be treason must be within such a time; for the words should be after the settlement in Ireland; and what need 'compelling,' when the thing is done, and all the acts concomitant and subsequent have been for quiet and settlement? Let every man lay his hand upon his heart. It is an accusation to this house, and from this house; will you imprison upon out-doors accusation? You may have the house, at this rate, garbled when you please. Would have the accusations transmitted to the lord lieutenant in Ireland, where the offences charged were done, and so represent it to the king.

The question being propounded, That a day be appointed for the accusers to produce witnesses to make good the charge, the previous question for putting it was carried, 116 to 114. After which the main question passed in the negative, 121 to 118. It was then resolved, "That this accusation against the earl of Orrery be left to be prosecuted at law."

Dec. 10. Sir Robert Carr, moves that witnesses may be sent for by order, there being, he hears, strict proceedings against persons who come over out of Ireland, without leave, by loss of command: would not have the business lie at our doors.

Col. Sandys. The lord lieutenant of Ireland is so strict upon our members, that, if they come over to do their duty here, others must be put into their commands. Moves that some directions may be given to prosecute lord Orrery; for his being quit of his Charge will be the greatest honour that ever came to him.

Mr. Wild said, that when sir John Morley was accused of high treason, he was to answer it at the bar, and it was referred to the law, but no particular direction given in it.

Sir Tho. Meres. The lawyers, una voce, said, That the charge was Treason; but that question was not in lord Orrery, who was used very civilly; but would not have us lose our justice in our civility.

Col. Birch would not have the thing reached into but in a straight line.—It was then resolved to address the king, that witnesses may have liberty to come over from Ireland.*

* "Though the managers of this affair had interest enough to procure a vote for bringing over witnesses, yet they had more wit than to trust the house, or his lordship, with the examination of those witnesses, and so the matter fell." Biogr. Brit.

"Thus ended this affair. No witnesses ever came, no prosecution was carried on at law, nor was any farther attempt ever made against lord Orrery. Had he continued still president of Munster, it is more than probable, that the name of sir Edw. Fitzharris and master Philip Alder had not been entered, on any occasion, in the Journals of parliament. But when the lion has lost his strength, the wild asses and all the unclean animals of the wood, trot forth from their lurking-places, and cowardly spurn at him." Preface to the Earl of Orrery's State Papers, published by his great grandson,

* "Lord Orrery defended himself so well, that his Charge produced no effect, except opening the eyes of such of his old friends as had differed from him, and who now saw, with how small reason they had taken this step, and how far he was from endeavouring to return it restraining himself, on the contrary, within the strict bounds of a direct defence, as the answers to the charge show." 229. The Trial of ROBERT HAWKINS, Clerk, late Minister of Chilton, at the Assizes at Aylesbury, for Felony : 21 CHARLES II. A. D. 1669. [Written by Himself.]

UPON Tuesday, being the 9th of March, 1669, I went to Aylesbury, and got thither about four of the clock in the afternoon, and about the same time came in the reverend judges, viz: Sir Matthew Hale, knt. (then Lord Chief Baron of his majesty's court of Exchequer, but now) Lord Chief Justice of England; and Hugh Windham, Serjeant at Law.

And upon Wednesday the 10th of March the Assizes began, and in the afternoon of the same day, Larimore, by the advice of sir John Croke, who had then got leave to come to the Assizes, carried his bill of Indictment against me, to the grand jury: Their names were as followeth, John Hill, Samuel Grange, Richard Cokeman, Jacob Sale, Thomas Redding, Thomas Berringer, Clement Summerford, John Winter, John Burnham, Ralph Rice, Jonathan Tomlins, William Barret, John Butterfield, William Pedder, John Fosket, John Sare, John Merydale, Robert Worrel, George Wells, in all 19.

These were the gentlemen of the Grand Inquest for the body of the county of Buckingham, and unto them the aforesaid Larimore exhibited his Bill of Felony against me; the sum and substance of it was as followeth:

'The Grand Inquest of our sovereign lord the king upon their sacred oaths present, that Robert Hawkins, late of Chilton, in the county aforesaid, clerk, did upon the 18th Sept. in the 20th year of the reign of our sovereign lord Charles the 2d, by the grace of God, &c. with force and arms, &c. at Chilton aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, two gold rings, each of them at the value of 10s.; one white Holland apron, of the value of 1s. 6d.; two pieces of gold, each of them at the value of 10s., and 19s. in silver, of the goods and chattels of Henry Larimore, in the parish and county aforesaid, then and there being found, then and there feloniously he did steal, take, and carry away, contrary to the peace, &c.'

This Bill was signed by the grand jury, Billa Vera, and returned to my lord chief baron Hale, who then sat on the crown's side, or upon life and death, about six of the clock at night.

Upon Thursday the 11th of March, 1669, my lord chief baron came to the hall about eight of the clock in the morning, and the court being set, I rendered myself willing to be tried according to the laws of this kingdom. And when the clerk of the assizes saw me bow to the court, he then informed my lord, and said, This is Mr. Hawkins, who stands indicted for felony; and then the clerk of the Arraignments read the bill, which was signed and returned, as aforesaid; and then I was set to the bar, without any other prisoners.

Clerk of the Arraignments said, Robert Hawkins, hold up thy hand, which I then did, and then the clerk read the indictment against me as followeth:

'You stand indicted in Aylesbury, in the county of Bucks, by the name of Robert Hawkins, late of Chilton, in the county aforesaid, clerk, for that you the said Robert Hawkins, not having the fear of God before your eyes, upon the 18th of September, in the 20th year of the reign of our sovereign lord Charles the second, by the grace of God, &c. with force and arms, &c. at Chilton aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, into the dwelling house of one Henry Larimore feloniously did enter, and two gold rings at the value of 10s. each of them; one white Holland apron, of the value of 1s. 6d.; two pieces of gold, each of them at the value of 10s. and 19s. in silver, of the goods and chattels of him, the said Henry Larimore then and there being found, then and there feloniously you did steal, take, and carry away, contrary to the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, his royal crown and dignity, &c.'

How sayest thou, Robert Hawkins, art thou guilty of the felony whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

R. Hawkins. Not Guilty, my lord.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Hawkins. By God and my country.

Clerk. God send you a good deliverance.

Court. Call the Jury. [which the clerk did.]

Crier. Call these, viz. Richard Lambourne, James Reynolds, jun. Robert Hoare, I challenged him. [L. C. B. Set him by.] Edward Butler, Tho. Coles, I challenged [L. C. B. Set him by.] Richard Hearnese, Thomas Sanders of Chilton was challenged by Larimore, contrary to custom. Edward Carter. John Goodwyn. William Porter. John Ringham. William Cannon, jun. William Welch, Edward Cope, Francis Russel.

All these being in number 15, but three of them were challenged, two of them by me (I being informed they were no friends to the church of England;) and for the third, viz. Mr. Tho. Sanders, he was challenged by Larimore contrary to custom, without shewing any reason, he being a neighbour that knew us both, and the business, better than any of the rest of the jurors. The other twelve were sworn as followeth:

Clerk. Rob. Hawkins, hold up thy hand; which I did.

hand upon the book ; look upon the prisoner. ' You shall well and truly try and true deliverance make between our sovereign lord the king, and the prisoner at the bar, whom you shall have in charge according to your evidence. So help you God: kiss the book.' And so were all the rest sworn.

Clerk. Crier, count these. Richard Lambourne, James Reynolds, two, &c. twelve good men and true, stand together, and hear your evidence.

Clerk. Crier, make a proclamation.

O yes, &c.

' If any man can inform my lords, the king's justices, the king's serjeant, or the king's attorney, of any murders, felonies, or treasons, done or committed by the prisoner at the bar, before this Inquest be taken, between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth and they shall be heard, for now the prisoner at the bar stands upon his deliverance. And all others bound by recognizance to give in evidence against the prisoner at the bar, come forth and give your evidence, or else you will forfeit your recognizances.'

Clerk. Crier, call the witnesses: viz. Henry Larimore, sen. the prosecutor. Richard Mayne, jun. constable. Tho. Beamsley, Tithingman (brother in law to the said Larimore.) Dodsworth Croke, esq.; (sir John Croke's eldest son.) John Cox. Henry Larimore, son to the said Larimore, near 20 years old, and not baptized.) Mary Keen, Joan Beamsley (sister to the said Larimore.) Margaret Larimore (wife to the said Larimore.) John Chilton. William Croke, gent. (son to sir John Croke.) John Boyse, Thomas Welch, Samuel Salter, John Stop (sir John Croke's man.) Francis Luce, William Mantill, alias Miles (nephew to the said Larimore.) Richard Mantill, alias Miles (brother in law to the said Larimore.) Tho. Croxton, of Weston, on the Green, in the county of Oxon, yeoman. Nicholas Sanders, Christopher Bethum. Edward Good, of Long Crendon, clerk, a person that committed a riot and forcible entry upon my church at Chilton.

All these (being in number 22) were witnesses procured (by sir John Croke and Larimore) and sworn against me.

Clerk. Rob. Hawkins, hold up thy hand, (which I did.)

Here the Indictment was again read.

The clerk speaks to the Jury thus. Look upon the prisoner, you that be sworn. You shall understand that the prisoner at the bar hath been arraigned upon this Indictment, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and the country; which country you are. Your charge is, to enquire whether the said Robert Hawkins be Guilty of this felony (in manner and form as he stands indicted,) or Not Guilty: if you find him Guilty, you shall enquire what goods and chattels, lands and tenements he had at the time of committing this felony, or at any time since: if you do find him Not Guilty, you shall enquire if he fled for the same; if you do find that he fled for the same, you shall enquire what goods and chattels, as if you had found him Guilty: if you find him Not Guilty, and that he did not flee for the same, you shall say so, and no more; and hear the evidence.

Henry Larimore, the prosecutor, was sworn. Here I took pen, ink, and paper, to take notes at the bar.

Larimore said, May it please your honour, my lord, upon Friday the 18th of Sept. in the year of our Lord 1668 between twelve and one o'clock at noon, I locked my doors fast, and left nobody in my house, putting the keys in my pocket. I went to a hemp-plot, about two furlongs from my house, to pluck hemp; where I, and the rest of my family, continued till an hour and half of sun-set, and then coming home, found my doors wide open: so I went in, and run up the stairs into my chamber (or upper loft, over my inward chamber where I lie:) I then hearing a noise in the chamber where I lie, just under me, I peeped down through some of the chinks of the loft-boards: there I saw this Mr. Hawkins (pointing with his left hand towards me, but having his face all that time towards the judge) ransacking and rifling of a box, in which box, was then, amongst other goods, one white Holland apron, a purse, and in that purse was, at that time, two gold rings, each of them of the value of 10s. two ten shilling pieces of gold, and 19s. in silver, all the which said gold rings, gold and silver (except one small piece of silver or two) I then saw this Mr. Hawkins, that is now the prisoner at the bar, take and turn out of this very purse, which I do now shew unto your honour; and he did then steal and carry away all the foresaid rings and money, with the said Holland apron. All these things, my lord, I saw him take out of my box and purse, for I was all that time looking through the chinks of the board. And when Mr. Hawkins heard some noise above, I further saw the prisoner now at the bar go out of my said lower room, where my box was, and glanced by the stair-foot door, and so run out of my house, with a great bunch of keys in his hand, down my yard, and hid himself in a close where there were some beans and weeds. All this, my lord, I saw with my own eye. Moreover, my lord, I having a warrant from sir Richard Piggot to search for the said rings and money, &c. I did upon the next day (it being Saturday, and the 19th of September) after Mr. Hawkins had robbed me, call Richard Mayne, jun. the constable, and Mr. Tho. Beamsley, tithing man, with some others of our town, to search Mr. Hawkins's house for my said money and goods, which the day before I saw him steal from me: but he refusing to open his doors or to let us search; when we saw that, the constable broke open his doors, and then we went in, and searching his house, I did then find, in an inward room below stairs, in a basket hanging on a pin (put amongst papers and rags, and other trumpery) this gold ring, and this five-shilling piece of silver. And I do swear, that this ring and piece of silver is one of the same rings and pieces of silver which the day before I saw the prisoner now at the bar take out of this very purse, it being Friday the 18th of Sept. and an hour and an half before sun-set.—This was the sum and substance of Larimore's evidence, whereupon my Lord Chief Baron asked Larimore these questions.

L. C. Baron Hale. Are you sure, Larimore, that you left your doors locked, when you went out to pluck hemp?

Larimore. Yes, my lord, I am sure I did.

L. C. B. When?

Lar. Between 12 and 1 o'clock at noon.

L. C. B. Upon what day was it?

Lar. It was upon the 18th of September last past, my lord.

L. C. B. Upon what day of the week was it?

Lar. It was upon Friday, my lord.

L. C. B. In what year was it?

Lar. It was in the year of our Lord 1668, my lord.

L. C. B. Are you sure that your chamber-door where your box stood was locked at that time?

Lar. I cannot certainly tell, my lord.

L. C. B. Was the box locked at that time?

Larimore to this question paused a while, and gave no answer.

Marshal. My lord desires to know whether your box was locked at that time when you lost your money and goods out of it.

Lar. It was locked, my lord.

Clerk. Was it at that time locked, by the oath you have taken?

Lar. It was locked, if it shall please your honour.

L. C. B. Were the locks of the doors and box broken?

Lar. My lord, I cannot certainly tell, but I do believe that they were picked open with some pick-lock or false key.

L. C. B. Did you see him, that is now the prisoner at the bar, in your house at that time, and in that posture, by the oath you have taken?

Lar. I did then see him that is now the prisoner at the bar, in my house, my lord, as I said before.

L. C. B. At what time of the day was it that you saw him in your house?

Lar. It was an hour and half before sun-set.

L. C. B. said to me, Sir, will you ask Larimore any questions before we call more witnesses?

Hawkins. Yes, my lord, if I may have leave.

L. C. B. Sir, you may proceed to your questions.

Hawkins. I humbly thank your honour.

Hawkins. I pray, my lord, ask Larimore if he be sure that I am the person that robbed him.

L. C. B. Larimore, answer to the question.

Lar. Yes, my lord, I am sure he is the person that robbed me, for I know him very well.

Hawk. Why did you say before sir John

Croke, when I was before him, that you could not say that I had stolen them?

Lar. I said no such thing, this all that were there can justify.

Hawk. My lord, I desire to know of Larimore if he be sure that it was upon a Friday, and the 18th of September 1668, and in an hour and half before sun-set, when he saw me in his house robbing him.

Lar. replied, that it was upon that day and time, as near as he could guess.

Hawk. Why (when Larimore found his doors open, which he expected to have found locked) did not he call some of his neighbours to assist him in searching his house, and to secure me, or any other person which he might find robbing him, rather than to run up stairs by himself to alarm any person that was in his house, and thereby giving them opportunity to escape?

Larimore said, He did not then so well consider of it as now; but being willing, seeing his doors open, ran up the stairs to know what the matter was, and looking through the ohinks of the loft, saw me in his house, as aforesaid.

Hawk. Larimore, did you speak to me when you saw me, or endeavour to stay me?

Lar. replied, That he was for that time so amazed, that he could not speak to me.

Hawk. My lord, I think he is still in great amazement.

Hawk. Was my house the first, or the only house you searched?

Lar. replied, No.

Hawk. If you saw me commit the robbery in your house, why then did you search other houses for the goods which you saw me steal?

Lar. replied to this, That he had been robbed at several other times.

Hawk. Why did not you then rather send out hue and cries to apprehend my person, than to search my house; and why did not you charge me with flat felony before sir Richard Pigott, of whom you had your warrant, if you saw me rob you?

Lar. to these questions made no direct answer.

L. C. B. Mr. Hawkins, will you ask Larimore any more questions?

Hawk. No, my lord, not at present; but when I come to my defence, I hope I shall be heard.

L. C. B. You shall be heard at large, and so shall they.

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour.

Clerk. Ass. Larimore, who shall be next called?

Lar. Call Henry Larimore the younger.

Clerk. Crier, call Henry Larimore the younger: who answered, Here, sir.

Marshal. Lay your hand upon the book, look upon the prisoner.

Hawk. My lord, may I be heard a word?

L. C. B. Yes, sir, you may go on.

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour.

Hawk. My lord, is it usual to admit persons that are not baptized to give evidence upon a trial of life and death for that person which is now about to be sworn (I suppose) is not baptized.

L. C. B. Sir, a person that is not baptized may be sworn, and give evidences, in cases of felony.

Hawk. My lord, I submit, but am not fully satisfied in it; and if occasion be I shall crave counsel in that point, it being matter of law, and not of fact.

L. C. B. The Jury may consider of it.

Hawk. My lord, I doubt not but they will weigh of what validity the oath and evidence of such a person is.

Larimore Jun. My lord, upon the 18th of September, I came home a little after my father, and coming in the yard, I saw this Mr. Hawkins, that is now at the bar, run out of my father's house, with a great bunch of keys in his hand, and run down my father's yard, and hid himself in a close with beans and weeds; and when I came into my father's house, I asked him what Mr. Hawkins did there; He answered me, that he had done too much there, for he had robbed him.

L. C. B. What day of the week was it?

Lar. Jun. It was upon a Friday.

L. C. B. In what year was it?

Lar. It was this last September, my lord.

L. C. B. Will you ask him any questions?

Hawk. Yes, my lord, if I may be permitted.

L. C. B. You may proceed to your questions.

Hawk. Larimore, are you sure that I am the person which you saw run out of your father's house?

Lar. Yes, I am sure that you are the same person that I then saw run down my father's yard.

Hawk. What time of the day was it when you saw me?

Lar. It was an hour and a half before the sun was down.

Hawk. Was your father within when you came there?

Lar. He was within when I came there, and I asked him as aforesaid.

Hawk. Did your father say no more to you, than what you have related? and did not he enquire which way I ran, or went?

Lar. He said no more, but that you had robbed him.

Hawk. My lord, and you of the Jury, Is it likely, that when the father had seen me commit a robbery in his house, and the son coming in immediately upon it, that the father would not ask of him which way I went?

Hawk. My lord, I have done with him at present.

Lar. Sen. My lord, pray let Joan Beamsly be called next.

Clerk. Crier, call Joan Beamsly.

Crier. Joan Beamsly. She answered, here, Sir.

Joan Beamsly. May it please your honour, my lord, upon Friday the 18th of September last past, about an hour and a half before sunset, as I was going to milking, in the street, near Larimore's house, I met Henry Larimore the younger, and being at that time much troubled with the tooth-ach, I told him of it, desiring him to help me to some hot water, for I believed that might give me ease; Larimore replied, that if I would go with him to his father's house, he would help me to some: so going both together, we saw this Mr. Hawkins, that is now the prisoner at the bar, run out of Larimore's house, with a great bunch of keys in his hand, and run down Larimore's yard into a close of beans and and weeds, and there hid himself; and when we came into Larimore's house, I there heard young Larimore ask his father what Mr. Hawkins did there; Larimore told his son that he had done too much there, for he had robbed him. [When my lord chief baron Hale heard how these three witnesses agreed in their evidence, he said, Here is enough sworn, if believed, to hang twenty men.

Hawk. I doubt not but to clear myself, notwithstanding their evidence, if I may be heard.

L. C. B. You shall be heard.

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour.

L. C. B. Larimore, have you any more witnesses?

Lar. Yes, if it may your honour, a great many more.

L. C. B. Who are they? Call them.

Lar. Call Richard Mayne, constable.

Mayne. My lord, upon Saturday the 19th of September last past, came Henry Larimore senior to me, and giving me a warrant from sir Richard Pigott to search, commanded me (amongst others) to search Mr. Hawkins for some money and goods, which he had lost; and when I saw his warrant, I went to Thomas Beamsly, tithing-man, and charged him, with three or four others, to assist me; and coming to Mr. Hawkins's house, he denying to open his doors, I broke them open, and I went into his house, and Henry Larimore sen. did find in a basket this gold ring, and five-shilling-piece of silver (Mr. Hawkins himself being by whilst he found them); so we had him before sir John Croke, who committed him to prison, and so on Sunday morning we brought him to Ailesbury. This also was sworn by Dodsworth Croke, esq.; Thomas Beamsly, and young Larimore.

L. C. B. said to me, Will you ask these witnesses any questions?

Hawk. Yes, my lord, if I may be permitted.

L. C. B. You may go on to your questions.

Hawk. Mayne, constable, did Larimore desire you to search my house alone, and did he then tell you, that he saw me rob him the day before.

Constable. Larimore did desire me to search several houses, but did not say to me that he saw you rob him.

Hawk. Where is the warrant upon which you broke open my house? I desire to see it.

Const. Here it is.

Hawk. Was it Larimore himself that found the ring and five-shilling-piece?

Const. It was Henry Larimore the elder that found it.

Hawk. Was I in the same room when he found them?

Const. You were in the same room when he found them.

Hawk. This was proved false, by Mr. Charles Wilcox and Nicholas Faulkner, which persons kept me in the Hall, whilst they pretended to find them in the buttery.

Hawk. Constable, why did you compel me to go before sir John Croke, which you knew was my adversary?

Const. We did not force you before him.

Hawk. This I proved to be so, by Michael Reed, gent. Mr. Tho. Saunders, Mr. Wilcox, Mr. Goulder, Robert Casemore, and many others that saw it.

Hawk. Constable, why did you advise the gaoler, Mr. Burch, to load me well with irons?

Const. I did not advise him to do so.

Hawk. Pray, my lord, ask the gaoler, Mr. Burch, what the constable said to him when he brought me thither.

Clerk. Mr. Burch, inform the court what the constable said to you, when he brought Mr. Hawkins to you as a prisoner.

Gaoler. My lord, when the constable delivered Mr. Hawkins to me on Sunday morning, he said, that Mr. Hawkins was a notorious picklock, and that he was confident he could pick every lock about the prison, and therefore he advised me to watch him narrowly, and load him well with irons.

Thomas Beamsly being sworn, his evidence being the same in effect with the constable's for brevity sake I omit; but I craved leave to ask him a question or two; which being granted, were as followeth.

Hawk. Beamsley, pray what discourse had you with Mr. Wilcox upon the 19th of September, presently after my house was broken up, concerning the time when (as your brother pretended to you) he lost the ring and five shilling-piece of silver?

Beamsly. He did not remember that he had any discourse with Mr. Wilcox about that.

Hawk. Did you not say to Mr. Wilcox, that your brother Larimore told you that he had lost the stone ring, and five-shilling piece of silver, (which as he pretended was found in my house) before the difference began betwixt me and your brother; and moreover that your brother said he had an intent to search for the same a month before?

Beamsly replied, that he did not remember any such discourse.

Hawk. My lord, may I be heard a word or two.

L. C. B. You may go on.

Hawk. My lord, I suppose that I can prove these Particulars.

1. That Larimore told Beamsly that he had lost this gold-ring and five-shilling-piece of silver now in question, before there was any difference between Larimore and myself, which began in Michaelmas term 1667. This was proved by Mr. Wilcox.

2. And that Larimore confessed upon his oath before sir John Croke (upon the 19th of Sept.) when I was committed, that he lost the said ring and piece of silver about a month before, which must be about Aug. 10. This was proved by Mr. Brown, Faulkner, and others.

3. I can prove that Larimore told sir Richard Pigott, when he went for his warrant to search, that he did suspect several persons for robbing him of this gold ring and five-shilling-piece, and that I was only one of the suspected persons. This sir Richard Pigott did acknowledge to be true.

But now he swears that he saw me steal the gold ring and five-shilling-piece out of his house on Friday the 18th of September, an hour and a half before sun-set, 1668.

Hawk. I pray, my lord, and you that are of this jury, take notice of this, and compare the times out of his own mouth; but more of this when I come to make my defence.

L. C. B. Larimore, have you any more witnesses?

Lar. Yes, my lord.

L. C. B. Call them, who are they?

Lar. Call Margaret Larimore.

Margaret, the wife of Henry Larimore being sworn said, That, when she was a servant to Larimore, which now is her husband, she had seen Mr. Hawkins, at several unreasonable hours in the night (when her master was in bed) lying lurking in and about her master's house, yard, windows, and doors, and said, that she believed he lay there for no good intent.

Hawk. My lord, may I ask this woman a question or two?

L. C. B. You may do so if you please.

Hawk. At what time was it, Margaret Larimore, that you saw me lurking in your master's yard, as you have said?

Marg. Lar. It was in the night time.

Hawk. But how long may it be since?

Marg. Lar. I can't tell, it might be about the time that my master was robbed. [Here Larimore prompts his wife, which I told my lord, for which he checked him.]

Hawk. Did you speak, or call to me, when you saw me there?

Marg. Lar. No, for I was affrighted at it. This same was also sworn by Richard Mantill, alias Miles, son-in-law to the said Larimore, and also by William his son, which for brevity sake I omit farther to relate.

L. C. B. Larimore, have you any more?

Lar. Yes, my lord, to prove that this ring and five-shilling-piece is mine.

L. C. B. Call them, who are they?

Lar. Esq. Dodsworth, sir John Croke's eldest son, and Mr. Good, minister of Long Crendon, my lord.

Clerk. Crier, call Dodsworth Croke, Esq. and Edward Good of Long Crendon, clerk: both answered, Here, sir. They both being sworn,

Mr. Dodsworth Croke said as followeth, (taking the ring in his hand, turned it up and down, and looked very narrowly upon it within and without, and put it upon his finger, and pulling it off several times in the face of the court and country, he then informed my lord) That he was confident, that this was Larimore's ring; and for his proof and credit, tells the court, that he had pawned it to Larimore.

Mr. Good took the five-shilling-piece into his hand, and swore, that he being at Buckingham last sessions, about some trouble which I had put him to, he then wanting some money, did pawn a five-shilling-piece to this Larimore for other money; and he desiring of him to take care that he had the same piece again, Larimore told him that he put a mark upon it: so seeing a mark upon this five-shilling-piece, he swore that he did verily believe that this was the same five-shilling-piece which he had pawned to Larimore at the sessions before.

L. C. B. said to me, Sir, if you will ask the witnesses any questions, you may.

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour for that freedom; but I do humbly conceive that the proving of the last point, viz. that the ring and five-shilling-piece was either Larimore's own goods, or pawned to him, is not much material to my case; for I am free to confess (as much as I can have ground to believe), which is, that Larimore might have the ring and five-shilling-piece of silver in his possession; but the charge against me is, that I stole them from him, which I do flatly deny, and do not doubt of clearing myself when I come to my defence, if I may be heard.

L. C. B. Sir, you need not question but you shall be heard.

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour, and crave your leave to be heard a word or two (if it be not unseasonable.)

L. C. B. You may go on.

Hawk. May it please your honour, and the jury, to take notice that Mr. Good swears he believes this to be the five-shilling-piece that he pawned to Larimore last sessions at Buckingham, but I desire to know if Larimore swears that this is that piece which Mr. Good pawned then to him, for he best knows.

L. C. B. Larimore, what say you to that?

Lur. My Lord, I do swear that this is the same five-shilling-piece which Mr. Good pawned to me, the last sessions at Buckingham.

Hawk. Then, my lord, and the jury, be pleased to observe, That sessions was held upon the 9th and 10th of July, 1668, but the difference between me and Larimore (for tithes) was begun in Michaelmas-Term, 1667, which is near nine months before that sessions; and notwithstanding Larimore did say to his brother Beamsly, upon the 12th of September, that he had lost this very ring and five-shilling piece of silver before the difference began, which is impossible, my lord, as appears by the oaths of Larimore and Mr. Good; for how could he be robbed of that five-shilling-piece nine months before he had it? And that he did say the very words to his brother Beamsly we have already proved, by the testimony of Mr. Wilcox.

L. C. B. said, Mr. Hawkins, was this suit for tithes begun by you against this Larimore before the time that Larimore swears this felony was committed?

Hawk. Yes, my lord, for I began that suit for tithes in Michaelmas-Term, 1667, and Larimore swears that I robbed him upon the 18th of September, 1668, which is, my lord, about a year after. My lord, it is an easy way thus for the fanatics to pay tithes; if they can but hang up the clergy, they may cease all their future pleading for liberty of conscience.

Now Larimore began to stumble, and shew his malice in prosecuting me unjustly, by his multiplying of feigned felonies, wherewith he did then endeavour to load me, of which I appeared innocent.

L. C. B. Larimore, have you any more?

Lur. Yes, my lord, Pray call John Chilton.

Clerk. Crier, call John Chilton.

Crier. John Chilton: who answered, Here, Sir; and being sworn, my L. C. B. said to him, Come, Chilton, what can you say to this business?

John Chilton said, My lord, I can say nothing but that I am paid for my boots.

L. C. B. What boots?

Chil. My lord, I am paid for my boots.

L. C. B. Our business is not now about boots, but however, come and tell me what thou meanest by them?

Chil. My lord, Mr. Hawkins brought me a pair of tops, to put new legs to them, which I did, and he coming by my shop, told me he wanted his boots; I replied, they were done: but I being then about to go out, did promise Mr. Hawkins, to lay them in my window, so that he might take them as he went home, which accordingly he did; and when I came home I went to Mr. Hawkins, who at that time was at sir John Croke's house, where he contented me for my work before we parted: and this is all that I can say, my lord.

L. C. B. What is this to the purpose? Can you say any more, Chilton? If you can, go on.

Chil. My lord, Mr. Hawkins paid me honestly for the boots: but as soon as he began to demand the tithes of Chilton, and did sue for them, then they lay at me night and day to have me charge Mr. Hawkins with flat felony, for stealing the said boots out of my shop; but I told them, that I laid them in my shop-window for him, and did bid him take them as he came back; and he paid me for my work, and therefore I cannot say he stole them.

L. C. B. Who were they that desired you to charge Mr. Hawkins with the stealing of your boots?

Chil. This Larimore, Mr. Dodsworth Croke, Richard Mayne the constable, Miles and John

Sanders (who is since dead, my lord).—Larimore here interrupted Chilton, and said, My lord, I have five or six witnesses that can prove that all this is false which Chilton hath sworn.

L. C. B. Call them, for I will hear all, if I sit until night.

Then Larimore called Dodsworth Croke, William Croke, John Stop, Thomas Welch, Samuel Satter, and William Sanders; all these being sworn, the sum and substance of their evidence was to this effect:

That they had heard John Chilton say, that I had stolen a pair of boots from him, to which Chilton (being then upon oath) said, that Mr. Hawkins did no otherwise than what before I have sworn; and he further added, that he never said that I had stolen any thing from him, for he had no reason for it.

L. C. B. Did this Larimore desire you to charge this Mr. Hawkins with felony? And when did he desire you to do so?

Chilton. My Lord, Larimore, and the rest that I have named, desired me to charge Mr. Hawkins with that Felony, for stealing the said boots, as soon as he demanded the tithes of Chilton; and they would have forced me to fetch a warrant from a justice of peace to search for them, and did further threaten me, in case I would not do it; that sir John Croke would indict me at the assizes, as one accessory to the stealing of my own goods.

L. C. B. Was Larimore one of them?

Chilton. Yes, my lord, and he said, that he would make me swear that Mr. Hawkins had stole my boots, and for that end did serve me with a Subpœna to be here.—Here Larimore the second time interrupted Chilton, and said, My lord, this fellow (pointing at John Chilton) is hired by Mr. Hawkins to swear this.

Chilton replied, No, my lord, I am not hired by Mr. Hawkins to swear, but I might have been hired, or borne out, if I would but swear that Mr. Hawkins stole my boots, by one Croxstone.

L. C. B. How! what is that! hired or borne out to swear? By whom, and how? Tell me the story.

Chilton. My lord, I am not hired to swear by Mr. Hawkins; but if I would swear that he stole my boots out of my shop, I might have been borne out in so doing. For Tho. Croxstone, of Westone on the Green, in the county of Oxen, told me upon Monday last, it being the 8th of March 1668, that if I would but swear what he would have me against Mr. Hawkins (viz. that he stole my boots) he would bear me harmless; but I replied, that it went against my conscience to do it. I added further, that if I should be so wicked as to swear it, Mr. Hawkins can prove the contrary by Mr. William Croke and others; to which Larimore replied, that I need not fear what Mr. Croke knew in that case, for he is one of us, and will not justify any thing that may tend to our prejudice. I farther told him that I durst not do it; for if I should, Mr. Hawkins might make me fly the country, as Smart did Wheeler: to which Croxstone replied, that if I would swear it, he would bear me out against the said Mr. Hawkins as far as an hundred pound would go, and if that would not do, as far as five hundred pound would go.

L. C. B. How! bear you out to swear! What Croxstone is this that would do so? This is not likely to be true.

Tho. Croxstone said, My lord, I said no such thing.

L. C. B. I do not believe it to be true.

Chilton rub in, and said, As I live and breathe, my lord, Croxstone did say, if I would swear that Mr. Hawkins had stole my boots, he would bear me out, as I said before, and if I made any doubt of it, he would give me bond to make good his promise.

L. C. B. said, This is strange.

Croxstone. My lord, I said I would bear him out in speaking the truth, and no otherwise.

Hawk. My lord, may I be heard?

L. C. B. Yes, you may go on.

Hawk. I thank your honour. My lord, pray let me ask Mr. Croxstone two or three questions.

L. C. B. So you may; go on.

Hawk. Mr. Croxstone, do you confess that you did promise to bear out Chilton (as you said before) in swearing the truth?

Croxstone. Yes, sir, I did, and no otherwise.

Hawk. Was it not about the boots?

Croxstone. Yes, sir, it was so.

Hawk. Did not you desire Chilton to swear that I had stolen his boots, after that he had told you I had paid him for them, and thereupon promise to bear him out against me, in 100 or 500*l.*

Croxstone. I think you cannot prove it against me.

Hawk. I pray, my lord, and you of this jury, consider that this Chilton is one of Larimore's witnesses, and swears for the king; yet he swears that he had given me orders to take those boots, and that I then paid him for legging of them, and that he had repeated this to Larimore and Croxstone several times; and after all this, Larimore and Croxstone, with others, used their utmost endeavours to persuade Chilton to charge me with felony for stealing them, and Croxstone promised him to bear him out in so doing, as far as 100*l.* would go, and if that would not do, as far as 500*l.* and give him bond for his security, &c. My lord, if this amounts not to a subornation, I am mistaken. But my lord, I have two witnesses more to prove the same against Mr. Croxstone, and I pray that they may be heard.

L. C. B. Who are they?

Hawk. Ann Scoly, and John, the son of Mr. Tho. Sanders. Both these being called, justified in court what Chilton had sworn against Mr. Croxstone: Upon which my Lord Chief Baron said to Croxstone, Come, you did ill to solicit persons to swear these things which you knew were false; and 'tis farther added, that this made not for the king, but rather for the prisoner at the bar. After all this, a rude fellow (Thomas Welch) came in, and said, my lord, I did hear Chilton say, that Mr. Hawkins had stole a pair of boots from him.

L. C. B. What, more boots still? Come, Larimore, have you any more?

Larimore said, Yes, my lord, one Mr. Boyce; who being sworn, said, That at a certain time, he coming into a house at Chilton, found this Mr. Hawkins, now the prisoner at the bar, and one James Noble (which Noble was then drunk, and asleep upon a bed), and I saw Mr. Hawkins have his hand in Noble's pocket, and the said Noble told me, that at that time he lost a gold ring and a piece of gold out of his pocket.

L. C. B. said to me, Sir, what say you to that?

Hawk. My lord, I desire to know if there be any bill or indictment against me for it.

Clerk. There is none, my lord, that I do know of.

Hawk. I desire, my lord, that Noble may be sworn, if he be here.

Lar. He is not here, my lord.

L. C. B. Why was not that Noble here himself to prosecute?

Lar. I could not find him, my lord.

Hawk. I desire to know whether Boyce came hither of his own accord, or if he be subpoenaed to be here; (if so) by whom, and who bears his charges?

Boyce. I was subpoenaed by Larimore, and he bears my charges, my lord.

Hawk. How long was it since, Mr. Boyce, that you saw my hand in Noble's pocket, as you said before?

Boyce. It may be near two years ago, my lord.

Hawk. Did you see me pick (or take) out of the said Noble's pocket, the said ring, or piece of gold or any thing else?

Boyce. I saw your hand in Noble's pocket, but did not see you take any thing out of it.

Hawk. Did Noble ever tell you, that I had picked his pocket of the said ring, or piece of gold, or any thing else?

Boyce. No; but said, he lost them at that time.

Hawk. But you say, that Noble was drunk at that time, and if so, it is possible he might be mistaken.

Boyce. So he was drunk, and asleep likewise.

L. C. B. I think you were all drunk.

Hawk. Boyce, you might have done well to have told Mr. Noble of this, when he told you that he had lost his ring and piece of gold; but can you say any thing touching Larimore's being robbed, or do you know that I am the person that robbed him?

Boyce. No, not I, my lord, I cannot charge him.

Hawk. But you say that Larimore subpoenaed you to be here, and that he bears your charges?

Boyce. Yes, my lord, and so he does.

Hawk. Mr. Boyce, if this be all you can say for Larimore, you will hardly requite his charges!

Hawk. My lord, may I be heard, as to the evidence of Boyce?

L. C. B. You may go on.

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour.

Hawk. This Boyce swears, my Lord, that about two years last past he saw my hand in Noble's pocket, and that Noble told him, he then lost a gold ring and a piece of gold. My Lord, I think, with submission to your honour and the Court, I am not bound to answer to this charge, because there is no indictment exhibited against me for it, nor is Noble himself here to prosecute, or can Boyce swear that I picked Noble's pocket, or that Noble ever told Boyce I did (as he himself swears). But, my lord, I observe in this the malice of Larimore's heart, as well as in that of the boots; for Boyce swears, that he can say nothing to Larimore's bill of robbery, and yet he forces him to come from London hither, to start a senseless story about Noble's ring and gold, which is of near two years standing. My lord, if there had been any truth in it, why was not Noble himself here to prosecute it? And why did he let it rest so long? I say again, my Lord, if it had been true that I had picked Noble's pocket, and if Larimore had known it, I pray, my Lord, and you of the jury, what had that concerned Larimore? But, my Lord, I am as clear of picking Noble's pocket, as I am of stealing Chilton's boots, and as clear of both these as I am of robbing this fellow Larimore, that now calls my life in question: Nay, if he can fairly prove me guilty of one, I am willing to suffer as guilty of all.

My Lord, I am bold to appeal to your honour, whether it be a fair prosecution in Larimore, to stir up Chilton falsely to charge me with felony in stealing his boots, when I had not only a right in them, but also leave from him to take them, and paid him for his work, which Larimore himself knows. Nay, my Lord, if I had never paid Chilton for his legs, the tops being mine, by law it had not been felony, but a trespass, because I had leave from him to take them, and right in them, the tops being mine. And again, my Lord, I appeal to your honour, whether it be fair in Larimore for him to ride up and down city and country, to bring a multitude of witnesses together that can say nothing to this bill (as Boyce swears he cannot): If this doth not discover malice in a prosecutor's heart, I know not what doth; and if that appears to your honour and the jury, to be in him, how far that ought, as well by law as equity, to frustrate his evidence, I am willing to leave to your honour and the jury; and so I have done, as to Boyce's evidence.

L. C. B. Larimore, have you any more?

Larimore. Yes, my Lord, John Cox, and Francis Lucy, They being both sworn;

John Car said, My Lord, I being in Mr. Hawkins's company not long since, one asked him, how he thought to come off at the Assizes: Mr. Hawkins replied, he cared not much for this plot (though he should be convicted), for they could but burn him in the hand for it, and that he could bite out.

Lucy being sworn, said, that he heard Mr. Hawkins confess, that he owed Larimore 15s. but because he had dealt so unjustly with him, he would make it cost Larimore fifteen times 15s. before he would pay him.

L. C. B. said, This makes little to the purpose. Come, Larimore, have you any more?

Lar. I think not, my Lord.

L. C. B. If you have any more witnesses, call them, and they shall be heard, and do not say, when I am gone, that your witnesses could not be heard.

Lar. My Lord, I confess they have been fully heard, and I have no more to say.

L. C. B. said to me, Sir, you have heard the Indictment against you, and the evidence to prove it; you have heard the charge, now say what you can for your own defence, and you shall be heard.

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour; and I hope, my Lord, because the evidence is large, I shall have the more time allowed me to make my defence; and if so, I doubt not but fully to open this conspiracy.

L. C. B. Do not fear that; for as they have been heard at large, so shall you likewise (God forbid else).

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour, and do promise to be as brief as conveniently I can: And as I intend to offer nothing but the naked truth, so I will say no more, if I am not misinformed, than I can prove to be true. And, my Lord, because it may seem necessary for me to offer many things by way of defence, in answer to so great a charge; to save time, I pray that it may not be expected by your honour, or the jury, that I should call witnesses to prove every particular: But when I offer such things as are most material, if either your honour or the jury be not fully satisfied touching the truth of such material points, I do humbly pray, that I may be called upon to prove them; for when I am not called upon for proof, I shall, under favour, my Lord, take it for granted that I am believed. And for method herein, if I may have leave, I do intend this:

1. In general, to shew how improbable it is, that I should be guilty of this robbery, and also deliver some hints to move the Court and jury to question whether this prosecutor (Larimore) was robbed at all, or no.

And 2dly, More particularly to examine the evidence, as to matter of fact.

L. C. B. Go on, Sir, to your defence.

Hawk. May it please your honour, and you of this jury, I begin with the first part of my defence, which is to hint how unlikely it is, that should be guilty of robbing this Larimore.

1. Larimore is generally known to be a notorious Anabaptist, and an enemy to the Church of England, and a hater of the ministry in general; but more particularly, he is most envious and malicious against myself, because I sued him for tithes, and caused him to be indicted for not coming to church, or baptizing his children: For which reason his malice against me hath appeared notorious several ways, as amongst others,

1. By dissuading all that owed me any money, not to pay me.

2. By his inducing those to whom I owed money to arrest and trouble me.

3. By dissuading those that I sued for tithes not to agree with me; he promising them, that sir John Croke and himself would force me to run the country ere-long.

4. By his continual tormenting, and vexing me with his false arrests, and illegal indictments.

5. By his constant endeavour to dissuade my friends from any ways relieving me, or mine, in my greatest wants and necessities, advising them to starve us.

My Lord, and this jury, if you are not fully satisfied in any of these particulars that I have alledged, I am ready to prove them; but if this be granted, they are no doubt sufficient arguments to prove the malice of his heart. Again I say, that it is no ways possible that Larimore was robbed at all; and of this opinion are most of his neighbours round about him, as may appear by this certificate, which followeth;

"We do humbly certify, That Henry Larimore of Chilton, in the county of Bucks, labourer, is a notorious Anabaptist, an enemy to the Church of England, and a perfect hater of all ministers of the same, but in particular, most inveterate and malicious against Robert Hawkins, clerk, late minister of the church of Chilton aforesaid; for that he doth not only seek and design utterly to ruin the said Mr. Hawkins himself, but makes it his business, and daily practice, to instigate others to do the like, and for no other cause, as he hath often confessed himself, but for that the said Hawkins hath caused him to be indicted for not coming to church, and sued him for tithes. And we do verily believe, and are justly satisfied in our consciences, that the said Mr. Hawkins is not at all guilty of the pretended felony, in stealing the ring, and piece of silver, which the said Larimore hath charged him with, but that it is meer contrivance inchoated, and set on foot by the said Larimore, Sir John Croke, and others, on purpose to revenge themselves. And we do also believe, that the said Mr. Hawkins is a very honest man, and that he is a very able minister, and a true and faithful labourer in God's word, and never heard that he was suspected in the least of Felony, till this malicious prosecution, which is by the said Larimore and others, whom the said Mr. Hawkins sueth for tithes.

By this certificate, which you see subscribed with above an hundred names; wherein many others (for brevity sake) are omitted, although I made no use of it upon my trial; yet the world may see what an opinion Larimore's neighbours had: concerning him, and his (pretended) robbery; which certificate I have for that purpose here inserted.

2. It is not likely that Larimore was robbed because he did not declare it to his neighbours immediately, which doubtless he would have done, had any such thing befallen him.

3. Nor is he certain (as to the time) when he was robbed.

For 1. He told his brother Beamsly, that he had lost the ring and five-shilling-piece (in question) before there was any difference between him and I: as may appear by this certificate under Mr. Wilcox's own hand, which is as followeth;

'These are to certify all whom it may concern, that Thomas Beamsley of Chilton, Titling-man, told me, Charles Wilcox, of Long Crendon (upon September 19, in the 30th year of his majesty's reign, An. Dom. 1668), that the five-shilling-piece of Silver, and the stone ring, which Larimore pretended he found in Mr. Hawkins's house, were both lost before there was any difference between the said Larimore and the said Mr. Hawkins; and he further added, that his brother Larimore told him, that he had an intent to search for the same ring and five-shilling-piece, above a month before he did. This I can and will depose, whensoever I shall be thereunto required. Witness my hand, Oct. 1, 1668.
CHARLES WILCOX.'

By this certificate, it appears (by Larimore's own confession to his brother Beamsly) that he had lost this ring, and five-shilling-piece, before there was any difference between him and I; and seeing I began my suit for tithes in Michaelmas term, 1667, against him and others, as it is well known to the inhabitants of Chilton (and also may appear by the records of the exchequer).

This is the first time that Larimore said he had lost the ring, and five shilling piece.

And that this is false, must needs appear by what Mr. Good and Larimore have already sworn in open court, viz. that Mr. Good pawned the five shilling piece to Larimore at Buckingham sessions: last (which sessions were held upon the 9th and 10th of July, 1668), which is near nine months after the difference began.

And moreover, Larimore confessed upon his examination before sir John Croke, when I was committed (which was upon the 19th of September, 1668), that he had lost the ring and five-shilling piece a month before, which must (consequently) be about the 19th of August, 1668.

And if so, how is it possible that he could have lost them before the difference began betwixt us, which was above ten months before?

3. He now swears in open court, that he saw me steal the said gold ring, and five shilling-piece of silver, out of his house, upon Friday the 18th of Sept. 1668 (precisely), an hour and half before sun-set; all which times being compared together, can no ways be possible; for which I dare appeal to all that hear it. Nor is it likely, in case he could prove that he was robbed (which I am confident he never can) that I am the person that robbed him; as may appear upon these considerations amongst others.

1. Is it likely that I should commit a robbery in my own parish (in the day time), where all that saw me must needs know me; and at the house of such a person as this Larimore is, that had solemnly swore (but a little before) that he would take away my life, as may appear by what his son said to Ann Scholy?

2. Is it probable, that if I were guilty, I would not have made my escape, having twenty four hours time, and four or five hours notice after they first attempted to search my house? Or that in all that time, I could find no better place to conceal a ring, and five-shilling piece, than in a little basket with two or three eggs (which all that time was hanging upon a pin)?

Again, if Larimore saw me rob him upon the 18th day of Sept. 1668 (as he swears he did), why did he not then secure me? He swears I ran away, why did he not send out Hue and cries, to discover and apprehend me? But the said Larimore was so far from doing it, that he never declared it to any of his neighbours, nor to the constable, when he commanded him to search, as may appear as well by the search itself, (in that they searched other houses before they searched mine) as by the constable's oath who swears that Larimore said not anything to him, that he had seen me rob him; nor did the said Larimore declare it to sir John Croke, for if he had, sir John (no doubt) would have inserted it in the Nittimus, which he hath not done: Nor did he declare it to sir Richard Pigott, from whom he fetched his warrant to search, as may appear by the contents of it. Whereupon, my lord chief baron Hale calling to the constable for the warrant (which being delivered), the Judge (himself) immediately espied, that the said warrant bore date a day before the robbery was committed; which when my Lord observed, he asked Larimore if he fetched this warrant to search for this ring and five-shilling piece; to which Larimore replied, he did; and then my lord asked Larimore upon what day he was robbed, he replied upon Friday, the 18th of September, 1668.

L. C. B. How comes it then to pass, Larimore, that the warrant bears date the 17th day, and you swear that the prisoner at the bar did not rob you till the 18th day? This is likely to be true!

Larimore to this replied, that he was robbed at several other times.

Hawk. (My Lord) may I be heard a word?

L. C. B. You may go on.

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour. And I hope the jury will take notice how Larimore hath ensnared himself, by the date of the warrant, which my lord first discovered. And whereas Larimore replies, that he was robbed at several other times, he may have credit (but by those only that can believe all that he hath said and sworn): For he saith that he was robbed before he and I differed, which must be before, October, 1667; and he told sir John Croke likewise (when I was committed) that he was robbed of the foresaid goods but a month before which must needs be about the 19th of August 1668; but now he swears in court, that he saw me steal these goods on Friday the 18th of September, 1668, which must needs be impossible, that I should rob him at three several times of the same ring and five shilling piece; and besides this, it is improbable that he should be robbed before, October 1667, and again in Aug. 1668, because he never declared any of these robberies to any person before the 16th of September 1668, upon which day, he and sir John Croke concluded upon this conspiracy, as hereafter we shall make appear: And moreover Larimore (himself) confessed even now, that he fetched this warrant to search for this very ring and five-shilling-piece (which now he denies.) By this, all may see, how notoriously he contradicts himself.

L. C. B. Said to Larimore, Thou art very cunning, to be provided with a warrant a day before you was robbed. It seems you knew upon the 17th day, that you should be robbed on the 18th day, and also that this person; (now at the bar) should rob you. Surely you can divine.—Here the people began to cry out Shame on Larimore.

L. C. B. said to me, Sir, but if you were innocent of this robbery, why did you refuse to open your doors, or to have your house searched?

Hawk. My lord, I had several reasons that moved me so to do.

1. In general, most of those persons, that were present, were my inveterate enemies, and several of them had threatened to ruin me, and my family; and therefore I had reason to suspect, that they came to injure me, either in my possession, or goods; For the first, sir John Croke and Larimore had often threatened to pull down my house, and for that end, had hired several persons to make a forcible entry upon it, and particularly, they had lately hired Jaires the son of Leonard Styres of Thame (in the county of Oxon), by a ladder to climb up, and run down my chimney, and open my doors, when we were all abroad: And about the same time they also contracted with one Christopher Tyler of Chilton for the same purpose. And 2. I feared the seizing of my goods by the said persons, because they had then a writ of Levay (or execution) to seize them, which Larimore's son had a few days before in part executed, and he was then present: And if these reasons are not sufficient, I have more to justify my act, in refusing to have them search my house, which was all, my lord, I ever denied, for I then declared myself willing that Mr. Sanders the other constable, he being then at the next door, might charge whom he pleased, and search as narrowly as he could.

L. C. B. said, Mr. Hawkins, can you prove what you have said?

Hawk. Yes, my lord; which particular shall I prove?

L. C. B. Prove that about the ladder, if you can.

Hawk. I pray, my lord, call John Acreman: He being called, did fully justify what I said concerning their intended forcible entry, and added farther, that he did help to set up the ladder for that purpose, being called by sir John Croke's own sons, they and Larimore standing by all that time to watch. And touching the second particular, concerning the seizing of my goods, Mr. Sheriff himself can justify, that they had then in their hands such a writ: (my lord) he is in court, if your honour please to call him.

And for the 3d particular, that I shewed myself willing that Mr. Sanders should search, I can prove, my lord, by these witnesses following, viz. Michael Read, gent. Mr. Thomas Sanders, Mr. Henry Golder, Robert Casemore, Mr. Charles Wilcox, and several others that were present. My Lord Chief Baron hearing these reasons fully proved, commended my discretion, in not opening my doors; and he added further, that he should have done as much himself, saying it was a foul business; and the judge (then looking towards sir John Croke with an angry countenance) said to me, Sir, is this sir John Croke concerned in this business?

Hawk. If it may please your honour, my lord, with permission, I suppose that sir John Croke is deeply concerned in this conspiracy, and I doubt not but to make it appear to the world (if I may be heard).

L. C. B. You need not fear that, for you shall have time; go on.

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour; and I crave leave to call two witness, viz. Mr. Charles Wilcox, and Mr. Samuel Brown. Both these being called, Mr. Wilcox said, If it may please your honour, my lord, upon Friday, the 18th of September, 1663, I was at Larimore's house in Chilton (from noon till it was near night), with Larimore, a driving of some bargain about tiles, and other things; and, my lord, Mr. Hawkins was not at Larimore's house all that afternoon, nor did I hear any thing at all then, that Larimore was robbed, which, my lord, I must needs have done, if he had been robbed that afternoon, for I was there.

L. C. B. At what time came you to Larimore's house, Mr. Wilcox? take heed what you say.

Wilcox. Before noon, my lord.

L. C. B. Mr. Wilcox, how long did you stay there?

Mr. Wilcox. Until it was near night, my lord.

L. C. B. Was Larimore with you all that time?

Mr. Wilcox. Yes, my lord, for we were about to bargain for some tiles, and other things.

L. C. B. Are you sure that it was upon the 18th of September that you was at Larimore's house?

Mr. Wilcox. I am sure, my lord, that it was upon the 18th of September that I was there, and the day before Mr. Hawkins's house was broke open.

L. C. B. What day of the week was it upon?

Mr. Wilcox. It was upon a Friday, my lord, and Mr. Hawkins's house was broke open on the next day, it being Saturday.

Lar. It was upon Thursday, my lord, that Mr. Wilcox was at my house, it was not upon that day that my house was robbed, but the day before.

Sir Ralph Verney replied, No, no, Larimore, it could not be on the Thursday that Mr. Wilcox and you were together at your house, for that was the 17th day of September, and that was the day you was busied in fetching your warrant from sir Richard Pigott.

L. C. B. It is well observed, sir, and so he was, and therefore it could not be on the Thursday that Mr. Wilcox was with him at his house.

Sir Richard Pigott replied, I am sure, my lord, that Larimore, and that fellow the constable, were both at my house upon the 17th of September, as my warrant testifieth.

L. C. B. At what time was it, Mr. Wilcox, when you came that day from Larimore's house?

Mr. Wilcox. It was about sunset, my lord, for it was dark by that time I got to my house, at Crendon.

L. C. B. How far is it from your house at Crendon, to Larimore's house?

Mr. Wilcox. It is about a mile and a half, my lord.

L. C. B. Were not the ways bad at that time?

Mr. Wilcox. No, my lord, the ways were very good.

L. C. B. Did not you stop, or stay, or meet with some body by the way that might hinder you?

Mr. Wilcox. No, my lord, I went a good pace; it being near night, my lord, I was afraid of being benighted, and yet it was dark by that time I got home.

L. C. B. You that are of the jury, do you know this Mr. Wilcox, of what credit is he?

Jury. We have known him a long time, and we know no harm by him.

L. C. B. He looks with an honest face, and you Larimore, do you know what that honest man, Mr. Wilcox, says? Do you know him? and did you ever see him at your house?

Lar. Yes, my lord, I know him well.

L. C. B. Larimore, do not you remember that he was at your house on Friday the 18th of Sept. 1668?

Larimore replied, No, my lord, sure it was not upon that day that I was robbed.

My L. C. B. Hale replied, Larimore, no, in my conscience thou sayest well, for it seems you were not robbed upon the same day that you have sworn you saw the prisoner at the bar commit this robbery.

Hawk. My lord, or upon any other day (as I do verily believe.) And here many of the people cried out, That they believed as much.

L. C. B. If that man Mr. Wilcox speaks true, then all is false that Larimore, his son and sister hath sworn, &c.

Come, Mr. Hawkins, said my Lord Chief Baron, have you any more to say?

Hawk. I have one witness more that I desire may be called, viz. Mr. Samuel Brown.

L. C. B. Yes, yes, call him; come, Mr. Brown, what can you say?

Mr. Brown said, My lord, I can say something, but I dare not speak.

L. C. B. Why dare you not? Come, speak the truth and spare not, and say no more.

Mr. Brown said, I dare not speak, for sir John Croke and this Larimore have threatened me, that if I came down to this assizes to testify what I heard about this plot, sir John Croke said, he would fling me in the gaol, and load me with action upon action of 1,000*l.* and ruin me and my family.

When the Judge and the Justices heard Mr. Brown relate this, every eye began to be fixed upon sir John Croke, and the people asked which was that sir John Croke? Then my Lord Chief Baron Hale commanded the clerk of the assizes to give Mr. Brown a writ of privilege, to protect him home again; which being immediately done in court, my L. C. B. said, Come, Mr. Brown, let us now hear what you can say to this business.

Mr. Brown said; If it please your honour (my lord) upon Wednesday, the 16th of September last past, early in the morning, as I lay in my bed at sir John Croke's house in Chilton, hearing a great noise (I being then entrusted by sir John Lentall as keeper to sir John Croke, which is a prisoner at the King's-bench), I fearing that they were contriving some way for him to escape, I started suddenly out of bed, having nothing on but my shirt, and stood at the dining-room door behind the hangings, and then, my lord, I heard this Larimore tell sir John Croke that he had undone him, by causing him to contend with the parson. Sir John Croke asked him why? Larimore replied, Because this Hawkins will undo me, for he hath entered me into most courts of England, and summoned me into the Crown Office and Chancery, and I cannot maintain so many suits: sir John Croke replied, Is that all? Come brother Larimore, be contented, we will have one trick more for Hawkins yet, which shall do his work. Larimore replied, Sir John; you have put me upon too many tricks already, more than I can manage, and the parson is too hard for us still. Sir John replied, If thou wilt but act, I will hatch enough to hang Hawkins. Larimore replied, But how shall we bring this to pass? Sir John Croke made answer, Canst not thou convey some gold or silver into into Mr. Hawkins's house, and have a warrant ready to search his house, and then our work is done? Larimore replied, Sir, if we could but bring this to pass, it might do well, but I know not how. Sir John Croke said to Larimore, Do you but go to sir Richard Pigott and inform him, that you have lost some money and goods, and desire his warrant to search for them, which sir Richard neither can nor will deny you, and then take Dick Mayne the constable, who is one of us, and will do whatever we desire him, and go and search Mr.

Hawkins's house, and there you will find these things; and then charge him with flat felony, and force him before me, and no other justice, and I'll send him to gaol without bail. And we will hang him at the next assizes. Come, (said sir John Croke) brother Larimore, let us go and drink our morning's draught, and we will consult more about this business. And so, my lord, I heard no more for that time? But—

L. C. B. That was enough and too much too; but however, Mr. Brown, go on.

Mr. Brown. So upon Saturday next (being the 19th of Sept. 1668.) I having been abroad (and towards night) coming up the town, I was informed that Mr. Hawkins (as Larimore pretended) had robbed him: I then began to think more seriously upon what I had heard pass the Wednesday before, between sir John Croke and this Larimore, and coming to sir John's house, I saw a paper lying upon the hall-table, full of writing, and Larimore with the constable, and several others, had brought Mr. Hawkins before sir John Croke, who committing Mr. Hawkins for robbing Larimore, as he pretended, took up the said paper and read it to the constable, and said, that it was Mr. Hawkins's Mitimus, which said Mitimus was written before Mr. Hawkins came to sir John Croke, as all that were there can justify. And on Sunday morning I went to an ale-house, where they had kept Mr. Hawkins all night, and there I saw Mr. H. go to the gaol, and then my heart began to tremble, and yet I durst not discover any thing of what I heard; but coming home, I said to sir John Croke, Sir, What, they have carried the poor parson to gaol? Sir John Croke replied, Yes, let him go, and the devil go with him, and more shall follow after; have I not often told you, that if my brother Larimore and I did but lay our heads together, none are able to stand against us? I replied, Yes, sir John, I have often heard you say so, but I never believed it until now.

L. C. B. Mr. Brown, is all this true which you have related?

Mr. Brown. Yes, my lord, all that I have said is true, and there sits sir John Croke (pointing to him with his finger), who knows that every word that I have said is true.

L. C. B. If but ever a word that Mr. Brown says be true, it is as foul a conspiracy as ever was heard of.

About this time sir John Croke stole away from the bench, without taking his leave of my Lord Chief Baron, or any of the Justices.

My L. C. B. said, Is this sir John Croke a gentleman, and contrives such plots as this? I never in all my days heard of the like: But I think once in this place I met with one something like it, but this far exceeds that, if this be true that Mr. Brown hath said.

But you of this Jury, there is an honest man (said my lord, pointing to Mr. Wilcox) he overthrows all; if that be true which he said, then all that is false which Larimore, his son, and sister hath sworn.

Larimore said, My lord what I have sworn, as to Mr. Hawkins is true.

Mr. L. C. B. replied, Come, Larimore, thou art a very villain.

Larimore said, I wish that the ground may open, and swallow me, if any thing that I have sworn against Mr. Hawkins is false.

L. C. B. replied, Come, come, Larimore, thou art a very villain; nay, I think thou art a devil.

Hawkins. I hope your honour, and this jury, are by this time fully convinced, that sir John Croke is concerned in this plot; for, my lord, he hath appeared all along to be the grand contriver of it, as appears by Mr. Brown's testimony, and by what he said to Larimore before me and others. See their charge in those words.

L. C. B. Hale replied, I am fully satisfied, and so (I think) are all that heard it: And he said to the justices, Gentlemen, where is this sir John Croke? They replied, he is gone.

L. C. B. Is sir John Croke gone? He said, gentlemen, I must not forget to acquaint you (for I thought that sir John Croke had been here still), that this sir John Croke sent me this morning two sugar-loaves for a present, praying me to excuse his absence yesterday. I did not then know, so well as now, what he meant by them; but to save his credit, I sent his sugar-loaves back again. Mr. Harvey, did you not send sir John his sugar-loaves back again?

Clerk of the Assize. Yes, my lord, they were sent back again.

L. C. B. I cannot think that sir John Croke believes that the king's justices come into the country to take bribes. I rather think, that some other person (having a design to put a trick upon him) sent them in his name. And so taking the letter out of his bosom, shewing it to the justices, said, Gentlemen, do you know this hand? To which some of them replied, they believed it might be sir John Croke's own hand; which letter being compared with his Mittimus (for he had no clerk) and some other of his writings there it plainly appeared to be his own hand. So my L. C. B. seeing that (putting up the letter again into his bosom), said, he intended to carry that to London; and he added farther, that he would relate the foulness of the business, as he found occasions fit for it.

L. C. B. said, Mr. Hawkins, have you any more?

Hawk. My lord, I hope that the jury, and your lordship, is fully satisfied as to my innocence, if so, my lord; but if not, I humbly desire to know wherein I have not given full satisfaction, if any thing else shall be alledged against me, I humbly crave time and leave to answer it; for, my lord, I am confident, I can give a fuller satisfaction, if what I have said already be too short.

L. C. B. You of the Jury, what do you think? The prisoner at the bar desires to know whether you are satisfied as to the indictment; if not, you may do well to declare wherein you are not satisfied.

Jury. It is a very plain case, my lord.

L. C. B. And I think so too; but it is a very foul one.

L. C. B. said to me, Sir, have you any more?

Hawk. My lord, I humbly thank your honour and the court, for that great patience and liberty I have had, and intend to say no more, but with Quintilian I conclude, 'innocentia melior est quàm eloquentia,' innocence is better than eloquence.

My Lord Chief Baron HALE's Directions to the Jury were to this effect:

L. C. B. said, You that are of the jury, the prisoner at the bar stands indicted for robbing this Larimore, and you have heard at large both the prosecutor's evidence to prove him guilty (which if you do believe) I never heard a fuller. And 2dly, You have also heard the prisoner's defence, wherein (as I think) he hath as fully answered the same charge. I shall, First, repeat the evidence against him, which consists of two branches; the first is the prosecutor's proof of this indictment; and secondly, his charging him with other crimes of the like nature, as the stealing of Chilton's boots, and the picking of Noble's pocket.

1. For to prove him guilty of robbing him, he observes this method:

First, He himself swears, that he saw the prisoner at the bar commit the robbery.

Secondly, His son and sister swear, that they saw him run out of the house at the same time.

Thirdly, He brings in four or five persons that swear the gold ring, and the five-shilling piece, was found in the house of him that is now the prisoner at the bar.

Fourthly and Lastly, He proves by two witnesses, that the gold ring and the five-shilling piece was pawned to him.

And for the first of these, Larimore swears, that upon Friday the 18th of September last past, he lockt his doors, between twelve and one of the clock at noon, and went out (leaving no body at home) to pluck hemp, about two furlongs from his house, where he stayed with the rest of his family till within an hour and a half of sunset; at which time, he coming home, found his doors open, and ran up into his chamber, and there through the chinks of the loft-boards he swears that he saw the prisoner, now at the bar, ransacking and rifling of a box, in which was at that time a holland apron, and a purse, in which purse was two gold rings, two pieces of gold, and nineteen shillings in silver, all which said rings, gold, and silver, with the said apron, he swears that he did see the prisoner now at the bar turn out of the said purse, take, and feloniously carry away, except one piece or two of the silver, and shews the very purse out of which he saw him take them. If you compare the evidence with the Indictment you may see the policy of the prosecutor; for he would gladly seem a moderate prosecutor, by indicting him for felony only, as the stealing of rings and money, &c. But by his evidence he would as gladly charge him with burglary also, for he swears, he broke open or picked the locks of his doors, and box, which by law is the same.

And Secondly, To corroborate this his evidence, he brings in two witnesses more, viz. his son, and sister. Beamsley, and they swear that they did, at the same time, see the prisoner that is now at the bar run out of Larimore's house, with a great bunch of keys in his hand, and he hid himself amongst beana and weeds: and note the keys, to intimate that, by the help of those, he picked Larimore's locks.

Thirdly, He brings in his son, Dodsworth Croke, the constable, and tithing-man, which all swear that they found this gold ring and five shilling piece of silver in a basket hanging upon a pin, in the house of the prisoner at the bar with a few eggs, which the prisoner at the bar the day before had stolen from him.

And Fourthly and Lastly, He brings in one of Sir John Croke's sons, and Mr. Good, who swear, that the one pawned the ring, the other the five-shilling piece to Larimore.

Thus Larimore swears he saw the prisoner rob him, his son and sister swear, that they saw him run out of the house, the same time four more swear, they found the ring and five-shilling piece in his house upon search: and lastly two swear that the ring and five-shilling piece was pawned to him. If all this be true, he must needs be guilty; and if so, although I have a great respect for his calling, yet that shall no ways excuse him, but rather aggravate his crime. And thus much touching the Indictment.

And Secondly, He seems to charge him with other acts of the like nature; as, 1. He brings in one Chilton to swear, that the prisoner at the bar did steal a pair of boots from him, and four or five persons swear, that they did hear Chilton say he did. 2. He brings in one Boyce from London, a person, I think, of no great credit; he swears, that he saw the prisoner at the bar about two years ago, have his hand in the pocket of one James Noble, and that Noble said, that he lost a gold ring, and a piece of gold at the same time. This (if true) would render the prisoner now at the bar obnoxious to any jury: thus far the evidence against the prisoner at the bar.

Now we come to the prisoner's Defence, which because it is so full, I shall be the briefer in it. The parts of his Defence were two, as himself observed. 1. He shews how too improbable it is. And 2. How, impossible that he should be guilty of this charge.

First, That it is not likely that Larimore was robbed at all, because he did not declare it to any of his neighbours, as soon as he saw the robbery committed; again, he varies as to the time when it was done, for that he told his brother Beamsley, that he had lost the ring and five-shilling piece, before there was any difference between him and the prisoner at the bar, as appears by Mr. Wilcox, and that difference began in Michaelmas term, 1667: and before sir John Croke he confessed that he had lost this a month before the prisoner (viz. Mr. Hawkins) was committed, which must be about the 19th of August, 1668. And in court he swears that, he saw the prisoner at the bar rob him of the same gold ring, and five-shilling piece of silver, upon Friday the 18th of September 1668, an hour and half before sunset; all this cannot be true; and for the warrant, that bears date a day before the robbery was committed. Whereupon the judge said to Larimore, Come, thou art a cunning fellow, for thou wentest to sir Richard Pigot for a warrant on the 17th day and was not robbed until the 18th day; Larimore, thou knewest, it seems, upon the 17th day, that thou shouldst be robbed on the 18th day, that the prisoner now at the bar should rob thee: surely, thou canst divine, if all this be true. Again, it is likely, that when the prisoner at the bar was charged with flat felony at his own doors, the constable likewise threatening to break open his house to search, if he had been guilty, his wife and himself having the opportunity of going abroad after they had so charged him, while they were gone to consult with sir John Croke, as the prisoner at the bar sufficiently proved they did, by the testimony of several witnesses, (as Mr. Read, Mr. Sanders, and others) that in all that time he would not have made his escape, or at least found a more convenient place to convey a ring, and five-shilling piece, than to let it remain all that time in a little basket with a few eggs, hanging on a pin? Again, who came first into the room where this egg-basket hung? Why, Larimore. And who took down the basket? Larimore. Who turned out the eggs? Larimore. And who had the dressing of the eggs? Larimore. He is a special cook. You gentlemen of the jury, it is an easy thing for Larimore to juggle a ring and five shilling piece into a basket, he being the first that came into the room; as he put up his hand to take down the basket, he might with ease enough convey such things as those were into it. All this, and many more, are probable circumstances to move you and me to believe, that it is not possible that the prisoner at the bar is guilty of this robbery; but that I must leave to you to consider of.

Again, The Prisoner at the bar proves the whole business to be but a mere contrivance of sir John Croke's and this Larimore's, on purpose to ruin him, as is fully made manifest by the testimony of Mr. Brown, who justifies, that upon Wednesday the 16th of September last past, and but two days before this pretended robbery, he heard sir John Croke advise this Larimore to fetch a warrant to search the house of the prisoner at the bar, and then to convey gold and silver into it; which having done, charge him with flat felony, and bring him before the said sir John Croke, and no other justice, he then promising to the said Larimore to commit him to the gaol without bail, and hang him at the next assizes, which is now: And, as I take it, they do aim at it. You of t if you do believe what Mr. Brown saith, it is as foul a conspiracy as ever was heard of: And I am apt to think it may be probable, because that sir John Croke and Larimore did threaten to cast this Mr. Brown into prison, and so ruin him, if he came down and testified his knowledge about this business, which thing is of a very ill consequence. Again, it seems likely that Mr. Brown may be credited, if you compare their actions with the times; for upon Tuesday sir John arrested the prisoner upon a feigned action of 100*l*. Upon Wednesday the plot was concluded upon by sir John Croke and Larimore, as may appear by Mr. Brown's testimony. On Thursday they procured of sir Richard Pigott the warrant to search. On Friday, Larimore pretends that he was robbed (though in truth there appears no such thing). Upon Saturday the prisoner's house was broke open, and he apprehended; and upon Sunday he was carried to the gaol: It was a good week's work. But there is an honest man, said my lord chief baron (pointing at Mr. Wilcox), he knocks down all; for he justifies, that he came to Larimore's house upon Friday the 18th of September last past, (it being the same day that he swears he saw the prisoner at the bar robbing him, and an hour and half before sun-set) and there continued till it was near night; and he further saith, that Larimore was with him all that afternoon. And he said, that Larimore was not robbed that afternoon, nor was Mr. Hawkins there at that time. If this that Mr. Wilcox saith be true, then all that Larimore, his son, and sister hath sworn must need be false.

And as touching the boots, Chilton swears that he had legged a pair of boots for the prisoner at the bar, and laid them in his shop window, for him to take along with him as he went by, which he did, and paid him for his work; and yet this Larimore, sir John Croke, Croxstone, and others, did use their utmost endeavours to stir up this Chilton to indict the prisoner at the bar for stealing of them (Croxstone promising him to bear him out in it). This can argue nothing else but malice in those persons: And for that which Boyce swears, is a story that can argue nothing else; for neither is Noble here to prosecute, nor can Boyce swear that the prisoner at the bar did pick his pocket, or that Noble ever said he did.

Thus I have repeated the Evidence to prove him guilty, and have not I think omitted any thing in it that is material. Which if you do believe, he must needs be guilty. And also the prisoner's defence, which I think is sufficient. It is a plain case, and I suppose you need not go from the bar; but that I leave to you.

And so the Jury not stirring from the bar, which the Clerk observing, he called the Jury, who severally answered to their names; which being done, the Clerk of the Arraignments asked whether they were all agreed upon their verdict.

Jury. Yes, we are all agreed.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. Our Foreman.

Clerk. Robert Hawkins, hold up thy hand. Which I did.—Jury, look upon the prisoner at the bar, How say you? Is he Guilty of the Felony whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman of the Jury said, Not Guilty, my lord.

L. C. B. Hale said to the Jury, You have found like honest men: I do believe, that he is not guilty. And he said to Larimore, Thou art a very villain.

Gaoler said, Is Mr. Hawkins, my lord, discharged of his imprisonment?

L. C. B. replied, Yes, yes, he is discharged, paying his fees.

Hawk. May it please your honour, my lord, I am poor; and this, with other troubles, which they have unjustly occasioned, hath cost me a great deal of money already.

L. C. B. I cannot help that, nor can I give away other mens' rights; if they will not remit their fees, you must pay them.

Hawk. I humbly thank your honour, and shall observe your lordship's commands.

And so the Court arose, there being no other business but my trial the while morning, which lasted from eight until one. So as soon as my trial was over, sir John Croke, Larimore, and the rest of that crew, fled privately out of Ailesbury, and durst not stay.

formation, especially of Public Acts; and well knowing, how industrious some will be, to mis-represent this Trial to the disadvantage of the cause and prisoners, it was thought requisite, in defence of both, and for the satisfaction of the people, to make it more public; nor can there be any business wherein the people of England are more concerned, than in that which relates to their civil and religious liberties, questioned in the persons above named, at the Old-Bailey, the 1st, 3rd, 4th, and 5th, of Sept. 1670.”]

seph Sheldon, aldermen; John Smith and James Edwards, sheriffs; and Richard Browne, Crier. ‘O Yes! Thomas Veer, Edward Bushel, John Hammond, Charles Milson, Gregory Walklet, John Brightman, William Plumsted, Henry Henley, Thomas Damask, Henry Michel, William Lever, John Bailly, you shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make betwixt our sovereign lord the king, and the prisoners at the bar, according to your evidence. So help you God.’

The Indictment sets forth, ‘That William Penn, Gent. and William Mead, late of London, linen draper, with divers other persons to the jurors unknown, to the number of 300, the 14th day of August in the 22d

TO THE ENGLISH READER.

“If ever it were time to speak or write, it is now, so many strange occurrences requiring both. How much thou art concerned in this ensuing Trial, where not only the Prisoners, but the Fundamental Laws of England, have been most arbitrarily arraigned, read, and thou mayest plainly judge.

“Liberty of Conscience is counted a pretence for Rebellion, and religious assemblies, routs, and riots; and the defenders of both, are them, reputed factious and disaffected.

“Magna Charta, is Magna f—— with the Recorder of London; and to demand right an affront to the court.

“Will and Power are their great charter, but to call for England’s, is a crime, incurring the penalty of their Bale-dock, and Nasty-hole, nay, the menace of a Gag, and Iron Shackles too.

“The Jury, though proper judges of law and fact, they would have over-ruled in both, as if their Verdict signified no more, than to echo back the illegal Charge of the Bench; and because their courage and honesty did more than hold pace with the threat and abuse of those, who sat as judges, after two days and two nights restraint for a verdict, in the end were fined and imprisoned, for giving it.

“O! what monstrous, and illegal proceedings are these? Who reasonably can call his coat his own? When property is made subservient to the will and interest of his judges; or, who can truly esteem himself a free man? When all pleas for liberty are esteemed sedition, and the laws, that give, and maintain them, so many insignificant pieces of formality.

“And what do they less than plainly tell us so, who at will and pleasure break open our locks, rob our houses, raze their foundations, imprison our persons, and finally deny us justice to our relief; as if they then acted most like christian men, when they were most barbarous, in ruining such, as really are so; and hat no sacrifice could be so acceptable to God, as the destruction of those, that most fear him.

“In short, That the conscientious should only be obnoxious, and the just demand of our religious liberty, the reason, why we should be denied our civil freedom, as if to be a Christian and an Englishman were inconsistent, and that so much solicitude and deep contrivance, should be employed only, to ensnare, and ruin, so many ten thousand conscientious families, so eminently industrious, serviceable, and exemplary, whilst murder can so easily obtain pardons, rapes be remitted, public uncleanness pass unpunished, and all manner of levity, prodigality, excess, profaneness, and atheism, universally connived at; if not in some respect manifestly encouraged, cannot but be detestably abhorrent, to every serious and honest mind.

“Yet that this lamentable state is true, and the present project in hand, let the London’s Recorder, and Canterbury’s Chaplain be heard.

“The first in his public panegyric, upon the ‘Spanish Inquisition, highly admiring the prudence of the Romish Church, in the erection of it, as an excellent way to prevent Schism,’ which unhappy expression, at once passeth sentence, both against our fundamental laws, and Protestant Reformation.

“The second, in his printed mercenary Discourse against Toleration, asserting for a main principle, ‘That it would be less injurious to the government, to dispense with prophane and loose persons, than to allow a toleration to religious dissenters.’ It were to over-do the business, to say any more, where there is so much said already.

“And therefore to conclude, we cannot choose but admonish all, as well persecutors to relinquish their heady, partial, and inhuman prosecutions, as what will certainly issue in disgrace here, and inevitable condign punishment hereafter, as those who yet dare express their moderation, however out of fashion, or made the brand of fanaticism, not to be baffled, or menaced, out of that excellent temper, to make their parts, and persons subservient to the base humours, and sinister designs of the biggest mortal upon earth: But to reverence and obey the eternal just God, before whose great tribunal all must render their accounts, and where he will recompense to every person according to his works.”

year of the king, about eleven of the clock in the forenoon, the same day, with force and arms, &c. in the parish of St. Bennet Grace-church in Bridge-ward, London, in the street called Grace-church street, unlawfully and tumultuously did assemble and congregate themselves together, to the disturbance of the peace of the said lord the king: and the aforesaid William Penn and William Mead, together with other persons to the jurors aforesaid unknown, then and there so assembled and congregated together; the aforesaid William Penn, by agreement between him and William Mead before made; and by abetment of the aforesaid William Mead, then and there, in the open street, did take upon himself to preach and speak, and then and there did preach and speak unto the aforesaid William Mead, and other persons there, in the street aforesaid, being assembled and congregated together, by reason whereof a great concourse and tumult of people in the street aforesaid, then and there, a long time did remain and continue, in contempt of the said lord the king, and of his law, to the great disturbance of his peace; to the great terror and disturbance of many of his liege people and subjects, to the ill example of all others in the like case offenders, and against the peace of the said lord the king, his crown and dignity.

What say you, William Penn and William Mead, are you Guilty, as you stand indicted, in manner and form, as aforesaid, or Not Guilty?

Penn. It is impossible that we should be able to remember the Indictment verbatim, and therefore we desire a copy of it, as is customary on the like occasions.

Recorder. You must first plead to the indictment, before you can have a copy of it.

Penn. I am unacquainted with the formality of the law, and therefore before I shall answer directly, I request two things of the court. 1. That no advantage may be taken against me, nor I deprived of any benefit, which I might otherwise have received. 2. That you will promise me a fair hearing, and liberty of making my defence.

Court. No advantage shall be taken against you; you shall have liberty; you shall be Penn. Then I plead Not Guilty in manner and form.

Clerk. What sayest thou, William Mead, art thou Guilty in manner and form, as thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Mead. I shall desire the same liberty as is promised William Penn.

Court. You shall have it.

Mead. Then I plead Not Guilty in manner and form.

The Court adjourned until the afternoon.

Crier. O Yes, &c.

Clerk. Bring William Penn and William Mead to the bar.

Obser. The said Prisoners were brought, but were set aside, and other business prosecuted. Where we cannot choose but observe, that it was the constant and unkind practices of the court to the prisoners to make them wait upon the trials of felons and murderers, thereby designing, in all probability, both to affront and tire them.

After five hours attendance, the court broke up and adjourned to the third instant.

The 3d of September, 1670, the court sat.

Crier. O Yes, &c.

Clerk. Bring William Penn and William Mead to the bar.

Mayor. Sirrah, who bid you put off their hats? put on their hats again.

Obser. Whereupon one of the officers putting the prisoners hats upon their heads (pursuant to the order of the court) brought them to the bar.

Record. Do you know where you are?

Penn. Yes.

Record. Do not you know it is the king's court.

Penn. I know it to be a court, and I suppose it to be the king's court.

Record. Do you not know there is respect due to the court?—Penn. Yes.

Record. Why do you not pay it then?

Penn. I do so.

Record. Why do you not pull off your hat then?

Penn. Because I do not believe that to be any respect.

Record. Well, the court sets forty marks a piece upon your heads, as a fine for your contempt of the court.

Penn. I desire it might be observed, that we came into the court with our hats off (that is, taken off,) and if they have been put on since, it was by order from the bench; and therefore not we, but the bench should be fined.

Mead. I have a question to ask the Recorder: am I fined also?

Record. Yes.

Mead. I desire the Jury, and all people to take notice of this injustice of the recorder. Who spake to me to pull off my hat? and yet hath he put a fine upon my head. O fear the Lord, and dread his power, and yield to the guidance of his holy spirit, for he is not far from every one of you.

The Jury sworn again.

Obser. J. Robinson, lieutenant of the Tower, disingenuously objected against Edward Bushel, as if he had not kissed the book, and therefore would have him sworn again: though indeed it was on purpose to have made use of his tenderness of conscience in avoiding reiterated oaths, to have put him by his being a jurymen, apprehending him to be a person not fit to answer their arbitrary ends.

The Clerk read the Indictment, as aforesaid.

Clerk. Crier, call James Cook into the court, give him his oath.

Clerk. James Cook, lay your hand upon the book: 'The evidence you shall give to the court, betwixt our sovereign the king, and the prisoners at the bar, shall be the truth, and the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God.'

Cook. I was sent for, from the Exchange, to go and disperse a meeting in Gracechurch-Street, where I saw Mr. Penn speaking to the people, but I could not hear what he said, because of the noise: I endeavoured to make way to take him, but I could not get to him for the crowd of people; upon which capt. Mead came to me, about the kennel of the street, and desired me to let him go on; for when he had done, he would bring Mr. Penn to me.

Court. What number do you think might be there?

Cook. About three or four hundred people.

Court. Call Richard Read, give him his oath.

Read being sworn was asked, What do you know concerning the prisoners at the bar?

Read. My lord, I went to Gracechurch-Street, where I found a great crowd of people, and I heard Mr. Penn preach to them; and I saw capt. Mead speaking to lieutenant Cook, but what he said, I could not tell.

Mead. What did William Penn say?

Read. There was such a great noise, that I could not tell what he said.

Mead. Jury, observe this evidence, he saith he heard him preach, and yet saith, he doth not know what he said.

Jury take notice, he swears now a clean contrary thing to what he swore before the mayor when we were committed: for now he swears that he saw me in Gracechurch-Street, and yet swore before the mayor, when I was committed, that he did not see me there. I appeal to the mayor himself, if this be not true. But no answer was given.

Court. What number do you think might be there?

Read. About four or five hundred.

Penn. I desire to know of him what day it was?

Read. The 14th day of August.

Penn. Did he speak to me, or let me know he was there? for I am very sure I never saw him.

Clerk. Crier, call — into the court.

Court. Give him his oath.

— My lord, I saw a great number of people, and Mr. Penn, I suppose, was speaking; I saw him make a motion with his hands, and heard some noise, but could not understand what he said. But for capt. Mead, I did not see him there.

Rec. What say you, Mr. Mead, were you there?

Mead. It is a maxim in your own law, 'Nemo tenetur accusare seipsum,' which if it be not true Latin, I am sure it is true English, 'That no man is bound to accuse himself.' And why dost thou offer to insnare me with such a question? Doth not this shew thy malice? Is this like unto a judge, that ought to be counsel for the prisoner at the bar?

Rec. Sir, hold your tongue, I did not go about to insnare you.

Penn. I desire we may come more close to the point, and that silence be commanded in the court.

Crier. O yes, all manner of persons keep silence upon pain of imprisonment. Silence in the court.

Penn. We confess ourselves to be so far from recanting, or declining to vindicate the assembling of ourselves to preach, pray, or worship the Eternal, Holy, Just God, that we declare to all the world, that we do believe it to be our indispensable duty, to meet incessantly upon so good an account; nor shall all the powers upon earth be able to divert us from reverencing and adoring our God who made us.

Brown. You are not here for worshipping God, but for breaking the law; you do yourselves a great deal of wrong in going on in that discourse.

Penn. I affirm I have broken no law, nor am I guilty of the indictment that is laid to my charge; and to the end the bench, the jury, and myself, with these that hear us, may have a more direct understanding of this procedure, I desire you would let me know by what law it is you prosecute me, and upon what law you ground my indictment.

Rec. Upon the common-law.

Penn. Where is that common-law?

Rec. You must not think that I am able to run up so many years, and over so many adjudged cases, which we call common-law, to answer your curiosity.

Penn. This answer I am sure is very short of my question, for if it be common, it should not be so hard to produce.

Rec. Sir, will you plead to your indictment?

Penn. Shall I plead to an Indictment that hath no foundation in law? If it contain that law you say I have broken, why should you decline to produce that law, since it will be impossible for the jury to determine, or agree to bring in their verdict, who have not the law produced, by which they should measure the truth of this indictment, and the guilt, or contrary of my fact?

Rec. You are a saucy fellow, speak to the Indictment.

Penn. I say, it is my place to speak to matter of law; I am arraigned a prisoner; my liberty, which is next to life itself, is now concerned: you are many mouths and ears against me, and if I must not be allowed to make the best of my case, it is hard, I say again, unless you shew me, and the people, the law you ground your indictment upon, I shall take it for granted your proceedings are merely arbitrary.

Obser. At this time several upon the Bench urged hard upon the Prisoner to bear him down.

Rec. The question is, whether you are Guilty of this Indictment?

Penn. The question is not, whether I am of this Indictment, but whether this Indictment be legal. It is too general and imperfect an answer, to say it is the common-law, unless we knew both where and what it is. For where there is no law, there is no transgression; and that law which is not in being, is so far from being common, that it is no law at all.

Rec. You are an impertinent fellow, will you teach the court what law is? It is 'Lex non scripta,' that which many have studied 30 or 40 years to know, and would you have me to tell you in a moment?

Penn. Certainly, if the common law be so hard to be understood, it is far from being very common; but if the lord Coke in his Institutes be of any consideration, he tells us, That Common-Law is common right, and that Common Right is the Great Charter-Privileges: confirmed 9 Hen. 3, 29, 25 Edw. 1, 12 Ed. 3, 8 Coke Instit. 4 p. 56.

Rec. Sir, you are a troublesome fellow, and it is not for the honour of the court to suffer you to go on.

Penn. I have asked but one question, and you have not answered me; though the rights and privileges of every Englishman be concerned in it.

Rec. If I should suffer you to ask questions till to-morrow morning, you would be never the wiser.

Penn. That is according as the answers are.

Rec. Sir, we must not stand to hear you talk all night.

Penn. I design no affront to the court, but to be heard in my just plea: and I must plainly tell you, that if you will deny me Oyer of that law, which you suggest I have broken, you do at once deny me an acknowledged right, and evidence to the whole world your resolution to sacrifice the privileges of Englishmen to your sinister and arbitrary designs.

Rec. Take him away. My lord, if you take not some course with this pestilent fellow, to stop his mouth, we shall not be able to do any thing to night.

Mayor. Take him away, take him away, turn him into the bale-dock.

Penn. These are but so many vain exclamations; is this justice or true judgment? Must I therefore be taken away because I plead for the fundamental laws of England? However, this I leave upon your consciences, who are of the jury (and my sole judges), that if these ancient fundamental laws, which relate to liberty and property, (and are not limited to particular persuasions in matters of religion) must not be indispensably maintained and observed, who can say he hath right to the coat upon his back? Certainly our liberties are openly to be invaded, our wives to be ravished, our children slaved, our families ruined, and our estates led away in triumph, by every sturdy beggar and malicious informer, as their trophies, but our (pretended) forfeits for conscience sake. The Lord of Heaven and Earth will be judge between us in this matter.

Rec. Be silent there.

Penn. I am not to be silent in a case wherein I am so much concerned, and not only myself, but many ten thousand families besides.

Obser. They having rudely baled him into the Bale-dock, William Mead they left in court, who spake as followeth.

Mead. You men of the jury, here I do now stand, to answer to an Indictment against me, which is a bundle of stuff; full of lies and falsehoods; for therein I am accused that I met 'vi & armis illicite & tumultuose:' time was when I had freedom to use a carnal weapon, and then I thought I feared no man; but now I fear the living God, and dare not make use thereof nor hurt any man; nor do I know I demeaned myself as a tumultuous person: I say, I am a peaceable man, therefore it is a very proper question what William Penn demanded in this case, an oyer of the law, on which our Indictment is grounded.

Rec. I have made answer to that already.

Mead, turning his face to the jury, saith, You men of the jury, who are my judges, if the Recorder will not tell you what makes a riot, a rout, or an unlawful assembly, Coke, he that once they called the lord Coke, tells us what makes a riot, a rout and an unlawful assembly. A riot is when three or more, are met together to beat a man, or to enter forcibly into another man's land, to 'cut down his grass, his wood or break down his pales.

Obser. Here the Recorder interrupted him, and said 'I thank you, sir, that you will tell me what the law is,' scornfully pulling off his hat.

Mead. Thou mayest put on thy hat, I have never a fee for thee now.

Brown. He talks at random, one while an independant, another while some other religion, and now a quaker, and next a papist.

Mead. 'Turpe est doctori cum culpa re-darguit ipsum.'

May. You deserve to have your tongue cut out.

Rec. If you discourse on this manner, I shall take occasion against you.

Mead. Thou didst promise me, I should have fair liberty to be heard? why may I not have the privilege of an Englishman? I am an Englishman, and you might be ashamed of this dealing.

Rec. I look upon you to be an enemy to the laws of England, which ought to be observed and kept, nor are you worthy of such privileges as others have.

Mead. The Lord is judge between me and thee in this matter.

Obser. Upon which they took him away into the Bale-dock, and the Recorder proceeded to give the Jury their charge, as followeth:

Recorder. You have heard what the Indictment is, It is for preaching to the people, and drawing a tumultuous company after them, and Mr. Penn was speaking; if they should not be disturbed, you see they will go on; there are three or four witnesses that have proved this, that he did preach there; that Mr. Mead did allow of it: after this you have heard by substantial witnesses what is said against them: now we are upon the matter of fact, which you are to keep to, and observe, as what hath been fully sworn at your peril.

Obser. The prisoners were put out of the court into the Bale-dock, and the charge given to the jury in their absence, at which W. Penn with a very raised voice, it being a considerable distance from the bench, spake.

Penn. I appeal to the jury who are my Judges, and this great assembly, whether the proceedings of the court are not most arbitrary, and void of all law, in offering to give the jury their charge in the absence of the prisoners; I say it is directly opposite to, and destructive of the undoubted right of every English prisoner, as Coke, in the 2 Instit. 29. on the chap. of Magna Charta.

Obser. The Recorder being thus unexpectedly lashed for his extra judicial procedure, said with an enraged smile, Rec. Why, ye are present, you do hear, do you not?

Penn. No thanks to the court, that commanded me into the Bale-dock; and you of the jury, take notice, that I have not been heard, neither can you legally depart the Court before I have been fully heard, having at last ten or twelve material points to offer, in order to invalidate their Indictment.

Rec. Pull that fellow down, pull him down.

Mead. Are these according to the rights and privileges of Englishmen, that we should not be heard, but turned into the Bale-dock, for making our defence, and the jury to have their charge given them in our absence? I say these are barbarous and unjust proceedings.

Rec. Take them away into the Hole: To hear them talk all night as they would, that I think doth not become the honour of the court and I think you (i. e. the jury) yourselves would be tired out, and not have patience to hear them.

Obser. The Jury were commanded up to agree upon their verdict, the prisoners remaining in the stinking hole. After an hour and a half's time eight came down agreed, but four remained above; the court sent an officer for them, and they accordingly came down. The Bench used many unworthy threats to the four that dissented; and the Recorder, addressing himself to Bushel, said, 'Sir, you are the cause of this disturbance, and manifestly shew yourself an abettor of faction; I shall set a mark upon you, Sir.'

J. Robinson. Mr. Bushel, I have known you near this 14 years; you have thrust yourself upon this jury, because you think there is some service for you: I tell you, you deserve to be indicted more than any man that hath been brought to the bar this day.

Bushel. No, sir John, there were threescore before me, and I would willingly have got off, but could not.

Bloodw. I said, when I saw Mr. Bushel, what I see is come to pass, for I knew he would never yield. Mr. Bushel, we know what you are.

May. Sirrah, you are an impudent fellow, I will put a mark upon you.

Obser. They used much menacing language, and behaved themselves very imperiously to the jury, as persons not more void of justice than sober education: After this barbarous usage, they sent them to consider of bringing in their verdict, and after some considerable time they returned to the Court. Silence was called for, and the jury called by their names, Cler. Are you agreed upon your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Cler. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. Our Foreman.

Clerk. Look upon the prisoners at the bar; how say you? Is William Penn Guilty of the matter whereof he stands indicted in manner and form, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty of speaking in Gracechurch-street.

Court. Is that all?

Foreman. That is all I have in commission.

Rec. You had as good say nothing.

May. Was it not an unlawful assembly? You mean he was speaking to a tumult of people there?

Foreman. My Lord, This is all I had in commission.

Obser. Here some of the jury seemed to buckle to the questions of the Court: upon which, Bushel, Hammond, and some others, opposed themselves, and said, they allowed of no such word as an unlawful assembly in their Verdict; at which the Recorder, Mayor, Robinson and Bloodworth took great occasion to vilify them with most opprobrious language; and this verdict not serving their turns, the Recorder expressed himself thus:

Rec. The law of England will not allow you to part till you have given in your Verdict.

Jury. We have given in our Verdict, and we can give in no other.

Rec. Gentlemen, you have not given in your Verdict, and you had as good say nothing; therefore go and consider it once more, that we may make an end of this troublesome business.

Jury. We desire we may have pen, ink, and paper.

Obser. The Court adjourned for half an hour; which being expired, the Court returns, and the Jury not long after.

The Prisoners were brought to the bar, and the Jury's names called over.

Clerk. Are you agreed of your Verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. Our Foreman.

Clerk. What say you? Look upon the prisoners: Is William Penn Guilty in manner and form, as he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Here is our Verdict; holding forth a piece of paper to the clerk of the peace, which follows.

'We the jurors, hereafter named, do find William Penn to be Guilty of speaking or preaching to an assembly, met together in Gracechurch-street, the 14th of August last, 1670. And that William Mead is Not Guilty of the said Indictment.' Foreman Thomas Veer, Edward Bushel, John Hammond, Henry Henley, Charles Milson, Gregory Walklet, John Bailly, William Lever, Henry Michel, John Brightman, James Damask, Wil. Plumsted.

Obser. This both Mayor and Recorder represented at so high a rate, that they exceeded the bounds of all reason and civility.

Mayor. What, will you be led by such a silly fellow as Bushel? an impudent canting fellow? I warrant you, you shall come no more upon juries in haste: You are a foreman indeed, addressing himself to the foreman, I thought you had understood your place better.

Recorder. Gentlemen, you shall not be dismissed till we have a verdict that the court will accept; and you shall be locked up, without meat, drink, fire, and tobacco; you shall not think thus to abuse the court; we will have a verdict, by the help of God, or you shall starve for it.

Penn. My jury, who are my judges, ought not to be thus menaced; their verdict should be free, and not compelled; the bench ought to wait upon them, but not forestal them. I do desire that justice may be done me, and that the arbitrary resolves of the bench may not be made the measure of my jury's verdict.

Recorder. Stop that prating fellow's mouth, or put him out of the court.

Mayor. You have heard that he preached, that he gathered a company of tumultuous people, and that they do not only disobey the martial power, but civil also.

Penn. It is a great mistake; we did not make the tumult, but they that interrupted us: The jury cannot be so ignorant, as to think, that we met there, with a design to disturb the civil peace, since (1st) we were by force of arms kept out of our lawful house, and met as near it in the street as their soldiers would give us leave; and (2dly) because it was no new thing (nor with the circumstances expressed in the indictment), but what was usual and customary with us: it is very well known that we are a peaceable people, and cannot offer violence to any man.

Obser. The court being ready to break up, and willing to huddle the prisoners to their gaol, and the jury to their chamber, Penn spoke as follows:

Penn. The agreement of 12 men is a verdict in law, and such a one being given by the jury, I require the clerk of the peace to record it, as he will answer it at his peril. And if the jury bring in another verdict contradictory to this, I affirm they are perjured men in law: And looking upon the jury, said, You are Englishmen, mind your privilege, give not away your right.

Bush. &c. Nor will we ever do it.

Obser. One of the jury-men pleaded indisposition of body, and therefore desired to be dismissed.

Mayor. You are as strong as any of them; starve them; and hold your principles.

Recorder. Gentlemen, You must be contented with your hard fate, let your patience overcome it; for the court is resolved to have a verdict, and that before you can be dismissed.

Jury. We are agreed, we are agreed, we are agreed.

Obser. The court swore several persons, to keep the Jury all night without meat, drink, fire, or any other accommodation; they had not so much as a chamber-pot, though desired.

Crier. O Yes, &c.

Obser. The court adjourns till 7 of the clock next morning (being the 4th instant, vulgarly called Sunday, at which time the prisoners were brought to the bar: The court sat, and the Jury called to bring in their verdict.

Crier. O Yes, &c.—Silence in the court, upon pain of imprisonment.

The Jury's names called over.

Clerk. Are you agreed upon your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Clerk. What say you? Look upon the prisoners at the bar; is William Penn guilty of the matter whereof he stands indicted, in manner and form as aforesaid, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. William Penn is Guilty of speaking in Gracechurch-Street.

Mayor. To an unlawful assembly?

Bush. No, my lord, we give no other verdict than what we gave last night; we have no other verdict to give.

Mayor. You are a factious fellow, I'll take a course with you.

Blood. I knew Mr. Bushel would not yield.

Bush. Sir Thomas, I have done according to my conscience.

Mayor. That conscience of yours would cut my throat.

Bush. No, my lord, it never shall.

Mayor. But I will cut yours so soon as I can.

Recorder. He has inspired the jury; he has the spirit of divination, methinks I feel him; I will have a positive verdict, or you shall starve for it.

Penn. I desire to ask the Recorder one question, Do you allow of the verdict given of William Mead?

Recorder. It cannot be a verdict, because you were indicted for a conspiracy, and one being found Not Guilty, and not the other, it could not be a verdict.

Penn. If Not Guilty be not a verdict, then you make of the jury and Magna Charta but a mere nose of wax.

Mead. How! is Not Guilty no verdict?

Rec. No, it is no Verdict.

Penn. I affirm, that the consent of a jury is a Verdict in law; and if William Mead be Not Guilty, it consequently follows, that I am clear, since you have indicted us of a conspiracy, and I could not possibly conspire alone.

Obser. There were many passages, that could not be taken, which past between the Jury and the Court. The Jury went up again, having received a fresh charge from the Bench, if possible to extort an unjust Verdict.

Cry. O Yes, &c. Silence in the Court.

Court. Call over the Jury. Which was done.

Clerk. What say you? Is William Penn Guilty of the matter whereof he stands indicted, in manner and form aforesaid, or Not Guilty?

Forem. Guilty of speaking in Gracechurch-street.

Rec. What is this to the purpose? I say, I will have a verdict. And speaking to Edw. Bushel, said, You are a factious fellow; I will set a mark upon you; and whilst I have any thing to do in the city, I will have an eye upon you.

Mayor. Have you no more wit than to be led by such a pitiful fellow? I will cut his nose.

Penn. It is intolerable that my jury should be thus menaced: Is this according to the fundamental laws? Are not they my proper judges by the Great Charter of England? What hope is there of ever having justice done, when juries are threatened, and their verdicts rejected? I am concerned to speak, and grieved to see such arbitrary proceedings. Did not the lieutenant of the Tower render one of them worse than a felon? And do you not plainly seem to condemn such for factious fellows, who answer not your ends? Unhappy are those juries, who are threatened to be fined, and starved, and ruined, if they give not in Verdicts contrary to their consciences.

Rec. My lord, you must take a course with that same fellow.

Mayor. Stop his mouth; gaoler, bring fetters, and stake him to the ground.

Penn. Do your pleasure, I matter not your fetters.

Rec. Till now I never understood the reason of the policy and prudence of the Spaniards, in suffering the inquisition among them: And certainly it will never be well with us, till something like unto the Spanish inquisition be in England.

Obser. The jury being required to go together to find another Verdict, and stedfastly refusing it (saying they could give no other Verdict than what was already given) the Recorder in great passion was running off the bench, with these words in his mouth, 'I protest I will sit here no longer to hear these things;' at which the Mayor calling, Stay, stay, he returned, and directed himself unto the Jury, and spoke as followeth:

Rec. Gentlemen, we shall not be at this trade always with you: you will find the next sessions of parliament there will be a law made, that those that will not conform shall not have the protection of the law. Mr. Lee, draw up another Verdict, that they may bring it in special.

Lee. I cannot tell how to do it.

Jury. We ought not to be returned, having all agreed, and set our hands to the Verdict.

Rec. Your Verdict is nothing, you play upon the Court; I say you shall go together, and bring in another Verdict, or you shall starve; and I will have you carted about the city, as in Edward 3rd's time.

Forem. We have given in our Verdict, and all agreed to it; and if we give in another, it will be a force upon us to save our lives.

Mayor. Take them up.

Offic. My Lord, they will not go up.

Obser. The Mayor spoke to the sheriff, and he came off his seat, and said, Sher. Come, gentlemen, you must go up; you see I am commanded to make you go.

Obser. Upon which the Jury went up; and several sworn to keep them without any accommodation, as aforesaid, till they brought in their Verdict.

Cry. O yes, &c. The Court adjourns till tomorrow morning, at 7 o'clock.

Obser. The prisoners were remanded to Newgate, where they remained till next morning, and then were brought unto the Court, which being sat, they proceeded as followeth.

Cry. O yes, &c. Silence in the Court, upon pain of imprisonment.

Cler. Set William Penn and William Mead to the bar. Gentlemen of the Jury, answer to your names; Tho. Veer, Edw. Bushel, John Hammond, Henry Henly, Henry Mitchell, John Brightman, Charles Milson, Gregory Walklet, John Bailly, William Leaver, James Damask, William Plumstead. Are you all agreed of your Verdict?—Jury. Yes.

Cler. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. Our foreman.

Cler. Look upon the prisoners. What say you? Is William Penn Guilty of the matter whereof he stands indicted, in manner and form, &c. or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Here is our Verdict in writing, and our hands subscribed.

Obser. The clerk took the Paper, but was stopt by the Recorder from reading of it; and he commanded to ask for a positive Verdict.

Foreman. That is our Verdict; we have subscribed to it.

Cler. How say you? is William Penn Guilty, &c. or Not Guilty.

Foreman. Not Guilty.

Cler. How say you? is William Mead Guilty, &c. or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

Cler. Then hearken to your Verdict; you say that William Penn is Not Guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted; you say that William Mead is Not Guilty in manner and form as he stands indicted, and so you say all?

Jury. Yes, we do so.

Obser. The Bench being unsatisfied with the Verdict, commanded that every person should distinctly answer to their names, and give in their Verdict, which they unanimously did in saying, Not Guilty, to the great satisfaction of the assembly.

Rec. I am sorry, gentlemen, you have followed your own judgments and opinions, rather than the good and wholesome advice which was given you; God keep my life out of your hands, but for this* the Court fines you

40 marks a man; and imprisonment till paid. At which Penn stepped up towards the bench, and said:

Penn. I demand my liberty, being freed by the Jury.

Mayor. No, you are in for your fines.

Penn. Fines, for what?

Mayor. For contempt of the Court.

Penn. I ask, if it be according to the fundamental laws of England, that any English-

* See Throgmorton's Case, vol. 1, p. 901; and the Case of Lilburne's Jury, Aug. 1653, ante, vol. 5, p. 415.

"The practice heretofore in use of fining, imprisoning or otherwise punishing jurors, merely at the discretion of the court, for finding their verdict contrary to the direction of the judge, was arbitrary, unconstitutional and illegal; and is treated as such by sir Thomas Smith, 200 years ago; who accounted such doings to be very violent, tyrannical and contrary to the liberty and custom of the realm of England. [Smith's Commonw. l. 3, c. 1.] For, as sir Matthew Hale well observes [2 Hal. P. C. 313.] it would be a most unhappy case for the judge himself, if the prisoner's fate depended upon his directions:—unhappy also for the prisoner; for if the judge's opinion must rule the verdict, the trial by jury would be useless. Yet in many instances [1 Lev. 9. T. Jones, 163.] where contrary to evidence the jury have found the prisoner Guilty, their verdict hath been mercifully set aside, and a new trial granted by the court of King's-bench; for in such case, as hath been said, it cannot be set right by attain. But there hath yet been no instance of granting a new trial, where the prisoner was acquitted upon the first [2 Hawk. P. C. 142]." Blackst. Comm. b. 4, c. 27, p. 361.

"If a bill be against A. for murder, and the grand inquest upon the evidence before them, or their own knowledge be satisfied that it was but per infortunium or se defendendo, and accordingly return the bill specially, the court may remand them to consider better of it, or may hear the evidence at the bar, and accordingly direct the grand inquest; but I have known a judge blamed for setting a fine upon the grand inquest for such a return, because in truth it comes not up to felony.

"But if a bill goes out against B. for murder, and it doth constare de persona occidentis, may the grand inquest find the bill for manslaughter and ignoramus for the murder? and is the court bound to receive such a return?

"In this case, of all hands it is agreed [upon this Emlyn remarks, "This is far from being agreed of all hands, for such an anticipation of the evidence by the grand jury is what they cannot avoid, they being bound by their oath as much as the petit jury, to present the whole truth and nothing but the truth; nor do they in this case so properly determine matter of law as matter of fact; for whether murder or not depends upon a preconceived malice, which though it is to be presumed, where no provocation appears, is matter of fact, and proper for the consideration of a jury."'] that the grand jury is to blame, because they take upon them to anticipate the evidence that is to be given to the petit jury, and so determine matter of law which belongs to the court to determine, and by this means many murders may escape under the disguise of manslaughter, and so escape with their clergy.

"Some therefore have made it a practice to set a fine upon the grand jury in this case, and it hath proceeded so far as to fine petit juries also in such like cases; whereof hereafter.

"That which I think herein and in other concealments of grand inquest, is as follows:

"1. That the court may receive such a return from the grand inquest, and it is a matter of discretion, especially if upon inquiry from the indictors or witnesses, or upon view of their examinations it doth plainly appear, that the crime amounts to no more.

"2. That barely upon such a return no fine can be set upon the grand inquest, unless the evidence to the grand inquest be given at the bar in the presence of the court; for otherwise the court cannot understand whether the grand inquest doth well or ill in such case.

"3. That if the evidence to the grand inquest be given at the bar upon an indictment in the King's-bench, and the grand inquest will not find a bill according to the direction of that court; as for instance, will find a man Guilty only se defendendo, or of manslaughter when it is murder, that court may set a fine upon the grand inquest, and so it hath been practised; for it is the highest court in England of ordinary justice, especially in criminal causes.

"4. That if the justices of Oyer and Terminer or gaol-delivery, having heard the evidence at the bar, the grand inquest will not find according to their directions, the justices may bind them over by recognizance into the King's-bench, and upon an information against them they may be fined.

"5. That in such a case justices of peace, Oyer and Terminer or gaol-delivery may, according to the statute of 3 H. 7, c. 1, impanel another inquest to enquire of their concealments, and thereupon set fines upon them.

"6. But in my opinion fines set upon grand inquests by justices of the peace, Oyer and Terminer or gaol-delivery for concealments or man should be fined or amerced, but by the judgment of his peers or jury; since it expressly contradicts the 11th and 29th chapters of the Great Charter of England, which say, 'No freeman ought to be amerced but by the oath of good and lawful men of the vicinage.'

Rec. Take him away, take him away, take him out of the Court.

Penn. I can never urge the fundamental laws of England, but you cry, 'Take him away, take him away.' But it is no wonder, since the Spanish Inquisition hath so great a place in the Recorder's heart. God Almighty, who is just, will judge you all for these things.

Observ. They hauled the prisoners into the Bale-dock, and from thence sent them to Newgate, for non-payment of their fines; and so were their JURY. But the JURY were afterwards discharged upon an Habeas Corpus, returnable in the Common-Pleas, where their commitment was adjudged illegal.

non-presentments in any other manner, are not warrantable by law; and though the late practice hath been for such justices to set fines arbitrarily, yea not only upon grand inquests, but also upon the petit jury in criminal causes, if they find not according to their directions, it weighs not much with me for those reasons; 1. Because I have seen arbitrary practice still go from one thing to another, the fines set upon grand inquests began, then they set fines upon the petit juries for not finding according to the directions of the court; then afterwards the judges of nisi prius proceeded to fine jurors in civil causes, if they gave not a verdict according to direction even in points of fact; this was done by a judge of assize [Justice Hyde at Oxford. Vaugh. 115.] in Oxfordshire, and the fine esteated; but I, by the advice of most of the judges of England, staid process upon that fine: the like was done by the same judge in a case of burglary, the fine was esteated into the Exchequer; but by the like advice I staid process; and in the case of Wagstaff [Vaugh. 153.] and other jurors fined at the Old Bailey, for giving a verdict contrary to direction, by the advice of all the judges of England (only one dissenting) it was ruled to be against law: but of this hereafter [c. 42.] 2. My second reason is, because the statute of 3 H. 7, c. 1, prescribes a way for their fining, which would not have been if they had been arbitrarily subject to a fine before. 3. It is of very ill consequence, for the privilege of an Englishman is, that his life shall not be drawn in danger without due presentment or indictment, and this would be but a slender screen or safe-guard, if every justice of peace, or commissioner of Oyer and Terminer or gaol-delivery, may make the grand jury present what he pleases, or otherwise fine them; and there is no parity of reason or example between inferior judges and the court of King's-bench, which is the supreme ordinary court of justice in such cases." 2 Hale's P. C. 158.

The following Article was subjoined to the account of this Trial printed in 1670:

An APPENDIX by way of DEFENCE for the PRISONERS, as what might have been offered against the Indictment and illegal Proceedings of the Court thereon, had they not violently over-ruled and stopped them.

UPON a sober disquisition into the several parts of the Indictment, we find it so wretchedly defective, as if it were nothing else but a mere composition of error, rather calculated to the malicious designs of the judges, than to the least verity of fact committed by the prisoners.

To prove this, what we say will be a main help to discover the arbitrary proceedings of the bench in their frequent menaces to the jury; as if it were not so much their business to try, as to condemn the prisoners; and that not so much for any fact they had committed, as what the court would have suggested to the jury to have been their fact.

Sec. 1. It is the constant common law of England, that no man should be taken, imprisoned, amerced, disseized of his free-hold, of his liberties or free customs, but by the judgment of his peers, which are vulgarly called a Jury, from Jurare, because they are sworn to do right.

Sec. 2. The only assistance that is given the Jury, in order to a verdict, is:

First, the Evidence given of the fact committed, by the person indicted.

Secondly, the knowledge of that law, act or statute the Indictment is grounded upon, and which the prisoners are said to have transgressed.

Sec. 3. We shall neglect to mention here how much they were deprived of that just advantage the ancient equal laws of England do allow, designing it for a conclusion of the whole, and shall only speak here to matter of fact and law.

Sec. 4. The evidence, you have read in the trial, the utmost import of which, is no more than this; That William Penn was speaking in Gracious-street, to an assembly of people, but knew not what he said, which is so great a contradiction, as he that runs may read it: for no man can say another man preaches, and yet understand not what he saith: he may conjecture it, but that is a lame evidence in law; it might as well have been sworn, that he was speaking of law, physic, trade, or any other matter of civil concernment. Besides there is no law against preaching what is truth; whether it be in the street, or any other place: nor is it possible, that any man can truly swear that he preached sedition, heresy, &c. unless he so heard him, that he could tell what he said.

Sec. 5. The evidence further saith, that William Mead was there, but till being in Gracious street be a fault, and hearing a man speak the witness knows not what, be contrary to law, the whole evidence is useless, and impertinent:

but what they want of that, they endeavour to supply with Indictment; whose parts we proceed to consider.

Exceptions against the Indictment.

Sec. 6. It saith, that the prisoners were met upon the 15th day of August 1670, whereas their own evidence affirms it to be upon the 14th day of August, 1670.

Sec. 7. [That they met with force and arms] which is so great a lye, that the court had no better cover for it, than to tell the jury, it was only a piece of form, urging that the man tried for clipping of money, this present sessions, had the same words used in his indictment. But that this answer is too scanty, as well as it was too weak to prevail with the jury: we desire it may be considered, that the same words may be used more of course, and out of form at one time, than at another: And though we grant they can have little force with any jury in a clipper's case for meer clipping; yet they are words that give so just a ground of jealousy, nay, that carry so clear an evidence of illegality where they are truly proved and affirmed of any meeting, as that they are the proper roots from whence do spring those branches which render an indictment terrible, and an assembly truly the terror of the people.

Sec. 8. [Unlawfully and tumultuously to disturb the peace] which is as true, as what is said before, (that is, as false) this will evidently appear to all that consider how lawful it is to assemble, with no other design than to worship God, and their calling a lawful assembly an unlawful one, no more makes it so, than to say light is darkness, black is white, conclude so impudent a falsity true.

In short, because to worship God can never be a crime, no meeting or assembly, designing to worship God, can be unlawful. Such as go about to prove an unlawful assembly must prove the assemblers intent not to worship God, but that no man can do, because no man can know another man's intentions, and therefore its impossible that any should prove such an assembly unlawful. That is properly an unlawful assembly, according to the definition of the law, when several persons are met together, with design to use violence and to do mischief; but that dissenters meet with no such intention, is manifest to the whole world, therefore their assemblies are not unlawful; he that hath only right to be worshipped, which is God, hath only right to institute how he will be worshipped; and such as worship him in that way they apprehend him to have instituted, are so far from being unlawful assemblers, that therein they do but express the duty they owe to God.

[Tumultuously] imports as much as disorderly, or an assembly full of noise, bustle, and confusion, using force and violence, to the injury of persons, houses, or grounds. But whether religious dissenters in their peaceable meetings, therein desiring, and seeking nothing more than to express that duty they owe to God Almighty be a tumultuous action, or meeting in the sense expressed (and which is the very definition of the law) will be the question. Certainly such as call these meetings tumultuous, as to break the peace, offer the greatest violence to common words, that can be well imagined: for they may as rightly say, such persons meet adulterously, thievishly, &c. as to affirm they meet tumultuously, because they are as truly applicable; in short, such particulars, as are required to prove them such meetings in law, are wholly wanting.

Sec. 9. [To the disturbance of the peace.]

If the disturbance of the peace be but matter of form with the rest, as is usually pleaded; leave out this matter of form and then see what great matter will be left.

Certainly such assemblies, as are not to the breach and disturbance of the peace, are far from being unlawful or tumultuary; but if the peace be broken by them, how comes it the evidence was so short? We cannot believe it was in favour of the prisoners. This may shew all the reasonable world, how forward some are to brand innocency with hateful names, to bring a suspicion, where there was none deserved.

Sec. 10. [That the said Penn and Mead met, by agreement before hand made.]

But if persons that never saw each other, nor converse together, neither had correspondence by any other hand, cannot be said to be agreed, to any action, before it be done; then the prisoners were far from an agreement; for they had never seen, conversed, nor corresponded, directly, nor indirectly, before the officers came to disturb the assembly: We well know how far they would have stretched the word 'Agreement, or Conspiracy;' but God who brings to nought the councils of the wicked, prevented their cruel designs.

Sec. 11. [That William Mead did abet the said William Penn in preaching.]

No man can be said to abet another, whilst they are both unknown to each other, especially in this case, where abetting follows agreeing, and agreeing supposes fore-knowledge. Nay the word abet in law signifies to command, procure or counsel a person, which W. Mead, could not be said to do, in reference to W. Penn, they being so great strangers one to another, and at so great a distance; for the evidence proves that he was with lieutenant Cook, and lieutenant Cook swears he could not make his way to W. Penn, for the croud.

Sec. 12. [That W. Penn's preaching and speaking caused a great concourse and tumult of people, to remain and continue a long time in the street.]

But this is so improbable to believe, that the very nature of a tumult admits of no such thing as preaching; but implies a disorderly multitude, where all may be said to speak, rather than any to hear.

Sec. 1. [In contempt of the king and his laws.]

They are so far from contemning the king and his laws, that they are obliged and constrained by their own principles, to obey every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, but not against the Lord for man's sake, which is the question in hand. Besides, their continuance there, was not in contempt, but by the permission of the chief officer present, that came there by the king's authority; nor is it for the honour of the king that such persons should be said to act in contempt of his laws, as only meet to honour God and his laws.

Sec. 2. [And to the great disturbance of the king's peace.]

It is far from disturbing and breaking the king's peace for men peaceably to meet to worship God; for it is then properly broken and invaded, when force and violence are used, to the hurt and prejudice of persons and estates; or when any thing is done that tends to the stirring up of sedition, and begetting in people a dislike of the civil government: But that such things are not practised by us in our assemblies, either to offer violence to mens' persons and estates, or to stir up the people to sedition, or dislike to the civil government, is obvious to all that visit our assemblies.

Sec. 3. [To the great terror and disturbance of the king's liege people and subjects, and to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the king's peace, his crown and dignity.]

Were these black criminations as true as they are wretchedly false, we should give as just an occasion, to lose our liberties, as our cruel adversaries, are ready to take any to deprive us unjustly of them. O! How notorious it is to all sober people, that our manner of life is far from terrifying any; and how absurd to think that naked men, in the generality of their conversation, known to be harmless and quiet, should prove a terror or disturbance to the people; certainly, if any such thing should be in the time of our meetings, it is brought with the cruelty and barbarous actions of your own soldiers: they never learned by our example to beat, hale before magistrates, fine, and imprison for matters relating to God's worship; neither can they say, we are their precedents: for all those adulterous, prodigal, lascivious, drunken, swearing, and profane acts, they daily commit, and esteem rather occasion of brag and boast, than sorrow and repentance; No, they need not go so far, they have too many, God Almighty knows, of their own superiors for their example.

Sec. 4. But we can never pass over with silence, nor enough observe the detestable juggle of such indictments, which we require all English and conscientious men to mind, as they value themselves in the like occasions. How little a grain of fact was proved, yet how spacious an indictment was made? had it related to the evidence, the bulk had been excusable but when it only swelled with malicious scaring phrases, to suggest to the people, that they were the merest villains, the most dangerous persons, and designing mutually the subversion of the laws, and breach of the peace, to the terrifying of the people, &c.

Who can choose but tell them of their romance-indictment, that is so forged; as it truly merits another against itself. This they childishly call form; but had an Italian or other stranger been in court, he would have judged it matter of fact, as thinking it unworthy of a king's court, to accuse men in terms, not legally, truly, or probably due to the fact, they really had committed; as well as that no court would practise it, but that which loved to deprive men of their liberties, and lives, rather than to save them; Nolens Volens.

Sec. 5. Had their cruelty and juggle ended here itself, they would have spared us the pains of any further observation. But that which we have to add, on the prisoners behalf, renders their actions so abominable, in the sight of justice, that all honest and ingenious hearts must needs abhor their base snares.

They tell the jury, That being but judges of fact only, they were to bring the prisoners in Guilty (that is of the fact) at their peril; and it was the part of the bench, to judge what was law; So that if the jury had brought them in Guilty, without any further additional explanation (though intentionally they meant only of the fact proved by evidence) yet the bench would have extended it to every part of the indictment, and by this impious delusion, to have perjured a well meaning jury, and have had their barbarous ends upon the innocent prisoners. But the jury better understanding themselves brought in William Penn Guilty of the fact proved, namely, That he was speaking to some people met in Gracious Church-Street, but not of an unlawful assembly, so circumstantiated (the mention of which stabbed their design of moulding the general answer of Guilty, to their own ends, to the heart) nor indeed could they do otherwise; for as well the jury as prisoners, were denied to have any law produced, by which they might measure the truth of the indictment, and guilt of the fact. But because the Recorder would or could not, perhaps it is so long since he read law that he may have forgotten it, we shall perform his part, in shewing what is that common law of the land, which in general, he said, they were indicted for the breach of, and which indeed if rightly understood, is the undoubted birthright of every Englishman; yea, the inheritance of inheritances, 'Major Hereditas venit unicuique nostrum a jure, et Legibus, quam a parentibus.' Coke Instit. 2. 56.

Sec. 6. All the various kinds or models of government, that are in the world, stand either upon will and power, or condition and contract, the first, rule by men, the second, by laws; it is our happiness to be born under such a constitution, as is most abhorrent in itself, of all arbitrary government, and which is, and ever has been, most choice and careful of her laws, by which all right is preserved.

Sec. 7. All laws are either fundamental, and so immutable; or superficial and so alterable. By the first we understand such laws, as enjoin men to be just, honest, virtuous; to do no wrong, to kill, rob, deceive, prejudice none; but to do, as one would be done unto; to cherish good, and to terrify wicked men; in short, universal reason, which are not subject to any revolutions, because no emergency, time, or occasion can ever justify a suspension of their execution, much less their utter abrogation.

Sec. 8. By superficial laws we understand, such acts, laws, or statutes, as are suited to present occurrences; and which may as well be abrogated, for the good of the kingdom, as they were first made for it. For instance, those statutes, that relate to victuals, cloaths, and places of trade, &c. which have ever stood whilst the reason of them was in force, but when that benefit, which once redounded, fell by cross occurrences, they ended according to that old maxim, 'cessante ratione legis, cessat lex;' but this cannot be said of fundamental laws, till houses stand without their foundation, and English mankind wholly cease to be, which brings close upon the point.

Sec. 9. There is not any country, that has more constantly expressed her care and deep solicitude to the preservation of her fundamental laws, than the English nation; and though the evil of some particular times and persons have endeavoured an utter abolition of those excellent fundamentals, which we have before defined and defended from any just reason of revolution; yet God Almighty, who is always concerned to avenge the cause of justice, and those excellent good laws, by which it is upheld, has by his providence befooled their contrivances, and baffled their attempts, by bringing their designs to naught, and their persons frequently to condign punishment and disgrace, their age no antiquary living can assure us, unless they say, as old as reason itself: but our own authors are not lacking to inform us, that the liberties, properties and privileges of the English nation are very ancient.

Sec. 10. For Hern in his Mirror of Justice (writ in Edward the first's time) fol. 1. tells us, "That after God had abated the nobility of the Britons, he did deliver the realm to men more humble and simple, of the countries adjoining, to wit, the Saxons, which came from the parts of Almain to conquer this land, of which men there were forty sovereigns, which did rule as companions; and those princes did call this realm England, which before was named the greater Britain: these, after great wars, tribulations and pains, by long time suffered, did chuse a king to reign over them to govern the people of God, and to maintain and defend their persons, and their good in quiet, by the rules of right, and at the beginning they did cause him to swear to maintain the holy Christian faith, and to guide his people by right, with all his power, without respect of persons, and to observe the laws: and after when the kingdom was turned into an heritage, king Alfred, that governed this kingdom about 171 years before the conquest, did cause the great men of the kingdom to assemble at London, and there did ordain for a perpetual usage, that twice in the year, or oftner, if need should be, in time of peace, they should assemble at London in parliament; for the government of God's people, that men might live in quiet and receive right by certain usages and holy judgments."

"In which parliament (saith our author) the rights and prerogatives of the kings and of the subjects are distinguished and set apart; and particularly by him expressed, too tedious here to insert; amongst which ordinances we find, "That no man should be imprisoned, but for a capital offence. And if a man should detain another in prison, by colour of right, where there was none, till the party imprisoned died; he that kept him in prison should be held guilty of murder" as you may read p. 33, and p. 36. "He is declared Guilty of Homicide, by whom a man shall die in prison, whether it be the judges, that shall too long delay to do a man right, or by cruelty of gaolers, or suffering him to die of famine; or when a man is adjudged to do penance, and shall be surcharged by his gaoler with irons, or other pain whereof he is deprived his life." And p. 149. "That by the ancient law of England, it was felony to detain a man in prison, after sufficient bail offered; where the party was pleivable; every person was pleivable, but he that was appealed of treason, murder, robbery or burglary," p. 35. "None ought to be put in common prisons, but only such as were attainted, or principally appealed or indicted of some capital offence, or attainted of false or wrongful imprisonment; so tender have the ancient laws and constitutions of this realm been of the liberty of their subjects persons, that no man ought to be imprisoned, but for a capital offence, as, treason, murder, robbery, or burglary."

Sec. 11. Nor is Lambard short in his excellent translation of the Saxon laws, from king Iwa's time, 712, to Hen. 3, 1100. In describing to us the great obligation, and strong condition, the people were wont to put upon their kings, To observe the ancient fundamental laws, and free customs of this land, which were handed down from one age to another. And in the 17th chap. of Edward the Confessor's laws, the mention there made of a king's duty is very remarkable. That if he break his oath, or performed not his obligation 'Nee nomen regis in eo constabit.' The same Lambard farther tells us, that however any may affirm William of Normandy to be a con-querer; he was received by the people as Edward's successor, and by solemn oath taken, to maintain unto them the same laws that his kinsman Edward the Confessor did; this doctrine remained in the general, unquestioned, to the reign of king John, who imperiously thought that voluntas regis, and not salvus populi, was suprema lex, or the king's will was the supreme law, and not the people's preservation; till the incensed barons of that time, betook themselves to a vigorous defence of their ancient rights and liberties, and learnt him to keep those laws by a due restraint and timely compulsion, which his former invasion of them evidenced to the world he would never have done willingly.

. Sec. 12. The Proposals and Articles of agreement, with the pledges given to the barons, on the behalf of the people by the king, were confirmed in Hen. 3d's time, his son and successor; when the abused, slighted, and disregarded laws, by his father, were thought fit to be reduced to record, that the people of England might not for ever after be to seek for a written recorded law, to their defence and security; for, 'misera servitus est ubi jus est vagum aut incognitum;' and so we enter upon that grand charter of liberty and privilege, in the cause, reason, and end of it.

Sect. 1. We shall first rehearse it, so far as we are concerned (with the formalities of Grant and Curse) and shall then say something as to the Cause, Reason and End of it.

A REHEARSAL of the MATERIAL PARTS of the GREAT CHARTER of ENGLAND.

"Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, &c. To all archbishops, or earls, barons, sheriffs, provosts, officers, and to all bailiffs, and our faithful subjects, who shall see this present charter, greeting. Know ye that we unto the honour of Almighty God, and for the salvation of the souls of our progenitors, and our successors, kings of England, to the advancement of holy church, and amendment of our realm, of our mere and free will have given and granted to all archbishops, &c. and to all freemen of this our realm, these liberties under written, to be holden and kept in this our realm of England for evermore. [9 H. 3. confirmed 28 Ed. 3.]

"We have granted and given to all freemen of our realm, for us, and our heirs for evermore these liberties under written, to have and to hold to them, and to their heirs, of us and our heirs fore-named. [Chap. 1. the form of ancient acts, &c. Co. 2. Inst. fol. 2.]

"A freeman shall not be amerced for a small fault, but after the quantity of the fault. And for a great fault, after the manner thereof, saving to him his contentments or free-hold. And a merchant likewise shall be amerced, saving to him his merchandize; and none of the said ameracements shall be assessed, but by the oath of good and honest men of the vicinage. [Chap. 14.]

VOL. VI.

"No freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, nor be disseized of his freehold, or liberties, or free customs, or be outlawed, or exiled, or any other ways destroyed; nor we shall not pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land; we shall sell to no man, we shall deny nor defer to no man either justice or right. [Chap. 29.]

"And to all these customs, liberties aforesaid, which we have granted to be holden within this our realm, as much as appertaineth to us and our heirs we shall observe; and all men of this our realm, as well spiritual as temporal, (as much as in them is) shall observe the same against all persons in like wise. And for this our gift, and grant of these liberties, and for other contained in our charter of liberties of our Forest, the archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, knights, freeholders, and other our subjects, have given unto us the fifteenth part of all their moveables; and we have granted unto them on the other part, that neither we, nor our heirs, shall procure or do any thing whereby the liberties in this charter contained shall be infringed or broken; and if any thing be procured by any person contrary to the premises, shall be had of no force nor effect. These being witnesses, Boniface archbishop of Canterbury, &c. We ratifying and approving those gifts and grants aforesaid, confirm and make strong all the same, for us and our heirs perpetually, and by the tenor of these presents do renew the same willingly; and granting for us and our heirs, that this charter, in all and singular his articles for evermore shall be steadfastly, firmly, and inviolably observed. And if any article in the same charter contained, yet hitherto peradventure hath not been observed, nor kept, we will, and by our authority royal command, from henceforth firmly they be observed. Witness, &c."

The SENTENCE of CURSE given by the Bishops, with the King's Consent, against the Breakers of the GREAT CHARTER.

In the year of our Lord 1253, the third day of May, in the great hall of the king at Westminster, in the presence, and by the consent of the lord Henry, by the grace of God, king of England, and the lord Richard, earl of Cornwall, his brother; Roger Bigot, earl of Norfolk marshal of England; Humphry, earl of Hereford; Henry earl of Oxford; John, earl Warren; and other estates of the realm of England: We Boniface, by the mercy of God, archbishop of Canterbury, primate of England, F. of London, H. of Ely, S. of Worcester, E. of Lincoln, W. of Norwich, P. of Hereford, W. of Salisbury, W. of Durham, R. of Exeter, M. of Carlisle, W. of Bath, E. of Rochester, T. of St. Davids, bishops, apparelled in pontificals, with tapers burning, against the breakers of the churches liberties, and of the liberties and other customs of this realm of England; and namely these which are contained in the Charter of the common Liberties of England, and Charter of the Forest, have denounced Sentence of Excommunication in this form, by the authority of Almighty God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, &c. of the blessed apostles Peter and Paul, and of all apostles, and of all martyrs, of blessed Edward king of England, and of all the saints of heaven, we excommunicate and accurse, and from the benefits of our holy mother the church we sequester all those that hereafter willingly and maliciously deprive or spoil the church of her right; and all those that by any craft, or willingness, do violate, break, diminish, or change the churches liberties, and free customs contained in the Charters of the common Liberties, and of the Forest, granted by our lord the king to archbishops, bishops, and other prelates of England, and likewise to the earls, barons, knights, and other freeholders of the realm; and all that secretly and openly, by deed, word or counsel do make statutes, or observe them being made, and that bring in customs to keep them, when they be brought in, against the said liberties, or any of them, and all those that shall presume to judge against them, and all and every such person, before mentioned, that wittingly shall commit any thing of the premises, let them well know that they incur the aforesaid Sentence ipso facto."

A CONFIRMATION of the CHARTERS and LIBERTIES of ENGLAND, and of the FOREST, made the 25th Year of EDWARD the FIRST.

"Edward, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Guyan, To all those that these present letters shall hear or see, greeting. Know ye that we to the honour of God and to the profit of our realm, have granted for us, and our heirs, and the Charter of Liberties, and the Charter of Forest, which were made by common assent of all the realm, in the time of king Henry our father, shall be kept in every point, without breach; and we will that the same Charters shall be sent under our seal, as well to our justices of the Forest, as to others, and to all sheriffs of shires, and to all our other officers, and to all our cities throughout the realm, together with our writs, in the which it shall be contained, that they cause the aforesaid Charters to be published, and to declare to the people, that we have confirmed them in all points; and that our justices, sheriffs, mayors, and other ministers, which under us have the laws of our land to guide, shall allow the same Charters pleaded before them in judgment, in all their points; that is, to wit, the Great Charter, as the common law, and the Charter of our Forest, for the Welch of our realm.

"And we will, that if any judgment be given from henceforth, contrary to the points of the Charter aforesaid, by the justices, or by any other of our ministers that hold plea before them, against the points of the Charters, it shall be undone, and holden for naught.

"And we will that the same Charters shall be sent under our seal to cathedral churches throughout our realm, there to remain, and shall be read before the people two times by the year.

And that all archbishops and bishops shall pronounce the sentence of excommunication against all those that by word, deed, or counsel, do contrary to the foresaid Charters, or that in any point do break or undo them; And that the said curses be twice a year denounced and published by the prelates aforesaid; and if the same prelates, or any of them, be remiss in the denunciation of the said sentences, the archbishops of Canterbury and York, for the time being, shall compel and distrain them to the execution of their duties in form aforesaid."

The SENTENCE of the Clergy against the Breakers of the Articles above-mentioned.

"In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; Amen: Whereas our sovereign lord the king, to the honour of God, and of holy church, and for the common profit of the realm, hath granted for him, and his heirs for ever, these Articles above-written; Robert archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, admonished all his province once twice and thrice, because that shortness will not suffer so much delay, as to give knowledge to all the people of England of these presents in writing; we therefore enjoin all persons, of what estate soever they be, that they, and every of them, as much as in them is, shall uphold and maintain these Articles granted by our sovereign lord the king, in all points: And all those that in any point do resist, or break, or in any manner hereafter procure, counsel, or in any wise assent to testify or break those ordinances, or go about it, by word or deed, openly or privily, by any manner of pretence or colour; we, the aforesaid archbishop, by our authority in this writing expressed, do excommunicate and accurse, and from the body of our Lord Jesus Christ, and from all the company of heaven, and from all the sacraments of holy church do sequester and exclude."

We may here see, that in the obscurest times of sottish popery, they were not left without a sense of justice, and the necessity of Liberty and Property, to be inviolably enjoyed, which brings us to the cause of it.

1. The Cause of this famous Charter, was, as we have already said, the encroachments that were made by several ministers of precedent kings, that almost became customary, and which had never extinguished the free customs due to Englishmen: How great care it cost our ancestors, it unbecomes us to ignore, or by our silence to neglect; It was that Yoke and Muzzle, which failed not to disable many raging bears, from entering the pleasant vineyard of English freedoms, that otherwise would not have left a fruitful vine in being. Anon we may give the reader an account of some, with their wages as well as works.

2. The Reason of it, is so great, that it seems to be its own. It is the very image and expression of justice, liberty, and property; points of such eminent importance, as without which no government can be said to be reasonable, but arbitrary and tyrannical. It allows every man that liberty God and nature have given him, and the secure possession of his property, from the inroad or invasion of his neighbour, or any else of that constitution. It justifies no man in a fault, only it provides equal and just ways to have the offender tried; considering the malice of many prosecutors, and the great value of liberty and life.

3. The End of it was the most noble of any earthly projection, to wit, The relaxing of those shaken laws, held for many hundred years, by constant claim, that they living might be re-instated in their primitive liberty, and their posterity secured in the possession of so great a happiness.

Amongst those many rich advantages, that accrue to the free people of England, from this Great Charter; and those many confirmatory statutes of the same, we shall present the Reader with the sight of some few, that may most properly fall under the consideration and inquiry of these present times, as found in our Common Law books.

1. "That every Englishman is born free."

2. "That no such freeman shall be taken, attached, assessed, or imprisoned, by any petition or suggestion to the king or his council, unless by the indictment or presentment of good and lawful men where such deeds be done;" 5 Edw. 3. c. 9. 25 Edw. 3. c. 4. 17 R. 2. c. 6. Rot. Parl. 42 Edw. 3. Coke 2 Inst. 46.

3. "That no freeman shall be disseized of his freehold or liberties, or free customs, &c." Hereby is intended, saith Coke, "That lands, tenements, goods, and chattels," shall not be seized into the king's hands contrary to this Great Charter, &c. 43. Ass. p. 12. 43 Edw. 3. Coke 2 Inst. 32. Neither shall any such freeman be put from his livelihood without answer. Coke 2 Inst. 47.

4. "That no freeman shall be out-lawed, unless he shroud and hide himself voluntarily from the justice of the law," 2 and 3 Phil. and Mar. Dier. 114. 145.

5. "No freeman shall be exiled." Coke says there are but two grounds, upon which any man may be exiled. One by act of parliament (supposing it not contrary to the Great Charter.) The other in case of abjuration, for felony by the common law, &c. Coke 2 Inst. 47.

6. "No freeman shall be destroyed," that is, he shall not be "fore-judged, of life, limb, dis-herited, or put to torture, or death," every oppression against law, by colour of any usurped authority, is a kind of destruction, and it is the worst oppression that is done by colour of justice. Coke Inst. p. 48.

7. "That no freeman shall be thus taken, or imprisoned, disseized, out-lawed, exiled, or destroyed of his liberties, freeholds, and free customs, but by the lawful judgment of his Peers" (vulgarly called jury). So that the judgment of any fact or person, is by this fundamental law, referred to the breasts, and consciences of the jury; it is rendered in Latin 'per legale iudicium,' that is lawful judgment; from whence it is to be observed, that the judgment must have law in it, and be according to law, which cannot be where they are not judges, how far the fact is legal, or the contrary; 'Judicium quasi Juris Dictum,' the voice of Law and Right, and therefore is their verdict not to be rejected, because it is supposed to be the truth, according to their consciences: For 'Ver dictis' from 'vere dictum,' is 'quasi dictum veritatis' or a true saying or judgment, 9 Hen. 3. 29. Coke Inst. 1. 39. Inst. 4. 207. Coke says, that by the word Legale three things are implied. 1st. That this was by law, before the Statute, and therefore this statute but declaratory of the ancient law. 2d. That their verdict must be legally given; wherein is to be observed. 1st. The jury ought to hear no evidence, but in the hearing and presence of the prisoner. 2d. That they cannot send to ask any question in law of the judges, but in the presence of the prisoner, for, 'de facto jus oritur.' 3d. The evidence produced by the king's counsel, being given, the judges cannot collect the evidence, nor urge it by way of charge to the jury, nor yet confer with the jury about the evidence, but in the presence of the prisoner. Coke Inst. 2. 49.

8th "Or by the law of the land" It is a synonymous expression, importing no more than by a trial of peers or a jury; for it is sometimes rendered not (or) disjunctively, but (and) which is connectively; however, it can never signify any thing contrary to the old way of trying by Peers; for then it would be connected to a contradiction.

Besides Coke well observes, that in the 4th Chap. of the 25th Edw. 3, 'Per legem terræ,' imports no more, than a trial by due process, and writ original at common law, which cannot be without a jury; therefore, 'Per iudicium' 'parum et per legem terræ,' signify the same privilege unto the people. Coke Inst. 2. page 50.

Thus have we presented you with some of those maxims of law, dearer to our ancestors, than life; because they are the defence of the lives and liberties of the people of England: it is from this 29th chap. of the Great Charter; Great, not for its bulk, but the privileges in it; as from a spacious root, that so many fruitful branches of the law of England springs, if Coke may be credited. But how sacred soever they have been esteemed, and still are by noble and just minds, yet so degenerate are same, in their proceedings, that conscious to themselves of their baseness, they will not dare stand the touch of this Great Charter, and those just laws grounded upon it, of which number we may truly rank the mayor, and recorder of London, with the rest of their wise companions, in their late sessions, at the Old Bailey, upon the occasion of the prisoners.

1. The prisoners were taken, and imprisoned without presentment of good and lawful men of the vicinage, or the neighbourhood, but after a military and tumultuous manner, contrary to the Grand Charter.

2. They refused to produce the law upon which they proceeded; leaving thereby the prisoners, jury and whole assembly in the dark.

3. They refused the prisoners to plead, and directly withstood that great privilege, mentioned in the first chap. 25 Edw. 1. "Where all justices, mayors, sheriffs, and other ministers, that have the laws of the land, to guide them, are required to allow the said Charter to be pleaded in all its points, and in all causes that shall come before them in judgment." For no sooner did William Penn, or his fellow prisoner, urge upon them the Great Charter, and other good laws, but the Recorder cried, Take him away; take him away, put him into the Bale-Dock or hole; from which the recorder can never deliver himself, unless it be by avowing; the laws are not his guide, and therefore does not suffer them to be pleaded before him in judgment.

4. They gave the Jury their charge, in the prisoner's absence, endeavouring highly to influence the Jury against them.

5. The verdict being given, which is in law, "Dictum Veritatis," The voice of Truth herself, (because not suitable to their humour) they did five times reject it, with many abusive, imperious, and menacing expressions to the jury, such as no precedent can afford us) as if they were not the only constituted judges by the fundamental laws of the land, but mere cyphers only to signify something behind their figures.

6. Though the prisoners were cleared by their Jury, yet were they continued for the non-payment of their fines, laid upon them, for not pulling off their hats, in which the law is notoriously broken. (1st) In that no man shall be amerced, but according to the offence, and they have fined each forty marks. (2d) They were not merced by any Jury, but at the will of an incensed bench.—Besides there is no law against the hat, and where there is no law there can be no transgression, and consequently no legal amercement or fine, 9 H. 3, chap. 14. But how the prisoners were trepanned into it, is most ridiculous on the side of the contrivers, that finding their hats off, would have them put on again by their officers, to fool the prisoners, with a trial of putting them off again, which childish conceit not being gratified, they fined them the forty marks a piece.

7. Instead of accepting their verdict as good in law, and for the true decision of the matter, according to the Great Charter (that constitutes them proper judges, and which bears them out with many other good laws, in what they agreed to, as a verdict, the court did most illegally and tyrannically fine and imprison them, as in the trial was expressed. And that notwithstanding the late just resentment of the House of Commons, in judge Keeling's Case, where they resolved, "That the precedent and practice of fining, and imprisoning of juries, for their verdicts, were illegal." And here we must needs observe two things.

1st. That the fundamental laws of England cannot be more slighted, and contradicted in any thing (next Englishmen being quiet destroyed) than in not suffering them to have that equal medium, or just way of trial, that the same law has provided, which is by a jury.

2d. That the late proceeding of the court, at the Old Bailey, is an evident demonstration, that juries are now but mere formality, and that the partial charge of the Bench must be the verdict of the jury; for if ever a rape were attempted on the consciences of any jury, it was there. And indeed the ignorance of jurors of their authority by law, is the only reason of their unhappy cringing to the court, and being scared into an Anti-Conscience Verdict, by their lawless threats.

But we have lived to an age, so debauched from all humanity and reason, as well as faith and religion, that some stick not to turn butchers to their own privileges, and conspirators against their own liberties. For however Magna Charta had once the reputation of a sacred unalterable law, and few hardened enough, to incur and bear the long curse, that attends the violators of it, yet it is frequently objected now, that the benefits there designed are but temporary, and therefore liable to alteration, as other statutes are. What game such persons play at, may be lively read, in the attempts of Dionisius, Palaris, &c. which would have will and power be the people's law.

But that the privileges due to Englishmen, by the Great Charter of England, have their foundation in reason and law: and that those new Cassandrian ways, to introduce will and power, deserve to be detested by all persons professing sense and honesty, and the least allegiance to our English government; we shall make appear from a sober consideration of the nature of those privileges contained in that Charter.

1. The ground of alteration of any law in government (where there is no invasion) should arise from the universal discommodity of its continuance, but there can be no disprofit in the discontinuance of liberty and property, therefore there can be no just ground of alteration.

2. No one Englishman is born slave to another, neither has the one a right to inherit the sweat and benefit of the others labour, without consent, therefore the liberty and property of an Englishman, cannot reasonably be at the will and beck of another, let his quality and rank be never so great.

3. There can be nothing more unreasonable than that which is partial, but to take away the liberty and property of any, which are natural rights, without breaking the law of nature (and not of will and power) is manifestly partial, and therefore unreasonable.

4. If it be just and reasonable for men to do as they would be done by, then no sort of men should invade the liberties and properties of other men, because they would not be served so themselves.

5. Where liberty and property are destroyed, there must always be a state of force and war, which however pleasing it may be unto the invaders, it will be esteemed intolerable by the invaded, who will no longer remain subject in all human probability, than while they want as much power to free themselves, as their adversaries had to enslave them; The troubles, hazards, ill-consequences, and illegality of such attempts, as they have declined by the most prudent in all ages, so have they proved most uneasy to the most savage of all nations, who first or last have by a mighty torrent freed themselves, to the due punishment and great infamy of their oppressors; such being the advantage, such the disadvantage which necessarily do attend the fixation, and removal of liberty and property.

We shall proceed to make it appear that Magna Charta (as recited by us) imports nothing less than their preservation.

"No freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or be disseized of his freehold, or liberties, or free customs, or be out-lawed, or exiled, or any other ways destroyed; nor we will not pass upon him nor condemn him, but by lawful judgment of his peers, &c.

"A freeman shall not be amerced for a small fault, but after the manner of the fault, and for a great fault after the greatness thereof, and none of the said amercement shall be assessed, but by the oath of good and lawful men of the vicinage."

1. It asserts Englishmen to be free; that's liberty.

2. That they have free-holds, that's property.

3. That amercement, or penalties, should be proportioned to the faults committed, which is equity.

4. That they shall lose neither, but when they are adjudged to have forfeited them, in the judgment of their honest neighbours, according to the law of the land; which is lawful judgment.

It is easy to discern to what pass the enemies of the Great Charter would bring the people.

1. They are now free-men; but they would have them slaves.

2. They have now right unto their wives, children, and estates, as their undoubted property; but such would rob them of all.

3. Now no man is to be amerced, or punished but suitably to his fault; whilst they would make it suitable to their revengeful minds.

4. Whereas the power of judgment lies in the breasts and consciences of twelve honest neighbours; they would have it at the discretion of mercenary judges: to which, we cannot chuse but add, That such discourses manifestly strike at this present constitution of government; for it being founded upon the Great Charter, which is the ancient common law of the Land, as upon its best foundation; none can design the cancelling of the Charter, but they must necessarily intend the extirpation of the English government; For where the cause is taken away the effect must consequently cease. And as the restoration of our ancient English laws, by the Great Charter, was the sovereign balsam which cured our former breaches, so doubtless will the continuation of it, prove an excellent prevention to any future disturbances.

But some are ready to object, "That the Great Charter consisting as well of religious as civil rights, the former having received an alteration, there is the same reason, why the latter may have the like."

To which we answer, That the reason of alteration cannot be the same, therefore the consequence is false. The one being matter of opinion, about faith and religious worship, which is as various as the unconstant apprehensions of men; but the other is matter of so immutable right, and justice, that all generations, however differing in their religious opinion, have concurred, and agreed to the certainty, equity, and indispensable necessity of preserving these fundamental laws; so that Magna Charta hath not risen and fallen with the differing religious opinions, that have been in this land, but have ever remained, as the stable right, of every individual Englishman, purely as an Englishman. Otherwise, if the civil privileges of the people had fallen with the pretended religious privileges, of the popish tyranny, at the first reformation, as must needs be suggested by this objection, our case had ended here, that we had obtained a spiritual freedom, at the cost of a civil bondage; which certainly was far from the intention of the first reformers, and probably an unseen consequence, by the objectors to their idle opinion.

In short, there is no time, in which any man may plead the necessity of such an action, as is unjust in its own nature, which he must unavoidably be guilty of, that doth deface or cancel that law by which the justice of liberty and property is confirmed and maintained to the people. And consequently, no person may legally attempt the subversion, or extenuation of the force of the Great Charter. We shall proceed to prove from instances out of both.

1. Any judgment given contrary to the said Charter, is to be undone, and holden for nought. 25 Edw. 1. Chap. 2.

2. Any that by word, deed, or counsel, go contrary to the said Charter, are to be excommunicated, by the bishops; And the archbishops of Canterbury and York, are bound to compel the other bishops to denounce sentence accordingly, in case of their remissness, or neglect; which certainly hath relation to the state, rather than the church; since there was never any necessity of compelling the bishops to denounce sentence in their own case, though frequently in the peoples. 25 Edw. 1, chap. 4.

3. That the Great Charter, and Charter of Forest, be holden and kept in all points, and if any statute be made to the contrary, that it shall be holden for nought. 42 Edw. 3, 1. Upon which Coke, that famous English lawyer, said, "That albeit judgments in the king's courts, are of high regard in law, and judicia are accounted as juris dicta; yet it is provided by act of parliament, that if any judgment be given contrary to any of the points of the Great Charter, it should be holden for nought."

He further saith, "That upon the Statute of the 25th of Ed. 1, chap. 1. That this Great Charter, and the Charter of Forest, are properly the common law of this land, or the law is common to all the people thereof."

4. Another statute runs thus, "If any force come to disturb the execution of the common law, ye shall cause their bodies to be arrested, and put in prison; Ye shall deny no man right by the king's letters, nor counsel the king any thing, that may turn to his damage, or dishonour. 18 Ed. 3, chap. 7. Neither to delay right by the great and little seal." This is the judges charge and oath. 2 Ed. 3, chap. 8, 14 Ed. 3, 14, 11 R. 2, chap. 10.

5. Such care hath been taken, for the preservation of this Great Charter, that in the 25th of Ed. 1. It was enacted, "That commissioners should issue forth, that there should be chosen in every shire-court, by the commonalty of the same shire, three substantial men, knights, or other lawful, wise, and well disposed persons, to be justices, which shall be assigned by the kings letters patents, under the great seal, to hear and determine, without any other writ, but only their commission, such complaints as shall be made upon all those, that commit or offend against any point, contained in the aforesaid Charters." 28 Ed. 1, chap. 1.

6. The necessity of preserving these Charters, hath appeared in nothing more, than in the care they have taken to confirm them; which as Coke observes, "hath been by 32 parliaments confirmed, established, and commanded to be put in execution," with the condign punishment they had inflicted upon the offenders. Coke's Proem to the second book of his Inst.

7. That in the notable Petition of Right, many of these great privileges, and free customs, contained in the aforesaid Charters, and other good laws, are recited and confirmed, 3 Car. 1.*

8. The late king, in his Declaration, at Newmarket, 1641, acknowledged, 'The law to be the rule of his power.'* By which he doubtless intended fundamental laws, since it may be the great advantage of countries, sometimes to suspend the execution of temporary laws.

Having so manifestly evidenced that venerable esteem, our ancestors had of that golden rule, the Great Charter, with their deep solicitude, to preserve it, from the defacing of usurpation and faction. We shall proceed to give an account of their just resentment and earnest prosecution against some of those, who in any age have adventured, to undermine that ancient foundation, by introducing an arbitrary way of government.

1. As judicious Lambard reports in his Saxon translation; "That the kings in those days, were by their coronation oaths obliged to keep, the ancient fundamental laws, and customs of this land" (of which this Great Charter is but declaratory) "so did king Alfred (reputed the most famous compiler of laws amongst them) give this discovery of his indignation against his own judges, for actions contrary to those fundamental laws, that he commanded the execution of 40 of them," which may be a seasonable caveat to judges of our times.

2. Hubert de Burgo, once chief justice of England (having advised Ed. 1 in the 11th year of his reign, (in his council holden at Oxford) "To cancel this Great Charter, and that of the Forest) was justly sentenced according to law, by his peers, in open parliament. When the statute called Confirmationis Cartarum was made; in the 1st chapter whereof, Magna Charta is peculiarly called the common law, 25 Ed. 1, chap. 2.

3. The Spencers, both father and son, for their arbitrary domination, and rash, and evil counsel to Ed. 2, (by which he was seduced to break the Great Charter) were banished for their pains, as Coke relates.†

4. The same case attended Tresilian and Belknap, for their illegal proceedings.‡

5. The breach of this Great Charter, was the ground of that exemplary justice done upon Empson and Dudley,* whose case is very memorable in this point; for though they gratified Hen. 7. in what they did, and had an Act of parliament for their warrant, made the 11th of his reign; yet met they with their due reward from the hands of justice, that Act being against equity and common reason, and so no justifiable ground or apology, for those frequent abuses, and oppressions of the people, they were found guilty of. Here what the Lord Coke further saith, concerning the matter, "There was an Act of parliament, made in the 11th year of king Hen. 7. which had a fair flattering preamble, pretending to avoid divers mischiefs, which were (1st) The high displeasure of Almighty

God. 2d. The great let of the common law. And (3d) The great let of the wealth of this land. And the purview of that act, tended in the execution contrary, ex diametro, viz. To the high displeasure of Almighty God, and the great let, nay the utter subversion of the common Law, and the great let of the wealth of this land, as hereafter shall appear; the substance of which Act follows in these words.

‘That from thenceforth, as well justices of Assize, as Justices of the peace, in every county, upon information for the king, before them made, without any finding or presentment by twelve men, shall have full power and authority, by their discretion; and to hear and determine all offences, as riots, unlawful assemblies, &c. committed and done against any act or statute made, and not repealed, &c.’ (a Case that very much resembles this of our own times.)

By pretext of this law, Empson and Dudley did commit upon the subjects, unsufferable pressure, and oppressions; and therefore this statute was justly, soon after the decease of Hen. 7. repealed, at the next parliament, after his decease by the statute of the 1 H. 8. chap. 6. A good caveat to parliaments, to leave all causes to be measured by the golden and straight metewand of the law, and not to the uncertain and crooked cord of discretion.

‘It is almost incredible to foresee, when any maxim, or fundamental, law of this realm is altered (as elsewhere hath been observed) what dangerous inconveniences do follow; which most expressly appeareth by this most unjust and strange act of the 11th of H. 7. For hereby, not only Empson and Dudley themselves, but such justices of peace (corrupt men) as they caused to be authorised, committed most grievous, and heavy oppressions and exactions; grinding the faces of the poor subjects by penal laws (be they never so obsolete, or unfit for the time) by information only, without any presentment, or trial by jury, being the ancient birth-right of the subject; but to hear and determine the same, by their discretions; inflicting such penalty, as the statute not repealed imposed. These and other like oppressions, and exactions by, or by the means of Empson, and Dudley, and their instruments, brought infinite treasure to the king’s coffers, whereof the king himself, at the end, with great grief, and compunction, repented as in another place we have observed.

‘This statute of the 11th of H. 7. we have recited, and shewed the just inconveniences thereof; to the end, that the like should never hereafter be attempted in any court of parliament; and that others might avoid the fearful end of those two time-servers, Empson and Dudley, ‘Qui eorum antiquis insistent, eorum exitus per horrescant.’

‘See the Statute of 8 Edw. 4. chap. 2. a Statute of Liveries, an Information, &c. By the discretion of the judges, to stand as an original, &c. This act is deservedly repealed, vide 12 R. 2. c 13. Punishment by discretion,

&c. vide, 5th of H. 4. c. 68. See the Commission of Sewers; discretion ought to be thus described, ‘Discretio est discernere per Legem, quid sit justum.’ From whence three things seem most remarkable.

1. The great equity and justice of the Great Charter, with the high value our ancestors have most deservedly set upon it.

2. The dreadful maledictions, or curse, they have denounced upon the Breakers of it; with those exemplary punishments they have not spared, to inflict upon such notorious offenders.

3. So heinous a thing was it esteemed of old, to endeavour an enervation, or subversion of these antient rights and privileges, that acts of parliaments themselves (otherwise the most sacred with the people,) have not been of force enough to secure or defend such persons from condign punishment, who in pursuance of them, have acted inconsistent with our Great Charter. Therefore it is, that great lawyer, the lord Coke, doth once more aggravate the example of Empson and Dudley (with persons of the same rank) into a just caution, as well to parliaments as judges, justices and inferior magistrates, to decline making, or executing any act, that may in the least seem to restringe or confirm this so often avowed and confirmed Great Charter of the liberties of England, since parliaments are said to err when they cross it; the obeyers of their acts punished, as time-serving transgressors, and that kings themselves, (though enriched by those courses) have with great compunction and repentance, left among their dying words their recantations.

Therefore most notable and true it was, with which we shall conclude this present subject, what the king pleased to observe in a Speech to the Parliament, about 1662, (viz.) ‘The good old rules of law are our best security.’

The manner of the Court’s behaviour towards the Prisoners, and Jury, with their many extravagant expressions, must not altogether slip our observation.

1. Their carriage to the Jury outdoes all precedents; they entertained them more like a pack of felons, than a Jury of honest men, as being fitter to be tried themselves, than to acquit others. In short, no Jury, for many ages, received so many instances of displeasure and affront, because they preferred not the humour of the Court, before the quiet of their own consciences, even to be esteemed as perjured, though they had really been so, had they not done what they did.

2. Their treatment of the Prisoners was not more unchristian, than inhuman. History can scarce tell us of one heathen Roman that ever was so ignoble to his captive: what! to accuse, and not hear them; to threaten to bore their tongues, gag and stop their mouths, fetter their legs, merely for defending themselves, and that by the ancient fundamental laws of England too. O barbarous! had they been Turks and infidels, that carriage would have ill become a Christian court, such actions proving much stronger dissuatives, than argument to convince them, how much the Christian religion inclines men to justice and moderation above their dark idolatry. It is truly lamentable that such occasion should be given, for intelligence to foreign parts, where England hath had the reputation of a Christian country, by the ill treating of its sober and religious inhabitants for their conscientious meetings to worship God. But above all, Dissenters had little reason to have expected this boarish fierceness from the mayor of London, when they consider his eager prosecution of the king's party under Cromwell's government, as thinking he could never give too great a testimony of his loyalty to that new instrument, which makes the old saying true, That one renegade is worse than three Turks.

Alderman Bludworth, being conscious to himself of his partial kindness to the Popish Friars, hopes to make amends by his zealous prosecution of the poor Dissenters; for at the same sessions he moved to have an evidence (of no small quality) against Harrison, the friar, sent to Bridewell and whipped; that he was earnest to have the Jury fined and imprisoned, because they brought not the Prisoners guilty, for only worshipping their God: whence it may be easy to observe, That Popish friars, and prelatial persecutors are mere confederates.

But what others have only adventured to stammer at, the Recorder of London, has been so ingenious as to speak most plainly; or else what means those two fatal expressions, which are become the talk and terror both of city and country?

First, in assuring the Jury, 'That there would be a law next session of parliament, That no man should have the protection of the law, but such as conformed to the church;' which, should it be as true, as we hope it is false (and a dishonourable prophecy of that great assembly) the papists may live to see their Marian days outdone by professed Protestants. But surely no Englishman can be so sottish, as to conceive that his right to Liberty and Property, came in with his profession of the Protestant religion; or that his natural and human rights, are dependent on certain religious apprehensions, and consequently he must esteem it a cruelty in the abstract, that persons should be denied the benefit of those laws which relate to civil concerns, who by their deportment in civil affairs, have no ways transgressed them, but merely upon an opinion of faith and matter of conscience. It is well known that Liberty and Property, Trade and Commerce were in the world long before the points in difference between Protestant and Dissenters, as the common privileges of mankind; and therefore not to be measured out by a conformity to this, or the other religious persuasion, but purely as Englishmen.

Secondly, But we should rather choose to esteem this an expression of heat in the Recorder, than that we could believe a London's Recorder should say, an English parliament should impose so much slavery on the present age, and entail it upon their own posterity (who for ought they know may be reckoned among the dissenters of the next age) did he not encourage us to believe, it was both his desire and his judgment, from that deliberate eulogy he made on the Spanish inquisition, expressing himself much to this purpose: viz. "Till now I never understood the reason of the policy and prudence of the Spaniards, in suffering the inquisition amongst them: And certainly it will never be well with us, till some thing like unto the Spanish inquisition be in England." The gross malignity of which saying is almost inexpressible: What does this but justify that hellish design of the papists to have prevented the first reformation; If this be good doctrine, then Hogestrant, the grand inquisitor, was a more venerable person than Luther the reformer. It was an expression that had better become Cajetan the pope's Legate, than Howel a protestant city's recorder. This is so far from helping to convert the Spaniard, that it is the way to harden him in his idolatry; when his abominable cruelty shall be esteemed prudence, and his most barbarous and exquisite torturing of truth, an excellent way to prevent faction.

If the recorder has spake for no more than for himself it is well; but certainly he little deserves to be thought a protestant, and a lawyer, that put both reformation and law into the inquisition; There being nothing more destructive of the fundamental laws and liberties of England, and that noble design of primitive reformation; than the arbitrary power and terrifying racks of the Spanish inquisition. And doubtless the supreme governors of the land, are highly obliged in honour and conscience (in discharge of their trust to God and the people) to take these things into their serious consideration, as what is expected from them, by those who earnestly wish theirs and the kingdom's safety and prosperity.

December 11th, 1667.

'The House resumed the hearing of the rest of the report touching the matter of restraints'

* "On the 16th of October, 1667, the House being informed, 'That there have been some innovations of late in trials of men for their lives and deaths; and in some particular cases, restraints have been put upon juries, in the inquiries,' this matter is referred to a committee. On the 18th of November, this committee are empowered to receive information against the Lord Chief Justice Keeling, for any other misdemeanors, besides those concerning juries. And on the 11th of December, 1667, the committee report several Resolutions [as above] against the Lord Chief Justice Keeling, of illegal and arbitrary proceedings in his office. The Chief Justice desiring to be heard, he is

‘ upon juries; and that upon the examination
‘ of divers witnesses, in several clauses of re‘ straints, put upon juries, by the Lord Chief ‘ Justice Keeling; whereupon the committee ‘ made their resolutions, which are as follow‘ eth:

‘ 1. That the proceedings of the Lord Chief admitted on the 13th of December, and heard in his defence to the matters charged against him, and being withdrawn, the House resolve, That they will proceed no farther in the matter against him.” 4 Hatsell.

Mr. Hatsell observes, that “The report of the facts on which these Resolutions are grounded, is not entered in the Journals; but the cases complained of, in which innovations had been had of late, were probably those of Wagstaff and Hood. Wagstaff’s case in Trin. term, 17 Ch. 2, is reported in Hardress’s Rep. p. 409. ‘Wagstaff and others of a jury were fined an hundred marks a-piece by Lord Chief Justice Keeling, because, though evidence was given, that persons had assembled at conventicles and had bibles with them, the jury would not find them guilty of keeping a conventicle, upon the late act of 16 Ch. 2. And the jury were committed till they paid their fine: and on application to the court of Exchequer, Lord Chief Baron Hale directed the fines to be estreated.’ The other case was in the 18th of Charles 2, Kelyng’s Reports, p. 50.” 4 Hatsell, 113.

“Memorandum, At Lent circuit at Winchester, 18 Car. 2, one Henry Hood was indicted for the murder of John Newen, and upon the evidence it appeared, that he killed him without any provocation, and thereupon I directed the jury that it was murder: for the law in that case intended malice; and I told them they were judges of the matter of fact, viz. whether Newen died by the hand of Hood; but whether it was murder or manslaughter, that was matter in law, in which they were to observe the direction of the Court. But notwithstanding they would find it only manslaughter; whereupon I took the verdict and fined the jury, of which John Goldwier was the foreman, 5*l.* a-piece, and committed them to gaol till they found sureties to appear at the next assizes, and in the mean time to be of the good behaviour: but after, upon the petition of the jurors, I took down their fines to 40*s.* a-piece, which they all paid and entered in recognisance, &c.” Kelyng, 50.

It is, perhaps, worth observation, that in this case of Hood, Kelyng’s direction, (for not following which he fined the jury), seems upon his own shewing to have been wrong. According to his own report of the case, the only question, which he left to the jury, was, whether Newen died by the hand of Hood. Now most undoubtedly the circumstances of intention on the part of Hood, and of provocation (the sufficiency of provocation is altogether distinct) on the part of Newen, were as much matters of fact,

‘ Justice, in the cases now reported, are inno‘ vations, in the trial of men for their lives and ‘ liberties; and that he hath used an arbitrary
‘ and illegal power, which is of dangerous con‘ sequence to the lives and liberties of the peo‘ ple of England, and tends to the introducing ‘ of an arbitrary government.

and to be collected from the testimony of the witnesses, as the giving the mortal wound. Those matters therefore should have been left to the jury. See the 8th Resolution of the Judges in lord Morley’s case ante, p. 771. It is not improbable, that in Hood’s case there was some provocation, which the jury thought sufficient to excite his sudden resentment, and put him off his guard, and so reduce his offence to man-slaughter, but which the judge did not think sufficient for that purpose.

The following Case is in 2 Keble, 180.

“The King against Sir H. Windham and others, Jurors of Somersetshire.

“The Chief Justice bound them over to appear here in regard they would not find a bill of murder, albeit they were satisfied the man died by the hands of the party indicted, and were told this was but an accusation, and no trial of the issue Guilty or Not Guilty, or whether it were maliciously or fortuito, and that whether the fact were murder or se defendendo was matter of law; and because they would not find the bill, the Chief Justice fined the eleven who refused to find it, to 20*l.* a-piece at the assizes; and now the Court delivered their opinions severally that this was well assessed, in regard if they should try the malice by the grand jury, they would prevent the judgment of the Court, and the grand jury is only for enquiry not for conviction; also they are not to regard the legal forms of malitiose, no more than the saying vi et armis in trespass, which is found every day without scruple; and when the petty jury, contrary to directions of the Court, will find a murder manslaughter, albeit it lie properly before them, yet the Court will fine them, but because they were gentlemen of repute in the country, the Court spared the fine, yet in Parliament the Chief Justice was fain to submit, being by sir H. W. accused.”

“This conduct of Chief Justice Kelyng,” says Mr. Hatsell, “was grounded on the authority of Wharton’s case, Mich. term, 44 Eliz. reported in Yelverton’s Rep. p. 23. ‘Wharton and others were indicted of murder; on which indictment all the parties were found Not Guilty; per q Popham, Gaudy and Fenner, fuerunt valde irati, et tous les jurors comit et fine, et oblige a leur bon behaviour.’ See the case of Watts v. Brains, in 1 Croke’s Rep. p. 773.”

A bill was ordered in, which however did not pass the House of Commons, to “declare the fining and imprisoning of jurors to be illegal.”

‘ 2. That in the place of judicature, the Lord Chief Justice hath under-valued, vilified, and condemned Magna Charta, the great preserver of our lives, freedom, and property.

‘ 3. That he be brought to trial, in order to condign punishment, in such manner as the House shall judge most fit and requisite.’

December 13th 1667.

‘ Resolved, &c.

‘ That the precedents and practice of fining or imprisoning jurors, for verdicts, is illegal.’*

Now whether the justices of this court, in their proceedings (both towards the prisoners, and Jury) have acted according to law, to their oaths and duty, and to do justice without partiality: whereby right might be preserved, the peace of the land secured, and our ancient laws established; or whether such actions tend not to deprive us of our lives and liberties, to rob us of (our birth-right) the fundamental laws of England? and finally to bring in an arbitrary and illegal power to usurp the benches of all our courts of justice, we leave the English reader to judge.

Certainly, there can be no higher affront offered to king and parliament, than the bringing their reputations into suspicion with their people, by the irregular actions of subordinate judges: And no age can parallel the carriage of this recorder, mayor, &c. Nor can we think so ignobly of the parliament, as that they should do less than call these persons to account, who failed not to do it to one less guilty, and of more repute, (to wit) judge Keeling: for if his behaviour gave just ground of jealousy, that he intended an innovation, and the introducing an arbitrary government, this recorder much more. Did Chief Justice Keeling say, Magna Charta was Magna carta; so did this recorder too: And did justice Keeling fine and imprison Juries, contrary to law; so did this Recorder also. In short there is no difference, unless it be, that the one was questioned, and the other deserves it: But we desire in this they may be said to differ, that though the former escaped punishment, the latter may not, who having a precedent before, did notwithstanding notoriously transgress.

To conclude, the law supposes the king cannot err, because it is willing to suppose, he always acts by law (and ‘voluntas legis, est voluntas Regis,’ or the king’s will is regulated by the law) but it says no such thing of his judges. And since they are obliged by oath to disregard the king’s letters (though under the broad and privy seal) if they any wise oppugn, or contradict the laws of the land; and considering that every singular action of an inferior minister, has an ugly reference to the supreme magistrate, where not rebuked; we cannot but conclude, that both judges are answerable for their irregularities, especially, where they had not a limitation of a king’s letter, or command; and that the supreme magistrate is obliged, as in honour and safety to himself, Alfred-like, to bring such to condign punishment, lest every sessions produce the like tragical scenes of usurpation over the consciences of Juries, to the vilifying and contemning of justice, and great detriment, and prejudice of the good and honest men of this famous and free city. Fiat Justitia.

THE severe measures adopted in the early part of the reign of Charles the Second, against Protestant Non-Conformists, (See the Act of Uniformity, Stat. 13 and 14 Car. 2, c. 4, the first Conventicle Act Stat. 16, Car. 2, c. 4, The Five Mile Act Stat. 17 Car. 2, c. 2.) it is probable were occasioned by the sentiments of hatred and revenge which Clarendon felt towards the Presbyterians. The revival of that course of measures, after Clarendon had been removed, was perhaps the result of cool policy in favour of the Papists. It seems to have been supposed that by the enactment and severe enforcement of the second Conventicle Act, Stat. 22, Car. 2, c. 1. the Protestant Dissenters might have been driven to petition for a general Toleration. However this may be, it appears that an active persecution was exercised under the provisions of that statute.

“Many of the bishops,” says Neal, “chose to lie behind the curtain, and throw off the odium from themselves to the civil magistrate; but some of the more zealous could not forbear appearing in person, as bishop Ward, already mentioned, and bishop Cunning, who often disturbed the meetings in person; once finding the doors shut, he ordered the constable to break them open with a sledge; another time he sat upon the bench at the quarter sessions, upon which the chairman desired his lordship to give the charge, which he refusing, received a very handsome rebuke; it being hardly consistent with one that is an ambassador of the prince of peace, to sit in judgment upon the consciences of his poor countrymen and neighbours, in order to plunder and tear them to pieces. The bishop was so zealous in the cause, that he sunk his character by giving a public challenge to the Presbyterians, Independants, Anabaptists, and Quakers, and appointed three days for the disputation; on the first of which his lordship went into the pulpit in the church, where was a considerable congregation, and charged the former with sedition and rebellion out of their books, but would hear no reply. When the day came to dispute with the Quakers, they summoned their friends, and when the bishop railed, they paid him in his own coin; and followed him to his very house with repeated cries, "The Hireling flyeth;" The Non-conformist ministers did what they could to keep themselves within the compass of the law; they preached frequently twice a day in large families, with only four strangers, and as many under the age of sixteen as would come; and at other times in places where people might hear in several adjoining houses; but after all, infinite mischiefs ensued, families were impoverished and divided; friendship between neighbours was interrupted; there was a general distrust and jealousy of each other; and sometimes upon little quarrels, servants would betray their masters and ruin all their affairs. Among others that suffered at this time was Dr. Manton, who was apprehended on a Lord's day in the afternoon just as he had done sermon, the door being opened to let a gentleman out, the justice and his attendants rushed in and went up stairs; they stayed till the Doctor had ended his prayer and then writ down the names of the principal persons present, and took the Doctor's promise to come to them at an house in the Piazzas of Covent Garden, where they tendered him the Oxford oath, upon his refusal of which he was committed prisoner to the Gatehouse, where he continued till he was released by the indulgence. At another time his Meeting-house in White-hart-yard was broken up; the place was fined forty pounds, and the minister twenty, which was paid by Lord Wharton, who was then present: they also took down the names of the hearers for the benefit of the justices of peace and spiritual courts."

* See Mr. Clifford’s argument in the Case of Flower, A. D. 1799, and Mr. Clifford’s Postscript to that Case, infra. See also what Mr. Hargrave says of this matter, in his Preface to lord Hale’s Treatise on the Judicature of the Lords’ House of Parliament. Some spirited observations on Kelyng’s conduct are to be found in the Tract concerning Juries, ascribed to lord Somers. See lord Shaftesbury’s Case, A. D. 1681, infra.

These severities seem to have been attended by the usual effects of religious persecution. The same author, by way of introduction to his Account of this Case of Penn and Mead tells us:

"The behaviour of the Quakers was very extraordinary, and had something in it that looked like the spirit of martyrdom. They met at the same place and hour as in times of liberty, and when the officers came to seize them none of them would stir; they went altogether to prison; they stayed there till they were dismissed, for they would not petition to be set at liberty, nor pay the fines set upon them, nor so much as the gaol fees. When they were discharged they went to their Meeting-house again, as before; and when the doors were shut up by order, they assembled in great numbers in the street before the doors, saying, they would not be ashamed, nor afraid to disown their meeting together in a peaceable manner to worship God; but in imitation of the Prophet Daniel, they would do it more publicly because they were forbid. Some called this obstinacy, others firmness; but by it they carried their point, the government being weary of dealing with so much perverseness."

The fanaticism of the Quakers had, indeed, occasionally displayed itself in an offensive manner some years earlier, as may be seen in the Case of James Nayler, ante, vol. 5, p. 801, and in the following curious narrative:

"In the year 1659, in the fourth month, the last day of the month being the 5th day of the week.

"The presence of the Lord God was felt within me, and in his light he let me see what his pleasure was with me; it was clearly shewed me that I should go to the Steeplehouse in Alderman-bury the first day of the week then following, and take with me something to work, and do it in the pulpit at their singing time.

"At which sight I found much unwillingness in myself, yet sitting still with trembling, there came upon me a very great weight pressing me to obedience; yea a heavy burthen was felt, till I had consented to obey; I felt the weight to increase, oh how hard my unwilling will was to yield, but the Lord strengthened me, and having consented, I found a little ease, yea I did resolve in the power of the Lord to go on: I purposed to carry with me a pocket to sew.

"So the first day morning being the 3rd day of the 5th month after the 8th hour one of the doors being open, I passed in, thinking to get into the pulpit to hide myself there till their singing time, and then get up and work; the Sexton spying me, took me by the arm, said friend we do not open yet, for it was their Communion day as they call: but the time I was in, I found the galleries were higher than the pulpit, and I should have been discovered before their song began; I see the clerk giving tickets: so about the 9th hour their doors were opened, I passed in as one of their own crowd, the throng came in very fast, I got into one of the galleries to spy if possible to get in the pulpit some way, but I found none at that time, so they began to read, and I came down, and finding no way to get into the pulpit, I came to the table that is prepared for that troop, I thought to get upon the table to work, but the table was set round with young men, and when they began their song, they laid on their hats upon the table, so I standing still waiting on the Lord, having a great mind to do the Lord's work; their song being up, my hat offended them, they took it off, and cast it away, and one of the young men gave it me again, I put it on, and it offended again, inso-much that Piercefall did perceive me, who came violently, and took my hat off to fling it away, but I held it, then he took me by the hair of the head, and dragged me out, and as one of their own company testified to his face that he struck me, but I cannot say that, but a lusty red-haired man did strike me, I supposed him to be an officer in that hateful place, but Piercefall after he had dragged me out by the hair, said, Sirrah do you not know William Duike, I said nay, for I did not know him; Sirrah, said he, I put him in prison, and fined him ten pound, and you must be served so too, and so charged the constable with me, and went himself in again, and received the Sacrament for all this.

"The constable told me that I might go away if I would, but in again I must not. So I stood a while and finding in myself no constraint, I passed away towards More-fields finding a little ease from the weight of the burden, being faithful to what might be done at that time: but the 6th day of the week being the 8th day of the month sitting at work in my shop but not on the shop board, the burden of the Lord came upon me, and the light making manifest the same thing that was not yet done, must be done, and the Lord would not discharge me, but laid a necessity upon me. I beholding this with trembling and fear; I did resolve in the power of the Lord not to eat nor drink, till I had performed the Lord's requiring. So having purposed in heart, I greatly desired the Lord's assistance; and it was shewed me how to do it, and the Lord made way for me.

"So the first day of the week being the 10th day of the 5th month, I waited opportunity till the singing tune began, which when I heard, I passed in, but being fearful to be taken with the hat again; and so loose my main business, for the Lord: I stepped out again, but staid not, I came in again; I looked towards the pulpit and spied the pew door open, that the priest might pass up the pulpit. So I waited thinking that Edmund Calomy would go up the pulpit, I intended to get in before him; for thought I that boy that sits upon the stairs will open the pulpit door for the priest, and I will get in before, but no priest came, whereupon in the power of the Lord I fixed my eye upon the pulpit, and I spied an iron hook, and I passed through the pew up the stairs, and unhooked the door, and pulled twice and got it open, and I sat myself down upon the cushion, and my feet upon the seat where the priest when he bath told out his lies doth sit down, and having my work ready, I pulled one or two stitches. The people lost their song, and some cried Pull him down, some break his neck down, and a lusty fellow came up and did intend to do me a mischief, and wrung my neck as if he would have wrung it in two. So I let go my hold and he flung me down stairs; but the Lord preserved me, and I felt no hurt; for having done that which the Lord required me to do I was full of peace; and it had been little to me if they had there taken away or killed the body. For I was full of joy, and they were full of wrath and madness; so they tore my coat off and my hat, and dragged me out, and one took me by the hair and flung me upon the ground, and some that was without said, Why do you use the man so, but I got up again, then they dragged me quite out into the street, and there held me, and while they held me, one came, and gave me a violent kick on the shins, and said he could find in his heart to knock me down, he made my shin bleed, and another kicked me on the other shin, but did not much hurt, another said that I had been some notorious sinner heretofore and now came to do something that might merit, presently the church-warden as they call him, came out, and he and the bell-toller carried me away to the counter, till their Sermon was ended, as they call it, then they carried me away to Paul's Yard to stay for the mayor, but the sergeant said he would carry me away to the mayor's house and there stay me till he came in; and so he did: and all the way through Paternoster-Row as I went, the boys kicked my heels, so then the mayor came in, and they told him that I was at work in the pulpit; then said he to me, Wherefore did you work there? I said in obedience to the Lord's commandment: he said, It was a false spirit, and said he, where are your sureties? I said the Lord was my surety; he said, the Lord would not bear me out in this thing: said he to them, Carry him again to the Counter: so they carried me back again, and there I was till the third day.

"Now let all sober people judge whether I did this thing out of envy against either priest or people.

"Yea farther I say, the Lord God lay it not to their charge, who have said that I did it in malice, devilishness and envy; it is the desire of my soul that they might be saved.

"And so do write my name being a prisoner for the Testimony of the Lord in the common gaol in Newgate, London: committed the 15th of the 5th month, 1659.

231. Case of the Imprisonment of EDWARD BUSHELL,* for alleged Misconduct as a Juryman: 22 CHARLES II. A. D. 1670. [Vaughan's Reports, 135.†]

THIS important Case, which arose out of the preceding, is thus reported by Chief Justice Vaughan:

The king's Writ of Habeas Corpus, dat. 9 die Novembris, 22 Car. 2. issued out of this court directed to the then Sheriffs of London, to have the body of Edward Bushell, by them detained in Prison, together with the day and cause of his caption and detention, on Friday then next following, before this court, to do and receive as the court should consider; as also to have then the said writ in court.

† See the Observations of Lord Erskine upon this Case in his very able and eloquent Argument in the Court of King's Bench in support of an application for a new trial in the Case of the Dean of St. Asaph (Shibly) in Michaelmas Term 1784, infra.

Of which Writ, Patient Ward and Dannel Fourth, then Sheriffs of London, made the return following, annexed to the said Writ.

That at the king's court of a session of Oyer and Terminer, held for the City of London, at Justice Hall in the Old Bailey, London, in the parish of St. Sepulchre's in Farringdon ward without London, on Wednesday 31 die August 22 Car. 2. before sir Samuel Sterling then mayor of London, and divers other his majesty's justices, by virtue of his majesty's letters patents, under the great seal of England, to them, or any four or more of them, directed to enquire, hear, and determine, according to the tenor of the said letters patents, the offences therein specified: and amongst others, the offences of unlawful congregating and assemblies, within the limits appointed by the said commission within the said city, as well within liberties as without. Edward Bushell, the prisoner at the bar, was committed to the gaol of Newgate, to be there safely kept, under the custody of John Smith knight, and James Edwards, then sheriffs of the said city, by virtue of a certain Order, then and there made by the said court of sessions, as followeth:

Ordinatum est per curiam hic quod Finis 40 marcarum separati ponatur super Edwardum Bushell, and other eleven persons particularly named, and upon every of them, being the 12 jurors, then and there sworn, and charged to try several issues then and there joined between our lord the king, and William Penn and William Mead, for certain trespasses, contempts, unlawful assemblies and tumults, made and perpetrated by the said Penn and Mead, together with divers other unknown persons, to the number of three hundred, unlawfully and tumultuously assembled in Grace-Church-street in London, to the disturbance of the peace, whereof the said Penn and Mead were then indicted before the said justices. Upon which indictment, the said Penn and Mead pleaded they were Not Guilty. For that they, the said jurors, then and there, the said William Penn and William Mead, of the said trespasses, contempts, unlawful assemblies and tumults, 'Contra legem hujus regni Angliæ, et contra plenum et manifestum evidentiæ, et contra directionem curiæ in materia legis, hic, de et super præmissis eisdem juratoribus versus præfatos Will Penn et Will. Mead, in curia hic aperta datam, et declaratam de præmissis, iis impositi in indictamento prædicto acquieverunt, in contemptum domini regis nunc, legumque suarum, et ad magnum impedimentum et obstructionem justitiæ, necnon ad malum exemplum omnium aliorum juratorum in consimili casu delinquentium. Ac super inde modo ulterius ordinatum est per curiam hic quod præfatus Ed. Bushell, capiatur et committatur gaolæ dicti domini regis de Newgate, ibidem remansurus quousque solvat dicto domino regi 40 Marcas pro fine suo prædicto, vel deliberatus fuerit, per debitum legis cursum. Ac eodem Edwardo Bushell ad tunc, et ibidem capto et commissio existente ad dictam gaolam de Newgate, sub custodia præfat. Johannis Smith et Jacobi Edwards adtunc vic, civitatis Lond. prædict, et in eorum custodia in gaola prædict existente et remanente virtute ordinis prædict, iidem Johannis Smith et Jacobus Edwards, postea in eorum exitu ab officio vic. civitatis Lond. prædict. scilicet 28 die Septembris, anno 22. supra dicto eundem Edwardum Bushell in dicta gaola dicti domini regis adtunc existentem, deliberaverunt nobis præfatis nunc vice comitibus civitatis prædict in eadem gaola, salvo custodiendum secundum tenorem, et effectum ordinis prædictæ. Et quia prædictus Edwardus, nondem solvit dicto domino regi prædictum finem 40 marcarum, nos iidem nunc vicecomites corpus ejusdem Edwardi in gaola prædicta, lucusque detinimus, et hæc est causa captionis et detentionis præfati Edwardi, cujus quidem corpus coram præfatis justitiariis paratum habemus.

The Writ of Habeas Corpus is now the most usual remedy by which a man is restored again to his liberty, if he have been against law deprived of it.

Therefore the writ commands the day, and the cause of the caption and detaining of the prisoner to be certified upon the return, which if not done, the Court cannot possibly judge whether the cause of the commitment and detainer be according to law or against it.

Therefore the cause of the imprisonment ought, by the return, to appear as specifically and certainly to the judges of the return, as it did appear to the court or person authorized to commit; else the return is insufficient, and the consequence must be,

That either the prisoner, because the cause returned of his imprisonment is too general, must be discharged; when as if the cause had been more particularly returned, he ought to have been remanded; or else he must be remanded, when if the cause had been particularly returned; he ought to have been discharged: Both which are inconveniences not agreeing with the dignity of the law. (There is a specious exception to this rule, but doth not materially vary it, as shall appear.)

In the present case it is returned, That the prisoner, being a juryman, among others charged at the Sessions Court of the Old Bailey; to try the issue between the king, and Penn, and Mead, upon an indictment, for assembling unlawfully and tumultuously, did 'contra plenum et manifestam evidentiæ,' openly given in court, acquit the prisoners indicted, in contempt of the king, &c.

The court hath no knowledge by this return, whether the evidence given were full and manifest, or doubtful, lame, and dark, or indeed evidence at all material to the issue, because it is not returned what evidence in particular, and as it was delivered, was given. For it is not possible to judge of that rightly, which is not exposed to a man's judgment. But here the evidence given to the jury is not exposed at all to this court, but the judgment of the Court of Sessions upon that evidence is only exposed to us; who tell us it was full and manifest. But our judgment ought to be grounded upon our own inferences and understandings, and not upon theirs.

It was said by a learned judge, If the jury might be fined for finding against manifest evidence, the return was good, though it did not express what the evidence particularly was, whereby the court might judge of it, because returning all the evidence would be too long. A strange reason: For if the law allow the remedy for wrong imprisonment, and that must be by judging whether the cause of it were good, or not, to say the cause is too long to be made known, is to say the law gives a remedy which it will not let me have, or I must be wrongfully imprisoned still, because it is too long to know that I ought to be freed? What is necessary to an end, the law allows is never too long. 'Non sunt longa quibus nihil est quod demere possis,' is as true as any axiom in Euclid. Besides, one manifest evidence returned had sufficed, without returning all the evidence. But the other judges were not of his mind.

If the return had been, That the jurors were committed by an order of the Court of Sessions, because they did, 'minus justè,' acquit the persons indicted. Or because they did, 'contra legem,' acquit the person indicted. Or because they did, 'contra Sacramentum suum,' acquit them.

The judges cannot upon the present more judge of the legal cause of their commitment, than they could if any of these causes, as general as they are, had been returned for the cause of their commitment. And the same argument may be exactly made to justify any of these returns, had they been made, as to justify the present return, they being equally as legal, equally as certain, and equally as far from possessing the court with the truth of the cause: and in what condition should all men be for the just liberty of their persons, if such causes should be admitted sufficient causes to remand persons to prison.

To those Objections made by the prisoners counsel against the return, as too general.

1. It hath been said, That 'Institutum est quod non inquiratur de discretione Judicis.'

2. That the Court of Sessions in London, is not to be looked on as an inferior court, having all the judges commissioners. That the court having heard the evidence, it must be credited, that the evidence given to the jury of the fact was clear, and not to be doubted.

As for any such institution pretended, I know no such, nor believe any such, as it was applied to the present cause; but taking it in another, and in the true sense, I admit it for truth: that is, when the king hath constituted any man a judge under him, his ability, parts, fitness for his place, are not to be reflected on, censured, defamed, or vilified by any other person, being allowed and stamp with the king's approbation, to whom only it belongs to judge of the fitness of his ministers.

And such scandalous assertions or inquiries upon the judges of both benches, is forbidden by the statute of scandalum magnatum, 2 R. 2. c. 5. Nor must we, upon supposition only, either admit judges deficient in their office, for so they should never do any thing right; nor on the other side, must we admit them unerring in their places, for so they should never do any thing wrong.

And in that sense the saying concerns not the present case.

But if any man thinks that a person concerned in interest, by the judgment, action, or authority exercised upon his person or fortunes by a judge, must submit in all, or any of these, to the implied discretion and unerringness of his judge, without seeking such redress as the law allows him, it is a persuasion against common reason, the received law, and usage both of this kingdom, and almost all others.

If a court, inferior or superior, hath given a false or erroneous judgment, is any thing more frequent than to reverse such judgments, by writs of false judgment, of error, or appeals, according to the course of the kingdom.

If they have given corrupt and dishonest judgments, they have in all ages been complained of to the king in the Star Chamber, or to the parliament.

Andrew Horne, in his Mirror of Justices (f. 296.) mentions many judges punished by king Alfred before the conquest, for corrupt judgments, and their particular names and offences, which could not be had but from the records of those times.

Our stories mention many punished in the time of Edward 1. our parliament rolls of Edward 3.'s time, of Richard 2.'s time, for the pernicious resolutions given at Nottingham castle, afford examples of this kind: in later times, the parliament journals of 18 and 21 Jac. the Judgment of the Ship-money* in the time of Charles 1. questioned, and the particular judges impeached. These instances are obvious, and therefore I but mention them.

In cases of returns too general upon writs of Habeas Corpus, of many I could urge, I will instance in two only.

One Astwick brought by Habeas Corpus to the king's bench, was returned to be committed, per mandatum Nicholai Bacon militis, domini custodis magni sigilli Angliæ virtute cujusdam contemptus in curia cancellar. facti, and was presently bailed. (9 El.)

One Apsley, prisoner in the Fleet, upon a Habeas Corpus, was returned to be committed, per considerationem curiæ cancellar. pro contemptu eidem curiæ illato, and upon this return set at liberty. (13 Jac.)

In both these cases, no inquiry was made or consideration had, whether the contempts were to the law court, or equitable court of Chancery, either was alike to the judges, lest any man should think a difference might arise thence.

* See vol. 3. p. 826, of this Collection.

The reason of discharging the prisoners upon those returns, was the generality of them being for contempts to the court, but no particular of the contempt exprest, whereby the King's Bench could judge, whether it were a cause for commitment or not.

And was it not as supposeable, and as much to be credited, that the lord keeper and court of Chancery, did well understand what was a contempt deserving commitment, as it is now to be credited, that the court of sessions did understand perfectly what was full and manifest evidence against the persons indicted at the sessions, and therefore it needed not to be revealed to us upon the return?

Hence it is apparent, that the commitment and return pursuing it, being in itself too general and uncertain, we ought not implicitly to think the commitment was re vera, for cause particular and sufficient enough, because it was the act of the court of sessions.

And as to the other part, that the court of sessions in London is not to be resembled to other inferior courts of oyer and terminer, because all the judges are commissioned here (which is true) but few are there, at the same time, and as I have heard, when this trial was, none of them were present. However persons of great quality are in the commissions of oyer and terminer, through the shires of the kingdom, and always some of the judges; nor doth one commission of oyer and terminer differ in its essence, nature, and power from another, if they be general commissions; but all differ in the accidents of the commissioners, which makes no alteration in their actings in the eye of law.

Another fault in the return is, that the jurors are not said to have acquitted the persons indicted, against full and manifest evidence corruptly, and knowing the said evidence to be full and manifest against the persons indicted, for how manifest soever the evidence was, if it were not manifest to them, and that they believed it such, it was not a finable fault, nor deserving imprisonment, upon which difference the law of punishing jurors for false verdicts principally depends.

A passage in Bracton is remarkable to this purpose concerning attainting inquests. 'Committit Jurator per jurium propter falsum Sacramentum, ut ex certa scientia aliter juraverit quam res veritate se habuerit, si autem Sacramentum fatuum fuerit licet falsum, tamen non committit perjurium licet re vera res aliter se habeat quam juraverat, et quia jurat secundum conscientiam eo quod non vadit contra mentem. Sunt quidam qui verum dicunt, mentiendo, sed se perjurant quia contra mentem vadunt.' Bracton, l. 4, c. f. 288, b.

The same words, and upon the same occasion, are in effect in Fleta. 'Committit enim jurator perjurium quandoque propter falsum Sacramentum, ut si ex certa scientia aliter juraverit quam res in veritate se habuerit, secus enim propter factum quamvis falsum; Fleta, l. 5, c. 22, f. 336, n. 9. and lest any should think that these passages are to be understood only of jury-mens perjuries in foro conscientie, it is clearly otherwise by both those books, which shew how, by the discreet examination of the judge, the error of the jury not wilful, may be prevented and corrected, and their Verdict rectified.

And in another place of Bracton, in the same chapter: 'Judex enim sive Justiciarius ad quem pertinet examinatio, si minus diligenter examinaverit, occasione prebet perjurii Juratoribus.' And after, 'Et si examinatus cum justo deducatur errore dictum suum emendaverint, hoc bene facere possunt, ante judicium et impune, sed post judicium non sine poena.' Bract. l. 4, f. 289. a.

After these Authorities,

I would know whether any thing be more common, than for two men students, barristers, or judges, to deduce contrary and opposite conclusions out of the same case in law? And is there any difference that two men should infer distinct conclusions from the same testimony? Is any thing more known than that the same author, and place in that author, is forcibly urged to maintain contrary conclusions, and the decision hard, which is in the right? Is any thing more frequent in the controversies of religion, than to press the same text for opposite tenets? how then comes it to pass that two persons may not apprehend with reason and honesty, what a witness, or many, say, to prove in the understanding of one plainly one thing, but in the apprehension of the other, clearly the contrary thing? Must therefore one of these merit fine and imprisonment, because he doth that which he cannot otherwise do, preserving his oath and integrity? And this often is the case of the judge and jury.

I conclude therefore, That this return, charging the prisoners to have acquitted Penn and Mead, against full and manifest evidence, first and next, without saying that they did know and believe that Evidence to be full and manifest against the indicted persons, is no cause of fine or imprisonment.*

And by the way I must here note, That the Verdict of a Jury, and Evidence of a Witness are very different things, in the truth and falsehood of them: A witness swears but to what he hath heard or seen, generally or more largely, to what hath fallen under his senses. But a jury-man swears to what he can infer and conclude from the testimony of such witnesses, by the act and force of his understanding, to be the fact inquired after, which differs nothing in the reason, though much in the punishment, from what a judge, out of various cases considered by him, infers to be the law in the question before him. Therefore Bracton, 'Et

* Of this mind were 10 judges of 11, the Chief Baron Turnor gave no opinion, because not at the arguments.

‘licet narratio facti contraria sit sacramento, et dicto præcedenti, tamen falsum non faciunt Sacramentum licet faciunt fatuum Judicium, quia loquuntur secundum conscientiam quia falli possunt in Judiciis suis, sicut ipse Justitarius.’ Bract. f. 289. a.

There is one objection which hath been made by none, as I remember, to justify this general Return, I would give answer to.

A man committed for treason or felony, and bringing a Habeas Corpus, hath returned upon it, ‘That he was committed for High Treason or Felony; and this is a sufficient return to remand him, though in truth this is a general return: for if the specific fact for which the party was committed, were expressed in the Warrant, it might then perhaps appear to be no treason or felony, but a trespass, as in the Case of the earl of Northumberland, 5 H. 4. questioned for Treason in raising power. The Lords adjudged it a trespass; for the powers raised were not against the king, but some subjects.

Why then by like reason may not this return be sufficient, though the fact for which the prisoners stood committed particularly expressed, might be no cause of commitment?

The cases are not alike; for upon a general commitment for treason or felony, the prisoner (the cause appearing) may press for his trial, which ought not to be denied or delayed, and upon his indictment and trial, the particular cause of his imprisonment must appear, which proving no treason or felony, the prisoner shall have the benefit of it. But in this case, though the evidence given were no full nor manifest evidence against the persons indicted, but such as the jury upon it ought to have acquitted those indicted, the prisoner shall never have any benefit of it, but must continue in prison, when remanded, until he hath paid the fine unjustly imposed on him, which was the whole end of his imprisonment.

We come now to the next part of the Return, viz. ‘That the jury acquitted those indicted against the direction of the court in matter of law, openly given and declared to them in court.’

1. The words, That the jury did acquit, against the direction of the court, in matter of law, literally taken, and de plano, are insignificant and not intelligible, for no issue can be joined of matter in law, no jury can be charged with the trial of matter in law barely, no evidence ever was, or can be given to a jury of what is law, or not; nor no such oath can be given to, or taken by, a jury, to try matter in law; nor no attaint can lye for such a false oath.

Therefore we must take off this veil and colour of words, which make a shew of being something, and in truth are nothing.

If the meaning of these words, finding against the direction of the court in matter of law, be, That if the judge having heard the evidence given in court (for he knows no other) shall tell the jury, upon this evidence, The law is for the plaintiff, or for the defendant, and you are under the pain of fine and imprisonment to find accordingly, then the jury ought of duty so to do; Every man sees that the jury is but a troublesome delay, great charge, and of no use in determining right and wrong, and therefore the trials by them may be better abolished than continued: which were a strange new-found conclusion, after a trial so celebrated for many hundreds of years.

For if the judge, from the evidence, shall by his own judgment first resolve upon any trial what the fact is, and so knowing the fact, shall then resolve what the law is, and order the jury penally to find accordingly, what either necessary or convenient use can be fancied of juries, or to continue trials by them at all?

But if the jury be not obliged in all trials to follow such directions, if given, but only in some sort of trials (as for instance, in trials for criminal matters upon indictments or appeals) why then the consequence will be, though not in all, yet in criminal trials, the jury (as of no material use) ought to be either omitted or abolished, which were the greater mischief to the people, than to abolish them in civil trials.

And how the jury should, in any other manner, according to the course of trials used, find against the direction of the court in matter of law, is really not conceivable.

True it is, if it fall out upon some special trial, that the jury being ready to give their Verdict, and before it is given, the judge shall ask, whether they find such a particular thing propounded by him? or whether they find the matter of fact to be as such a witness, or witnesses have deposed? and the jury answer, they find the matter of fact to be so; if then the judge shall declare, The matter of fact being by you so found to be, the law is for the plaintiff, and you are to find accordingly for him.

If notwithstanding they find for the defendant, this may be thought a finding in matter of law against the direction of the court: for in that case the jury first declare the fact, as it is found by themselves, to which fact the judge declares how the law is consequent.

And this is ordinary, when the jury find unexpectedly for the plaintiff or defendant, the judge will ask, how do you find such a fact in particular? and upon their answer he will say, then it is for the defendant though they found for the plaintiff, or è contrario, and thereupon they rectify their verdict.

And in these cases the jury, and not the judge, resolve and find what the fact is.

Wherefore always in discreet and lawful assistance of the jury, the judge his direction is hypothetical, and upon supposition, and not positive, and upon coercion, viz. If you find the fact thus (leaving it to them what to find) then you are to find for the plaintiff; but if you find the fact thus, then it is for the defendant.

But in the case propounded by me, where it is possible in that special manner, the jury may find against the direction of the court in matter of law, it will not follow they are therefore finable; for if an attaint will lie upon the verdict so given by them, they ought not to be fined and imprisoned by the judge for that verdict; for all the judges have agreed upon a full conference at Serjeants-Inn, in this case. And it was formerly so agreed by the then judges in a case where justice Hyde had fined a jury at Oxford, for finding against their evidence in a civil cause. That a jury is not finable for going against their evidence, where an attaint lies; for if an attaint be brought upon that verdict, it may be affirmed and found upon the attaint a true verdict, and the same verdict cannot be a false verdict, and therefore the jury fined for it as such by the judge, and yet no false verdict, because affirmed upon the attaint.

Another reason that the jury may not be fined in such case, is, because until a jury have consummated their verdict, which is not done until they find for the plaintiff or defendant, and that also be entered of Record; they have time still of deliberation, and whatsoever they have answered the judge upon an interlocutory question or discourse, they may lawfully have from it if they find cause, and are not thereby concluded.

Whence it follows upon this last reason, that upon trials wherein no attaint lies, as well as upon such where it doth, no case can be invented; wherein it can be maintained that a jury can find, in matter of law, nakedly against the direction of the judge.

And the judges were (as before) all of opinion that the return in this latter part of it, is also insufficient, as in the former, and so wholly insufficient.

But that this question may not hereafter revive if possible, it is evident by several resolutions of all the judges, that where an attaint lies, the judge cannot fine the jury for going against their evidence or direction of the court, without other misdemeanour.

For in such case, finding against, or following the direction of the court barely, will not barr an attaint, but in some case the judge being demanded by, and declaring to, the jury what is the law. Though he declares it erroneously, and they find accordingly, this may excuse the jury from the forfeitures; for though their verdict be false, yet it is not corrupt, but the judgment is to be reversed however upon the attaint; for a man loseth not his right by the judge's mistake in the law. Ingeralls C. Cr. 35 El. f. 309, n. 18.

Therefore if an attaint lies for a false verdict upon indictment not capital (as this is) either by the common or statute law, by those resolutions the court would not fine the jury in this case for going against evidence, because an attaint lay.

But admitting an attaint did not lie (as I think the law clear it did not) for there is no case in all the law of such an attaint, nor opinion, but that of Thirings 10 H. 4. Attaint 60. and 64. for which there is no warrant in law, though there be other specious authority against it, touched by none that argued this case.

The question then will be, Whether before the several acts of parliament, which granted attaints, and are enumerated in their order in the Register, [f. 122. a.] the judge by the common law, in all cases, might have fined the jury, going against their evidence and direction of the court, where no attaint did lie, or could so do, yet if the statutes which gave the attaints were repealed.

If he could not in civil causes before attaints granted in them, he could not in criminal causes upon indictment (wherein I have admitted attaint lies not) for the fault in both was the same, viz. finding against evidence and direction of the court, and by the common law; the reason being the same in both; the law is the same.

That the court could not fine a jury at the common law, where attaint did not lie (for where it did, is agreed he could not) I think to be the clearest position that ever I considered, either for authority or reason of law.

After attaints were granted by statutes generally; as by Westminster the first c. 38. in pleas real, and by 34 E. 3. c. 7. in pleas personal, and where they did lie at common law (which was only in writs of assise) the examples are frequent in our books of punishing jurors by attaint.

But no case can be offered, either before attaints granted in general, or after, that ever a jury was punished by fine and imprisonment by the judge, for not finding according to their evidence, and his direction, until Popham's time, nor is there clear proof that he ever fined them for that reason, separated from other misdemeanour. If juries might be fined in such case before attaints granted, why not since; for no statute hath taken that power from the judge. But since attaints granted, the judges resolved they cannot find where the attaint lies, therefore they could not fine before. Sure this latter age did not first discover that the verdicts of juries were many times not according to the judge's opinion and liking.

But the reasons are, I conceive, most clear, that the judge could not, nor can fine and imprison the jury in such cases.

Without a fact agreed, it is as impossible for a judge, or any other, to know the law relating to that fact or direct concerning it, as to know an accident that hath no subject.

Hence it follows, that the judge can never direct what the law is in any matter controverted, without first knowing the fact; and then it follows, that without his previous knowledge of the fact, the jury cannot go against his direction in law, for he could not direct.

But the judge, quâ judge, cannot know the fact possibly but from the evidence which the jury have, but (as will appear) he can never know what evidence the jury have, and consequently he cannot know the matter of fact, nor punish the jury for going against their evidence, when he cannot know what their evidence is.

It is true, if the jury were to have no other evidence for the fact, but what is deposed in court, the judge might know their evidence, and the fact from it, equally as they, and so direct what the law were in the case, though even then the judge and jury might honestly differ in the result from the evidence, as well as two judges may, which often happens.

But the evidence which the jury have of the fact is much other than that: for,

1. Being returned of the vicinage, whence the cause of action ariseth, the law supposeth them thence to have sufficient knowledge to try the matter in issue (and so they must) though no evidence were given on either side in court, but to this evidence the judge is a stranger.

2. They may have evidence from their own personal knowledge, by which they may be assured, and sometimes are, that what is deposed in court, is absolutely false: but to this the judge is a stranger, and he knows no more of the fact than he hath learned in court, and perhaps by false depositions, and consequently knows nothing.

3. The jury may know the witnesses to be stigmatized and infamous, which may be unknown to the parties, and consequently to the court.

4. In many cases the jury are to have view necessarily, in many, by consent, for their better information; to this evidence likewise the judge is a stranger.

5. If they do follow his direction, they may be attainted and the judgment reversed for doing that, which if they had not done, they should have been fined and imprisoned by the judge, which is unreasonable.

6. If they do not follow his direction, and be therefore fined, yet they may be attainted, and so doubly punished by distinct judicatures for the same offence, which the common law admits not.

A fine reversed in Banco Regis for infancy,* per inspectionem et per testimonium del. 4. fide dignorum. After upon examination of divers witnesses in chancery, the supposed infant was proved to be of age, 'tempore finis levati,' which testimonies were exemplified, and given in evidence after in Communi Banco in a writ of entry in the quibus there brought. And though it was the opinion of the court, that those testimonies were of no force against the judgment in the King's-Bench, yet the jury found, with the testimony in chancery, against direction of the court, upon a point in law and their verdict after affirmed in an attain brought, and after a writ of right was brought, and battle joined.†

7. To what end is the jury to be returned out of the vicinage, whence the cause of action

ariseth? To what end must hundredors be of the jury, whom the law supposeth to have clearer knowledge of the fact than those of the vicinage in general: To what end are they challenged so scrupulously to array and pole? To what end must they have such a certain free-hold, and be 'probi et legales homines,' and not of affinity with the parties concerned? To what end must they have in many cases the view, for their exacter information chiefly? To what end must they undergo the heavy punishment of the villanous judgment, if after all this they implicitly must give a verdict by the dictates and authority of another man, under pain of fines and imprisonment, when sworn to do it according to the best of their own knowledge?

A man cannot see by another's eye, nor hear by another's ear, no more can a man conclude or infer the thing to be resolved by another's understanding or reasoning; and though the verdict be right the jury give, yet they being not assured it is so from their own understanding, are forsworn, at least in foro conscientie.

9. It is absurd a jury should be fined by the judge for going against their evidence, when he who fineth knows not what it is, as where a jury find without evidence, in court of either side, so if the jury find, upon their own knowledge, as the course is if the defendant plead solvit ad diem, to a bond proved, and offers no proof. The jury is directed to find for the plaintiff, unless they know payment was made of their own knowledge, according to the plea. [14 H. 7. f. 29 per Vavasor in Camer. Scacc. without contradiction Hob. f. 227.]

And it is as absurd to fine a jury for finding against their evidence, when the judge knows but part of it; for the better and greater part of the evidence may be wholly unknown to him, and this may happen in most cases, and often both, as in Graves and Short's case. [40 El. Cro. f. 616.]

Error of a Judgment in the Common Bench, the error assigned was, The issue being, whether a feoffment were made? and the Jurors being gone together to confer for their verdict, one of them shewed to the rest an 'Escrow pro petentibus,' not given in evidence by the parties per quod, they found for the demandant, upon demurrer adjudged no error; for it appears not to be given him by any of the parties, or any for them, it must be intended he had it as a piece of evidence about him before, and shewed it to inform himself and his fellows, and as he might declare it as a witness, that he knew it to be true.* They resolved, if that might have avoided the verdict, which they agreed it could not, yet it ought to have been done by examination, and not by error.

That Decantatum in our books, 'Ad quæstionem facti non respondent Judices, ad quæstionem legis non respondent Juratores,' literally taken is true; for if it be demanded, What is the fact? the Judge cannot answer it: if it be asked, What is the law in the case, the Jury cannot answer it.*

be examined, and subjected to cross examination, as a witness. See too what Chief Justice North says as to sir John Cutler in Reading's Case, A. D. 1679, infra. See also Burn's Justice, "Of the Demeanour of Jurors in giving their Verdicts." In the trial of an Impeachment, a peer, who is one of the judges, may be examined as a witness. Lord Stafford's Case, A. D. 1680, infra. Upon the Trial of the Earls of Essex and Southampton (ante, vol. 1, p. 1333) the Lord Keeper Egerton, the Earl of Worcester, (one of the Lords Tryers) and the Lord Chief Justice Popham gave evidence 'upon their honours' against the prisoners. Upon the trial of Hacker, one of the regicides, Secretary Morrice and Annesley President of the Council, who were both Commissioners for trial of the Prisoners, and as such sat on the bench, came off from the bench and being sworn gave evidence on the part of the Crown, but did not go up to the bench upon that man's trial, ante, vol. 5, p. 1181, and note. Oates in his trial for perjury, May 5th, 1685, infra, proposed that the Chief Justice (Jefferies) who tried him should be sworn to give an account of what had passed at a former trial, to which Jefferies answered, "No, there will be no need of that: I will acknowledge any thing I said 'then.' [For more matter relating to these points, see sir John Hawles's Observation on Lord Shaftesbury's Grand Jury, A. D. 1681, and on Cornish's trial for treason, A. D. 1685; also the speech in the House of Commons of the same sir John Hawles when Solicitor General upon the Bill of Attainder against sir John Fenwick, A. D. 1696, post.]

Mr. Barrington observes on the statute of York (12 Ed. 2.) that the witnesses to a deed seem to have been antiently a necessary part of the Jury, which was to try the validity of such an instrument.

* "The most usual trial of matters of fact," says Lord Coke, (First Inst. 155, b.) "is by twelve such men ('liberi et legales homines') for 'ad quæstionem facti non respondent judices;' and matters in law the judges ought to decide and discuss, for 'ad quæstionem juris non respondent juratores.'"

Upon which passage his learned commentator, Mr. Hargrave, has given the following Note:

"This decantatum, as Lord Chief Justice Vaughan calls it on account of its frequency in the books, about the respective provinces of judge and jury, hath, since lord Coke's time, become the subject of very heated controversy,

Therefore the parties agree the fact by their pleading upon Demurrer, and ask the Judgment of the Court for the law.

In special verdicts the Jury inform the naked fact, and the Court deliver the law; and so is it in Demurrers upon evidence, in arrest of judgments upon challenges, and often upon the judge's opinion of the evidence given in Court, the plaintiff becomes nonsuit, when if the matter had been left to the Jury, they might well have found for the plaintiff.

But upon all general issues; as upon not culpable pleaded in trespass, 'nil debet' in debt, 'nul tort, nul disseisin' in assize, 'ne disturbas' in 'quare impedit,' and the like; though especially on prosecutions for state libels; some aiming to render juries wholly dependent on the judge for matters of law, and others contending for nearly a compleat and unqualified independence. On the trial of John Lilburne for treason in 1649, high words passed between the Court and him, in consequence of his stating to the jury that they were judges both of law and fact, and citing passages in the Coke upon Littleton to prove it. 2 State Tr. 4th ed. 69 and post. 228, a. In the case of Penn and Meade, who in 1670 were indicted for unlawfully assembling the people and preaching to them, the jury gave a verdict against the directions of the Court in point of law, and for this were committed to prison. But the commitment was questioned; and on a Habeas Corpus brought in the court of Common Pleas, it was declared illegal; Lord Chief Justice Vaughan distinguishing himself on the occasion by a most profound argument in favour of the rights of a jury. Bushell's case 1 Freem. 1, and Vaughan 135. However the contest did not cease, as appears by sir John Hawles's famous Dialogue between a Barrister and a Jurymen, which was published in 1680 to assert the claims of the latter against the then current doctrine decrying their authority. Since the Revolution also many cases have occurred, in which there has been much debate on the like topic. See King v. Poole in Cas. B. R. temp. Hardwicke 23. Franklin's case in the St. Tr. Peter Zenger's ibid. Owen's case in the St. Tr. and Woodfall's case 5 Burr. 261. By attending to the cases before referred to, it will be easy to trace the progress of this controversy on the limits of the jury's province.

"In respect to my own ideas on this subject, they are at present to this effect:

"On the one hand, as the jury may, as often as they think fit, find a general verdict, I therefore think it unquestionable, that they so far may decide upon the law as well as fact, such a verdict necessarily involving both. In this I have the authority of Littleton himself, who hereafter writes, That if the inquest will take upon them the knowledge of the law upon the matter, they may give their verdict generally. Post. sect. 368 and fol. 228.

"But on the other hand I think it seems clear, that questions of law generally and more it be matter of law whether the defendant be a trespasser, a debtor, disseisor, or disturber in the particular cases in issue; yet the jury find not (as in a special verdict) the fact of every case by itself, leaving the law to the court, but find for the plaintiff or defendant upon the issue to be tried, wherein they resolve both law and fact complicately, and not the fact by itself; so as though they answer not singly to the question what is the law, yet they determine the properly belong to the judges; and that, exclusively of the fitness of having the law expounded by those who are trained to the knowledge of it by long study and practice, this appears from various considerations. I. If the parties litigating agree in their facts, the cause can never go to a jury, but is tried on a demurrer; it being a rule, and I believe without exception, that issues in law are ever determined by the judges, and only issues of fact are tried by a jury. Ant. 71. b.—II. Even when an issue in fact is joined, and comes before a jury for trial, either party, by demurring to evidence, which includes an admission of the fact to which the evidence applies, may so far draw the cause from the cognizance of the jury; for in that case the law is reserved for the decision of the Court, from which the issue of fact comes, and the jury is either discharged or at the utmost only ascertains the damages. Ant. 72. a. Dougl. Rep. 127, 213. Buller's Nisi Pri. 2nd edition, 313.—III. The jury is supposed to be so inadequate to finding out the law, that it is incumbent upon the judge who presides at the trial, to inform them what the law is; and as a check to the judge in the discharge of this duty, either party may under the statute of Westminster the 2nd, c. 31, make his exception in writing to the judge's direction, and enforce its being made a part of the record, so as afterwards to found error upon it. See post. 2 Inst. 426. Trials per Pais, 8th ed. 222, 466. Case of Fabrigas and Mostyn in the State Trials. Case of Money and others v. Leach, 3 Burr. 1742. Buller's Law of Nisi Pri. 2nd ed. 315.—IV. The jury is ever at liberty to give a special verdict, the nature of which is to find the facts at large and leave the conclusion of law to the judges of the court from which the issue comes. Formerly indeed it was doubted, whether in certain cases, in which the issue was of a very limited and restrained kind, the jury was not bound to find a general verdict. But the contrary was settled in Downman's case, 9 Co. 11 b. and the rule now holds both in criminal and civil cases without exception. See post. 227. b. Staundf. Pl. C. 165. a. Oneby's case, 2 L. Raym. 1494. [A. D. 1726, infra.]—V. Whilst attaints which still subsist in law were in use, it was hazardous in a jury to find a general verdict, where the case was doubtful, and they were apprised of it by the judges; because if they mistook the law, they were in danger of an attaint. Post. 228. a. Hob. 227. Vaugh. 144. 2 Hal. Hist. Pl. C. 310. Gilb. Coin. Pl. 2nd edit. 128.—VI. If the jury find the facts specially, and add their conclusion as to the law, it is not binding on the judges; but they have a right to controul the verdict, and declare the law as they conceive it to be. At least this is the language of some most respectable authorities. Staundf. Pl. C. 165. a. Plowd. 114, a. b. 4 Co. 42, b. Hal. Hist. Pl. C. v. 1. p. 471, 476, 477. and v. 2. p. 302.—VII. The courts have long exercised the power of granting new trials in civil cases, where the jury find against that which the judge trying the cause or the court at large holds to be law, or where the jury find a general verdict, and the court conceives that on account of difficulty of law there ought to have been a special one. King v. Poole, Cas. B. R. temp. Hardwicke 26. Though too in criminal and penal cases the judges do not claim such a discretion against persons acquitted, the reason I presume is in respect of the rule that 'nemo bis punitur aut vexatur pro eodem delicto,' or the hardship which would arise from allowing a person to be twice put in jeopardy for one offence; and if this be so, it only shews that on that account an exception is made to a general rule. 4 Blackst. 8th ed. 361. 2 L. Raym. 1585. 2 Stra. 899. 4 Co. 40, a. and Wingate's Maxims, 695.

"Upon the whole, as my mind is affected with this interesting subject, the result is, that the immediate and direct right of deciding upon questions of law is entrusted to the judges; that in a jury it is only incidental; that in the exercise of this incidental right the latter are not only placed under the superintendence of the former, but are in some degree controulable by them; and therefore that in all points of law arising on a trial, juries ought to shew the most respectful deference to the advice and recommendation of judges. In favour of this conclusion the conduct of juries bears ample testimony; for to their honour it should be remembered, that the examples of their resisting the advice of a judge in points of law are rare, except where they have been provoked into such an opposition by the grossness of his own misconduct, or betrayed into an unjust suspicion of his integrity by the misrepresentation and ill practice of others. In civil cases, particularly where the title to real property is in question, juries almost universally find a special verdict as often as the judge recommends their so doing; and though in criminal cases special verdicts are not frequent, it is not from any averseness to them in juries, but from the nature of criminal causes, which generally depend more upon the evidence of facts than any difficulty of law. Nor is it any small merit in this arrangement, that in consequence of it every person accused of a civil crime is enabled by the general plea of Not Guilty to have the benefit of a trial, in which the judge and jury are a check upon each other; and that this benefit may be always enjoyed, except in such small offences as are left to the summary jurisdiction of a justice of the law in all matters, where issue is joined, and tried in the principal case, but where the verdict is special.

To this purpose the lord Hobart (f. 227.) in Needler's Case against the bishop of Winchester, is very apposite:—"Legally it will be very hard to quit a jury that finds against the law, either common law, or several statute law, whereof all men were to take knowledge, and whereupon verdict is to be given, whether any evidence be given to them or not. As if a feoffment or devise were made to one imperpetuum, and the jury should find cross, either an estate for life, or in fee simple against the law, they should be subject to an attain, though no man informed them what the law was in that case."

The legal verdict of the jury to be recorded, is finding for the plaintiff or defendant, what they answer, if asked to questions concerning peace; which exception from the necessity of the times is continually increasing, but which however cannot be too cautiously extended to new objects. Thus considered, the distinction between the office of judge and jury seems to claim our utmost respect. May this wise distribution of power between the two long continue to flourish, unspoiled, either by the proud encroachment of ill-designing judges, or the wild presumption of licentious juries.

"It would be wrong to conclude this note, without referring the reader to the very forcible reasoning on the same subject, in a modern work, which contains much general legal instruction elegantly conveyed. See "Eunomus, or Dialogues concerning the Law and Constitution of England," vol. 3, p. 196.

"See further on the origin of English Juries, Spelm. Gloss. voc. jurata, Dissertat. Epistol. in Ling. Septentrion. Thesaur. Hickes. D. 1784, infra.

On the right of jurors to find general verdicts Blackstone is very decisive.

"Sometimes, if there arises in the case any difficult matter of law, the jury, for the sake of better information, and to avoid the danger of having their verdict attained, will find a special verdict; which is grounded on the statute Westm. 2. 13 Edw. 1, c. 30, s. 2. And herein they state the naked facts, as they find them to be proved, and pray the advice of the court thereon; concluding conditionally, that if upon the whole matter the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff had cause of action, they then find for the plaintiff; if otherwise, then for the defendant. This is entered at length on the record, and afterwards argued and determined in the court at Westminster, from whence the issue came to be tried.

"Another method of finding a species of special verdict, is when the jury find a verdict generally for the plaintiff, but subject nevertheless to the opinion of the judge or the court above, on a special case stated by the counsel on both sides with regard to a matter of law; which has this advantage over a special verdict, that it is attended with much less expense, and obtains a much speedier decision: the postea (of which in the next chapter) being stayed in the hands of the officer of nisi prius, till the question is determined, and the verdict is then entered for the plaintiff or defendant as the case may happen. But, as nothing appears upon the record but the general verdict, the parties are precluded hereby from the benefit of a writ of error, if dissatisfied with the judgment of the court or judge upon the point of law. Which makes it a thing to be wished, that a method could be devised of either lessening the expense of special verdicts, or else of entering the case at length upon the postea. But in both these instances the jury may, if they think proper, take upon themselves to determine, at their own hazard, the complicated question of fact and law; and, without either special verdict or special case, may find a verdict absolutely either for the plaintiff or defendant." 3 Bl. Com. 377.

"When the evidence on both sides is closed, the jury cannot be discharged till they have given in their verdict; but are to consider of it, and deliver it in, with the same forms, as upon civil causes: only they cannot, in a criminal case which touches life or member, give a privy verdict. But an open verdict may be either general, guilty, or not guilty; or special, setting forth all the circumstances of the case, and praying the judgment of the court, whether, for instance, on the facts stated, it be murder, manslaughter, or no crime at all. This is where they doubt the matter of law, and therefore chuse to leave it to the determination of the court: though they have an unquestionable right of determining upon all the circumstances, and finding a general verdict, if they think proper so to hazard a breach of their oaths; and, if their verdict be notoriously wrong, they may be punished and the verdict set aside by attain at the suit of the king; but not at the suit of the prisoner." 4 Bl. Com. 361.

"Item en tiel case l'ou l'enquest poit dire leur verdict a large, s'ils voient prendre sur eux le conusance de la ley sur le matter, ils poient dire leur verdict generalment, come est mis en leur charge; come en le case avant dit ils poient bien dire, que le lessor ne disseisa pas le lessee, s'ils voient, &c."

Whereupon Lord Coke thus comments:—"Although the jury if they will take upon them (as Littleton here saith) the knowledge of the law, may give a general verdict, yet it is dangerous for them so to do, for if they do mistake the law, they run into the danger of an attain; therefore to find the special matter is the safest way where the case is doubtful." See also the Law Dictionary, Articles Attain, Jury.

some particular fact, is not of their verdict essentially, nor are they bound to agree in such particulars; if they all agree to find their issue for the plaintiff or defendant, they may differ in the motives, wherefore, as well as judges, in giving judgment for the plaintiff or defendant, may differ in the reasons wherefore they give that judgment, which is very ordinary.

I conclude with the statute of 26 H. 8, c. 4. 'That if any jurors in Wales do acquit any felon, murderer, or accessory, or give an untrue verdict against the king, upon the trial of any traverse, recognizance, or forfeiture, contrary to good and pregnant evidence ministered to them by persons sworn before the king's justice, That then such jurors should be bound to appear before the Council of the Marches, there to abide such fine or ransom for their offence, as that Court should think fit.'

If jurors might have been fined before, by the law, for going against their evidence in matters criminal, there had been no cause for making this statute against jurors, for so doing in Wales only.

Objections out of the Ancient and Modern Books.

1. A juror kept his fellows a day and a night, without any reason or assenting, and therefore awarded to the Flect. [8 Ass. pl. 35.]

This book rightly understood is law, That he staid his fellows a day and a night, without any reason or assenting, may be understood, That he would not in that time intend the verdict at all, more than if he had been absent from his fellows, but wilfully not find for either side: In this sense it was a misdemeanor against his oath, for his oath was truly to try the issue, which he could never do, that resolved not to confer with his fellows.

And in this sense it is the same with the Case 34 Ed. 3, where 12 being sworn, and put together to treat of their verdict, one secretly withdrew himself, and went away, for which he was justly fined and imprisoned; and it differs not to withdraw from a man's duty, by departing from his fellows, and to withdraw from it, though he stay in the same room, and so is that book to be understood. [34 E. 3 Bra. Title Jurors n. 46.]

But if a man differ in judgment from his fellows for a day and a night, though his dissent may not be as reasonable as the opinion of the rest that agree, yet if his judgment be not satisfied, one disagreeing can be no more criminal than four or five disagreeing with the rest.

2. A juror would not agree with his fellows for two days, and being demanded by the judges, if he would agree; said, he would first die in prison; whereupon he was committed, and the verdict of the 11 taken; but upon better advice the verdict of the 11 was quasht, and the juror discharged without fine, and the justices said, the way was to carry them in carts, until they agreed, and not by fining them; and as the judges erred in taking the verdict of 11, so they did in imprisoning the 12th; and this case makes strongly that the juror was not to be fined, who disagreed in judgment only. [41 Ass. p. 11.]

Much of the office of jurors, in order to their verdict, is ministerial, as not withdrawing from their fellows, after they are sworn, not withdrawing after challenge, and being tried in before they take their oath, not receiving from either side evidence after their oath not given in court, not eating and drinking before their verdict, refusing to give a verdict, and the like; wherein if they transgress, they are finable; but the verdict itself, when given, is not an act ministerial, but judicial, and according to the best of their judgment, for which they are not finable, nor to be punished, but by attain. 36 H. 6, f. 27, Br. Jurors 18.

3. The Case of 7 R. 2, Title Coronæ Fitz, 108, was cited, where upon acquittal of a common thief, the judge said, The jury ought to be bound to his good behaviour, during his life: But saith the book, 'quere per quelley,' but that was only gratis dictum by the judge, for no such thing was done, as binding them.

4. Bradshaw and Salmon's Case was urged, where a jury had given excessive damages upon a trial in an action of covenant, and the court of Star Chamber gave damages to the complainant almost as high as the jury had given upon the trial: But the jury, who gave the damages, were not questioned: Though, saith the book, they might have been, because they received briefs from the plaintiff, for whom they gave damages, which was a misdemeanor; but the express book is, That the jury could not be punished by information for the excessive damages, but only by attain, therefore not for their false verdict without other misdemeanor; which answers some other cases alleged. [Hob. f. 114.]

Nor can any man shew (though it was said) That a jury was ever punished upon an information, either in law, or in the Star Chamber, where the charge was only for finding against their evidence, or giving an untrue verdict, unless imbracery, subornation, or the like, were joined.

5. It was said, a perjury in facie curiæ is punishable by the judge; and such is it if jurors go against their evidence; perhaps a witness may be punished for perjury in facie curiæ (which I will not maintain to be law) but a jury can never be so punished, because the evidence in court is not binding evidence to a jury, as hath been shewed.

6. Some records were cited, of fines pro concealamento; no doubt it is an article inquirable in every Oyer and Terminer, and one jury may find it upon another.

7. Braynes Case was urged, but the jurors were there fined for a manifest combination to delude the court, by agreeing upon two verdicts, and concealing the latter, if the court would be satisfied with the former. [42 El. Cr. 778.]

8. Wharton's Case, reported by two reporters, Yelverton saith, That the judges, whereof Popham was one, and a privy counsellor, were very angry, and fined the jury for their verdict, and finding against direction.

In those reports that pass under the name of Noy's, the same case is reported with this, that the judges conceived the jury had been unlawfully dealt with to give that verdict; which, if true, the fining was lawful, and the case therein reported short by Yelverton.

9. Wagstaff's Case, in the King's Bench lately, was the same with the present Case; but by the record it is reasonable to think the jurors committed some fault besides going against their evidence, for they were unequally fined.

But however, all the judges having, upon this return, resolved, That finding against the evidence in court, or direction of the court barely, is no sufficient cause to fine; the jury answers all these cases, if not answered before.

10. There remains Southwell's Case, reported by Leonard; some cases out of the Court of Wards in Lannoy's Case, reported by serjeant Moore, f. 730, where jurors were sent to the Fleet, or threatened to be sent, for not finding offices according to the direction of the court. [Lannoys C. Moore 730.]

1. An inquest of office is not subject to an attain.

2. It neither determines any man's right, nor doth any party put any trial upon them.

3. They are only to find naked matter of fact, as the books are of 3 H. 7, f. 10 b. and 2 H. 4, f. 5, a. but principally an office for the king is in many cases, as necessary, as an entry for a common person, without which he can never come by, or try his right, nor can the king, without an office, know whether he hath a right to a ward, a mortmain, or the like; and as it is an injury to hinder a man from his entry, whereby his right may be tried, so it is not to find an office for the king, whereby his right may be tried, which concludes no man, but enables the king to a trial of his right, and in truth is only a finding of matter of fact, and no more.

Therefore perhaps it may be an offence, as of a witness refusing his Testimony, not to find an office for the king, when clear proof is made of the matter of fact; but if proof be not made at all, or be altogether doubtful, or that the matter be matter of law, the Inquest may find an Ignoramus, which a jury, upon a trial, can never do: But of this I shall say no more, it concerning not the case in question.

PRECEDENTS. That the Court of Common Pleas, upon Habeas Corpus, hath discharged persons imprisoned by other Courts, upon the insufficiency of the return only, and not for privilege.

Sir Anthony Roper, committed by the High Commission Court, discharged absolutely in the Common Pleas, as unlawfully committed and detained, without any mention of privilege.

George Milton, imprisoned for contempt, scandalous words of the Court, and convicted of drunkenness; the causes resolved insufficient, and therefore dimittitur a prisona, and the gaoler discharged of him; but he gave bail to attend the pleasure of the Court. [5 Jac. Sir Anthony Roper's Case, 12 Rep. Sir William Chaney's C. and Edward Thicknes C. 12 Rep. 8 Jac.]

Elizabeth Ash committed by the High Commission, pro lenocinio, in like manner discharged; the cause being insufficient to detain her in prison, or to hinder her from the privilege of that Court, but no other mention of privilege put in bail. [4 Car. 1.]

Richard Hayes, for refusing to do penance, as enjoined, committed by the High Commission, the cause judged insufficient to commit, but gave bail as before; he demanded a Habeas Corpus by reason of privilege. [7 Jac.]

But it is to be observed, That privilege lies only where a man is officer of the Court, or hath a prior suit in the Common Pleas depending, and is elsewhere arrested to answer, and molested, that he cannot prosecute his suit, he is then privileged justly, and without wrong, because his prosecutor, elsewhere might have sued, if he pleased, in the Common Pleas.

All privilege is either for officers, clerks, or attorneys of the Court, not to be sued elsewhere; or for persons impleading or impleaded, having priority of suit in the Common Pleas, arrested or sued in other jurisdictions; or for the menial servants of such officers.

These privileges are not detrimental to any, because whoever hath occasion to sue an officer, or any other, having priority of suit as before, is not restrained to sue them in the Common Pleas, but is restrained from suing elsewhere. And this is the true privilege of the Court.

And the way of enjoying this privilege, was, by writs of privilege to supersede the proceeding of other Courts against such, who had the privilege of the Common Pleas, as is yet ordinary in the cases of attorneys, officers, and clerks.

And in such writs the cause of privilege is mentioned, and as to their menial servants, if not true, may be traversed. As 22 H. 6. 38. Debt was brought against baron and feme, and a supersedeas out of the Chancery, was cast for the baron, as menial servant to an officer of Chancery; whereupon the plaintiff said it was contained in the writ that the husband was menial servant to R. J. del Chancery, whereas he was not his menial servant, and thereupon issue was taken. But quere of the officers appearing of record in the Court may be traversed.*

Hence it follows, Though proceeding in other Courts, against a person privileged in Banco, might be superseded, yet it was when the matter proceeded upon in such Courts, might as well be prosecuted in the Common Bench; but if a privileged person, in Banco, were sued in the Ecclesiastical Courts, or before the High Commission, or constable and marshal, for things whereof the Common Pleas had no cognizance, they could not supersede that proceeding by privilege. And this was the ancient reason and course of privilege.

1. Another way of privilege, by reason of suit depending in a superior Court, is, when a person impleading or impleaded, as in the Common Bench, is after arrested in a civil action or plaint in London, or elsewhere, and by Habeas Corpus is brought to the Common Pleas, and the arrest and cause returned; if it appear to the Court, That the arrest in London was after the party ought to have had the privilege of the Common Pleas; he shall have his privilege allowed, and be discharged of his arrest, and the party left to prosecute his cause of action in London, in the Common Pleas, if he will.

2. If the cause of the imprisonment returned, be a lawful cause, but which cannot be prosecuted in the Common Pleas, as felony, treason, or some cause wherein the High Commission, Admiralty, or other Court, had power to imprison lawfully, then the party imprisoned, which did implead, or was impleaded in the Common Bench before such imprisonment, shall not be allowed privilege, but ought to be remanded.

3. The third way is, when a man is brought by Habeas Corpus to the Court, and upon return of it, it appears to the Court, That he was against law imprisoned and detained, though there be no cause of privilege for him in this Court, he shall never be by the act of the Court remanded to his unlawful imprisonment, for then the Court should do an act of injustice in imprisoning him, de novo, against law, whereas the Great Charter is, 'Quod nullus liber homo imprisonetur nisi per legem terræ;' This is the present case, and this was the case upon all the precedents produced and many more that might be produced, where upon Habeas Corpus, many have been discharged and bailed, though there was no cause of privilege in the case.

This appears plainly by many old books, if the reason of them be rightly taken, For insufficient causes are as no causes returned; and to send a man back to prison for no cause returned, seems unworthy of a Court.

If a man be impleaded by writ in the Common Pleas, and is after arrested in London upon a plaint, thereupon a Habeas Corpus he shall have privilege in the Common Pleas, if the writ, upon which he is impleaded, bear date before the arrest in London, and he returned, although the plaintiff in the Common Pleas be nonsuit, essoined, or will not appear, and consequently the case of privilege at an end before the Corpus cum causa returned; but if the first writ be not returned, there is no record in Court that there is such a defendant. [9 H. 6. 54. 58. Br. n. 5. 14 H. 7. f. 6. n. 19. 9 E. 4. 47. n. 24. 12 H. 4. f. 21. n. 11. Br.]

The like where a man brought debt, in Banco, and after for the same debt arrested the defendant in London, and became nonsuit in Banco; yet the defendant, upon a Habeas Corpus, had his privilege, because he had cause of privilege at the time of the arrest, 14 H. 7. 6. Br. Privilege, n. 19.

The like case 9 E. 4, where a man appeared in Banco, by a Cepi Corpus, and found mainprise, and had a day to appear in Court, and before his day was arrested in London, and brought a Corpus cum causa in Banco Regis, at which day the plaintiff became nonsuit, yet he was discharged from the serjeant at London, because his arrest there was after his arrest in Banco, and consequently unlawful, 9 E. 4. f. 47. Br. privilege 24, and a man cannot be imprisoned at the same time lawfully in two Courts.

The Court of King's Bench cannot pretend to the only discharging of prisoners upon Habeas Corpus, unless in case of privilege, for the Chancery may do it without question.

And the same book is, That the Common Pleas or Exchequer may do it, if upon return of the Habeas Corpus, it appear the imprisonment is against law.

An Habeas Corpus may be had out of the King's Bench or Chancery, though there be no privilege, &c. or in the Court of Common Pleas, or Exchequer, for any officer or privileged person there; upon which writ the gaoler must return by whom he was committed, and the cause of his imprisonment; and if it appeareth that his imprisonment be just and lawful, he shall be remanded to the former gaoler; but if it shall appear to the Court that he was imprisoned against the law of the land, they ought, by force of this statute, to deliver him; if it be doubtful and under consideration, he may be bailed.—The King's Bench may bail, if they please, in all cases; but the Common Bench must remand, if the cause of the imprisonment returned be just.

The writ 'de homine replegiando,' is as well returnable in the Common Pleas, as in the King's Bench.

All prohibitions for incroaching jurisdiction issue as well out of the Common Pleas as King's Bench.

Quashing the order of commitment upon a certiorari, which the King's Bench may do, but not the Common Pleas, is not material in this case.

1. The prisoner is to be discharged or remanded barely upon the return, and nothing else, whether in the King's Bench, or Common Pleas.

2. Should the King's Bench have the order of commitment certified and quashed, before the return of the Habeas Corpus, or after, what will it avail the prisoners; they cannot plead null tiel record, in the one case or the other,

3. In all the precedents shewed in the Common Pleas, or in any that can be shewed in the King's Bench, upon discharging the prisoner by Habeas Corpus, nothing can be shewed of quashing the orders or decrees of that Court, that made the wrong commitment.

4. It is manifest, where the King's Bench hath, upon Habeas Corpus, discharged a prisoner committed by the Chancery, the person hath been again re-committed for the same cause by the Chancery, and re-delivered by the King's Bench; but no quashing of the Chancery order for commitment ever heard of. [Glanvill's C. Moore f. 836.]

5. In such cases of re-commitment, the party hath other and proper remedy besides a new Habeas Corpus; of which I shall not speak now.

6. It is known, That if a man recover in assise, and after in a re-disseisin, if the first judgment be reversed in the assise, the judgment in the redisseisin is also reversed. So if a man recover in waste, and damages given, for which debt is brought (especially if the first judgment be reversed before execution) it destroys the process for the damages in debt, though by several originals. But it may be said, That in a Writ of Error in this kind, the foundation is destroyed, and no such record is left.

But as to that in Drury's case, 8 Rep. an outlawry issued, and process of Capias upon the outlawry, the sheriff returned, non est inventus; and the same day the party came into Court and demanded Oyer of the exigent which was the warrant of the outlawry; and shewed the exigent to be altogether uncertain and insufficient, and consequently the outlawry depending upon it to be null. And the Court gave judgment accordingly, though the record of the outlawry were never reversed by error; which differs not from this case, where the order of commitment is judicially declared illegal, though not quashed or reversed by error, and consequently whatever depends upon it, as the fine and commitment doth, and the outlawry in the former case was more the king's interest, than the fine in this.

The Chief Justice delivered the Opinion of the Court, and accordingly the Prisoners were discharged.

232. Proceedings in the House of Commons against the Duke of LAUDERDALE*, 25 CHARLES II. A. D. 1674.

THE Commons' House of King Charles the second's Long Parliament had in their 11th session manifested much discontent. They had devoted much attention to the consideration of Grievances. On the 31st of October, 1673, they resolved: "That this house, considering the present condition of the nation, will not take into any farther debate, or consideration, any Aid, or Supply, or Charge upon the subject, before the times of payment of the eighteen months Assessment, &c. granted last session, be expired: unless it shall appear, that the obstinacy of the Dutch shall render it necessary; nor before this kingdom be effectually secured from the dangers of Popery, and popish counsels and counsellors, and the other present Grievances be redressed."

On the 4th of November, after the Speaker (Seymour, against whom in the preceding week several objections and reproaches had been alleged in the house by different members) who came not to the house till 10 o'clock, though the house was the day before adjourned to eight, had been called to the Chair by a great voice, he at last took the chair; and then sir Robert Thomas moved to take into his consideration the business of 'evil counsellors,' as 'a grievance,' hinted the other day, and would name one, 'the duke of Lauderdale.' The word was no sooner out of his mouth but the usher of the

some years in the Tower of London, in Portland Castle, and in other prisons, till he was set at liberty by those who called home the king. He was very learned, not only in Latin, in which he was a master, but in Greek and Hebrew. He was a man, (as the duke of Buckingham called him to me) of a blundering understanding. He was haughty beyond expression, abject to those he saw he must stoop to, but imperious to all others. He had a violence of passion, which carried him often to fits like madness, in which he had no temper. He was the coldest friend, and the violentest enemy I ever knew. He at first seemed to despise wealth; but he delivered himself up afterwards to luxury and sensuality. He was in his principles much against Popery and arbitrary government; and yet, by a fatal train of passions and interests, he made way for the former, and had almost established the latter; and whereas some, by a smooth deportment, made the first beginnings of tyranny less discernible and unacceptable; he, by the fury of his behaviour, heightened the severity of his ministry, which was more like the cruelty of an inquisition than the legality of justice. With all this, he was a Presbyterian, and retained his aversion to king Charles 1, and his party, to his death [which happened in 1682."] Burnet.—Many years after his death there was published a translation by him of Virgil's Æneid, which had been shewn in MS. to Dryden, and from which he has borrowed many lines.

* "The duke of Lauderdale had been for many years a zealous Covenanter: but in 1647 he turned to the king's interest; and had continued a prisoner all the while after Worcester fight, where he was taken. He was kept for Black rod knocked at the door, and the Serjeant gave notice of it to the Speaker, who forbade sir Robert proceeding any farther.*

The next session commenced on the 7th of January 1674, and on the 12th the House of Commons resolved, "That this house will proceed, in the first place, to have Grievances effectually redressed, the Protestant Religion, Liberties, and Properties, effectually secured, to suppress Popery, and to remove persons and Counsellors, popishly affected, or otherwise obnoxious, or dangerous to the government." 2. "That the humble and hearty Thanks of this house be returned to his majesty for his gracious Promises and Assurances in his last Speech, and for those Acts which he has done since the last prorogation, towards the suppressing and discountenancing of Popery; and that he would please to give order for the Militia of London, Westminster, and Middlesex, to be ready at an hour's warning, and the other Militia of the kingdom at a day's warning, for the suppressing any tumultuous meeting of Papists, or other malcontent persons whatsoever; and that the house will go with this Address to his majesty in a body."

On the next day the following Proceedings took place.

Mr. Stockdale. Many Grievances have been represented; the way is now, how you will redress your grievances; the last session produced many good votes as to that, but we were prorogued; and to the intent that that may not happen again, consider that the same Counsellors are interposing, and interpreting our intentions may procure the same prorogation; therefore moves to begin with the last part of the vote first, viz. 'Evil Counsellors.' You cannot have Grievances effectually redressed, without removing those that

* "The Address (agreed to the day before) was to have been presented this afternoon; but the king disappointed all by coming unexpectedly to the House of Lords, and ordering the Commons to attend him. It happened that the Speaker and the usher both met at the door of the House of Commons, and the Speaker being got within the house, some of the members suddenly shut the door, and cried out 'To the Chair! To the Chair!' while others cried, 'The Black Rod is at the door.' The Speaker was immediately hurried to the chair, and then it was moved, 1. 'That our Alliance with France was a Grievance. 2. That the Evil Counsellors about the king were a Grievance. And 3. That the duke of Lauderdale was a Grievance, and not fit to be trusted or employed in any office or place of trust.' Upon which there was a general cry, 'To the Question! To the Question!' But the Black Rod knocking earnestly at the door, the Speaker leaped out of the chair, and the house rose in great confusion." Echard, have advised these things, and, when that is done, he perhaps will name one.

Sir Robert Thomas. We have a great many grievances; hazard of Religion, Counsellors advising the king to take away religion and properties; must name one; (by the bye, the Black Rod being called in by you, Mr. Speaker, the last session, before he knocked, he could not do it then) a person that has contributed as much to our misfortunes as any man; the duke of Lauderdale.—You will have proofs of his advice by four of your members; viz. "Your majesty is bound in honour to satisfy your Edicts; I wonder at the confidence of any person to deny your majesty's Edicts, and those persons that do, I think, deserve to be most severely punished†." The act of the Militia in Scotland, 'which forces are to be in a readiness to be called to march into England or Ireland, upon any service where the honour, authority, or greatness of the king shall be concerned.' Other gentlemen know more: he has great forces in readiness and pay, and for no other end, he believes, than to awe us.

Sir Nich. Carew. We should never have grievances, but by such 'Counsellors:' the duke is at the head of a great army in Scotland; desires that we may move the king, that he may keep there and return no more into England.

Sir T. Littleton. The words are ready, and desires you will order the gentlemen that heard them, to declare them.

Sir R. Thomas names sir Scroope Howe, Mr. Man, and Mr. Robert Pierpoint, who heard the words, and lord St. John.

Lord St. John. The last session, February he was called to do it, but then refused, because there was a dispute then betwixt the duke of Lauderdale and himself; Mr. Howe, then sick, being concerned for Mr. Whalley, desired him to go hear the business at the Council, where Mr. Whalley (a justice of peace in Nottinghamshire) was summoned, who had committed a preacher contrary to the Declaration. Whalley was to answer the contempt, the parson had no licence to preach, but entry was made of it in the Secretary's Book; a law bound Whalley, and a Declaration did not bind him. Lauderdale then spoke the words mentioned by sir Robert Thomas, that he wondered at the words and said, 'Lauderdale may be questioned in parliament.' Some members

* The expressions mentioned in the Journal are, "Your majesty's Edicts ought to be obeyed; for your majesty's Edicts are equal with the laws, and ought to be observed in the first place."

† "A gentleman, there present, informed me, that the king should say to Mr. Penyston Whalley (the person then before the council) 'I wonder that you should withstand my Declaration. I would have you know, that I will be obeyed according to my interpretation of the law, and not yours; and if you will not, I shall put in those that will.'" Grey.

being present, Lauderdale spoke as before, none else of the Council spoke, and all were bid to withdraw.

Sir Scroope Howe, averred the words as before; Mr. Pierpoint, and Mr. Man likewise.

Sir T. Littleton. Now you are possessed of this, he shall offer his sense; the last session, we were cut off in the beginning; in Scotland, an army is raised by this great duke; though by act of parliament, yet his power is great, and the army under his power: it is in vain to act here, without converting our thoughts to Scotland. Pray God! this be not elsewhere: a man, so principled and arbitrary! You had need look about you; needs say nothing to aggravate, the bare thing aggravates itself; a cloud hangs over us, and it is high time it was scattered; it has made Counsellors in England so much the bolder; moves 'to address the king to exclude the duke of Lauderdale from his Councils in England;' keep him from councils here, and you may shake his authority in Scotland: he is in all respects a commoner*, and so we cannot clash with the Lords in point of trial; there are 20,000 foot, and 2,000 horse, ready in Scotland, and no colour for it; a man of such principles is not fit to be trusted with such an army, nor with our councils, and, without any more ceremony, would address the king, as he is a commoner.

Sir C. Harbord has a double charge against him, that of the army in Scotland, and his words at the Council here. You may miss of trial, but an Act may reach him.

Mr. Dalmahoy has heard the duke of Lauderdale deny the words; he was not in Scotland when the Act about the Militia was made; he knows not who was then commissioner.

Mr. Powle supposes that every man is sensible of a pernicious design to alter the government, and these Counsellors have brought us to the brink of destruction; we have a gracious prince, but the great design was, first to abuse the king, and then to oppress the people, fearing his good disposition to us; the Triple League was made to check a great prince; to ruin the Protestant religion was the design, and, without Money, that was not to be carried on, which money was given for the maintaining the Triple Alliance; and then more money was got, by stopping the Exchequer, to the undoing of many hundreds of persons.—Then a Declaration for the ease of tender consciences, and, under pretence of Toleration, suspending by it all ecclesiastical laws, and, in consequence, laying all laws aside; upon the declaration of war against Holland, armies were raised, and popish officers at the head of them, and in places of civil authorities, honours, and dignities; then Popish officers are sent over into Ireland, Papists put into trust and office there; then in Scotland, an army is raised to march into England, &c. or for any other cause wherein 'the king's honour or greatness may be concerned;' but the greatness of the king consists in governing a free people; the parliament supplied and brought him from banishment, and, because the king would hearken to their advice, they must be prorogued, the juncture of their time not being fit for the fleet against Holland; they suppose we would give, and, if not, the necessity must justify raising of money: what benefit had we but fruitless battles at sea, and engaging us, by the French, with his allies? The king was persuaded that the parliament would not assist his interest, but doubts not but time will demonstrate the contrary: when we would have reached these men, we were prorogued, and now there is a necessity of giving money; the king's credit lost, the people poor, jealousies great, and all might have been remedied by our meeting.—Lauderdale asserted 'Edicts superior to law,' and it was spoken in the presence of the king and council; no greater argument, though some, he doubts not, have done it privately, but he publicly: Hamilton's book asserts the king's authority of raising Money without Parliament, and it was countenanced by Lauderdale in 1667. When lord Rothes was commissioner, then was the foundation of this army, but it came not to maturity till 1669, when Lauderdale was commissioner; it was then kept on foot, and boasted of; it is not unknown at what vast greatness this person has lived, thereby bringing the king into necessity, and disobliging the house, that we should not supply: Lauderdale sued out the king's pardon; a new trick our great men have gotten, fearing our enquiry, and would arm themselves against us with the king's pardon; let this be considered and weighed well: less crimes than these have brought men to the scaffold, but the temper of this house is not desirous of blood. The 5th R. 2. counsellors were removed without cause: the people only spoke ill of them. 11 R. 2. the duke of Ireland, and sir John Crosby were impeached; the people spoke ill of them, 20 Hen. 6. the lord Dudley for the same cause: It may be the case of peers of England, and this upon no other article but merely the people speaking ill of them. 3d C. 1. remonstrance against the duke of Bucks, bishop Neale, arch-bishop Laud, to be removed as evil counsellors: moves, "That this great person, the duke of Lauderdale, may for ever be removed from the king's presence."

Mr. Secretary Coventry. To condemn a man, without hearing, he never knew the precedent before in this house.

Mr. Stockdale. If for taking away blood, witnesses must be sworn; but to remove this man you have testimony sufficient to ground an Address to the king; so notorious a man!

Sir Rob. Carr. A person was accused, and you gave a day: moves to consider of it.

Col. Birch. It is true, there was a person had a day, but he had no pardon, and he would have Lauderdale sent where 'Edicts' are in fashion.

* The Duke was at this time only a Peer of Scotland. But in June following he was created an English peer, by the title of earl of Guilford.

Sir John Duncombe. It is hard to condemn a man without being heard; 'removed from the king's presence' is as hard a judgment as a man can have: thinks it worthy consideration to give him a day.

Sir John Trevor. If you proceed merely to suspend him from the king's 'Councils,' you may do it, but if from the king's 'presence,' where no manner of proof is taken, you ought to give him a day; by way of confiscation, or attainder, you give time, but as to 'removal from councils,' you need give none.

Mr. Howe. He was the most active person to bring the late king to his murder: he was solicitor from Scotland to bring the late king to the block, and to destroy this king by giving ill advice to him.

Mr. Garroway has often heard that this man brought the declaration from Scotland to bring the late king to the block, and those people had a horror for the fact would have him come and answer it here, and all that are concerned with him: he has heard of one Murray kept in the Tower, by the instigation of Lauderdale, for complaining against him; these are violences, when no writs of Habeas Corpus can be had; and would send to the Gatehouse, where he now stands committed, for the Mitimus: you will find it of his own making, and illegal: agrees to the Address for removing him; and would have a Bill to make it treason if ever he return hither again.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. If he be guilty of this horrid crime alledged, will not defend him neither will he condemn him without proof.

Sir John Birkenhead. The duke of Ireland, Oxford, and Somerset, had a day assigned them—No man has been banished the king's presence on this formality, though you cannot have greater evidence; it may be he may confess it; many things are law in Scotland, and not so here; would not have a precedent to reach every body: assign him a day, and you will tread more safely, and do him right, and no man wrong.

Sir Thomas Littleton has heard a great man in the Rump, and a counsellor then, say, 'That Lauderdale did solicit that bloody Kirk-Declaration against the king;' does not name the person, because desired not to do it: would have him removed from the king's person and counsels for ever. This thing is not so hard, he at a great distance, and great affairs in Scotland to attend, and so he may excuse himself from coming, and perhaps when come we may not be sitting, and if he will come, at any time, he may be tried by parliament.

Col. Sandys. Since he has heard that Lauderdale had some part in the king's murder, that has raised him; and would have him as much sequestered from the world, as from the king, and would have 'a Bill of Attainder against him.'

Mr. Sacheverell fears that this lord has not lost his old evil principles, but improved them;

the Scotch Act of Militia plainly shows it: It puts the king in power plainly to alter any thing in Church or State, and so, by this army, popery may be set up: not content to keep their law in Scotland, but printed here by authority; it was done this time twelvemonth, when the question was, whether all your laws must be set aside; and therefore is for secluding him for ever from the king's presence, and an Act of banishment.

Col. Strangways would have the words 'obnoxious and dangerous' retained in the vote: our Saviour pardoned them that persecuted him, but where a man, by after-actions, has done ill, his righteousness shall be forgotten, when transgressing de novo: he abhors the crime; but consider your case; 'sequestering him from the king's presence and the kingdom:' common fame from this house is a greater ground for accusation than thought to be.

Sir R. Temple does not remember that, by any of the precedents, men were sent for, and time given them to answer; this vote is with that moderation, 'to remove' only: would add something, that it may have more strength, viz. 'as a man found by this house to be dangerous.' Has heard of his being no less arbitrary in Scotland than here; to have made himself a perpetual commissioner there.

Sir John Monson hears it said, 'that every subject has a right to come into the king's presence;' therefore to prevent that, when we are up, would have a Bill, as well as an Address now.

Sir Eliab Harvey would have a Bill ordered to make it treason for him to return to England.

Mr. Waller thinks as bad of this case as any man here; If so much had been against lord Strafford, would not have then been against his Impeachment.

Sir W. Coventry. The bill as proposed, is contradictory to what you have spoken of 'removing him from the king's presence.' The king may remove him, by his own power, 'from his presence,' at the request of any private man, and when it is done, it is well done: every subject has a right of petitioning the king, though he be not of his bed-chamber or council; but it is not so easy a thing to exclude any man out 'of the kingdom.' To make a precedent to exclude a man 'the kingdom,' without hearing him, cannot agree to it.

Mr. Boscawen desires that lord Clarendon's Bill of Banishment may not be a precedent: that was done somewhat hastily.

Sir T. Clarges would have a Bill, to forbid him coming within 12 miles of the court, wherever the king shall be: will consent to that and no farther.

Resolved nem. con. "That an Address be presented to his majesty to remove the duke of Lauderdale from all his employments, and from his presence and councils, for ever; being a person obnoxious and dangerous to the government."

For an account of Lauderdale's abominable misgovernment of Scotland, see the fourth volume of the History of that kingdom by Mr. Laing, who in relating the transactions of the year 1663, thus describes him :

"Originally not less attached to the covenant than at present to the court, he engaged in its measures with the zeal of a proselyte ; determined that no compliance should be omitted to promote his ambition or to preserve his place. His personal appearance is perhaps satirically described as enormous or uncouth ; his hair was red and dishevelled ; his tongue too big for distinct articulation ; his address ungracious, and his manners coarse, boisterous, and unsuitable to the fastidious refinement of a court. During a long imprisonment, his mind had been carefully improved by study, and impressed with a sense of religion which was soon effaced on his return to the world. His learning was extensive and accurate ; in public affairs his experience was considerable, and his elocution copious, though unpolished and indistinct. But his temper was dark and vindictive, incapable of friendship, mean and abject to his superiors, haughty and tyrannical to his inferiors ; and his judgment, seldom correct or just, was obstinate in error, and irreclaimable by advice. His passions were furious and ungovernable, unless when his interest or ambition interposed : his violence was ever prepared to suggest or to execute the most desperate counsels ; and his ready compliance preserved his credit with the king, till his faculties were visibly impaired with age."

The descriptions left of him may perhaps, as Laing suggests, aggravate the unfavourableness of his personal appearance : there is no reason, however, to doubt that it was sufficiently uncouth. In the following ironical description (which is said to have been composed by Rochester, but which I have never seen in print) of Charles 2, and a party of his associates, the ugliness of Lauderdale is selected as the topic of characteristic allusion to him :

See Monmouth the witty,
And Lauderdale pretty,
And Fraser that learned Physician, —
Then the Duke for a jest,
And above all the rest,
The King for a wise Politician.

233. Proceedings in the House of Commons against the Duke of BUCKINGHAM : 25 CHARLES II. A. D. 1674.

THE Proceedings against Lauderdale were closely followed by others against Buckingham.

On the 13th day of January, 1674, a Letter being brought in to the Speaker of the House of Commons, signed "Buckingham," on his offering to read it,

Mr. Stockdale said, He would not have the Letter now read, he having something to offer against the duke of Buckingham.* Whatever that Letter contains, he has a charge against the person, of as high a nature as the Letter can be : says, it is irregular for the Speaker to bring us a new business ; the Letter—He was interrupted by Sir Ch. Wheeler. To order of proceedings, in reference to your vote, after what manner ! Would have some previous consideration, that one man may not prevent another.

* "The duke of Buckingham was a man of a noble presence. He had a great liveliness of wit, and a peculiar faculty of turning all things into ridicule with bold figures and natural descriptions. He had no sort of literature ; only he was drawn into chemistry ; and for some years he thought he was very near finding the Philosopher's Stone. He had no principles of religion, virtue, or friendship ; pleasure, frolic, or extravagant diversion, was all that he laid to heart. He was true to nothing, for he was not true to himself. He had no steadiness, nor conduct. He could never fix his thoughts, nor govern his estate, though then the greatest in England. He was bred about the king, and for many years he had a great ascendant over him ; but he spoke of him to all persons with that contempt, that at last he drew a lasting disgrace upon himself ; and he at length ruined both body and mind, fortune and reputation, equally. The madness of vice appeared in his person in many instances ; since at last he became contemptible and poor, sickly, and sunk in his parts, as well as in all other respects ; so that his conversation was as much avoided as ever it had been courted. The main blame of the king's ill principles, and bad morals, was owing to the duke of Buckingham." Burnet.

Dryden in his Absalom and Achitophel says, that he was "A man so various, that he seemed to be

Not one, but all mankind's epitome ;
Stiff in opinion, always in the wrong ;
Was ev'ry thing by starts, and nothing long ;
But, in the course of one revolving moon,
Was chynist, fidler, statesman, and buffoon :
Then all for women, painting, rhyming, drinking,
Besides ten thousand freaks that dy'd in thinking.

Blest madman ! who could every hour employ,
With something new to wish, or to enjoy !
Railing and praising were his usual themes,
And both (to shew his judgment) in extremes ;
So over violent, or over civil,
That every man, with him, was god or devil.
In squandering wealth was his peculiar art ;
Nothing went unrewarded but desert.

Mr. Stockdale. Would have all men concerned, named : and you are possessed of one against whom he has a charge, the duke of Buckingham ; that, if encouraging or practising, and, he supposes, establishing Popery ; if taking money from the subject, and breaking the Triple Alliance, and engaging us in this French alliance, be a Charge, he has a Charge against the duke of Buckingham : the proofs are not so ready as the last, but the particulars will all be proved : offers not an Impeachment : though the crimes may be proved, impeachments take up a long time ; it may be longer than we have to sit : his own letters show corresponding with Peter Talbot, the pretended archbishop. When Ireland was in

Beegar'd by fools, whom still he found too late ;
He had his jest, and they had his estate.
He laugh'd himself from Court ; then sought relief

By forming parties, but could ne'er be chief :
For, spite of him, the weight of bus'ness fell
On Absalom and wise Achitophel :
Thus, wicked but in will, of means bereft,
He left not faction, but of that was left."

Pope thus paints at once his character and the last scene of his life, which on April 16, 1688, was closed at Kirkby-moor-side. The Biographia says, that he left much more than enough to pay his debts :

" In the worst inn's worst room, with mat half-hung,

The floors of plaister, and the walls of dung,
On once a flock-bed, but repair'd with straw,
With tape-ty'd curtains never meant to draw,
The George and Garter dangling from that bed
Where tawdry yellow strove with dirty red,
Great Villiers lies—alas ! how chang'd from him,

That life of pleasure, and that soul of whim !
Gallant and gay, in Cliveden's proud alcove.
The bow'r of wanton Shrewsbury and love ;
Or just as gay, at council, in a ring
Of mimic statesmen, and their merry king.
No wit to flatter, left of all his store !
No fool to laugh at, which he valu'd more :
There, victor of his health, of fortune, friends,
And fame, this lord of useless thousands end !"

Sir John Dalrymple, 4to edition, vol. 2, p. 231, notices that Barillon writes March 16, 1679, to his court, That Buckingham dares not attend the House of Lords, in the prosecution of lord Danby, because Danby threatened him with a prosecution for Sodomy. There is in Tremaine's Pleas of the Crown, 171, an Indictment at the suit of the King and Buckingham against eleven persons, of the names of Hickey, Higgins, Smith, Jones, Haley, Curtis, Blood, Christian, O'Brian, Lemarr, and Bradley, for endeavouring to suborn persons to swear against the duke of Buckingham that he was guilty of Sodomy. As to this and other imputations on Buckingham, see the duke of Buckingham's Litany, inserted in a Note to his Life in the Biographia Britannica.

great danger by Popery, he advised the army to be drawn out of that kingdom, and headed his own regiment with Popish officers. At Knaresborough, Whitsuntide last (the Standing Army was then forming) this duke came into Yorkshire to raise men ; a poor man, being pressed, came to the overseers of the poor, and told them, ' You must provide for my wife and children, I am pressed away and cannot maintain them.' The duke sent for the overseer, and beat him for not doing it, and sent a warrant to the marshal of the West Riding of Yorkshire, to keep him till farther order from him ; the man applied to the duke, and, after 3 days imprisonment, was delivered by the marshal (Wainman) who demanded 30*l.* fees, and got 5*l.* for three days : this was done, when there was a prospect of arbitrary power, and this was the first action of martial law, committed by a martial-man. The next is the duke's taking of money, 2*s.* 6*d.* upon every horse exported at Dover, by virtue of his place as Master of the Horse, against law : breaking of the Triple Alliance : the duke was sent into France, and what treaty he made there we know by the effect ; the Triple Alliance broken : lord Bellasis was sent to Dunkirk, and the duke, though he had no business, yet would go to see the king of France, and has heard what presents he had there, and believes it will be proved : his endeavours to take away the affections of the king's good subjects, by saying ' that the king was an arrant knave, and unfit to govern ;' Dr. Williams can prove it : he has defrauded the king's servants of their wages, so disadvantageous to his service ; this is public ; now, there is a Petition against him in the House of Lords of a strange nature : killing the earl of Shrewsbury,* and living scandalously with his widow. Not only that, but he has attempted a horrid sin not to be named ; not to be named at Rome, where their other practices are horrid : moves, ' That a person so dangerous to the government, and of so ill a life and conversation, may be removed from the king's presence and from all his employments : and for ' an Act of Banishment' against him, as against the duke of Lauderdale.

Sir John Coventry. This man has made it his business to sow dissension betwixt the king and this House, but he is not a man to put things in execution when much danger is in the case: when the king had his ministers in France, the duke of B. put many of his servants, incognito, to treat with the ministers of that state, Papists and persons ill affected to our government: it is a sad condition we are in, to have a man so near the king's person that contemns his person: this duke has given night and lantern counsels, not to be owned by the rest of the counsellors. He corresponds with a traitor, Peter Talbot; the letter was burned in the king's bed-chamber, and part remains: some say the duke is not ashamed of that profession; it is known to you all, that these people have been protected by him: it may be said, that the officers of his regiment are Protestants, but we may thank the Commons of England for it: if these things be proved, he desires the duke may be removed from the king's person for ever.

* This was in a duel, March 16, 1667. " The Countess is said to have held the duke's horse, disguised like a page, during the combat ; to reward his prowess in which, she went to bed to him in the shirt stained with her husband's blood." Walpole's Noble Authors, vol. ii. p. 82, 3.

Of this intrigue, Marvell, in one of his Letters, makes the following mention : " Buckingham runs out of all with Lady Shrewsbury ; by whom he believes he had a son, to whom the king stood godfather : it died young, earl of Coventry."

Mr. Howe. Besides all this, when the king was at Windsor, because he would not stay so long as the duke would have him,† he took the bridle from the king's horse, to the great danger of the king's person, and the duke was then Master of his Horse.

Sir Winston Churchill. He that would answer this charge of the duke's may do himself more wrong than the duke has. Wishes the particulars as easily proved as charged: the business of Windsor he knows: the duke is not far from you, and supposes, if the Letter be not of importance, the duke has forfeited his understanding, as the charge makes him forfeit his reputation: men of his quality will not inform you of trifles: the Letter may be of concernment; it may discover something you know not (as that in the Lords' House about a plot) therefore would read it.

Lord Cavendish. Should the artifice of the man put it out of our power to proceed, it would be of ill consequence: would have him removed from offices and councils about the king and suspended his presence till farther proceeded against.

Sir Tho. Clarges would first put the question for 'the Address,' and then read the Letter. No great need of particular proof; but all you desire, is, that he may not be near the king's person to pursue these dangerous counsels: in Scotland, did he not correspond with Argyle, and ransack the king's close-stool for papers? There were shrewd suspicions of him in the rebellion in the north, and soon after he got his pardon. Is it no crime to kill the husband, and prostitute the wife? He accuses him not, for it may be pardoned; but for us to countenance such things, will bring God's judgments upon us: after so great an accusation, to come so familiarly amongst the lords, his judges, and to do his offices about the king, argues a strange boldness: there are seven persons that have had five pardons since the Restoration of the king; two by act of parliament, and three under the great seal, for murder, treason, &c.

† It was whispered "at a drinking-bout." Grey.

so that you can never lay hold of him: since March last he has got another Pardon, and, as the docket says, 'for all treasons, insurrections, murders, misprisions, manslaughters, &c. committed or done before the 14th of Nov. last.' This is in some sort a confession of the guilt of so many crimes as are enumerated in the pardon: you must give it, by Vote, for the safety of witnesses, and he to be 'removed from the king's person.' Men are awed; and at the reading of the Petition against him, in the house of lords, there was a great silence: he has not common bowels of mercy; he beat an old gentleman for desiring him not to ride over his corn, till the blood ran down his hoary head. At Barnet he beat a poor soldier in bonds about the unfortunate killing lady Shrewsbury's coachman: moves as before.

Sir Edm. Jennings. The Letter may be of consequence. The paper of discovery was read in the Lords house, and he would have the duke's Letter read.

The Duke's Letter was then read, as follows:

'Mr. Speaker; I desire you to do me the favour to get leave of the hon. House of Commons, that I may inform them, in person, of some truths relating to the public; by which you will much oblige, &c. BUCKINGHAM.' Jan. 13, 1674.'

Mr. Sacheverell. You ought to hear the Duke, because the matter, he pretends, is public, and you may be concerned.

Mr. Garrouay hopes you will do justice to all men. If you pass your vote against him, of what validity will any thing be that he can say? Moves that that right may be done to the duke, which you will not deny to the meanest commoner: lord chief justice Keeling, and the earl of Bristol, had a chair set for them: you heard them speak, and Bristol cleared your member, sir Rd. Temple*: would now hear the duke.

Sir Tho. Clarges. This man has done his impieties in the face of the sun; he prevented our meeting in Oct. last. Has he not perverted the king's word? Would only now have him removed from the king's council. My lord of Bristol's coming hither was a voluntary desire, and nothing against him here: is not against his coming in, but would first remove him from the king's person.

Col. Birch. Such things as the duke has done, cannot be without company: would have him come in, and hear him what he can say.

Mr. Sawyer. Your vote may discourage him, that he may say little to you, and possibly he may reveal something in compensation, by way of discovery: would hear him.

Col. Strangways. Hear him what he can say: some vices of the man may not take away a man's testimony.

The Duke of Buckingham was ordered to be and a chair was set for him on the left side of the bar, the serjeant standing with his mace on his right hand. Then the duke saluted the house round.

Ordered, "That the Speaker ask him, Whether he owned the Letter he sent him, and what he has to communicate to the house, of concernment?"

The Duke sat a short space, covered; then the Speaker asked him, &c. and showed him the Letter, which the Duke owned. The Speaker then said, "The house is ready to hear what your grace has to say, relating to the public service."

The Duke's Speech to the House of Commons.

The Duke, standing, then said, "I have written something," [fumbling a Paper in his hand] "but will trust to my own present thoughts. I give this hon. house humble thanks for the honour done me, in admitting me to come and speak here. I have always made it my business to get the good opinion of this house; I desire that my actions may be examined, and I will stand, or fall, by the censure and judgment of this house: the business against me, I understand, is the breaking of the Triple Alliance; I had as great a hand in making it as any man: my going to Holland was to hinder De Witt's conjunction with France, and I did no ill service in it, and the more the thing is examined, the more my innocence will appear. I was not of the opinion of a war, and France to take all, and give us nothing; if my advice had been followed, there would have been better effects; it is not my practice to accuse, but it is hard if a man may not clear himself. I have been in as much danger, for my respect to this house, as any man; have been turned out of all my places at court; proclaimed traitor; witnesses hired to swear against me, and confessed so; no man can be exempted from malicious accusations, and all for favouring Bills from this house; and after the proclaiming me traitor, I had a Letter from a sister of mine, which was alledged one from Dr. Haven a conjurer, but through his name any man might see Richmond and Lenox.† I was

* Burnet says, "That the Duke, the first day of his being before the house, fell into such a disorder, that he pretended he was taken ill, and desired to be admitted again. But that next day he was more composed."

† "There was a poor fellow, who had a poorer lodging about Tower Hill, to whom the duke often repaired, in disguise, in the night; and lord Arlington had caused that fellow to be apprehended, and his pockets and chamber to be searched; where were found several letters to the duke of Buckingham, and one original letter from the duke to him, in all which there were many unusual expressions, which were capable of very ill interpretations, and could not bear a good one. This man and not afraid of my enemies in the house of commons, but afraid of being tried for my life, before you met. There have been great desires of having me removed from the king. I can hunt the hare with a pack of hounds, but not with a pack of lobsters.* If this house desires it, I will remove from the king, and go beyond sea; no man ought to serve the king, whom the nation has no good opinion of. I have spent an estate in the king's service, when others have got thousands. Beggars that run away with the bags, when a robbery is done, you stop; but a fine gentleman, riding upon the highway, you let go. I desire to be removed from my place, and to have leave to sell it. Persons are vehement upon me, and would ruin me. I submit myself, and actions, to the good construction of the hon. house," —He then withdrew.

Debate thereon.

Mr. Stockdale desires, that seeing the duke is of your mind, you may join issue with him, and let him go beyond sea.

Lord Buckhurst.† The duke has informed you of nothing concerning 'public affairs,' and some others, were sent close prisoners to the Tower, and a warrant being issued, under the king's sign manual, to apprehend the duke, he at last surrendered himself, and, on his examination at the council board, the letter being produced, as soon as he cast his eyes upon it, he said, 'It was not his hand, but his sister's 'the duchess of Richmond's, with whom, he said, it was known he had no correspondence.' Whereupon the king called for the letter, and having looked upon it, he said, 'He had been mistaken,' and confessed, 'that it was the duchess's hand; and seemed much out of countenance at the mistake: though the letter gave still as much cause of suspicion, for it was as strange that she should write to such a fellow, in a style very obliging, and in answer to a letter; so that it seemed very reasonable still to believe, that she might have written it upon his desire and dictating.' Earl of Clarendon's Life, p. 430, 434.

* "The duke justified his own designs, laying all the ill counsels upon others, chiefly on lord Arlington; intimating plainly, that the root of all errors was in the king and the duke of York. He said, 'Hunting was a good diversion, but if a man would hunt with a brace of lobsters he would have but ill sport.' He had used that figure to myself; but had then applied it to prince Rupert and lord Arlington. It was now understood to go higher." Burnet.

† "Son of the earl of Dorset, to which title he succeeded in 1677, having been created earl of Middlesex, 1675. He was a volunteer in the first Dutch war, in 1665, and the night before the engagement, composed the famous song, 'To all you ladies now at land,' &c. At the Revolution he was early engaged in the interest of the prince of Orange, and was pitched upon to convey the princess (afterwards queen) why will you put him out of all capacity? Though his relation to him were ever so near, or obligations ever so great, would have him answer his accusations: but hear him first.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. This duke's is not the same case with the duke of Lauderdale's. The king may turn any man out of his service, and especially on your desires; but when it shall be upon record, that the duke has uttered such words against the king, if a man asks whether such words are treason, it may be represented, that he said the words, 'of the king's being a knave, and unfit to govern.'

Mr. Boscowen has no kindness nor relation to the duke, but we ought to hear him. Your judgment will not be thought just, though it is so in truth, by persons that understand not the reasons; would have him acquainted with what is against him, and then you may proceed.

Col. Birch. The duke has not spoken one word of 'public' in what he has offered, but all 'private.' It seems to him, that he would be drawn to accuse, but in modesty would not do it of himself: would adjourn now, and let him know, if he has any 'public' thing to say, we are ready to hear him.

Mr. Garroway would make no false steps in the business; would adjourn the debate, but would have nothing said to the duke. He seemed discomposed, and fumbled with a paper, and would 'sell his place,' and could hunt 'with hounds and not with lobsters;' but if any man desires he may be heard on any 'public occasion,' would have him heard, but not any thing 'private' from him.

Lord Cornbury observes that the duke has good intelligence of what we do here; for he began his discourse with the great business of France: if you accuse him, he is pardoned, and has the king's pardon; being so secured, there is no justice to proceed upon these crimes: but suppose he should acquit himself of all the great matters relating to the king, yet here is a crime in the face of the sun, a murder, and his living with that miserable woman in that perpetual adultery. He never was tried for killing her husband, and would be satisfied how you may try him; but how will you reach him? He must be tried by the Lords. Every body knows the great friendship that you, Mr. Speaker, have for him; and would not have you write or speak to him: but if he has any thing more to say, you may hear him to-morrow.

Sir Rob. Howard moves to adjourn the debate till to-morrow.

Mr. Powle. In Impeachments, 'by way of justice,' is another way of proceeding, but, 'in point of fame,' every man must lay his hand upon his heart, in his judgment of him.

Anne, out of the reach of her father's displeasure. He was a great patron of men of letters, who have not been ungrateful in transmitting his name with lustre to posterity. He died in 1705." Biog. Brit.

Sir John Monson has attended this noble lord's speech, but wonders that he should interpret the weighty affairs of this house to be his own private affairs, and believes, that his mind changed from what he had to say at first upon our debate.

The debate was adjourned till the next day.

The Speaker reminded the house, that it is against order, that members should salute messengers from the Lords house, as if this house was the School of Compliments: the Speaker only ought to do respect for the whole house.

The Speaker reported, "That he had presented the Addresses to his majesty, who was pleased to return Answer to this effect: "That he was always ready to preserve them in their Liberties and Properties, and to secure the Protestant Religion; and would take care the Militia should be in readiness upon all occasions to secure the Government."

January 14.

Sir John Monson would know whether the Speaker has any more letters, or intimations from the duke; and that, if he had, he would produce them.

Sir Eliab Harvey moves to state the question, upon the matter of the debate adjourned yesterday; the question, 'to remove the duke of Buckingham from his majesty's person, and employments, for ever,' to be the Address to the king.

Sir Cs. Wheeler would do things so like an honest man, that, if informed of any other matter, he may not repent him of his vote. The debate arises fairly from the first vote, 'all Papists, and persons obnoxious, to be removed from the king.' That he will stick close to. If the house will add 'all others guilty of murder' &c. and have all scandalous livers removed, he is content: many others may be as perplexed in the vote, and entangled as he is; therefore would come to a fair debate. If any person, be it who it will, is 'so obnoxious,' would fairly give his vote to have him removed: would a man be content that every duke in England that has killed a man, or lived in adultery, should be comprehended in your vote as dangerous to the government? Whether 'seizing on money,' 'popishly affected' or 'has made a league,' let all these come fairly before us: How carefully did we proceed in the duke of Lauderdale's vote? The duke said 'he was not a man to be an accuser, but, if examined, he would throw himself upon the judgment of the house;' if he did not make the League (French Alliance) he may know who did it: shall we lose such an opportunity, as this offer of the duke's? Though not expressed, yet it is fairly implied, that he can tell you, would set the saddle upon the right horse, and send for him, if he will come.

The Speaker. Dr. Williams addressed himself to him thus: 'that his name, he has heard, was made use of in the house, about what he should hear the duke say of the king; protest he never heard the words, nor said he heard them.'

Mr. Rob. Philips. Dr. Williams told him, 'That the words were not only spoken once, but frequently, by the duke.'

Sir John Coventry has no malice against the duke, but could not be silent when a worthy member, col. Titus, can tell you as much.

Col. Titus rises up very unwillingly to speak in the matter, for he has been under a misfortune from this person: will not do a public good for a private revenge: he has heard the same things from Dr. Williams.

Mr. Sacheverell. We are not going to hang the duke, nor try him for his life, we only desire to remove him from the king. The question might have been yesterday, but he being too fool we would not touch him: Wheeler said, 'affairs are not mended since lord Clarendon's banishment;' but the house is a judge of that, not he; but if this person is not removed, will never move to have any removed more.

Sir Tho. Clarges. The duke told you, 'he had no hand in the French Alliance,' and at the same time that, 'he would have had no ships, but towns:' Averse from the war, and yet would have towns and no ships! When he told you, 'he was not for breaking the Triple Alliance,' a thing of great honour! but 'for putting most of the towns into the French hands,' it was one of the elegancies of speech which men call a Bull: 'would have leave to sell his place:' he has, under the signet, 2,400*l.* a year, in compensation of what he has given for the place of Master of the Horse; and yet he affirms 'he has nothing from the crown:' the method we take is by common fame here; the wisest parliaments have taken it before us. Hen. 4. in the case of the Abbot of ——— his Confessor, removed him for no other reason but for not being loved by the people, though the king knew nothing against him: many more have been removed at the instance of the Commons: would not have a hair of his head touched, but a learned judge (Atkins) said here, in lord Clarendon's case (about removing him) 'Was he a young gentleman, and came to town with money in his pocket, and gave it to a gamester to improve it for him by play, and he lost it, believes he should not put another bag into such unlucky hands to play for him:' would have the question, 'That he is not a man fit to be about the king.' Whom will you impute your Grievances to? No man will say, to the king; but if such a man's crimes must be alleviated, he is for the king and the common-wealth: would, perhaps move you, that no member for the future, whilst parliaments sit, should have the temptation of offices; moves for the single question, as before.

Col. Sandys has met with a servant of the duke's, who informs him, 'that the duke desires to be heard here again;' being under a surprise yesterday, he has something farther to say.

Sir Joseph Tredenham says the same.

Mr. Russell has no malice against the duke, but would have this question 'for removing him' passed; fearing the danger the king and the nation are in, from a knot of persons that meet at the duke's, who have neither morality nor christianity, who turn our Saviour and parliaments into ridicule, and contrive prorogations; and would have such persons removed.

Col. Sandys remembers that my Lord Keeper Finch* desired to be heard, and was heard, but ran away; but the duke has no reason to do so; you have dealt favourably with him: but would hear him; you cannot, it may be, have notice of things without hearing him.

Sir Tho. Lee knows nothing of what the duke intends, but he has been at the head of councils, and knows much: the kingdom is in misery, a little knowledge of affairs may bring you to more, and you may at last know the end: he has no design, nor hopes, but to keep his property in the county: pardons, it seems, in parliament have not served the turn: would call in any man that can inform the house.

Lord St. John is a friend to no man that gives ill counsels: any in the private Cabal that advised against the House of Commons, 'to force the House of Commons to pass Bills, and, if any refused, to take off their heads †:' would have these things enquired into: he has been told it by one of the Cabal ‡.

Mr. Sawyer did not expect, yesterday, excuses, from the duke, of his own actions, but discoveries of matters of concernment to the nation, relating to the public: but would not call him in to do the same thing again, only would have light into those causes that have produced such ill effects. He was called in only for discovery: the house proceeds not by fame of vulgar persons, but upon things as plain as the sun. This new light, a thing called wit, is little less than fanaticism, one degree below madness: of Democritus's family, he laughs always at all religion and true wisdom: we come here to take away examples of such things; such as this duke as great as any. This kind of wit's best ornament is most horrid blasphemy, oaths, and imprecations, which have done more hurt, in a few years, than all the convents and Jesuits could do in 100 years: prays, that the duke may not be heard to matters of excuse, to acquaint you with that

* See vol. 4, p. 1, of this Collection.

† Burnet says, "That sir Ellis Leighton assured him, that the duke of Buckingham, and lord Berkeley, offered to the king if he would bring the army to town, that they would take out of both houses the members that made the opposition to the declaration."

‡ The Cabal (so called from the initial letters of their titles) consisted originally of Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley, (afterwards Shaftesbury) and Lauderdale. Of these, three only, who were now attacked by the Commons, remained; Clifford being dead, and Shaftesbury having made his peace, which all the world is satisfied in; but confined only to matters of discovery.

Mr. Garraway fears not any thing the duke can say, in 'excuse' of himself; he had little advantage upon us by it yesterday. 'Sequestering him only from his employments, and the king's presence,' is a gentle way, and would have it done in as gentle words as possible: it is likely he may have been as ill an instrument as any; you have grievances, but will you not have the causes discovered? would call him in, and hear him at large: would have lord St. John's question asked the duke, or any other delivered you.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Lord St. John said, 'one of the Cabal told him, &c.' would know what the meaning of the Cabal is.

Mr. Garraway. That is so great a mystery, that he would know it above all things.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. We do things, not voluntarily, but by law; the king's privy counsellors! and it is perjury for us to reveal: as for the committee of foreign affairs (of which he is the only man of this house) wishes (he protests to God) that you knew what opinion he has ever given of affairs.

Sir Wm. Lewis. The way is to hear him at large and then propose your questions, and he has time by it to ask the king's leave to answer: that has been anciently done in these cases.

Mr. Powle commends secretary Coventry for his secrecy. This house has liberty to examine any man, not being a peer, and what he discovers is no breach of his oath: but if this house must take no notice of things, and persons are rescued from punishment, we may be all destroyed. A privy counsellor may do it safely, with breach of his oath: in lord Strafford's case, examination was upon oath of what was done at the council-table, and no exception was then taken against it: Cabal is a new word, and what is said there is not said in council, any more than in the bed-chamber; and those few men of the Cabal to encroach upon royal power as the duke of Ireland did, would have that question 'of the Cabal' proposed to the duke.

Sir Tho. Meres. 'Cabal' and 'Council' are different, but we have power over both.

Sir John Birkenhead. In lord Strafford's case the attorney general, when he was examined here, said, 'he would answer, when he had his master's leave:' it is perjury in any privy counsellor to answer without it.

Sir Cha. Harbord. To give counsel to the king 'to take away privilege of parliament!' no council can protect him.

Serj. Maynard. Supposed this 'of the parliament-men's heads' [said in the king's council] 'to be set upon the house;' will not meddle with that; knows not how the question propounded about the Cabal is understood.

Mr. Sucheverell. The duke said, '3, 4, or 5,000*l.* a year some had got;' would have him asked to every one of them.

The Speaker. The things proposed to be asked the duke he will state; 'the private Cabal to destroy the privileges of this house' 'altering the government where and by whom?' 'What meant by 4, 5, or 6,000*l.* a year gotten?' 'Who got it? and by what means the Triple Alliance was broke?' 'The Smyrna fleet set upon?' 'The Parliament Prorogued?'

Sir Rob. Holmes. He was commanded to fall upon the Smyrna fleet, and has his orders to show from the lord high admiral to do it*.

Sir Nich. Carew. 'By whose advice a Frenchman was made general of an army, when here raised,' another question.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. Count Schomberg is far from a Frenchman; his mother was an Englishwoman, and his father a German. He first commanded the Scots under the duke; and, would he have been a Papist, might long ago have been Marshal of France†. Though Germany be one country, they are not of one mind, in this war; divers princes are now arming in Germany, that will neither obey the emperor, nor the king of France: he came first to marshal Turenne, when he was a Protestant.

Sir Wm. Coventry. What was said from the bar, of M. Schomberg, needs not his confirmation. This gentleman might be abler than another man, it may be reasonably supposed, for the king's service, having served long in Holland, and knows the condition of that country: would lay no more weight on this than will be borne: I wish this was our greatest Grievance; the gentleman came only for the command of the army, when intended for foreign service, and when that intention was laid aside, he went away.

Sir Tho. Lee is for avoiding all things that give any umbrage or jealousy: it may be thought as necessary to have 'a foreign army,' as to have 'a foreign general;' they may both give umbrage or jealousy, and therefore would avoid them.

Sir Ch. Wheeler does not believe that an English general would serve for such purposes; but a 'foreigner' has given us great jealousies, and would have that one of the questions.

Mr. Love would have it another Question, who advised that the army should be appointed to draw up towards London, to awe this house, to make us vote what they please?

* "This perfidious and piratical attempt on the Smyrna fleet, though performed with the utmost bravery and resolution by sir Robert Holmes, and the earl of Ossory, miscarried. Though the Dutch defended themselves with amazing obstinacy, they could not have escaped (as they did) if sir Rob. Holmes had condescended to impart his design to sir Edw. Spragge, (whom he met at sea) and desired his assistance. But though sir Robert applied to him for intelligence concerning the game he sought, he kept the secret that he might engross the whole honour and profit to himself, and thereby fell into the disgrace of undertaking a bad thing, without having the glitter of good success to gild it over. Ralph.

† He was made Marshal in 1676.

The Duke's Second Speech to the House of Commons.

The Duke of Buckingham was then called in, as before, and spoke thus:

"In the first place, I return this honourable house humble thanks for the honour of twice admitting me; especially when I consider, how ill I expressed myself yesterday: consider the condition I am in; in danger to pass for a vicious person, and a betrayer of my country, all the world over. I have the misfortune to bear the blame of other men's faults. I know that it is laid against me the 'revealing the king's counsels,' 'correspondency with the enemy, in time of war,' and 'having hindered what the Council would have done.' I hope I shall have pardon, if I speak truth for myself. I told you, that, if the Triple Alliance had advantage in it, I had the honour to have as great a hand in it (I speak it without vanity) as any man: then upon the French ambassador's and other intelligence, I had orders to compliment upon the sad subject of Madame.* I thought it for the service of the king, that the French ought not to endeavour to be considerable at sea; we were jealous of them, that the Dutch should make their peace with them, because they had power to conquer. When I returned, I had all the demonstrations imaginable that the French had no such thoughts, but that the king of England should be master at sea. I pretend not to judge, whether I, or another, was in the right, but leave the house to judge. At that time, I, and lord Shaftsbury, were of opinion not to begin a war, without advice of the parliament, and the affections of the people, that the parliament might join in it; and I believe the king, at the head of his parliament, the greatest prince in the world: this was Shaftsbury's opinion and mine, but not lord Arlington's. Then I was of opinion not to make use of the French ships; but to have half the value of them in money, for English ships, which would have been of more service; the French ships of no use to us, because of no experience, and the use of our seas, learned by them, of great danger to us: lord Arlington was of a contrary opinion. I was sent to Dunkirk to the king of France, Arlington to Utrecht. I endeavoured to have money, instead of ships; at my first audience, the French king was willing to comply with it, but, after some time, by letters and returns from hence, it was altered. I make no reflections, but declare matter of fact. Then lord Shaftsbury and I were of opinion to order the war so, that the French were to deliver towns into our hands; an useful precedent! lord Arlington was of opinion to have no towns at all delivered, for one year, and here is the cause of the condition of affairs, with that of the fleet, and the French army let go on to conquer; they get all, and we nothing, and agree for none neither; consider who it was locked up with the French ambassador;* my spirit moves me to tell you. When we are to consider what to do we must advise with the French ambassador: I will not trouble you with reports. Look not upon me as a peer, but as an honest English gentleman, who have suffered much for my love to my country. I had a regiment given me, which was sir Edward Scott's: and, not knowing the law of England, I gave him 1,500*l.* for it; no Papists, nor Irish in the regiment. I will say nothing of my extraordinary gains. I have lost as much estate as some have got, and that is a big word. I am honest, and when I shall be found otherwise, desire to die. A man that has not gotten by all this. I leave it to you. If I am a Grievance, I am the cheapest Grievance, after all this, that ever this house had: and so humbly ask pardon of the house for the trouble I have given it."

Questions put to the Duke: with his Answers.

Then the Speaker told the duke, 'That he was commended, by the house, to ask his grace some Questions, if he pleased to make answer to them.' The duke answered, 'he was willing.'

Question 1. "Whether any persons have, at any time, declared to him any of their advices, or ill-purposes, against the liberty of this house, or propounded any way to him for altering our government; and if they did, what was that advice, and by whom?" Ans. It is an old proverb, 'over shoes, over boots.' This reflects upon one now not living [lord Clifford] and I would have pardon for not naming him, and fear it will be thought a malicious invention of mine. I have said nothing yet but what I can justify; but this not.—2. What his grace meant by this expression yesterday 'that he had gotten nothing, and that others had gotten 3, 4, and 5,000*l.*': who they were that had gotten it, and by what means? Ans. I cannot acquaint you how they got it, because not well acquainted myself with the means of getting money. What the duke of Ormond has got is upon record. Lord Arlington has not got so much, but a great deal.—3. By whose advice the army was raised, and Papists set to officer them, and M. Schomberg to be their general? Ans. I cannot say 'by whose

* King Charles's sister, the duchess of Orleans, who, in 1671, soon after her return from an interview with her brother at Dover, was poisoned at Paris, (as was supposed) by the direction of her husband. The duke of Buckingham was sent over, on that occasion, with compliments of condolence.

* Reflecting on lord Arlington. The French ambassador, here mentioned, was M. Rouvigny, a Protestant, whose son was created earl of Galway, by king William, and commanded the British forces in Portugal, in the reign of queen Anne. Burnet says, "he had the appointment of an ambassador, but would not take the character, that he might not have a chapel, and mass said in it."

advice,' but, on my honour, not by my advice; but was told by a man that is dead, 'that lord Arlington sent for him,' and it will be easily proved.—4. Whether he knows, that any have advised to make use of the army to awe the debates and resolutions of this house? Ans. This is the same question of a discourse from a man that is dead to a man that is living. If I had desired it, I might have had the command of the army that M. Schomberg had; but I have been told, that lord Arlington would have the government by an army.—5. By whose counsel and ministry the Triple League was made? Ans. Lord Arlington and I were only employed to treat, and finding the danger that we were in of being cheated, pressed the ambassadors to sign before they had power. It was an odd request to the ambassadors, yet they did sign.—6. Who made the first Treaty with France, by which the Triple League was broken, and the Articles thereof? Ans. I made no Treaty.—7. Who advised the shutting up the Exchequer, whereby the orders of assignment and credit of the exchequer were broken and destroyed? Ans. I was not the adviser. I lost 3,000*l.* by it.—8. And the Declaration about matters of Religion made? Ans. I do not disown that I advised it, but no farther only than what might be done by the Declaration by law.—9. And the Smyrna fleet fallen upon, before war was declared? Ans. It was lord Arlington's advice; I was against it: so much against it (as careful of the honour of the nation) that I incurred some anger from the king. Lord Arlington principally moved it: and I might say more.—10. And the second Treaty with the French king at Utrecht, and the Articles thereof? Ans. Lord Arlington and I were sent over to Utrecht, and found in the common people of Holland, in our journey thither, the greatest consternation imaginable: like burning the Rump in England, crying, 'God bless the king of England!' and 'cursing the States;' and had we then gone over and landed our men, we might have conquered the country; the prince of Orange would have had peace with France; but what share should we have had? Though he was the king's nephew, yet the king must be kind to his own country. If peace had been then, we had been in worse condition than we were before: at last, the prince of Orange hoped for a good peace; but I was not for France to have all, and England nothing. The consequence would have been, Holland must depend on France, if France had conquered near Germany. I think it a wise Article, that France should not make peace without us.—11. By whose counsels the war was made, without advice of parliament; and the parliament thereupon prorogued? Ans. Lord Shaftsbury and I were for 'the advice of parliament for the war.' I can say nothing to 'the prorogation'. I believe the parliament will never be against a war for the good of England; and so desire the pardon of the House: I know not how words may have slipped me, and lay myself at the feet of the House, as an English gentleman."

The Duke then saluted the House, as before, and withdrew.

Debate on the Duke's Answers.

Colonel Birch. What the duke has told us are personal discourses of one that 'is dead.' He may inform us, if he pleases, of one of those, 'living:' would have him declare them, and have him called in again.

Mr. Sawyer. What came from a dead man can be of no use imaginable; but here is no answer made to 'setting upon the Smyrna fleet.' Probably he is less guilty as to state affairs, but for public scandal, would have the Question put 'for his removal.'

Sir Nich. Carew hoped for great light from the duke, but he gives no light as to persons of a contrary opinion to him.

Sir Courtney Poole, thinks us not so much in the dark: thinks this noble lord will satisfy you farther to-morrow: he named but one about the army, he may tell you more.

Sir Tho. Lee. All he has said terminates in one man; but he believes no man so big as he represents him: it was in his power to have given larger answers if he would: he cannot believe that some one person, without help, could carry counsels against two or three; not one evil against two good: by the same right, you may send for him, as he came before; and if not, you may send to the House of Peers for their leave.

Mr. Secretary Coventry. We have little light from the duke without explaining; no oath of secrecy does bind a man to promote an ill act; but as for promoting, or not promoting a league, it is no sin: in one of the Answers, the duke makes lord Arlington instrumental in breaking the Triple Alliance; but it is not the duke's saying it, that makes him so: nor lord Arlington's saying it that makes the duke so: otherwise, happy is the first accuser: would be equal on both sides, but would ask, Whether any man believes that lord Arlington would own all this? You are to have farther light from the duke. Send to him to come again, if he be willing, or, if not, to the House of Lords, for leave for him.

Col. Birch would send out two gentlemen to know, whether the duke has any thing farther to say: that is parliamentary.

Sir Rob. Howard. Some things came from the duke that require us to proceed more carefully, than we are about to do; but the question that is pressed is like hearing him after, and condemning him first. Upon the whole, you cannot but think the time of the day, and the thing, great enough to put us upon considering it till to-morrow.

Mr. Russel. If the debate be adjourned, the duke, by his power, may prorogue us again, as he has done formerly.

Mr. Sawyer pities the duke's condition here, and the loss of his estate; but would have you proceed in it,

Sir Nich. Pedley. The duke may have patents for life. The serjeant of your mace has a patent for his place, for life, and it is a freehold in him. You cannot take away the duke's office without legal proceedings against him: by rule of law, there must be a scire facias: you cannot put a man from his freehold; and he would not have the question.

Sir Tho. Lee sees not such danger in this, as is alleged: by impeachments, the Lords are judges. By the Address we make to the king, the king cannot grant against law more than is in his power would clear it to the house. It may fall out to have the same case before you again, and would not have any person out of the power of the House of Commons.

Mr. Waller moves, not for the duke's sake, but for his own. You take away from him more than you leave him: common fame against one of the lords is the same thing here: you go with an humble desire to the king to have our judgment put in execution: because you have not liked men, they have been removed: some say, he never said the word alleged against him; others say, others said them—no proof—witnesses may be corrupted: not many men are hanged for want of their pardon, if recorded: never any man was hanged, with his pardon in his hand: this is a great convulsion of state, a peer to come down to your house. If times are so corrupt, I must piece out my innocence with a pardon: if this nation be ever preserved, it must be in this place; and where so great a power is, if not as exact a justice with it, we are not safe: God has given us great power, and thank God for it.

Mr. Sec. Coventry. The duke's office is a patent, and a freehold: the duke may have a recompence for his office.

Sir Cha. Harbord. The duke's office cost him a great sum of money, and it may be any man's case; pray be tender in what you cannot put the king upon, in point of law.

Sir Wm. Lewis. We have cause to be tender in the things offered, and 'to desire that the king would be pleased to give him leave to sell his place.'

Lord Cavendish, should not be for the latter part of the question, if it 'took his place' from him, for the king may 'give him leave to sell it.'

Lord Cornbury is not for taking away the duke's life. Would have things rightly understood: it concerns not his freehold; he holds it only during the king's pleasure. Is not against his 'leave to sell it': do you intend to leave 'employment' wholly out of the question? He has a patent for gentleman of the bedchamber, and a pension for it, and his lieutenancy of Yorkshire; and, on the other side, would not recommend him to the king, and not think him fit to be about his person.

Sir John Duncombe has a great compassion for this honourable person's misfortunes: what comfort can a man have, after such a charge, without some compensation for his place: which he moves for.

Mr. Harwood has had great honour for this person, but now must lay all aside here: with what face can you make such an Address to the king? you do nothing to take away the king's charity, in compensation of his places, and doubts not but the king will do it: it is a burden greater than he could wish he had, but would not put it upon the king by our Address.

Sir Wm. Coventry. 'To remove him' is the general sense, but would not wound other men, by destroying his patent, nor wound his freehold, nor take away his blood: would have added to the question, 'reserving to him the profits of such places, as of right, he has by any inheritance, or freehold.'

Mr. Powle would have him removed out of offices that are granted him at his majesty's pleasure.

Mr. Swynfin. Be the offender ever so great, or the offence, you may err in the manner of proceeding: would have you proceed by such rules as agree with justice: in the duke of Lauderdale's case, persons did prove things against him (your members): looks for judicial proof before you; information has been but remembers no proof: it has been the course that great ministers of state do take out those pardons, sometimes one or two in a year: as to impeachment, this way was well; for then all evidence on both sides is heard: does not think 'removal from the king's presence' a light thing. Put the case, you had this upon your own members—would you have freeholds taken away without proof? Thinks it an ill precedent: let the case be this, Lords or whose it will, we have nothing but justice for our own preservation: whoever shall judge a man, and not hear him to the point, though his judgment be just, he is unjust in judging.

Col. Strungways. There is no freehold in a grant 'at the king's pleasure': will you make 'Lex et consuetudo parliamenti' nothing? We do as a grand jury does, persuaded in conscience that the thing is so.—'Neither fornicator, nor adulterer, &c. shall enter into the kingdom of Heaven'—Hopes that virtue will be countenanced here: this vote is only 'to remove such a Counsellor,' to restore the king, and honour and integrity unto the kingdom: no sanguinary law: not for taking away his freehold, but only what he holds at the king's pleasure: hopes that men of sobriety and honesty will be near the king, and would have the duke removed.

Sir Tho. Meres. 'Removing from the king's person' is, in consequence, removing from places and employments: it is also said, 'we are heard as a grand jury, in impeachments'; but, as you proceed now, there are objections; you now give your last judgment, whatever the king will do. Says another gentleman, 'you have heard no proofs; but these shall not go without an answer: this House had great power in judgment by common fame, as every one of us is told without doors. Lex Parliamentaria. Thirty persons, in Mr. Prynne's books, were desired to be removed from former kings, because the people spoke ill of them; some of them, though not all, were removed: the duke is a fine person, and taking with us, and we have a tenderness; but it does not become this house to countenance selling of places: though common fame is the great prerogative of this House, yet would use it very sparingly.

Sir John Berkenhead is against clancular and clandestine proceedings: in the common law, if the Christian neighbourhood say, 'one keeps another man's wife,' yet upon his oath he may clear himself: lord Bacon calls common fame 'a common liar;' and the precedents cited, of removals, were in ill times: is against the latter part of the question.

Mr. Powle. Birkenhead said, 'the precedents, cited, were of ill times,'—11 Richard 2, a great while before his deposing: that was done in the 22d. The effects of those censures then kept things quiet, till his deposing: the duke of Ireland was then removed, for encroaching upon royal power: wishes we might ever use this power moderately, and that we had no occasion of using it now.

Col Birch is one of those who desired no resolution of this matter till another day; and did it then for another reason, not for favour to the duke: it is the custom, that the Speaker call for a clear account, and wishes it had been now from the duke: but cannot a gentleman give a clear opinion in the question? Would not call for it: when once the debate was, in the Convention, of recommending Counsellors to the king, it was answered, 'all the awe you have upon the king's Council hereafter is, if they be such as the people have an ill opinion of, you may remove them; and it is better for us then to name them, for we must be responsible for them: shall you depart from this, and call for direct proof of persons only, and not things? You have great prejudice by it: you cannot take his freehold from him by your vote, and he is therefore for the question.

Sir Tho. Littleton fears, that you may clash with the Lords upon another thing: when the point was of removal from the king's presence, 29 Hen. 6, as now, the king answered, 'he is content to remove them from his presence, except they be Lords, unless they approve.' Whether any clear precedent, the Commons originally to go to the king to remove, in case of peers, is not satisfied: it is not the case of the duke of Lauderdale, who is no peer.

Lord Cornbury. Littleton is mistaken in the precedent of 29 Hen. 6. The duke of Somerset, and the bishop of Winchester, were removed: the words of the accusation were, 'the people spake ill of them:' the king grants the request of the Commons, unless to some few persons that were Lords, who are necessary about him: the Lords' Concurrence will beget another debate, but the king is still at the same freedom.

Resolution against the Duke.

At length it was resolved, "That an Address be presented to his majesty to remove the duke of Buckingham from all his Employments that are held during his majesty's pleasure, and from his Presence and Councils for ever."

234. Proceedings in the House of Commons against the Earl of ARLINGTON.* 25 CHARLES II. A. D. 1674.

ON the 15th of January, 1674, Sir Gilbert Gerrard states to the House of Commons, that he has a Complaint against a great minister of state, the earl of Arlington †; all great affairs and transactions go through his hands: he has been the great treasurer; the management of that must pass by him: he has no prejudice to him, or disobligation from him, but it is a duty he owes the king and nation: it was just upon your heels the taking away your Liberties, contrary to the laws of the kingdom; and to back this, an Army was raised of dangerous men, unfit to command; nothing has passed for some years but through his hands; the Army, the Declaration; he the great conduit-pipe; this instance many within these walls know, and abroad he is reported a papist, and reconciled to the church of Rome: in the Journal you may find the Act for suppressing Conventicles; upon his majesty's power to suspend Laws in the Proviso; upon the division of the house, Arlington staid in for it with not above 30: every thing passed through his hands; all Licences according to the declaration.

He then opened and presented to the House the following

ARTICLES of treasonable and other Crimes of High Misdemeanor against the Earl of Arlington, principal Secretary of State:

* See an account of him in the Note to Clarendon's Case, p. 307, of this volume.

† "Bennet, advanced afterwards to be earl of Arlington, was made secretary of state, by the interest of the popish party, [in 1662.] He was a proud man. His parts were solid, but not quick. He had the art of observing the king's temper, and managing it beyond all the men of that time. He was believed a Papist. He had once professed it, and when he died, he again reconciled himself to that church. Yet in the whole course of his ministry, he seemed to have made it a maxim, that the king ought to show no favour to popery, but that all his affairs would be spoiled, if ever he turned that way; which made the Papists become his mortal enemies, and accuse him as an apostate, and a betrayer of their interest." Burnet.—He died in 1685, leaving an only daughter, married to king Charles's favourite son, the duke of Grafton.

I. "That the said earl hath been a constant and most vehement promoter of Popery and Popish Counsels: 1. By procuring commissions for all the Papists lately in command, and who made their application to him, as a known favourer of that faction; there being not one commission signed by the other secretary; many of which commissions were procured and signed by him, since the several Addresses of the two houses of parliament to his majesty and the passing the late Act against Popery: 2. By procuring his majesty's Letter, commanding Irish papists and rebels to be let into corporations, and admitted into the commissions of the peace, and other offices of trust military and civil, contrary to the established laws and constitutions of that realm, to the great terror of the king's protestant subjects there: 3. By not only setting up and supporting the aforesaid Papists there, but bringing the most violent and fiercest of them to command companies and regiments of the king's English subjects here to the great dishonour and danger of this kingdom: 4. By openly and avowedly entertaining and lodging in his family a Popish priest, contrary to the known laws of the land; which said priest was a noted solicitor and promoter of the Popish faction, and has since fled out of this kingdom. 5. By procuring Pensions, in other mens names, for Papist officers, contrary to, and in illusion of the late act of parliament: 6. By obtaining several Grants of considerable sums of money, to be charged upon the revenue of Ireland, for the most violent and pernicious papists there; particularly 2,000*l.* for one colonel Fitz Patrick, a notorious Irish rebel, whose mother was hanged in the late war, for murdering several English, and making candles of their fat; this grant being procured for the said Fitz Patrick at a time when he was accused to the lord Arlington of high crimes, by the now lord lieut. of Ireland: 7. by procuring his majesty to release several Irish Papists (some whereof deeply engaged in the horrid rebellion of that kingdom) the chiefries or head rents reserved to the crown, out of the forfeited estates of Papists there, being a principal part of his majesty's revenue in that kingdom.

II. "That the said Earl had been guilty of many and undue practices to promote his own greatness; and hath embezzled and wasted the treasure of this nation; 1. By procuring vast and exorbitant Grants for himself, both in England and Ireland, breaking into the settlement of that kingdom, and dispossessioning several English Adventurers and Soldiers of their properties and freeholds, in which they were duly and legally stated, without any colour of reason, or suggestion of right. 2. By charging excessive and almost incredible sums for false and deceitful intelligence: 3. By procuring his majesty's hand for the giving away, between his first entrance into his office, the value of three millions of sterling money, at the least; the several Grants whereof are extant, countersigned by him, and by him only. 4. That the said Earl, presuming to trample upon all estates and degrees of the subjects of this realm; the better to subdue them to his will and pleasure, hath causelessly and illegally imprisoned many of his majesty's subjects. 5. That he did procure a principal peer of this realm to be unjustly imprisoned and to be proclaimed traitor, without any legal proceed or trial; and did maliciously suborn false witness, with money to take away his life, upon pretence of treasonable words.

III. "That the said Earl hath falsely and traiterously betrayed the great trust reposed in him, by his majesty, as counsellor and principal secretary of state; 1. By entertaining a more than usual intimacy with the French ambassador; not only lodging him in his house, but letting him into the king's most secret counsels. 2. By altering in private, and singly by himself, several solemn determinations of his majesty's councils. 3. By procuring a stranger to have the chief command of the late raised army, for invasion of Holland, to the great dishonour and discouragement of all the loyal nobility and gentry of this nation. 4. By advising his majesty to admit of a squadron of French ships to be joined with our English fleet; the sad consequence whereof we have since felt, notwithstanding the king of France had agreed to send a supply of money, in order to the having the fleet wholly English. 5. Whereas the king was advised by several of his council to press the French king to desist from making any further progress in his conquest of the inland towns of Holland, whereof England was to have no benefit, and to turn his arms upon those maritime towns that were by the treaty to have been ours, his lordship gave the king counsel to desist; whereby that part of our expectation was wholly frustrate. 6. Whereas the king was advised, by several of his council, not to enter into this war, till his majesty was out of debt, and had advised with his parliament, his lordship was of opinion to the contrary, and gave his advice accordingly. 7. When the French ships were dispersed after the late Fight at sea, and had lost all their anchors and cables, by reason of the foul weather that then ensued, he persuaded his majesty to send them fourscore cables and anchors; although it was then objected, and he knew it to be true. That his majesty had not at that present time any more in his stores than would supply his own ships, in case of the like necessity. 8. He hath traiterously corresponded with the king's enemies, beyond the seas, and contrary to the trust reposed in him, hath given intelligence to them."

The above Articles being delivered in at the Clerk's table and read,

Sir Robert Carr assures the house that he does not oppose the bringing in the Articles, or any thing objected against lord Arlington; but he has a letter to the Speaker to be communicated to the house.

Lord O'Brien knows not but what has been said yesterday may have been the occasion of this Letter, and would have it read.

The EARL'S LETTER to the HOUSE of COMMONS.

The Speaker moves that he may read lord Arlington's Letter. The Letter was read accordingly, as follows :

' Mr. Speaker ; hearing that the honourable House of Commons are informing themselves of public affairs, wherein, I humbly conceive what I can say may be of use, and satisfaction to them, I beseech you to do me the favour, by the means of this house, to obtain leave for me to be heard by the honourable house.

ARLINGTON.'

Mr. Thomas Lee moves that lord Arlington may be asked the same Questions with the duke of Buckingham, excepting that of M. Schomberg, being one of the Articles lord Arlington is accused of.

Mr. Sec. Coventry hopes that the house will not vote that we shall examine him. no member of the Lords house can answer us.

Sir William Lewis. He is at his own pleasure for answering our questions : he, by his letter, offers information only.

Sir Thomas Lee. He is judge of his own discretion ; you may ask him what you please.

Sir Robert Carr believes, that any question this house will ask this noble lord he will answer.

The Speaker reminded the house of making a noise yesterday, and that we ought not particularly to salute any man, because the respects of the house are paid by the Chair ; an irregular motion when performed by any else.

Sir Edmund Jennings. If you lose the opportunity of asking him questions here, perhaps you will not see him again.

Col. Birch. Can any thing be more natural than asking of questions ? and the Speaker has drawn questions this way and that way, till you have come to the bottom : if he gives full Answers, you need go no further : it was not so managed yesterday.

Sir Charles Harbord. If, upon the relation he makes, you find no cause, then would have no questions asked ; you cannot examine a peer, nor can you send for him again.

Mr. Sacheverell would have no questions asked him to accuse himself : five of the questions concern him, and he would have all these laid aside.

The EARL'S SPEECH to the HOUSE of COMMONS.

The Earl of Arlington was admitted into the house, in the same manner, in all respects, with the duke of Buckingham. He then spoke to this effect :

" I acknowledge the honour the House has done me in admitting me to speak here ; in private conversation, and at dinners, I have met with a paper of Articles against me, in the nature of an Impeachment, though upon uncertain grounds : had I as much memory as innocence, I assure myself of all favour from this House : I have a bad memory, and so must make use of papers.

" I reduce the accusations to three heads. 1. Matter of Religion. 2. Matter of War and Treaties. 3. Particular Fortune and Acquisitions I have got since the king's Restoration.

" 1st, For Religion. I never did one act to derogate from the protestant religion, neither have I heard mass, nor made any reconciliation to the Church of Rome. I hope you will not rest upon aspersions, unless any honourable member will aver it on his knowledge, and, if so, I am content it should pass for a conviction. I am accused, of having a part in ' composing the declaration for Liberty of Conscience.' I was present in council when it was resolved, that, in time of war, it might be of great advantage to do any temporary thing till the parliament might consider of it ; but, as soon as I was convinced that it was contrary to laws I was the first man that advised to desist from what was not tenable by law ; as for what concerns the papists (Roman Catholics) I suppose, that according to the function of my place, I might pen it, but it was brought to me changed to what was resolved in council : to the charge of being ' a favourer of Papists,' I answer, in particular I have favoured those of the Church of England ; but I have promiscuously obliged men of merit, without distinction of religion.

To the 2nd. " That I have promoted Irish ' Papists and Rebels, to be let into corporations and commissions of the peace, offices of trust, military and civil, &c.' This is so ill imputed to me, that I was not at London, at the council, but at my country house, when the order was made. Any gentleman here, that knows the forms in this matter, can tell, that these letters are by the king's particular direction.

3. " Bringing the most violent Papists into ' command of companies and regiments of the king's English subjects, &c.' and though they ' refused the oaths by the act enjoined, procuring them new commissions.' It was affirmed to me, that colonel Panton would take the oaths and rest, and by his looks seemed to accept his commission accordingly. I dare pronounce that not one commission was signed by me, but for such as went into foreign parts, and were not likely to return.

4. " That I stopped prosecution of the piracy ' in Ireland of one Fitzpatrick.' My hand is no way seen in it, but in an order for his prosecution. A letter was sent me from the lord lieutenant of Ireland ; but I gave no interruption directly nor indirectly to his prosecution.

5. " Entertaining and lodging in my house ' a Priest, contrary to the known laws, a noted solicitor of the Popish faction, &c.' I know of none, except father Patrick, that ever frequented my house, unless by chance, upon some sudden emergency."

6. " That I was the adviser to begin the

'war, without consent of parliament.' What-ever others may have done, few had a more positive share in hindering it than myself. There was no such thing as 'constraining the ambassadors to sign,' as was alleged.* What was done was on the other side of the water, and I was sensible of all approaches of violation of the league; in this I can scarce vindicate myself without reflection on others: I cannot affirm, but will lay before you my presumptions and others in this business. France, to bring the duke of Buckingham on their side, contrived his going over to Paris, on pretence of some easy coaches for the king, which he had leave for. The king warned him by no means to meddle with affairs. The king of France used him well, and gave him a jewel. He counselled me about it; to requite him, I told him in what state matters lay: 'I see you fast to the Spanish interest, if you will procure me a pension from the Spanish ambassador;' the duke took the pleasure of telling the tale, and, upon my honour, I appeal if many have not heard the duke say, with oaths, 'Arlington is to be turned out, and he would furnish the king with a better secretary;' which he might easily have done. The first time the duke discovered himself, he desired to go with a compliment into France, which might have been done by a more ordinary man. He had authority to sound that court, and brought word of the French resolutions for war, and so magnified that king and his ministers, that all wondered at it. He brought accounts of resolutions of France for our interest, but no particulars; sometimes seriously, sometimes pleasantly. The king told me the reports. I answered, 'Examine the thing, and be not guided by particular partiality.' I have leave from the king for my coming hither, for the purgation of myself. I am taxed with having spoiled the treaty with France. Many, that I can name, present in council, have heard the duke say, 'I am persuaded, what lord Arlington says is with reflection. Either I did, or did not say, he changed the Treaty.' I fear the Duke has forgot the Treaty. This French Treaty confirmed the Triple Alliance; the king established it in the treaty. It is true, the progress of the war has begotten some disturbance; as the business of Charentoy. If France disturbs, this Treaty is violated: France was thus warned. The king of France asked leave for some forces to pass through Flanders; Monteri gave him a civil denial; which being resented by the king, on the behalf of France, diverted the French king from marching.

"As for 'the delivery of towns to us,' it is so silly a thing, that it deserves not an answer. We have ever pressed France for money instead of ships. France had stores, but could not spare money. The king sent to complement the king at France at Dunkirk; Buckingham offered himself, and treated of things unknown to me; he hoped satisfaction to wait upon so great a king, so obliging, when we approached so near the war. Ambassador Montagu, under the king's own hand, was commanded not to speak to the ministers, but to the king of France himself; 6,000 men for the king to maintain. I pressed the king that Montague might desist from that proposition. Buckingham was the head of them, and his officers.

"As to my charge of 'being privately shut up with the French ambassador;' my doors were not shut to him, nor the Spanish ambassador; but as for 'Pensions,' those that wrote the paper of Articles should have had the good manners to have told mine.

"As for 'M. Schomberg's being general of the English;' his mother was an English woman, and he commanded the king's troops in Portugal. If he would have changed his religion, he might have been marshal of France. It was not strange he should be sent for to command, when a descent was intended into Holland, in which country he had long commanded. Though Buckingham is a man of wit and parts, yet his experience is little or none at all in military affairs. Buckingham proposed that he might go to Utrecht, and I he joined with him, to temper him with my slow pace. Hard by, the king of France staid in his camp ten days, expecting the Holland Deputies; neither prince was to treat without the other. I and Halifax were for moderate courses; Buckingham was for exorbitant.

"As to 'the Parliament's not being acquainted with the war by my means;' it was represented, that the king had money to carry it on; it was never moved, nor urged, by any, that the war should come to the parliament. And as for our 'having towns,' what should we have done with them, if the king of France had given us half his conquests? To 'the falling upon the Smyrna fleet before war was declared against Holland,' I remember that my opinion was not prevalent, for I never pretended to maritime affairs; neither do I remember, that I had more concernment in it than others. 'That we should be governed by a Standing Army.' None in this house, nor out of it, abominate it more than I. I think it impossible to awe it with 20,000 men. I never heard the thing said, no, not by the duke of Buckingham. It was never in debate, and we never had it in our mouths.

"As for 'my having had extraordinary Grants from the king, &c.' had I presumed to beg of the king, as others have done, I might have had more; but if I have to maintain half the dignity of my employment, I am the falsest man that lives. I never begged any thing in England, but 'I have had 10,000*l.* out of Ireland.' I have lord Bense's estate, in Ireland, given me, (which I begged) which he forfeited in the Rebellion, worth 1,000*l.* per ann. I proved I was never in rebellion, and so I claimed his estates myself. 'Engrossing all affairs into my hands,' I should think myself the happiest man in the world, if I might retire from the management of affairs. Any gentleman of honour or parts, that hath had any business with the king, I have gone with and assisted.

"I beg pardon for tiring the house with this abrupt paper. I doubt not but to be found an innocent man. If what I have said is applicable to any thing the house desires to be informed of, I will serve the house: I think myself safe in your hands, and lay myself at your feet."

Questions put to the Earl: with his Answers.

Then the Speaker desired to know, "Whether he was pleased to make answer to some Questions he had in command from the house to ask his lordship?" Who answered, "he was willing."

Question 1. "Whether any persons have, at any time, declared to him any of their advices or ill purposes against the liberties of this house, or propounded any ways to him for altering the government; and if they did, what was that advice, and by whom?" Ans. I cannot apply this to any discourse I have heard, either public or private.—2. By whose advice the army was raised, and Papists set to officer them? Ans. On account of the war there was a necessity of good officers, and the Papist officers, many of them, were represented more skilful; but cannot apply the advice to any person.—3. And that army to awe the debates of this house? Ans. I can say nothing to it.—4. By whose counsel and ministry the Triple League was made? Ans. It has been suggested by me. Sir Wm. Temple was the fortunate man that dispatched it.—5. Who advised the first treaty with France? Ans. The making that League was the concurrent opinion of us all. I did not expect the French in earnest, if some blots had not happened.—6. By whose advice the Exchequer was shut up? Ans. You may easily believe I was passive in it. I can say but suspicions only: many things were proposed, but I have nothing to do with the Treasury.—7. By whose advice the Declaration for Liberty was made and published? Ans. It was a concurrent opinion, and, we thought, upon good grounds, and advisable by law; but when found contrary to law, I detested it.—8. By whose advice the Smyrna fleet was fallen upon? Ans. It was a concurrent advice, and I cannot apply it to any man's particular advice.—9. By whose advice the war was undertaken without advice of parliament? Ans. There was all probability of peace imaginable, and it was ill to show our adversaries any ill distempers, and it was a concurrent opinion.—10. And the parliament prorogued upon it, in Nov. last? Ans. It is a hard matter to say who was the adviser. I protest, I know not the author of it. I may wrong persons. I have presumptions, but no evidence."—Then his lordship, after saluting the house, withdrew.*

RESOLUTION AGAINST THE EARL.

After several long debates upon the above Articles, the question being put, "That an Address be presented to his majesty to remove the earl of Arlington from all his employments that are held during his majesty's pleasure, and from his majesty's presence and councils for ever;" it passed in the negative, 166 to 127.

It was then resolved, "That the Articles be referred to a committee, and that they report what matter is therein contained, and can be proved, that is fit for an Impeachment."† was expected: he excused himself, but without blaming the king: and this had so good an effect, that though he, as secretary of state, was more exposed than any other, by the many warrants and orders he had signed, yet he was acquitted, though by a small majority. But the care he took to preserve himself, and his success in it, lost him his high favour with the king, as the duke was out of measure offended at him. So he quitted his post, and was made lord chamberlain." Burnet.

The Author of his Life, in the Biographia, says, "That it was neither his speech, nor his cause, that brought him off, but the personal friendship of a noble person nearly allied to him, viz. the earl of Ossory, eldest son to the duke of Ormond, and then the most popular man of his quality in England, who stood for five days, that the debate lasted, in the lobby of the house of commons, and solicited the members in his favour as they entered the house."

† Nothing further appears to have been done in this Accusation. "No greater mistake," says Ralph, "can be made by the prosecutors of a bad minister, than to charge him with any one Article which they cannot support with undeniable proofs. If he has it in his power to loosen any one link of the chain, he infallibly makes his escape; and, instead of being punished himself, renders odious his accusers. This was the circumstance in the case before us: these gentlemen had suffered their Charge to outrun their evidence, by dealing in presumptions instead of proofs: lord Arlington saw the opening, and improved it with all the address imaginable: for, being admitted to be heard by the house, in his turn, he so far exploded, or evaded, all that the duke had said the day before, and set so plausible a gloss on his own actions, that the Impeachment died away, and he escaped, even without the least censure: he had been charged in particular with corresponding with the king's enemies beyond the seas: his friends, who had taken heart on seeing him come off so triumphantly, called upon sir Gilbert Gerrard for his vouchers: he was unprovided, would have withdrawn that Article, was not allowed, had recourse to the wretched expedient of desiring time; and, at last, took refuge in saying, that this treacherous correspondence was carried on during the last Dutch war."

* "Lord Arlington spoke much better than

Case, and declares that a writ issued out of Chancery to the defendant, then Sheriff of Suffolk, to elect a knight of the county for the parliament: and that the plaintiff was chosen by the majority of freeholders, and that the defendant returned the writ with an indenture of the said election, but maliciously intending to deprive the plaintiff, 'de fiducia et officio' præd' falso et deceptivo, una cum indentura 'præd' retornavit unam alteram indenturam 'in cancellaria præd' specificant' quod alie personæ liberi tenentes vel major pars liberorum 'tenentium elegerunt quendam Lionellum Tolmach, ubi re vera præd' Lionellus non fuit 'electus per majorem numerum liberorum 'tenentium; ratione cujus,' the Plaintiff was kept out of the House of Commons, and put to great charge to prove his election in the House of Commons. The defendant pleaded non culp. and upon trial at bar, Twisden, Rainsford, and Wylde held, and so directed the Jury, That if this double return was made maliciously, they ought to find for the plaintiff, which accordingly they did, and gave him 800*l.* damages, though the evidence as to the malice and falsity, was very slender. For the poll was granted; upon which the matter seeming doubtful, whether some of them who voted for the plaintiff had sufficient freehold to qualify them to give their votes; the Sheriff, by advice of counsel then present, and of some members of parliament there also, made this double return, to prevent an action for a false return, in case that it should appear that some freeholders that voted for the plaintiff had sufficient freehold. And after, upon examination in parliament, the election of the plaintiff was adjudged good, and the defendant committed by them for making this double return: And now it was moved in arrest of judgment by North, At- torney-General, and Scroggs, king's serjeant, that this action lies not, and that no such action was ever yet maintained in this case; for the case of Nevil and Stroud was never resolved, but in respect of difficulty sent to parliament; where it never received a determination. And the reasons they urged against the actions, were, First, Because the falsity or verity of the return is only examinable in the House of Commons, who are the sole judges, and will punish such falsities; and accordingly they have so done in this case, by committing the Sheriff, and he ought not to be twice punished for the same fault. And before the statute of H. 6. no action lay for a false return, and that only gives an action of debt for 100*l*. Secondly, The right of the party is not considerable in this case; for this is not an office of profit, but of trust, concerning the state. Thirdly, What the Sheriff does in this case, he doth as a judge; for he is judge of the election, and therefore no action lies against him. Fourthly, What the Sheriff doth in this case, is propter difficultatem, upon his doubtfulness of the matter, and judges of assize may, propter difficultatem, adjourn an assize: the Sheriff hath done no more in this case than laid the matter before the House of Commons, that the validity of the votes may be there deliberately examined. To which it was answered by Maynard king's serjeant, and sir William Jones, solicitor; First, That here was malice and falsity in the Sheriff, and thereby damage and charge to the plaintiff, and all this found by the jury, which is sufficient to maintain an action in all cases, whether there has been a like action in such case or not before; for actions upon the case are founded upon the particular case, which is mostly new. And the case of Nevil and Stroud was not for a double return, but for making no return; for there two were elected, and the Sheriff made no return as to one, and for that he brought the action. Secondly, The commitment by the parliament is only to punish the contempt of the Sheriff, as to them and the state, but not to repair the party for the damage he sustained; and thus in several respects, one may be twice punished pro uno delicto. As it falls out often in many cases, particularly in criminal matters, wherein the party is punished for the king by indictment, and by the party for the special damage he sustained. Thirdly, the Sheriff is not a judge of the election in this case, but a minister to take the polls; of which, in point of sufficiency, the House of Commons is judge. Fourthly, Though the statute of H. 6. gives to the party the 100*l*. penalty, that will not prove this action does not lie at common law. The parliament intended only to give a certain penalty to the party, which was considerable then, though not so considerable now, and not leave them to a jury's discretion altogether for damages. 'Et adjournatur ad proximum terminum,' when Hale being in court, he, Twysden and Wyldé; forasmuch as the return is said to be 'falso et malitiose et ea intentione,' to put the plaintiff to charge and expence, and so found by the jury; held the action lay, and gave judgment for the plaintiff; Rainsford doubting.

Upon this a Writ of Error was brought in the Chequer-chamber, where six Judges were for reversing the Judgment, and two for affirming it.

Their Arguments here follow:

BARNARDISTON versus SOAME. In Case.

The Case.

On the death of sir Henry North, one of the knights for Suffolk, a writ was issued forth for the election of a new member; and sir Samuel Barnardiston, and my lord Huntingtore, were the two candidates; but sir Samuel carried it by 78 voices, and was returned: And my lord Huntingtore having made an interest with the sheriff, got the sheriff to return him too; and he sat in the House till the election was there determined for sir Samuel. Whereupon sir Samuel Barnardiston, for this double return, brought an action upon the case against the sheriff, and tried it at the King's-bench bar 12 Nov. 1674, before my Lord Chief Justice Hale, and recovered 1,000*l*. damages: and afterwards a Writ of Error was brought in the Exchequer-chamber, and there the Judgment in the King's-bench was reversed; only Atkins and Ellis were for affirming it.

Judge Ellis's Argument is as followeth:

First, The declaration does consist of the Writ to the sheriff, his Return, and the averment of the plaintiff's damage. The Writ does shew the great import of what was to be done, and what he should do.

Now as to the Return: 1. It is impossible to be a true return, but it is a false return; for that simul et semel, both should be chosen at the same time, that can't be: So then he hath not observed the Writ.

2. The Writ requires that the House should be full, and have a member of parliament, but by this return neither can sit in parliament; for it appears, that from the 24th of Feb. 25 Car. 2, until the confirmation he was kept out. So the end of the writ not at all observed, and the business of the parliament retarded as much as could be.

3. It may be said, This may be done by mistake, he may mistake the law; but when the plaintiff comes and says, That he knowing the plaintiff was duly elected, and on purpose to keep him out of the House, did falso et malitiose make this return; then here is a false and malicious return, and made knowingly upon him: Then an action lies.

Then to consider the Case,

1. At common law; and I conceive it will lie.

2. The acts of parliament have not taken away the remedy which the common law gave.

1. That the common law gave remedy; for that it was falsely and maliciously done, we must not doubt it : It is a matter of fact, and the jury have found it so, and that there was a wrong done to Barnardiston, and it is of the sheriff's own knowledge : then,

2. When I suffer an injury, joined with a loss, the common law gives me a remedy for it.

Cooper and Andrews's case, Hob. 43.

Then take it as done by an officer of justice, and a sworn officer, one of the greatest in the kingdom : If it should not lie in that case, there would be a failure of justice, but no failure of wrong.

Second, That in cases of far less concern, as to officers, it will lie, and then we shall see in this case what it will do.

Powle and Godfrey's case, Rolls, lib. 1, 63. Co. lib. 12, 128. In that case because there was a temporal loss to the party, though for a spiritual wrong, the law gave him damages.

Rolls 1 lib. 1, 108, 24. Ford and Hoschin's case against an archdeacon, F. N. B. 47, and yet an archdeacon is a spiritual officer : So that if he do not induct the parson, he may have his remedy ; for where he suffers a loss, the law gives him his remedy.

Now here is injuria et dampnum, he does complain about the nature of his election, and the undue return of an election ; and to a court that never yet did give damages to the party.

3. Then when there is a colour of justice, and a man does proceed in a legal way, yet fulso et malitiose an action lies, Hob. 266. Waterer and Freeman's case. If a man will arrest one and put him to special bail, a special action of the case lies against him.

Cro. 3, 130. Windham and Clere's case against a justice of peace : Whereas in truth the justice never had any complaint. An action will lie against him, because he did fulso et malitiose.

Id. 21 E. 4, 22, 23. If a misinformation be in a court of justice, an action lies against him. Now here is a very great misinformation given to the Chancery upon this return.

Obj. This is a new case, and a case of a great deal of danger, and therefore we must have a great deal of care of making new laws.

Ans. It were endless to put cases where there never was a case before ; yet an action will lie, if damage : there was no precedent for an action of the case for falsely and maliciously accusing one of treason, before Smith and Crashaw's case. Rolls Abr. 1, 1131.

Bulstr. 2, 270. Jones 93. Cro. 1, 15. Though there it was objected, that never any precedents were that this action was brought for maliciously and falsely accusing one of treason, and the danger of that action would lie, yet the judges resolved otherwise, being falsely and maliciously ; and though never any precedents could be shewn, yet they gave judgment expressly that the action would lie.

3 Cro. 534. Moor and Blackwell's case : Objected, That no precedent could be found where insufficient returns have been amended ; yet the court said, If there never was a precedent, they would make a precedent thereof. The first precedent had a beginning, and there was none at first.

2. There is a great difference where the law is silent in the case.

Before Stade's case they never could shew any action of the case upon an indebitatus assumpsit ; multitudes of actions of debt, but none of the case, yet adjudged it would lie : For where there is eadem ratio, there is eadem lex : and will any man doubt where there is a false return whether an action will lie ? In actions of the case there is less reason to expect precedents than in other things ; they grow as the invention of man grows ; according as new frauds and new deceits arise, so should new remedies.

Obj. Never an action brought for such a return ; and Littleton's rule is, That if such an action could be brought, it would have been brought before now.

Ans. 1. My lord Coke says, The not user of an action does not take away the action, but ye may bring the action if ye have cause.

2. May it not be said as it was said to the former cases ? There were accusations of treason, and false ones too, and no actions brought ; therefore no action ought to lie now. I cannot see if ye reverse this judgment, ye must reverse many more of the same nature.

It is true, there is a great difference, that if the nature of the thing be such as it cannot be falsely and maliciously, the adding these words will not change the nature ; but if the nature of the thing be so, and the jury do find fulso et malitiose, the action will lie. As for the first part, as for a false accusation of stealing an apple off a tree, an action will not lie, though the declaration is falso et malitiose, for the nature of the thing will not permit it : so Moor, 491. Palmer and Porter's case, there no action will lie upon that reason ; but in our case, the nature of the thing is of such a wrong, that an action may lie.

Then though the acts of parliament may give remedy, yet that takes not away the remedy at common law, which was his ancient remedy. Plow. 113, puts many cases to that purpose ; and the difference is plain, for if it were no crime and offence at common law, but given by the act, then no action could lie but upon the act ; but where there was another remedy, he may take either that as common law, or the other upon the act.

The common law gave an action of the case upon too little issues returned by the sheriff, the statute gives an averment, yet he may take the action still.

Now consider the remedy this act gives, and see whether it be so good a remedy : for first, he must bring his action within the time, limited by the act, or else he is out of the act ; now if there be a double return depending in the house, no man will bring an action, depending that return undecided, and the judges will not countenance such an action; so the party is quite deprived of his remedy. Then secondly as this case is the sheriff is not within the act at all, for he has returned the plaintiff. Now if this should be suffered, there would be an evasion out of the statute, and the statute would give no remedy at all. Thirdly, it is the same mischief to the plaintiff; if my lord had been singly returned, he might have vindicated his election as much as in this double return, and have been in the house as soon.

Obj. This is a general matter, and all the subjects of England are concerned in it: and Co. Rep. 3. William's case, where there is a general nuisance, every man shall not have an action.

Resp. Where there is a general concern, and no particular damage, every man shall not have an action; but when there is particular damage there he may. Here is a particular damage to the plaintiff, and so he is well intitled to his action. Rep. 9. Marie's case. 1 Inst. 59. Powell's case. 3 Cro. 664. Fineux and Hovenden's case.

Obj. This matter is matter proper to be determined in parliament, and a hard case the sheriff should be condemned for that he could not help.

Resp. As to the right of election that is determinable there, and it was so; but for his damage, it neither was, nor could be examined there. If the house of commons had given damages, and the parliament had broken up, how should he have recovered them?

1. Here is no action brought against a member.

2. No action brought for any thing done in parliament.

3. The return is into Chancery; the sheriff's work was ended in Chancery; it was filed in chancery, and there remains, and there must remain. So that all the malice and falsity was done in Chancery; and the action is not brought for any right of election, but for what was done to put him to charges.

If there had been an equality of voices, he must have returned so; nor is here a little mistake; but what is done, is done falsely and maliciously, and with an intent to put him to charges.

Obj. The sheriff is not concerned himself for what was done in the Commons House.

Ans. He was not charged with it there; this action is not brought purely for a double return; yet if so, and he does it knowingly, an action will lie, the return is plain, for the sheriff is a great officer and the law does give that credit to him, that it will not suffer any averment against his return, but an action of the case will lie, Rep. 11. Bagg's case; and the sheriff is a sworn officer, and the law imposes this man upon me, and the law is my caution in that case, and gives me a remedy.

Obj. Here is no double return, for it is no return at all, it not being under seal; and the statute says, all returns shall be under the seal of the electors: so here is no harm at all; he might have gone into the house, if he had pleased.

Ans. At the Common Law there was no necessity the return should have been under the seal of the electors: so it is a good return until avoided, and not a void return. If it were not good unless under the seal of all that elect what will become of those that sit now? It was never done yet, if he makes a return without seal, it is good, prima facie.

As to the exceptions taken to the declaration, it is well laid in strictness of pleading; he says secundum exigentiam brevis; and though he says per aliam indenturam factum, it was as much as factum indentatum, 1 Inst. 103. Leo. 310, Maydwell and Andrew's case. How should it be a return, unless it be as it should be? And ye must intend so as it should be, 3 Cro. 737.

The pleading of Bulkley's case is the same with this, and no exception taken to it; but if it had been upon a demurrer, there might have been more said for the exception; but now it is an exception upon a verdict, and it shall be intended, that they that tried it had the right of the return, 2 Bulst. 41. Yelv. 247. after a verdict a vicious plea shall be made good, Allen and Nashe's case, 3 Cro. 53. ibid. 371. Southwell and Brown's case and Fulwood's case, 4 Rep. is a stronger case than has been cited, and yet adjudged good.

Though there be no seal, yet when he returns this, and a man suffers damage by it, and all the mischief that may happen, who is the party would take advantage of it? he that has done the wrong? No, he cannot, 21 E. 4. 22; 15 E. 4. 18, 19.

So therefore both because the declaration is well laid, and the party well entitled to his action,

The Judgment ought to be affirmed.

AN ARGUMENT in the great Case concerning Election of Members to Parliament, by sir ROBERT ATKINS, knt. of the Hon. Order of the Bath, and late one of the Judges of the Court of Common-Pleas.

Trinity Term, 26 Car. 2.

In the Court of King's-Bench, Rot. 577.

Sir SAMUEL BARNARDISTON, bart. Plaintiff:
Sir WILLIAM SOAME, Defendant.

In Trespass upon the Case.

That whereas the king, 8 Feb. 25. of his reign, by a writ out of the Chancery, directed to the then sheriff of Suffolk, commanded that he should cause an election to be made of another knight for the said shire in the place of sir Henry North, lately dead; and that he should certify the election under his own seal, and the seals of those that were present at the election, into the Chancery.

Which writ, 12 Feb. 25 Car. 2, was delivered to the defendant, then sheriff.

And, 24 Feb. 25 Car. 2, in full county, by the people resident in that county, the writ was

And although the plaintiff was duly elected to be knight for that county, by the greater number of the people then resident in the said county, every one whereof could spend 40*l.* per annum within that county: And although the defendant, then sheriff of the said county, premissa satis sciens, afterwards the same 24 Feb. 25 Car. 2, returned the said writ into the Chancery; together with an indenture between him the said Sheriff, and the aforesaid electors of the plaintiff, of the aforesaid election of the plaintiff, made according as the said writ requires.

Yet the defendant, then sheriff, 'Officii sui debitum minime ponderans, sed machinaus et malitiose intendans ipsam Samuelem in hac parte minus rite pręgravare,' and to deprive the plaintiff of the trust and office of one of the knights of the shire, to be exercised in parliament; and to cause the plaintiff to expend great sums of money, against the duty of his office, Falsely, maliciously and deceitfully returned into the Chancery, together with the aforesaid indenture, another indenture annexed to the said writ, purporting the same to be made between him the said defendant, then sheriff, of the one part, and divers other persons; containing, That the said other persons, as the greater part of the said county, did chuse one sir Lionel Talmach, bart. otherwise Lionel lord Huntingtowre, as knight of the shire, to come to parliament. Whereas in truth, the said Lionel was not chosen by the greater part. By reason of which false return of the said other indenture, the plaintiff could not be admitted into the lower house at the return of the said writ, and a long time after.

Till the plaintiff, upon his petition to the Commons, and till after he had spent divers great sums of money about the proving of his election, and divers pains and labours in that behalf sustained, afterwards, scil. 20. Feb. 26 Car. 2, he was admitted, and his election was declared to be good.

Plea. Not Guilty.

Judgment. Pro quer' sir Samuel Barnardiston, in the King's-Bench, for the 800*l.* damages, and for the 98*l.* costs.

The defendant, sir William Soame, sued a Writ of Error before the justices of the Common-Bench, and the barons of the Exchequer, in the Exchequer-Chamber, to reverse the said judgment given by the judges of the King's-Bench.

And two of the justices of the Common-Bench, viz. sir Robert Atkins, and sir William Ellis, upon argument, were of opinion, That the said judgment was good in law, and were for affirming that judgment.

But the other two judges of the Common-Bench, and the four barons of the Exchequer, holding the said judgment in the King's-Bench erroneous, were for reversing the said judgment.

And the said Judgment still stands reversed; but needs a redress by error in parliament.

Sir SAMUEL BARNARDISTON, Bart. Plaintiff,
Sir WILLIAM SOAME, Defendant, in an Action upon the Case.

I shall divide the Record into the several parts of it:

1. There is first, the occasion, or as we commonly call it, the inducement to the action; that is, sir Henry North, who served in parliament as knight of the shire for Suffolk, died; and a new writ issued to chuse another in his place.

2. In the next place, the right that accrued to the plaintiff, sir Samuel Barnardiston, he was duly elected knight of the shire.

3. The injury done him by the defendant, with the aggravations of it, viz. Although the defendant well knew the plaintiff was duly elected, and though he did return him; yet contrary to the duty of his office as sheriff, and intending to oppress him, and to deprive him of the right he had, and on purpose to put him to great expence and charges,

He did falsely, maliciously, and deceitfully return another indenture with the former; importing, that another person was chosen by the greater part of the county.

4. The damage sustained by the plaintiff, after the writ was returned.

1. He could not for a long time he admitted to sit to do his duty, and discharge his trust.

2. He was put to great charges to prove his election.

3. He did sustain great pains and labour.

5. The right done him at last, and the satisfaction and amends made him.

1. By the House of Commons. His election was declared good, and he was admitted to sit.

2. By the Jury. They have found the wrong done by the defendant, and the damage sustained by the plaintiff; and they have repaired him with 800*l.* damages.

3. By the court of King's-Bench. They have given judgment for the plaintiff.

And the question before us, is, whether this Judgment be erroneous? I hold the judgment not to be erroneous. I am for affirming of the judgment.

1. I conceive the matter set forth in the plaintiff's declaration, to be actionable. 2. That the wrong and injury complained of, is such for which the law gives him a remedy. And 3. That he has taken his proper remedy, by bringing this action upon the case.

All this being in the affirmative, the proof of it lies upon me.

My ground and foundation is this, That where one person does injury to another, and the person to whom the wrong is done sustains particular damage and loss by the injury, there the law gives a remedy, by action, to the party injured.

But here is an injury done.

And here is a particular damage sustained. Therefore an action lies.

I shall first prove the ground or foundation, which is the major proposition, That where a wrong or injury is done, and a particular damage sustained, there the law gives a remedy by action.

1. From the nature and quality of the law; which is to do right to all, and to give relief and redress to those that receive wrongs. And should there be any case where a person might receive an injury and damage, and yet have no remedy nor redress, the law would be defective; which would be a reproach to the law and government.

The law has appointed several courts, and given them several powers and jurisdictions; so that in the one or the other, every person that has suffered injury and damage may make his complaint, and have right done him.

Sir Edw. Coke, in his Mag. Chart. fol. 405, in his Expos. upon the Stat. of W. 2, c. 14, says, It is an ancient maxim of the common law, 'Non recedant quærentes a curia regis sine remedio.' Whoever has just cause to complain, shall have their just remedy. And 'curia regis non debet deficere in justitia exhibenda.'

Both these rules and maxims, which have one and the same sense, are remembered in that Stat. of Mag. Chart. c. 24.

In Pinchon's case, 9 Rep. fol. 88, b. adjud. That an action upon the case lies against executors for a debt, due by the testator upon a simple contract. And in the argument of that case it is said, That by that resolution, justice and right is advanced, and the creditor paid his just debt; and if the debt should be discharged by the death of the debtor, it would (say the judges) be a great defect in the law, that there should be a right, and no remedy for it; and the judges urge the maxim I mentioned but now, 'curia Domini Regis deficere non debet conquerentibus in justitia exhibenda.'

In Meriel Tresham's case, 9 Rep. fol. 3, it is urged as an absurd thing in law, that a man should have wrong done him, and yet should be without remedy: and the reporter does observe, that the judges in all ages have endeavoured to put the rule of W. 2, in execution, 'Curia domini regis non debet deficere conquerentibus in justitia exhibenda.'

Nay, the law has so great a zeal for redressing of wrongs, that as sacred as the maxims and rules of the law are, yet if there were any rules or maxims that stood in our way to hinder, the law would break through those rules and maxims, rather than suffer an injury to be without remedy. 4 Inst. fol. 71, about the middle, 'No wrong or injury, either public or private, can be done, but it shall be reformed or punished in one court or other, by due course of law.' And in the lower end of that folio, 'A failure of justice is abhorred in law.'

Sir Fran. Bacon, amongst the elements of the law, fol. 51, delivers this as a principle, 'Receditur a placitis juris potius quam injuria et delicta remaneant impunita;' which he himself expounds in this sense, the law will dispense with some maxims, rather than wrongs should be unpunished.

2. My next argument to prove this position, 'That where an injury is done, and damage sustained, the law gives remedy,' shall be taken from the nature of an action, which is the ordinary remedy the law gives for the repairing of a private wrong.

Now what the nature and definition of an action is, we learn from the most ancient authors of the law, as Bracton and Fleta, and the Mirror of the Justices, as they are collected by sir E. C. 2 Inst. fol. 40, and they all agree almost in the same words: 'Actio nihil aliud est quam jus prosequendi in judicio, quod alicui debetur, et quod nascitur ex maleficio, vel quod provenit ex delicto vel injuria.' It is nothing else but a means or remedy for a man to have right done him, that has suffered wrong and injury.

It is the argument commonly used, and the reason given to maintain an action, and in particular an action upon the case, viz. That there is an injury done, and a damage sustained.

Sir E. C. 12 Rep. fol. 128, res. p. tot. cur. If a Sumner return one summoned, or cited into the Spiritual Court, where in truth he was never summoned, and he is pronounced contumar, and thereupon excommunicate; he shall have an action upon the case against the Sumner: and the reason given is, because there is injuria et damnum. It is the same case that is reported in Rolls 1 Rep. fol. 69, by the name of Powle and Godfrey: which I shall have further occasion to mention before I have done: you have the same case reported by sir Francis Moor, fol. 835.

This may suffice to prove the major proposition, 'That where wrong and injury is done to any man, and particular damage sustained by it, there the law entitles him to an action.'

For the minor proposition, 'That in the case before us, there is a wrong and injury done to the plaintiff, and a particular damage sustained by him: to make this out, I shall need to do no more than barely to relate the very fact; and put it as a question to any plain man, that has but a common capacity, and no learning, nor acquired parts; and to stand to his judgment in the case.

And the case is no more than this: The plaintiff had the honour to be chosen to that great trust and employment, of a knight of the shire, by his countrymen, to serve in parliament; by which he was justly entitled to several great privileges, and to wages for the time he served. And it is an honour and employment we all know is highly esteemed, and generally desired and sought after; and he that desires it, desires a good office. The defendant having the office of a sheriff, and being bound by his office and oath to do justly and truly, 'Et præmissa satis sciens;' that is, well knowing the plaintiff had the only right to be returned, and that no other had the least colour for it, and where there was not the least doubt or difficulty in the case:

Yet falsely, deceitfully, and maliciously to deprive him of his trust and office, on purpose to put him to great charges. he returned another person with him.

And after all, the question is, Whether he has done him any wrong or no? By occasion of this, the plaintiff was hindered from sitting in the house, and was put to great expence, and underwent great trouble and labour. And the question is, Whether the plaintiff has been at any particular damage?

Shall I have my action for a halfpenny trespass pedibus ambulando? Does the law give me an action of assault and battery, if a man does but lift up his hand to strike me? Or for a few ill words, that will break no bones? And shall I recover damage for these petty things, and shall no action lie for so notorious an injury as is done in this case?

But our greatest work is to answer the many Objections that have been made against this action; which yet, I will be bold to say, have much more of wit than of weight in them.

And the difficulty rather lies in the great power and interest of the parties to the action, and of those that concern themselves in the example and consequence of it, upon a politic account, than from any uncertainty of the law: that is, there is a design to model the parliament to the humour of the court.

Sir Ed. Coke, in his preface to Rep. fol. 6, in the beginning of the folio, affirms, That he never saw any case of great value proceed quietly, without many exceptions in arrest of judgment.

Object. 1. This is a matter that concerns the government, and is of a public nature; the employment of a parliament-man, consisting 'in negotiis regem, statum, et defensionem regni et ecclesiarum concernentibus;' and therefore the punishment of an offence committed, in reference to this, should be by a public prosecution, and not to be appropriated to any particular private person; nor the amends and satisfaction made to any one man.

Ans. It must be agreed, That public injuries wherein all, or very many are concerned are proper for a public prosecution; as in the name of the king, or by a presentment at a leet, or quarter-sessions, &c. But if any particular man receive a particular damage by the public offence or injury, he shall have his action; and this is consistent enough with the prosecution for the public. As the case of 27 H. 8, fol. 26, 27, Br. Abr. Act. Sr. Ca. Plac. 6. If a man make a ditch upon the king's highway, this is a wrong to every man that has a right to pass that way; and he is presentable at a leet for this offence; but if I and my horse happen to fall into the ditch, riding along the way, and so receive a particular damage, I may have an action upon the case against him that made the ditch, 9 Rep. 113, 5 Rep. 72, 73. It is the ordinary case, A. makes an assault and battery upon B. this is but one single act, but it has a double aspect; it is a breach of the king's peace, and for that A. is indictable, and may be fined to the king, and imprisoned. It is a particular wrong to B. for which B. may have an action of assault and battery, and recover damages; and both of them consistent.

So in our case, this false and malicious double return, it was an injury to the king and kingdom, and to the House of Commons, in that while the election by this means was under dispute, they wanted the plaintiff's service and assistance. It was a wrong to the county of Suffolk, for the knight of a shire has 'plenam potestatem pro se et communitate comitatus ad faciendum et consentiendum;' but it was more particularly an injury to the plaintiff, in that he was for some time deprived of the honour done him by his country; who by their electing of him, settled that character upon him, that he was 'magis idoneus et discretus;' for the writ commands such to be chosen.

He was hindered from discharging his trust, committed to him by his own country; hindered from doing service to the king and kingdom; hindered of his wages.

The stat. of 27 H. 8, c. 26, which unites England to Wales, enacts, That for every shire in Wales there shall be chosen one knight to serve in parliament, and one burgess for every borough; and that the knights and burgesses shall have like dignity, pre-eminence, and privilege, and shall be allowed such fees as other knights and burgesses of the parliament have, and are allowed: by which it appears there are dignities, pre-eminences, privileges and fees, belonging to such as serve in parliament; of all which the plaintiff, for a time, was hindered by this false return.

And that it does concern the government it argues the greater injury done to the plaintiff; for every member of parliament, for the time he serves there, is instrumental in carrying on the government, which is an high honour to him. 'Tu regere imperio populos, hæ tibi erunt artes.' It is a noble employment.

And since it does so nearly concern the government, we that are judges should be the more careful to discourage all abuses committed by sheriffs in elections: it is of vast concernment to the kingdom that elections should be fair, and returns duly made, without partiality and indirect means used. And we, by judgments, should encourage all remedies against such abuses and practices.

Besides all this the plaintiff has been put to great expences, and undergone great labour and trouble; which is a private and particular damage, and therefore entitles him to his particular action.

A Justice of peace may have an action of slander in relation to his office, yet that was not an offence at Common Law neither; and yet it concerns the government.

The Stat. of 7 H. 4, cap. 1, recites, That the Commons made a grievous complaint to the king, of the undue elections of the knights of the counties, 'which' (says the preamble) 'be sometimes made by affection of the she'riffs, to the great slander of the counties, and 'hindrance of the business of the commonalty 'of the said counties.'

By which it appears, how great the mischief was in those days, and whence it came principally, viz. from the partiality of the Sheriffs: And that stat. to prevent the abuses, does appoint the return of indentures under the seal of the sheriff, and the seals of the electors: But the defendant in our case has practised an abuse even in the very remedy, by returning several indentures, and so evading the good provision made by that statute.

The stat. of 11 H. 4, c. 1, observes, That no pain is set in special by that stat. of 7 H. 4, upon sheriffs, if they make returns contrary to that statute, and give power to judges of assize to punish them, and to inflict the penalty of 100*l*. upon the sheriff; and the knights unduly returned are to lose their wages: And all this depends upon the enquiry made by the judges of assize. At this time surely this matter of elections, and the examining and determining of the right, was not held so sacred and so incommunicable a thing as some would have it now; for by this statute it is referred to the judges of the assize.

But the principal statute in this matter, is that of 23 H. 6, c. 15, which sets out the great abuses by sheriffs committed in elections; it recites, That of late divers sheriffs, for their singular avail and lucre, have not made due elections of the knights. One would think by those words (for their lucre), that there was money stirring upon these occasions, even in those times; and that some men paid dear to be chosen parliament-men: Or else, how could a sheriff make profit to himself by an election? And to be a parliament-man, it seems, was a very desirable thing in those days.

'And forasmuch' (says that statute) 'as a 'sufficient pain, and convenient remedy' for the party in such case grieved, is not ordained in the said statutes against the sheriffs: It therefore provides a better remedy.

But let us to our purpose observe by the way, that it mentions 'the party grieved:' so that there is a party grieved: It is not merely a public offence, but an injury to some particular persons, and to some one person: so it says the party grieved, but it does not mention who that party grieved is. So that it may be objected, that those words (the party grieved) refer to every elector, as well as the knight elected.

But the enacting clause expounds the words, and declares whom the makers of that law meant; for it makes the first offer of the forfeiture to every person chosen knight, and not duly returned: So then it is plain, that the knight elected, and not returned, is the party grieved. If he have a particular wrong done him, then it follows he ought to have a particular remedy and satisfaction: And he was a party grieved before these statutes made, and this penalty and remedy given; for these statutes do not first make him a party grieved, but mention him as being so before. If he were so before, surely the law gave him some remedy, or else there was a gravamen without remedium; which would have been a defect in the same.

Object. 2. Is that which I think is most relied upon, and that has most weight laid upon it, viz. That this action concerns an election of a knight to the parliament, and therefore belongs to the jurisdiction of the parliament, and ought to be determined there, and not by any court inferior to it.

Answer. To this it has been truly answered, That though in this case we have often occasion to speak of the parliament, and to mention an election to parliament, yet the right of election is not called in question, nor was it to be tried in this action, but was determined by the House of Commons; and this action is pursuant to that decision of the right of election by the parliament, and grounds itself upon it.

I shall, however, take this occasion, in the first place, to shew in what matters that concern the parliament, the judges of Westminster-hall have in all times, and must meddle, and take cognizance of them. And in the next place, what they have declined and left to the parliament.

1. They have debated and resolved, "What is a good session of parliament, and what is not, and what makes a session," as in Tr. 12. Jac. in B. R. Rolls, Rep. 20. There were several acts of parliament that had passed at a former parliament, which were continued only to the first session of the next parliament; and in that case they held those acts then still in force: for though the parliament had met, yet no act passing, they therefore adjudged it was no session, and there was a necessity that the judges should determine this. For though the king and parliament make acts, yet the courts in Westminster-hall put those acts in execution, and therefore must first satisfy themselves.

2. Whether they are in force or not so, in the prince's case, 8 Rep. whether the charter made by king Ed. 3, to the prince, were an act of parliament or not, is here argued and resolved. So 4 Hen. 7. 18. 6 and 7 Hen. 7. 14, 15.

3. In Rolls Ab. 1st part. fol. 93. c. 10, under the title of Action upon the Case, there is cited 17 E. 3. in B. R. Rot. 69, where an action is brought by John Bokeland, knight of Wiltshire, against the sheriff of that county, for not levying 10*l*. 4*s*. 'pro expensis suis in attendencia sua in parlamento.' Now, in order to the recovery of this action, many things relating to the parliament, as, When the parliament began? How long his attendance was? and divers other questions relating to the parliament, must of necessity be incident.

10 Eliz. Dy. fol. 275. The very lower end of that folio, there is an action brought against the keeper, for letting a burress of parliament go at large by writ de privilegio parliamenti, who was in execution: The lord Dyer says nothing there, what became of it; but sir

Francis Moor, in his Rap. fol. 57, at the lower end of that fol. reports, that it was held by Dyer, that if one condemned in debt or trespass be chosen to the parliament, and after in execution, that he shall not have his privilege of parliament. And, as he says, it was so held by the sages of the law, in the case of Ferrers; and that though his privilege was indeed allowed, yet, (as they held) it was minus jure; which case of Ferrers was the same here mentioned before to be in Dy. fol. 275, as appears by Mr. Crompton in his Jurisdiction of Courts, fol. 8. b.

So that some things relating to the parliament, the courts of Westminster-hall must determine; and the judges cannot avoid it, if they will do justice.

2. But some things are concerning the parliament, which the courts of Westminster-hall may determine if they think fit; or they may at the discretion of the judges suspend their further proceeding, and refer them till the parliament meets to determine them.

39 H. 6. fol. 17, 18. It is there debated by the judges, whether it were a perfect and legal act that passed in parliament against sir John Pilkington, for a rape committed by him; and it depended upon the course of the two Houses, in their transmitting of bills from one to another, and of indorsing the bills: and they sent for the clerk of the parliament and consulted with him about it; and there, Fortescue, Chief-Justice, held the act in question to be a good act of parliament; but, says he, peradventure the matter, or question, shall wait till the next parliament meet, and then we may be certified by them of the certainty of the matter. By this it appears that the judges did not disown the jurisdiction of that cause, that was so nearly lying upon the usage of parliament, but that it belonged to them, and not to the parliament; yet it was convenient to be advised by the parliament, and to wait till then.

And sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inst. 408, tells us, that matters of difficulty were usually adjourned to parliament.

3. Some things there are that concern the parliament, wherein the courts of Westminster-hall must not intermeddle, but the jurisdiction belongs to the parliament only.

By the statute of 4 H. 8. c. 8, though all in that act that concerns one Richard Strode is a private act, yet there is one clause which is a general act, and is declaratory of the ancient law and custom of parliament, viz. It is enacted, 'That all suits, accusations, condemnations, executions, fines, amerciaments, punishments, corrections, charges, and impositions, at any time from thenceforth, to be put or had upon any member, for any bill, speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter concerning the parliament, to be communed or treated of, be utterly void and of none effect.' This concerns none but members of parliament, and it provides for freedom of debates in matters that are proper to be treated of in parliament.

The Lords, for themselves only, and for their own house, made claim of this privilege and jurisdiction, 11 R. 2. numb. 7. Sir Robert Cotton's Abr. fol. 341, but it is limited only to matters moved in parliament, and the king allowed it in full parliament.

And sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inst. fol. 15, says, That pari ratione, the like belongs to the House of Commons: * And this is the reason, says sir E. C. that judges ought not to give any opinion of a matter of parliament, because it is not to be decided by the common laws used in other courts, but 'secundum legem et consuetudinem parliamenti.'

So likewise in case of the privilege of a member of parliament, against suits and executions, sitting the parliament, the judges have refused to give their opinion, though demanded by the Lords; as they did in the case of Thorp, Speaker of the House of Commons, who was taken in execution between two sessions of parliament, of which the Commons made complaint to the Lords, and the Lords asked the advice of the judges whether the Speaker ought to be delivered by privilege of parliament? The judges answered, 'That they ought not to determine the privilege of the high court of parliament:' the case is 31 H. 6. fol.—Rolls Ab. 2d part. 94. c. 1. See 39 H. 6. Sir Robert Cotton's Abridg. num. 6.

Concerning departure from parliament, (sitting the parliament) and not attending according to their duty; the case seems doubtful, whether any other court than the parliament can determine of that offence, it seeming to be of a middle nature. For though it be an offence committed by a member, and that in parliament time, which argues for their privilege, and against the jurisdiction of any inferior court, especially while the parliament sits, who undoubtedly may take cognizance of it, and punish it: yet on the other side, when the parliament has not taken cognizance of it, and the parliament is risen, why should not that offence, at the king's suit, be punished in the Star chamber, while that was a court, and now in the King's-bench? and why should privilege protect against non-attendance, when the true ground of privilege is by reason of attendance. And Mr. Plowden, who was a very learned lawyer, submits to the jurisdiction, but traverses his departure; as the case of the bishop of Winchester, 3 Ed. 3, remembered by sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inst. in his Chapter of Parliament, (as far as he reports it) seems rather to be an authority against the jurisdiction of any other court besides the parliament itself, in such case of proceeding against a member to punish him for non-attendance: for the bishop being impleaded by original writ at the king's suit, (which I suppose was in the King's-bench) 'quia recessit à parlamento sine licentia regis.'

* Sir John Elliot, and Denzel Holles, pleaded the like plea to the jurisdiction of the King's-bench. See the Case in vol. 3, p. 293, of this Collection.

The bishop pleaded 'Quod ipse est unus de paribus, et dicit, quod si quis eorum deliquerit in dominum regem in aliquo parlamento, in parlamento debet corrigi et emendari, et non alibi in minori curia.' And so sir Ed. Coke seems to leave the victory on the bishop's side, and that his plea succeeded. But sir Francis Moor, 779, 780, reports the case of the lord Sturton, and the lord Mordant, how they were deeply fined in the Star chamber, 4 Jac. for absenting from parliament, at the complaint of the Attorney General, ore tenus. And there were then present in the Star chamber, the lord chancellor, chief justice Popham, Fleming, and Walmisly. And for precedents to justify the proceeding against them in that court, they cite the case of the earl of Cornwall, 4 H. 3, and the bishop of Winchester's case, (which I mentioned but now) 3 E. 3, how that for departing from parliament, without licence, their lands were seized.

But the objection in our case is, 'concerning a matter of election of a knight of a shire' to serve in parliament: that no other court but the parliament must meddle in it, as the objectors would have it.

Ans. It is not impertinent, therefore, to enquire briefly of the true jurisdiction in this matter.

Sir Robert Cotton affirms, that writs of summons for knights of the shire to serve in parliament, began 49 H. 3, and that the admittance of commoners into the parliament, was purposely to lessen and curb the power of the lords, after the daring earl of Leicester was slain in the battle of Evesham (which was that very year), and the barons were totally routed by prince Edward, (afterwards king Ed. 1.) and king H. 3 was rescued out of their hands. And to back that opinion, it is observed, that the first writ to the sheriffs, to summon two knights out of every shire, that is to be found upon record, is that of the close roll 49 H. 3, (the very same year) dorso 10 and 11. Thus Mr. Prynne affirms, in his preface to the Abridgment of the Records of the Tower, fol. 11, in the beginning of that fol. and fol. 13, b, in the middle of that fol.

But we must not be governed by historians in matters of law; and therefore, notwithstanding this observation of sir Robert Cotton's and Mr. Prynne's, we must presume that the House of Commons, and elections of knights of the shire, are as ancient as the common law, and have been time immemorial; because we find no written law that does first begin any such institution.

But to come closer to the Objection, and to enquire who are the proper judges of the right of elections?

Mr. Prynne, in the same Preface, fol. 14, b, in the middle of it, (as I myself have folio'd it, for the print has no folios to the Preface) "The King and Lords" (says he) "were anciently sole judges of the legality of elections of members of the House of Commons, till the time of king Henry 7."

And in sir Robert Cotton's Abridgment, fol. 392, the year 1 H. 4, num. 80, at the prayer of the Commons, the king declares, that the Commons were only petitioners, and that all judgments appertain to the King and Lords, unless it were in statutes, grants, subsidies, or such like; the which order the king would from that time to be observed.

But we know that the House of Commons is now possessed of the jurisdiction of determining all questions concerning the election of their own members; so far at least, as is in order to their being admitted or excluded from sitting there. But how far their judgment is concluding to all others to other purposes, I have now no just occasion to examine; for, as has been observed, the plaintiff in this case grounds his action upon his original right of election, and mentions the determination of the House on his side; and not only alledges that he was duly elected, but so returned by the defendant himself: and that though he were for some time hindered from sitting, by occasion of the false return, made by the defendant on purpose, and the election was under question by it, yet he proved it clearly to the House, and was admitted, and his election declared good; and taking it for granted that he was duly elected, he sues in the King's-bench, by this action to recover damages for the injury done him by the defendant, for which the House of Commons could not have helped him. For to that purpose they have no jurisdiction, for they cannot examine a witness upon oath, nor can they act the part of a jury to give damages, nor have they any power to award a trial, or to cause the sheriff to impanel a jury.

Obj. 3. This is an action of a new invention, and prime impressionis, and never any such was brought before, save that of Nevil against Stroud; which never had any determination.

Ans. It is true, it is new, in the particular circumstances, but not in the main, nor in the substance; 'tis new, in that 'tis brought by one elected knight of the shire against the sheriff, for a false and malicious return of another indenture, whereby the plaintiff was put to great expence and trouble; but 'tis not new in the general nature of the action. For nothing is more frequent than actions upon the case, where an injury is done and damage sustained; nay it is very frequent for actions upon the case to be brought against the sheriffs, for mere false returns, and that where there is no malice, nor any of those great aggravations that appear in this case.

For this I refer you to the case in Roll's Abr. 1. part. fol. 99. Getin, Paluer and Marshal, in the king's bench, where the bailiff of a franchise was newly removed; but though he were removed, took upon him to answer, but made a false answer to the sheriff's warrant, to execute Fieri fac' against an administrator, and the sheriff made that return to the court; and thereupon an action upon the case brought against the sheriff, and adjudged it lies: And that the sheriff at his peril must take notice who is the rightful bailiff of the franchise, and accept of no answer to his warrant from any other.

19 H. 6. 29. An action upon the case against a deputy sheriff, for embezzling a Writ.

19 H. 6. 38. by Paston. If a sheriff upon a Venire fac' return a jury that is insufficient to pay issues, the next sheriff to whom the issues are estreated to be levied, must charge himself with the issues, and must not return a Nihil, but shall have an action upon the case against his predecessor, for his false return; yet here is no malice, but at the most a neglect, or a mistake only.

39 E. 3. 7. Brook. action upon the case, 67.

An action upon the case against a sheriff for not summoning and warning a man in due time, upon a writ of Præmunire or attachment, whereby he sustained damage, as judgment given against him, or the like. This is but a bare neglect or omission, and seems to be the least or lowest sort of injuries; and yet being accompanied with a particular damage to the party, though without any malice on the sheriff's part, the action will lie.

3 E. 4. 20. Brook. action upon the case, pl. 91. by Danby and Pigot, for a false return only.

If a Nihil be returned against me who have land, F. N. B. 93. 31 E. 3. Fitz. Abr. Proces 55.

So for not returning a writ of second deliverance, which is a mere neglect and non-feasance, though there be no malice, 21 E. 3. 45. Br. Act. s. ca. pl. 48. 5 Rep. 32. b. 91. 7 Rep. 1.

So against a bishop, if he falsely return, that an executor has not refused the executorship, when re vera he has refused it, 2 Leon. 221.

So against an escheator, 9 H. 6. 60. 21 E. 4. 23. 27.

Much more shall the action upon the case lie against the sheriff, as the circumstances of this case are, where the return is not only false but he knew it to be false, and he did maliciously, with a purpose to hinder the plaintiff from sitting, and to put him to expence, and where the plaintiff has had so great a damage. And the sheriff by his oath is obliged to do right as well to poor as to rich, in all that belongeth to his office. 2. To do no wrong to any man for favour nor hate. 3. To disturb no man's right. 4. Truly to return, and truly to serve all the king's writs, as far forth as shall be within his cunning. And the jury, by their verdict in this case, have found the defendant to fail in every one of the clauses of his oath. And though the circumstances that do diversify all cases are new in this case; yet it is very frequent in actions upon the case, to have new cases and new circumstances; and that there is nothing more frequent than this variety and novelty.

Sir Francis Bacon, in his book of Advancement of Learning, speaking of cases omitted in law, fol. 38. says, 'That the narrow compass of man's wisdom cannot comprehend all cases which time hath found out;' and therefore cases omitted and new, do often present themselves, but, every new case does not require a new law; for then the legislative power must be continually exercised: But though it differs from former cases in circumstances, yet it may fall under a general rule, or be proceeded upon by parity of reason; 'ubi est eadem ratio, ibi idem est jus.'

And the statute of W. 21. cap. 24. has made ample provision for all such new cases that fall under a general rule, but have no formed writ, or writ of course, that fits it in all the particulars and circumstances. 'In consimili casu, simili remedio indigenete, fiat breve,' says that statute.

In the 8th Rep. fol. 43. Jehu Webb's case, there you have the distinction of writs; some are 'brevia formata seu de cursu,' and from thence the cursitors have their name, because they have the drawing of those writs.

Some are 'brevia Magistralia, quæ nec sunt de cursu nec formata, i. e. de aliqua certa forma, sed sæpius variant secundem varietatem casuum, factorum & querularum;' as are actions upon the case, &c. which have not any certain form, but are upon occasion drawn by the masters of the chancery, and from thence are called Magistralia; all this is by virtue of the words of the statute of W. 2. c. 24. 'concordant clerici in Cancellaria de brevi faciendo.' 2 Inst. 405, 406, 407.

And many new Cases may be put, that have no parallel cases to be found in our books, if all the particulars and circumstances be regarded, as the Case, 3 Car. Croke 291. in the king's bench, where an action upon the case is brought against an Apparitor, for what he did in his office, viz. for falsely and maliciously presenting one, and that in the spiritual court, for incontinency. This was against an officer for what he did in his office, and to which his oath obliged him; and this was for a thing done in the spiritual court, viz. the consistory court at Exeter, and for a matter merely of ecclesiastical cognisance, viz. incontinency, wherein the common law had nothing to do; and this case had no parallel nor precedent before it: and yet being an injury and damage to the party presented, and done falsely and maliciously, and without colour, and for which the party injured could have no recompence in any other court but at common law, it was adjudged the action lay. This case, though it had not parallel before it in all the circumstances, yet in many respects it is a parallel to the case before us. There is the like action against constables for making a false presentment, Croke Car. 467. and the case I cited before against a sumner 12 Rep. 128.

And for that objection and observation concerning the novelty of this action, this more may be said in answer to it; That till of late years sheriffs have given no occasion for the like actions of this; for double returns upon elections to parliament, have not been in ancient times.

Mr. Prynne, in his "Brevia Parliamentaria Rediviva," fol. 137. observes, that there were not above two or three cases of elections questioned from 49 H. 3. till 24 E. 4. for aught appears by the returns, or Parliament-Rolls, and not so much as one double return or indenture.

And the common law does comply with, and conform to the general opinion and genius of the kingdom, and values what they generally esteem and value, and disesteems what they value not.

Heretofore an election to serve in parliament was not a thing so desirable, and so much sought after as now-a-days it is; and it is not the desire or seeking after it that is to be disliked or condemned, for he that desireth the office of a bishop (says the Apostle) desires a good office; but it is the undue means used, or the ill ends for which it is desired, that makes the seeking bad.

Mr. Prynne, ut supra, fol. 165. anno 1. E. 3. a writ issued to elect two knights for the county of Northumberland, and the Sheriff returned this answer, 'Communitas comit. Northumbriae sic respondet, quod ipsi per inimicos Scotiae adeo sunt destructi, quod non habent unde solvere expensa duobus militibus proficiscendis ad consilium apud Lincoln. tendendum.'

In his fourth Part of his Register of Parliamentary Writs, is mentioned a Patent of Exemption granted 12 E. 1. to the town of Torrington in Devonshire; which Patent recites in its preamble, 'That the men of that town never used to send Burgesses to parliament till the Sheriff, 21 E. 1. summonites fuisse malitiose retornavit.'

So that a malicious return to parliament is no new thing, but has been formerly done; and as the plaintiff in this action has well sued the Sheriff for returning another with him, so I make no doubt but as the case then stood with the general humour and opinion of the people, those of Torrington might have had their remedy against the then Sheriff for returning them summoned.

And the law is still the same, in that it still sets a price and esteem upon that which the people generally esteem and value.

And several cases have been put to prove, that new Statutes have given occasion to new actions upon the case, which actions could not have been sued at the Common Law; and yet those new laws and Statutes do not give those new actions, but only occasioned them.

Barnes v. Carey 12 Jac. King's-bench, Roll's Rep. fol. 47.

The plaintiff there brought an action upon the case against the Sheriff of Bristol, for suffering J. S. to escape out of his custody, J. S. being committed by the commissioners of bankrupts, for refusing to answer interrogatories, the plaintiff being one of the creditors, and J. S. a bankrupt; and after many exceptions taken to the declaration, the court gave judgment for the plaintiff. And yet there was no such thing as a commission of bankrupt at the common law; but the common law takes occasion by the statutes of bankrupt, to give such an action upon the case, which before those statutes could not have been sued.

In like manner the common law takes occasion by those statutes that give the action of waste against tenant for life, or years, against whom it lay not by common law, to give an action upon the case against such tenants, if they will not permit their lessors to enter upon the thing demised, to view whether waste be done or not. Croke 2 part, 478.

Object. 4. That there is not one case in law parallel to this case, for a Sheriff to be sued for returning the whole truth, and something more than the truth: though actions for false returns are frequent.

Ans. This is an action for a false return, and something more. That it is for a false return, appears by that allegation, that he did falsely make his return, and the jury have found it so, and we must believe it. And it was false in this, in that he returned an indenture pretended to be under the hands and seals of divers persons, as the greater part of the said county, purporting the choice of another than the plaintiff to be knight of the shire. The plaintiff does not alledge, that there ever was any such indenture sealed by any person; but that the defendant did falsely return another indenture, purporting the same to be made by divers persons, &c. So that we may reasonably understand it, that in truth there never was any such indenture sealed by any but the Sheriff himself, and not by any others that were present at the election. 2dly, Though the Sheriff have returned the whole truth, yet together with that truth he returned a falsehood; and till it was re-examined, it could not appear which was the truth; and in the mean time the plaintiff sustained all his damage.

Object. 5. That the Sheriff acted herein as a judge, and therefore if he err, he is not to be sued for it, but his error may be reformed; and the law will not suffer an averment tending to the discredit of a judge. Pl. comment. 491. b. and Dy. 89. b.

Ans. All this is true, as to one that is a judge of record, in respect of the greatness of his authority, and the great trust the king and the law repose in a judge of record; but the Sheriff is no judge at all in what he acts in the election of knights for the shire, but is only an officer upon record, 9 H. 6. 53. and 60 Br. Ab. Tit. Act. s. ca. plac. 6. though in some particular cases indeed, the Sheriff is a judge, as in a justices, 6 Rep. 12. ad. fin. and a judge of record, as in a re-disseisin, by the statute of Merton, c. 13.

Object. 6. The Statute of 23 H. 6. c. 15. has provided a remedy against the Sheriff for any abuse committed by him in elections, viz. the penalty of an hundred pound, in case of knights of the shire, to the knight injured; and it does recite in the preamble, that a convenient remedy for the party grieved is not ordained in the former statutes; and from hence it is inferred, that there was no remedy for the party grieved at the common law, nor before this statute.

Ans. I have already proved, that there was a remedy at the common law, and before this statute; and this statute is an argument to prove it, for this statute mentions a party grieved, and there could be no grief without a remedy, otherwise the law would have been defective. And it cannot be denied, but that if there were a remedy at the common law, this statute being in the affirmative does not take it away, only it gives another remedy.

And for the words of this statute of 23 H. 6. that 'a convenient remedy' for the party grieved is not ordained by the former statutes; this does not argue that there was no remedy at the common law, nor does it argue that there was no remedy at all; but that there was no 'convenient' remedy by those former statutes, and thereupon the statute of 23 H. 6. gives an hundred pound to the knight injured by an undue return.

I shall put some like cases where acts of parliament give remedies, where yet there were other remedies before at common law, and the party may sue for either; Rolls Ab. 1. part. fol. 93. case 20.

A Distringas is awarded to the Sheriff to distrain the defendant in an action, and the Sheriff returns too small issues, though an averment lies by the statute of W. 2. c. 43. yet the plaintiff may well have his action upon the case against the Sheriff, because it appears by the words of the statute, that it is a false return. Observe the argument there used, viz.

If the action upon the case did not lie, in such case the plaintiff had not any remedy at the common law, which was greatly mischievous; and the statute (as is there observed) though it gives a new remedy, and takes no notice of any remedy that was before in the case, yet it does not restrain the plaintiff from any remedy that he had at the common law. It is there indeed made a Quære; but serjeant Rolls has this note upon it, That Tr. 3 Car. one Mrs. Bennet, upon good advice, brought such an action upon the case against the Sheriff of London, for returning too small issues against the mayor and commonalty of London.

The statute of W. 2. c. 24. (sir E. C. 2 Inst. fol. 404, 405.) first gives an assize of nuisance against the alienor of him that levied that nuisance; and that statute seems (as sir E. C. observes) to understand that the party grieved was without any remedy before; for it provides in these words, 'de cetero non recedant quærentes a curia Regis sine remedio'; yet sir E. C. takes notice, fol. 405. of his 2. Inst. at the lower end of that folio, upon the word 'a curia': 'That the maker of that Act knew well that the party injured by the nuisance might enter upon the ground of the wrong-doer, not only when it was in his hands, but after it was aliened too, and abate the nuisance, and so prevent himself of the remedy by assize of nuisance given by this Act.' And besides this, he had another remedy by action, viz. If he had any particular damage (says sir E. C.) he might bring his action upon the case, and recover damage, 'Ne quærentes recederent a curia sine remedio.'

Object. The ground of this action against the sheriff is for making a double return. Now the declaration sets forth only one perfect return, and that is of the plaintiff's election, which the declaration says, was 'secundum exigentiam brevis'; and it was by indenture, under the seal of the sheriff and electors: And though the plaintiff alledges, that the late sheriff and the electors returned another indenture of the election of another person, (which is the gravamen that he complains of) yet that appears to be no return; for it was not said, 'that that Indenture was under any seals.' And the statutes of 7 H. 4. c. 15. and 8 H. 6. c. 7. require Indentures ensealed by the electors to be tacked to the writ, which indentures so sealed and tacked, shall be holden for the sheriff's return.

Answer. This other Indenture last mentioned, must be understood an Indenture ensealed, in like manner as the former; for the declaration just before mentions the first Indenture, whereby the plaintiff was returned to be chosen, and that it is said to be so ensealed, as the statutes require; and then the declaration says, that the sheriff, together with that Indenture, returned another Indenture: so that it must be reasonably understood, to be an Indenture, in like manner ensealed.

And then it is said by the declaration of this last Indenture, that it was annexed to the writ; and so returned by the defendant the sheriff, which must therefore be presumed to be an Indenture ensealed, or else to what purpose did the defendant annex it to the writ, and return it.

And further the declaration says, that by reason of the false return, the plaintiff could not be admitted into the Lower House, till he had made proof of his election. Now, if that other Indenture were not ensealed, it could not be said to be a false return; for it would indeed have been no return, and it could not have hindered the plaintiff from being admitted, nor put him to the proof of his election.

And that the Indenture must be understood an Indenture ensealed, by those that were present at the election, appears by the Writ; the form whereof you will find in "Crompt. Jurisdiction of Courts," fol. 1. b. the clause is this; 'Et nomina eorundem militum, sic electorum, in quibusdam Indenturis, inter te et illos qui hujusmodi Electioni interfuerint inde conficiendis, inseri.' And in another clause, 'Et Electionem illam sub sigillo tuo et sigillis eorum qui Electioni illi interfuerint nobis in Cancellariam certifies, remitteas nobis alteram partem Indenturarum predictarum presentibus consutim una cum hoc breve.'

Lord Chief Justice NORRIS's Argument, in the Case between Sir William Soame, sheriff of Suffolk, and Sir Samuel Barnardiston, bart. adjudged in the Court of Exchequer-chamber, upon a Writ of Error, containing the reasons of that Judgment.

Sir Samuel Barnardiston, the plaintiff, brings an action upon the case in Banco Regis against the defendant, Sir William Soame, late sheriff of Suffolk, setting forth, that a Writ issued for the chusing of a knight for that county, to serve in the then parliament, instead of sir Henry North, deceased; that at the next county court the freeholders proceeded to an election, and although the plaintiff was duly chosen 'per majorem numerum gentium tunc resident. infra dict. There is a verdict given for the Plaintiff, and damages found to the value of 800*l*. and Judgment thereupon, and a Writ of Error is brought to reverse that Judgment.

I have but a little time left me to say what I have to offer, it being very late; and yet I must desire leave to produce those reasons I have in maintenance of my opinion: I will be careful not to detain you longer than will be necessary. And therefore, I will not trouble you with starting the case again, nor will I speak of any exceptions that have been made to the declaration, for I love not the niceties of the law, in cases where they do prevail: and in this case I have only considered the foundations of the action; which if I had found well established upon reason, or the grounds of the law, I would have examined what has been objected to the forms of the declaration, which must have brought great weight to have overturned those proceedings.

But as the point of the action, upon the most serious consideration I could have of it, and weighing what has been before now, and also at this time, said in support of it; I am of opinion, that the Judgment ought to be reversed; for that no such action as this, at bar, does lie by the common law.

Because this is a cause of considerable value, great damages being recovered; because it is a judgment of great authority, being upon a cause tried at the King's-Bench bar, and given upon deliberation there; because it is a case of an extraordinary nature, and of great import, each party pretending benefit to the parliament by it; because it is an action primæ impressionis, that never was before adjudged, the report of which will be listened after: I have taken pains to collect and set down the reasons that I must go upon in determining this case; that as the judgment had the countenance of some deliberation in the court where it was given; so the reversal being with greater deliberation, may appear grounded upon reasons that ought to prevail.

I can say with my brother Windham, that I love rather to affirm Judgments, than to reverse them; but I can attribute nothing of authority to the judgment, though it were given in a superior court, and upon deliberation; I must judge of it as if the case came to be judged originally by me: the argument to support a judgment from the authority of itself, is, 'Exceptio ejusdem rei cujus petitur Dissolutio,' which must not be admitted in cases of Writs of Error. We are entrusted to examine and correct the errors of that court, and for that purpose we are made superior to it; we must proceed according to our own knowledge and discretion, or else we do not perform the trust reposed in us.

I must needs say, this is a cause that imports it more than any cause I have known to come before us, for it is a cause primæ impressionis; and the question is, Whether by this judgment a change of the common law be introduced? It is the principal use of Writs of Error, and appeals, to hinder the change of the law; therefore do Writs of Error in our law, and appeals in the civil law, carry judgments and decrees to be examined by superior courts until they come to the highest, who are entrusted that they will not change the law.

Therefore do Writs of Error lie from Ireland, which is a subordinate kingdom, to England, by whose laws it is governed; that they might not be able to change the law by their judgments, and not so much for the particular right of the party.

For otherwise it would be very easy for judges, by construction and interpretation, to change even a written law; and it would be most easy for the judges of the common laws of England, which are not written, but depend upon usage, to make a change in them, especially if they may justify themselves by such a rule as my brother Atkins lays down to support this case, viz. that the common law complies with the genius of the nation. I admit that the laws are fitted to the genius of the nation; but when that genius changes, the parliament is only entrusted to judge of it, and by changing the law to make it suitable to it. But if the judges shall say it is common law, because it suits with the genius of the nation, they may take upon them to change the whole as well as any part of it, the consequence whereof may easily be seen; I wish we had not found it by sad experience.

If the case at the bar be a change of the law, it is happy that it comes to be questioned in the first instance; for if this cause had been any way agreed and quitted, and a second case of this nature had been questioned, there would have been a precedent urged, which cannot be spoke of here; for this case hath no fellow, there never having been the like judgment before.

The method I shall take in what I have to say, shall be, 1st, To remove some prejudice the case is under.

2dly, Give my reasons against the action.

3dly, Weigh what has been said to maintain the action.

1st, The case is under this prejudice, that an action of the case lies for false returns of sheriffs, and why should it not lie in this case as well as any other?—To remove this prejudice, I shall shew some material differences betwixt the nature of ordinary returns and this return. In ordinary returns the party is concluded, and absolutely without remedy; for the court must take the return as the sheriff makes it. In ordinary cases the sheriff may, and frequently does, take security of the plaintiff, or the sheriff hath means by law to be secure; as, if he doubts the property of the goods, he may return a Fieri Facias, 'Nullus venit ad mon-' 'strandum bona.' In some cases he may, for his safety, impanel a jury, as upon an Elegit; or he may resort to the court, and pray reasonable time to prepare his return, if the matter be difficult; and hath other shelters, that if he be wary, will save him from danger.

But in this case the party is not concluded, for upon a petition to the parliament, if they see it just, they will cause the return to be altered by the clerk of the crown; if the sheriff be not in the way; in this case, the sheriff may not take security, it were criminal in him to make such a return by compact, nor can the sheriff make a fruitless return or obtain delay to consult his safety.

These differences are of that nature, that they change the case in the reason of it, as I shall hereafter make appear: and no man can infer, because an action lies for false returns, in ordinary cases; therefore it lies in case of a return to parliament, where the sheriff is clearly upon terms.

My reasons against this action are applicable to this case, and make it different from all the cases, that have been put by my brothers that argued for the action: I observe they argued only upon generals, without any other application to this case than by the topic of concluding, a minori ad majus, because an action lies in cases of inferior nature, therefore it will lie in this; which rule holds not in diverse cases, where there are particular reasons to the contrary, as I shall by-and-by shew to be in this.

2dly, I shall give you my Reasons against this action, which are as follow:

(1.) My first Reason is this, because the sheriff as to the declaring the majority is Judge; and no action will lie against a judge, for what he does judicially, though it should be laid falso mulitioso et scienter; as appears in Co. 12 Rep. fol. 21. They who are intrusted to judge, ought to be free from vexation, that they may determine without fear; the law requires courage in a judge, and therefore provides security for the support of that courage. But,

1. Is the sheriff a judge in this case? And, 2. Is there the same reason he should be freed from all actions?—As to the first it is of necessity, that as to the declaring the majority, he should be judge upon the place: in other cases, in the county court, the freeholders are the judges, and he is the minister. When we say the freeholders, we mean the major part of them is to judge; but when the question is, Which is the major part? they cannot determine the question; but of necessity the sheriff must determine that, the nature of the thing speaks it.

Therefore it was held rightly in Letchmere's Case, 13 and 14 Car. 2. that as to the election of knights to the parliament, the court is properly the sheriff's court, and the writ is in the nature of a special commission, Elegi facias.

I know a judge may have many ministerial acts incumbent upon him, as the chief-justices have to certify records upon writs of error; therefore it is necessary for me to observe, that the suit here is for what he does as a judge, and not for any thing ministerial; which appears by the averment, that the sheriff annexed another indenture, specifying it to be made by the major part of the freeholders, and containing that the lord Huntingtowre was chosen, ubi re vera the lord Huntingtowre was not chosen by the major part of the freeholders. If it had been said ubi re vera the freeholders supposed to seal the same, never did seal the same, there had been a falsity in his ministerial part of sending in the indenture; but his sending his two indentures, which were really sealed by the freeholders, as they import; wherein the freeholders of each indenture (and not the sheriff) say, that they are the major part, is no falsity in his ministerial part, but only deferring to judge between them, which is the major part; or more properly judging that they are both equal in number.

They object, that the matter of this question is not matter of judgment, it is but counting the poll, which requires arithmetic, but not judgment; but certainly if it be rightly considered, it will be thought this question of majority is not barely a question of fact, but a question of judgment, a question of difficult judgment, there are so many qualifications of electors.

1. They must have 40s. per annum, there the value must be judged.

2. It must be freehold; there the title.

3. It must be their own; there colourable and fraudulent gifts made many times on purpose to get voices, must be judged.

4. The electors must be resident; here the settlement of the party must be determined.

5. There are many things that incapacitate voices, as bribery, force, &c. and many other questions arise, that are of such difficulty in debate of them, much time is spent in parliament; and sometimes a Committee determines one way, and the House another. Is not this then a question that refers to judgment.

They object again, the sheriff may give an oath concerning all the qualifications, and he is to look no farther.

I answer, the statute has given the sheriff power to give an oath in assistance of him; but the statute does not say that whosoever takes that oath shall have a voice: neither does the statute 23 Hen. 6. say, that the sheriff shall not be charged with a false return, that pursues that way: so that although he may use those means for his direction, yet he must consider his own safety, and not make a false return. If a man, upon taking such an oath, give the sheriff a special answer, or if it should be known to the sheriff he swears false, the sheriff must determine according to his own judgment, and not by what is sworn.

It may hence be concluded, that the sheriff, as to declaring a majority, is a judge; and if so, my next assertion is, that there is the same reason he should be free from actions, as any judge in Westminster-hall, or any other judge. Does it not import the public, that the sheriff should deal uprightly and impartially? Ought he not to have courage, and for that end should not the law provide him security?

Consider his disadvantages, what a noise and croud accompany such elections; what importunity, nay, what violence there is upon him from the contending parties.

We may say, no other judge has more need of courage and resolution to manage himself, and determine uprightly, than he. No other judge determines in a case of greater consequence to the public, or difficulty, than he;

expose him to such actions, and in most elections he must have trouble; for commonly each party is confident of his strength, his conduct, and his friends; that let the sheriff return never so uprightly, the party that is rejected will revenge it by a suit, especially if he may sue at common law, to have boundless damages, without running any hazard himself, but of the loss of his costs.

If we judges, that find ourselves secure from actions, should not be tender of others that are in the same circumstances; it may well be said, 'Wo unto you, for you impose heavy burthens upon others, but will not bear the least of them yourselves.'

2. My second Reason is, because it is alieni fori, either to examine the right of the election, or behaviour of the sheriff; both which are incident, and indeed the only considerations that can guide in the trial of such causes, if they be allowed.

It is admitted, that the parliament is the only proper judicature to determine the right of election, and to censure the behaviour of the sheriff. How then can the common law try a cause, that cannot determine of those things, without which the cause cannot be tried?

No action upon the case will lie for breach of a trust, because the determination of the principal thing, the trust, does not belong to the common law, but to the court of Chancery: certainly the reason of the case at bar is stronger, as the parliament ought to have more reverence than the court of Chancery.

They object, that it may be tried after the parliament hath decided the election; for then that which the common law would not try is determined, and the parliament cannot give the party the costs he is put unto.

Then I perceive they would have the determination of the parliament binding to the sheriff in the action, which it cannot be; for that is between other parties to which the sheriff is not called: it is against the course of law, that any judgment, decree or proceeding betwixt other parties should bind the interest of, or any way conclude a third person; no more ought it to do here: it may be easy for parties combining to represent a case so to the parliament, that the right of election may appear either way as the parties please. Is it fit the sheriff, who is not admitted to controvert such determination, should be concluded by it, in an action brought against him, to make him pay the reckoning?

Did the parliament believe, when they determined this election, that they passed sentence against the sheriff, upon which he must pay 800*l*.? Sure if they had imagined so, they would, nay, in justice, they ought to have heard his defence, before they determined it.

And yet that was the measure of this case, the Sheriff was not heard in parliament, indeed he was not blamed there: and yet upon the Trial, which concerned him so deeply, he was not allowed to defend himself, by shewing any majority or equality of voices, the parliament having determined the election.

I do not by these reflections tax the law of injustice, or the course of parliament of inconvenience; I am an admirer of the methods of both: it is from the excellency of them, I conclude this proceeding in this new-fangled action, being absurd, unjust and unreasonable, cannot be legal.

To answer the other branch of this objection, I say, it does not follow, that because the parliament cannot give costs, therefore this new-devised action must lie, to help the party to them.

For then such an action might as well lie in all cases, where there is a wrong to be remedied by course of law, and no costs are given for it.

At the common law no costs were given in any case, and many cases remain at this day, where the statutes have given no costs: as in a prohibition, scire facias, and quare impedit, and divers other cases; and yet no action will lie to recover those costs, and why should it lie in the case at bar?

In this case the parliament have already had it under their consideration in the statute 23 Hen. 6, and have appointed what shall be paid by the Sheriff that offends, viz. 100*l.* to the party, 100*l.* to the king, and imprisonment; the parliament have stated what shall be paid for compensation, and what for punishment, and would have provided for costs, if they had thought fit.

3. My third Reason is, because a double return is a lawful means for the Sheriff to perform his duty in doubtful cases. If this be so, then all aggravations of fulso, malitiosè et scienter, will not make the thing actionable; for whatever a man may do for his safety, cannot be the ground of an action.

There is sometimes 'Damnnum absque injuria,' though the thing be done on purpose to bring a loss upon another, without any design of benefit to himself; as if a new house be erected contiguous to my ground, I may build any thing on purpose to blind the lights of that new house, and no action will accrue, though the malice were never so great; much less will it lie, when a man acts for his own safety.

If a Jury will find a special verdict; if a judge will advise and take time to consider; if a bishop will delay a patron, and impanel a jury to enquire of the right of patronage; you cannot bring an action for these delays, though you suppose it to be done maliciously, and on purpose to put you to charges; though you suppose it to be done scienter, knowing the law to be clear; for they take but the liberty the law has provided for their safety, and there can be no demonstration that they have not real doubts, for these are within their own breasts; it would be very mischievous, that a man might not have leave to doubt without so great peril.

The course of parliament makes out the ground of this reason to be true in fact, so that a double return is lawful when the Sheriff doubts; for if the parliament did not allow a double return in doubtful cases, they ought never to accept a double return: If it were in itself a void and unlawful return, they ought not to endure it a moment, but send for the Sheriff, and compel him forthwith to make a single return. But we see where there is doubt, the parliament sends not for the Sheriff before they have examined the case, and given particular directions.

And it must of necessity be the course: for suppose the voices are equal: suppose the election is void for force; suppose the Sheriff doubts upon the validity of some voices, shall he transmit his doubts especially to parliament? Was there ever any such thing done? Was there ever any other way but to make a double return, and leave it fairly to the decision of parliament?

It was said by my brother Ellis, that if the Sheriff had returned, in the nature of a special verdict, the special matter, and had concluded in this manner, viz. if the parliament shall adjudge sir Samuel Barnardiston to be chosen, then he returns him; and if the parliament shall adjudge the lord Huntingtore to be chosen, then he returns him; that such a return as this had been safe, and could not have borne an action.

This is a pretty invention, found out for argument sake, but methinks it furnishes no force at all to the part for which it is brought, but rather shews the right to be the other way: for let any man of reason say, whether a double return, as it is now used, be not the same thing in consequence? Is not a double return, as if the Sheriff should say to the parliament, "The right of election is between these two, I am in doubt which of them I shall reject, and expect your directions." This is the import of a double return, and is the same in effect, as if it had concluded like a special verdict; and so my brother Ellis's instance should not be actionable, though he concluded otherwise.

That other new-fangled way could not be received.—For,

1. The freeholders would never join in such a return.

2. Such a return is not capable of being amended by the Sheriff.

But the judgment of the parliament must be entered upon record, to make it any return; it concluding nothing of itself, as a special verdict concludes nothing, till the judgment of the Court be entered upon the roll with it.

3. The parliament will not, as I believe, admit of new devices in the course of their proceedings, whatever we do at law.

But the double return is practicable in the county, for the freeholders of each part will tender their indentures; and it is easily amended in parliament, by rejecting the indenture of those freeholders that were not the major part, which way has been practised in doubtful cases for many years. So that I apprehend the case at bar to be more regular and favourable, than that case, which my brother Ellis put as a case that would bear an action.

Again, suppose the sheriff had informed the parliament of his doubts, and that he could not readily determine where the majority was, but it was betwixt two persons, A. and B. and thereupon desired their favour, either to grant him time to determine it, if they pleased to command him so to do, or else, that they would decide it themselves, and he would obey what directions they should make in it; and thereupon the parliament had taken upon themselves to determine it.

This most clearly had not been actionable, for it is not actionable to delay a return to any court of justice, where the sheriff had leave from the court so to do. A double return, in my understanding, speaks the same thing to the parliament; and upon it they may either direct the sheriff to make a single return, which is to cause him to decide it, or they may do it themselves.

And here, I must needs reflect upon the second reason I gave against this action, that the matter of it is alien forei; I find myself and my brothers that argued for the action, engaged in a discourse of the nature of a double return, and the course of parliament upon it, which, as a judge, I cannot so well speak to. I had the honour to be of this House of Commons, and whilst I was there, I considered as well as I could the course of the proceedings of the House, and am therefore able to speak something of them, and I am brought into this discourse necessarily by this action; but I must needs say, it is an improper discourse for judges, for they know not what is the course of parliament, nor the privilege of parliament. When the lords in parliament, whom they are bound to assist with their advice, ask the judges any thing, concerning the course or privilege of parliament, they have answered, that they know them not, nor can advise concerning them.

If in parliament we do not know, nor can advise concerning these things; how can we judge upon them out of parliament? We ought to know before we judge, and therefore we cannot judge of things we cannot know.

Our being engaged in a discourse improper for judges, shews the action to be improper, as much as any other argument that can be made; and this argument arises from my brothers that argued for the action.

But now I am in this discourse, I must go a little farther; my observation from the course of parliament has been, that they will not permit the sheriff to delay his return, to deliberate, and he cannot take security of either party; and if a single return be not justified by the Committee of Elections, he is in danger of the statute of 23 Hen. 6.

It follows, that there is no way for an innocent sheriff to be safe, where he conceives doubt, but in making a double return; and if that should be actionable too, the service of the parliament would be the most ungrateful service in the world.

It seems ridiculous to me, that it should be objected, that this course of law is necessary to prevent the great mischief arising from double returns; whereas, if it be a mischief, or disliked by the parliament, either in general or any particular case, they may reject them when they please, and command the sheriff to make a single return; so that they may remedy it by their practice, without their legislative power.

Their practice hitherto has been to receive double returns, which therefore in some cases must be lawful, and in this very case the double return was accepted, and the sheriff no way punished for it; which he ought to have been, if he had been blameable.

If double returns are accepted by parliament, they are allowed, and we must say they are lawful, which is the ground of my third reason; for which I hold this action not maintainable.

4. My fourth Reason is, That there is no legal damages occasioned by the sheriff. The damages laid in the declaration are,

1. Being kept from sitting in the House.
2. The pains and charges he was put unto, to get his admittance into the House.

1. That of his being kept from sitting in the House, is as much every man's damage in the whole county, nay, in the whole kingdom; and any man else might as well have an action for it, as the member chosen.

To sit in parliament is a service in the member, for the benefit of the king and kingdom; and not for the particular profit of the member.

It is a rule in law, that no particular man may bring an action for a nuisance to the king's highway; because all the men in England might as well have actions, which would be infinite: and therefore such an offence is punishable only by indictment, except there be special loss occasioned by that nuisance.

For the same reason, the exclusion of a member from the House, being as much damage to all men in England, as to himself, he, nor any man else in England, can have an action for it; but it is punishable upon the public score, and not otherwise.

For this reason was the statute 23 Hen. 6, wisely considered: by that statute the action is not given to the party for his particular damage; but the action given is a popular action, only the party grieved hath a preference for six months: but if he do not sue in that time, every man else is at liberty to recover the same sum.

2. The other point of damage, is the pains and charges he was put unto, and that is not occasioned by the sheriff, but by the deliberation of the House. Why should the sheriff pay for that? It may be, if the parliament had sent for the sheriff the first day, and blamed the double return, he would have ventured to determine the matter speedily, and there should have been no cause of complaint for delay; but the parliament saw so much cause of doubt, that they think it not fit to put the sheriff to determine, but to resolve to examine the matter, and give him directions that may guide him in mending his return; thereupon they give a day to the parties on both sides, and finding the matter of long examination, and withal difficult, they deliberate upon it.

It seems very unreasonable the sheriff should be made pay for this, which he did not occasion; but was a course taken by the parliament for their own satisfaction, who found no fault in the sheriff for putting them to all that trouble.

Suppose sir Samuel Barnardiston had been returned alone, and the lord Huntingtore had petitioned against that return, there had been the same charge to have defended that return; so that it was the contest of the opposite party that occasioned the charge, the deliberation of the parliament that occasioned the delay; but neither of them can be imputed to the sheriff.

I cannot difference this case, from the case of bringing an action against a jury, for maliciously, knowingly, and on purpose, to put the party to charges, finding a matter specially, whereby great delay and great expences were, before the party could obtain judgment; and yet I think no man will affirm that an action will lie in that case.

In this case the damages are found entire, so that if both parts, viz. the not sitting in the house, and the pains and charges are not actionable causes of damages; it will be intended the jury gave for both, and so the judgment is for that cause erroneous.

I suppose the wages of parliament will not be mentioned for damages, for in most places they are only imaginary, being not demanded; but if there were to be any consideration of them, it will not alter this case; for upon this return they are due as from the first day, and so no damage can be pretended upon that score.

5. My fifth Reason is drawn from the statute of 23 Hen. 6. which has been so often mentioned; that statute is a great evidence to me, that no action lay by the common law against a sheriff, for a false return of a writ of election to the parliament; and this evidence is much strengthened by the observation that hath been made, that never any action was brought otherwise than upon that statute.

I must admit, that if an action lay by the Common Law, this statute hath not taken it away, for there are no negative words in the statute; but it is not likely that the parliament would have made that law, if there had been any remedy for the party before.

The statute observes, that some laws had been made before, for preventing false returns, but there was not convenient remedy provided for the party grieved; and therefore gives him an action for 100*l*. If the Courts of Justice had, by the Common Law, jurisdiction to examine misdemeanors concerning the returns of sheriffs to the parliament; what needed the parliament to be so elaborate, to provide law after law, to give them power therein, and at last to give the party grieved an action? Can any man imagine but that the parliament took the law to be, that the party was without remedy? I know preambles of acts of parliament are not always Gospel; but it becomes us, I am sure, to have respect to them, and not to impute any falsity or failing to them, especially where constant usage speaks for them.

It has been objected, that in those times, it was reckoned a damage to be returned to serve in parliament, which is the reason that no man then did bring his action against the sheriff for returning another in his stead. This cannot be true, for the statute calls him the party grieved, and is careful in providing convenient remedy for him; and we see by the many statutes about those times, that it was a mischief very frequent, and there wanted no occasion for those actions; which does extremely strengthen the argument of the non-user of this pretended Common Law.

An action upon the case; where it may be brought, is a plaster that fits itself for all times and all sores; and if such an action might then have been brought, there was no need for the parliament to provide a convenient remedy. By Littleton's rule, often mentioned by my brothers, we may conclude this action will not lie; for if such an action had lain, it would have been brought before this time.

In the Case of Bulkley against Rice Thomas in Plowden's Commentaries, 118, which appears to be so elaborately argued both at bar and bench; if this common law had been thought upon, they might have prevented the question, whether the sheriffs of Wales were bound by the statute 23 Hen. 6.

It seems plain to me, that the makers of the said statute were ignorant of this Common Law; and yet my brother Thurland observes, the judges, in those times, usually assisted in the penning of the laws.

The judges and counsel in the time of Buckley's case were ignorant of this Common Law, else it would have been mentioned in the argument of that case.

This Common law was never revealed, that I find, until a time that there were divers other new lights: I mean those times, when Nevil brought an action for a false return against Stroud during the late troubles; but in those times, it could never obtain judgment, I have heard that the Court of Common Pleas sent the record to the parliament, as a case too difficult for the Courts of Common Law to determine.

The statute of 23 Hen. 6. is not only evidence, that no such action lay at the common law; but, in my opinion, is not consistent with any remedy at the common law, unless it be allowed that the party should be doubly punished.

If the party grieved has brought his action upon the statute, and recovered, it was admitted by the counsel, that no action can be brought at the common law; nor à contra, can he recover by the statute, after he has recovered by the Common Law, because 'nemo bis puniatur pro eodem delicto.'

So far it stands well; but suppose the party grieved has let slip his time of three months and then a third person brings a popular action and recovers 100*l.* upon the statute; there is nothing can bar the party grieved from his action at Common Law, for his sitting still will not conclude him; no statute of limitations extending to this case. And if it be so, then must the party, besides his fine and imprisonment, be doubly punished by this statute; which was made, as the letter of it imports, because there wanted convenient remedy.

And now I am discouraging of this statute, I must observe the great wisdom of the course of parliament in these cases, which hath in great measure prevented the bringing actions against sheriffs, even upon this statute.

Where the sheriff mistakes the person in his return, he incurs the penalty of 23 Hen. 6. though it be without malice: and it may happen that any where there are 21 electors of one side, and 20 of the other, the sheriff returns him that hath 21, and the parliament adjudging an incapacity in two of the 21, may determine he that had the 20 voices was duly chosen. In such case the sheriff had made a false return, within the penalty of the statute 23 Hen. 6. and no evidence shall be given against the determination of the parliament.

This was a very hard case for the sheriff; and if we were liable to such a mischief, many a past sheriff might be awakened, that takes himself to be secure.

But the course of parliament prevents this, as it is reason; for immediately upon their determinations, they send for the sheriff, and cause him to amend his return; and thenceforward the amended return is the sheriff's return; and there is no record that can warrant any action to be brought for a false return: as when the Marshal of the King's-Bench or Warden of the Fleet have made an improvident return, omitting some causes wherewith the prisoner stood charged in their custody, whereby they came liable to action, they frequently move the court to amend the return; and when the return is amended, all is set right, for there is no averring against a record: in like manner, when the sheriff hath amended his return, he is secure from any action upon that occasion.

By this means, there has of late years been no recovery upon the statute, because all persons chuse rather to compel the sheriff to amend his return, that they might be admitted to sit in the House, than to take their remedy upon the statute; and no man can recover upon the statute first, and have afterwards their return amended: for I have been told, that by the course of parliament, unless the petition be lodged within some few days after the return, it cannot be received afterwards. So that a man cannot upon that statute have remedy at law, and also in parliament: which seems to be wisely provided, to prevent any contrariety of determinations.

This statute of 23 H. 6. furnished those that argued for this action, with one argument, which doth now vanish: They said that all the inconveniences that could be objected to this action, were the same upon the statute of 23 H. 6. viz. That upon that statute, the right of election must be examined upon a trial, where there might be a contrariety of determinations; for it appears by what I have said, that there can be no contrariety of determinations.

And there are other inconveniences in this remedy by the common law, which are not in the remedy given by the statute; for by the statute the sum to be recovered is limited; the informer hath a time prefixed, so that there are bounds set which cannot be exceeded; but the remedy by the Common Law is without limitation of time, which is considerable; for all sheriffs that ever made any return otherwise than the parliament determined, will be liable, during their whole lives, to them that will call them to account for it. I say, this is without limitation of time, without measure of damages, or any rules contained in a written law: It depends upon a general notion of remedy, which may be enlarged by construction, as it is now introduced without precedent.

To finish my observation upon this statute, I say it is great wisdom in the parliament to call the sheriff to amend the return, and so prevent any remedy against him upon the statute 23 H. 6. for I do not see that the rules of law concerning elections, are so manifestly clear and known, that it is fit that the sheriff should, upon all returns that are corrected by the parliament, pay the reckoning of the contest.

6. I have a sixth reason against this action; which is, because the sheriff is not admitted to take security to save him harmless in such cases: I take this reason to be instar omnium, and there needs no other in the case.

It were the most unreasonable and grievous thing in the world, that the sheriffs should be bound to act without any deliberation, and not to be allowed to take any security; and yet be liable to an action, which way soever he takes: there is no course can avoid it but this of a double return, as I have before shewn.

It has not been said, by any that argued the other way, that the sheriff may take security: and, I suppose, will not be said; for it would be a dangerous course for parliaments, for then the most litigious man must be returned, and not he who is truly chosen.

If the sheriff may not take security, the law must be his security. It was an argument used by my brother Ellis, that because the law imposes an officer, to wit, the sheriff, therefore the law must give the party an action against that officer, if he misdemean himself: the argument does not hold universally, for the law imposes a judge, and yet no action lies against him: But the reason of that argument, if turned the other way, is irrefragable; as thus, the law will not suffer the sheriff to take a security, therefore the law must be his security, else it were a most unreasonable law. This reason of itself is sufficient to bear the whole case; for no case can be put in our law, nay, no case can be in any reasonable law, where a man is compelled to judge without deliberation, and cannot take security, and yet shall be liable to an action.

I have two more reasons to add, upon which I lay great weight, though they depend not upon any particular circumstances of this case, but the general consideration of it.

1. That it is a new invention.

2. That it relates to the parliament.

3. As it is a new invention, it ought to be examined very strictly, and have no allowance of favour at the end; and it will have the same fortune that many other novelties, heretofore attempted in our law, have had.

Actions upon the case have sometimes been received in new cases, where it stands with the rules of law, and no inconvenience appears; but they have been more often rejected. I shall instance some cases that have been rejected, because it will be manifested by them, that all the arguments and positions laid down by my brothers that would support the action, are as well applicable to several cases that have been already rejected, as to the case at bar.

An action upon the case was brought against a grand-jury-man, for falsely and maliciously conspiring to indict another, and adjudged it would not lie. Against a witness for testifying falsely and maliciously; and an action was brought against a judge, for acting falsely and maliciously; but adjudged that no action would lie in those cases.

These three instances are applicable to every argument urged for this action. The arguments my brothers made in depressing falsity and malice, those which they made from the comparison of other actions upon the case a minori ad majus; the argument, that because the law imposes the officer, it will punish the malice, has the same force in the case of a judge, juror, or witness: and yet my brothers admit in those cases, an action will not lie, which shews the invalidity of those arguments.

Now I shall give other instances where actions upon the case have been rejected for novelty and reasons of inconvenience.

An action of the case was brought against the Lord of a Manor for not admitting a copyholder, and it was adjudged it would not lie. Cro. Jac. 368.

There was a verdict found, and damages given by the jury in that case: the Lord is compellable in chancery to admit a copyholder; and what harm would it have been if there might have been a remedy given by the common law, there being a custom broken by which the Lord was bound? The reasons of the books are, because it was a novelty, and it would be vexatious, if every copyholder should have an action against the Lord, when he refused to admit him upon his own terms.

It has been adjudged, that an action upon the case will not lie for the breach of a trust, because the common law cannot try what a trust is; but if such actions were allowed, the law might declare that to be a trust, which the court of chancery, that properly judges of trusts, might say is none; and where the common law cannot examine the principal matter, the damages that were but dependant upon it shall not be regarded.

Anthony Maddison brought an action against Skipwith, for maliciously killing sir Tho. Wortley: the case was thus; The plaintiff was a young lawyer that had expended all his gains in the purchase of a rent that was determinable upon the death of sir Tho. Wortley: Skipwith quarrelled with sir Thomas Wortley in the streets, about a mistress, and killed him, whereby Maddison lost his rent. It was held the action would not lie, though it were laid to be done maliciously, on purpose to determine the plaintiff's rent.

I observed in that case, that although Mr. Maddison knew very well that there was a mistress in the case, and that the rent was not aimed at, yet he would fain try his fortune in the suit: thinking that a jury, perhaps, out of compassion to him, or to discourage the like facts, might make the manslayer pay him for his loss: but the judges would not suffer it to go on, it being a mere device and a new fangled action.

It hath been held, that an action will not lie against a parson for suing for tithes in-kind, knowing that there was a modus, because it might then be perilous for any parson to insist upon his right.

It was held by the court of common-pleas, that no action will lie for suing an attorney, knowingly, in any other court against his privilege; for his means to enjoy his privilege, is to claim it by writ of privilege; and he is not bound to claim his privilege, nor can his adversary know he will claim it.

An action was lately brought in the King's bench, (as I have heard) for delaying a post-letter maliciously, whereby the plaintiff wanted intelligence that might have been of great advantage to him. The court discountenanced the action, so that it proceeded no further. It was then said (as I heard) to this effect; That if such precedents were admitted, there could hardly be any dealing or correspondence, but might be matter for actions at law; and although the case depended upon proof of particular malice, and the defendant will be acquitted if his case be not odious; yet we must consider that there is both charge and vexation of mind that attends the defence of a just cause, and we must not subject men for all their actions to such trouble and hazard.

These instances shew, that although an action upon the case be esteemed a catholicon, yet when actions have been applied to new cases, they have always been strictly examined, and upon considerations of justice or inconvenience they have been many times rejected.

For though the law advances remedies, as my brothers observed, yet it is with consideration that vexation be not more advanced than remedy.

It is my opinion, that no new device ever was, or can be introduced into the law, but absurdities and difficulties arise upon it, which were not foreseen: which makes me very jealous of admitting novelties. But,

2. In matters relating to the parliament, which is my second ground, there is no need of introducing novelties; for the parliament can provide new laws to answer any mischiefs that arise, and it ought to be left to them to do it.

Especially in a case of this nature, concerning elections, which the parliament have already taken care of, and prescribed remedies by the several statutes that have been made concerning them; I say, in such a case, there is little need to strain the law.

The Judges in all times have been very tender of meddling with matters relating to parliament. I do not find that ever they tried elections, but where statutes give them express power; or that they ever examined the behaviour of a sheriff, or any officer of the parliament, in relation to any service performed to the parliament, but upon those statutes; And in Brounker's case, Dyer 168, the statute was their rule in the Star-Chamber, and they inflicted the same punishment that is appointed by that statute.

If we shall allow general remedies (as an action upon the case is) to be applied to cases relating to the parliament, we shall at last invade privilege of parliament, and that great privilege of judging of their own privileges.

Suppose an action should be brought in time of prorogation, against a member of parliament, for that he falsely and maliciously did exhibit a complaint of breach of privilege to the parliament, whereby the party was sent for in custody, and lost his liberty, and was put to great charges to acquit himself, and was acquitted by the parliament.

If upon such a case the jury should find the defendant guilty, why should not that action be maintained as well as this at bar; It may be said for that action, that the judgment of the parliament is followed, and the privilege is not tried at law, but determined, 1. In the House; 2. It may be said, the party has no other way to recover his charges.

It would be dangerous to admit such an action, for then there would be peril in claiming privilege; for if the party complained of, had the fortune to be acquitted by the House, the member that made the complaint would be at the mercy of the jury, as to the point of malice and quantity of damages. Such a precedent, I suppose, would not please the parliament; and yet it may with more justice be the second case, than this at the bar the first.

Actions may be brought for giving parliament-protections wrongfully, actions may be brought against the clerk of the parliament, serjeant at arms, and Speaker, for aught I know, for executing their offices amiss, with averments of malice and damage: and then must judges and juries determine what they ought to do by their officers. This is in effect prescribing rules to the parliament for them to act by.

It cannot be seen whither we shall be drawn, if we meddle with matters of parliament in actions at law. Therefore, in my judgment, the only safety is in those bounds that are warranted by acts of parliament or constant practice.

Suppose this action had been brought before the election had been decided in the house, and the jury had found one way, and the parliament had determined contrary; how inconsistent had this been?

But it was said in the King's-Bench that the court would not try it, before parliament had determined the election, and then that cannot be contested, but the judgment of the parliament must be followed: And my brother Ellis but now said, "Surely no man will be so indiscreet as to bring such an action before the parliament hath determined it; and the Court will not try it, before such time as the election be determined contrary; how inconsistent had this been?"

But it was said in the King's-bench that the Court would not try it, before the parliament had determined the election, and then that cannot be contested, but the judgment of the parliament hath determined it; and the Court will not try it, before such time as the election be determined in a proper way.

In my opinion this was not rightly considered, for how can the Court stay any suit, to expect the determination of the parliament? And what reason or justice is there, that the sheriff, who is no party called to answer in the parliament, should be concluded in any thing by a judgment between other parties, to defend himself from a demand of damages in a court of law, where witnesses are examined upon oath, which they cannot be in the Commons-House?

There is no reason the suit of law should stay till the House have determined the election, if the determination of the House be not conclusive in that suit.

And for the discretion of the parties that are like to bring such actions, I cannot depend upon it: for I see in this age, some men will insist upon their private rights to the hindrance of public affairs of higher consequence than any that can come before the Courts in Westminster-hall.

It may be, there will not want men that will press us to judge in such cases; and not only before the parliament have determined, but against what the parliament have determined; and will tell us, that the sheriff was no party, that witnesses were not there examined upon oath, and produce arguments from antiquity which we shall be very loath to judge of.

I can see no other way to avoid consequences derogatory to the honour of the parliament, but to reject the action; and all others that shall relate either to the proceedings or privilege of parliament, as our predecessors have done.

For if we should admit general remedies in matters relating to the parliament, we must set bounds how far they shall go, which is a dangerous province: for if we err, privilege of parliament will be invaded, which we ought not any way to endanger.

This I speak of general remedies: Now I will consider this particular case, which, in my opinion, would bring great danger and dishonour to the parliament.

It is dishonourable to the parliament that there should be no protection in their service; I have shewn that the sheriff can be safe in no case, if he shall be sued in such a case as this: And can there be a greater reproach, than that there is no safety in their service? Nobody can serve them cheerfully and willingly at that rate.

It has been objected that the sheriff is not their officer, but is the officer of the Court of Chancery, which sends forth the writs, and receives the returns. The argument is plausible, but will not pass in the parliament; for they say the court of chancery is the repository for their writs, but will not allow them to issue without warrant from the house: They will not suffer the court of Chancery to meddle with the returns of the sheriff. The parliament sends immediate order to the sheriff; if the return be too slow, they direct the sheriff to amend his return, and they punish the sheriff where they find him faulty; so that it appears they exercise an immediate jurisdiction over the sheriff. And I suppose they would judge it very false doctrine to say, that the court of Chancery, or us, can any way meddle with the returns of the officer.

Admitting the sheriff to act in returns as the officer of the parliament, it concerns them that he should be liable to no other punishment but what they inflict, otherwise they cannot expect to be obeyed.

To have others judge when their servants do well, will be to have others give rules to their servants and service, which they will think inconvenient.

Let it be considered how hard a task sheriffs have in the elections of knights to the parliament: The appearance commonly is very numerous, the parties contesting very violent, the proceeding tumultuous, the polling sometimes is at several places at once: so that the sheriff can hardly be a witness of the action and if the dispute be in the House of Commons, he is no party to it. If after all this, the sheriff, who cannot indemnify himself by security, still be liable to an action, the service of the parliament may be reckoned a miserable slavery; which is not for their honour.

As this is dishonourable, so it is dangerous to parliaments; it concerns the kingdom that returns to the parliament should be upright and impartial, and that they may be so, the sheriff should be secure from all fears.

Judges are not liable to actions, that they may proceed uprightly and impartially; if they were subject to suits for their judgments, there is that earnestness and confidence on both sides, that one side would be dissatisfied and trouble them, and they could not discharge their duty without apprehensions of disquiet.

If the sheriff be exposed to actions thus, let us consider what and whom he is to fear: He may fear the suit of the party, and he may fear the suit of the king. And it follows necessarily, that if an action lies, an information for the king will also lie for the misdemeanor in his office: If it be not a case privileged by the complexion of it, as parliamentary, from being examined in Westminster-hall, but that he may be punished at the suit of the party, he may certainly as well be punished at the suit of the king: If so, Where is the sheriff's security? Will his own innocence secure him? That must be tried by a jury of the county where the parliament sits: who are, it may be, strangers to him as well as to the matter; or by a jury of the county where the election was, where, it may be, they will be of an opposite party; the plaintiff may wait his opportunity, and question him twenty years after: And if he be condemned, his punishment is unlimited, a fine may be set to any height for the king, and damages may be given to any value for the party. Where is his security upon such proceedings? Will he not be more afraid of such punishment out of parliament, than of any punishment in parliament? Will not, nay, may not his terror make him desire to please them that can punish him out of parliament, rather than to do right? Will not that be dangerous to the constitution of parliaments?

As the punishment out of parliament may be a terror to those who mean well, so colourable punishments may be as mischievous on the other side; for they may prevent any punishment in parliament, for nemo bis puniatur pro eodem delicto; they may serve for protection of men that do ill. When it is seriously weighed, of what consequence this may be, the case at bar will not be thought a case fit to be received by the judges without the countenance of a new law.

They object, here is malice found by the verdict, and that there can be no danger or inconvenience that malice should be punished.

This objection fortifies my opinion; for malice, upon which they would have the scales turn in this case, is not a thing demonstrative, but interpretative, and lies in opinion; so that it may give an handle to any man to punish another by.

The instance of this very case shews, that a good man may reasonably be afraid of the event of his defence in such a case.

For although the matter was of great examination in parliament, and at last decided but by few voices, and no observation of the sheriff's miscarriage there; though it appeared upon the trial (which I may say, being present there,) that the sheriff was guided by the advice of his friends, of counsel, and of parliament men, that told him the only safe course was to make a double return; yet the jury condemned him to pay 800*l.* against the expectation of the court: for the judges that were present at the trial did all declare publicly, that they would not have given that verdict.

The judges heard all the evidence the jury could go upon; for being of a remote county to the place of election, the jury could know nothing of their own knowledge, and yet the judges concurred not with the jury in their opinion.

I know we are not to examine the truth of the verdict, we must take it for gospel; neither doth any partiality in this particular lead me in judgment: but I shew it as an instance that malice is not demonstrative; men's minds may be mistaken, and innocent men may therefore have reason to be afraid, especially in ill times, and may use such means for their safety as may not be convenient for parliaments.

But there can be no danger or inconvenience in the censure of the parliament, that represents the whole kingdom, who hitherto have alone exercised this power, and who may at any time reform the law, if the present practice be any way inconvenient.

Upon these reasons which I have produced, I ground my opinion: now it will be necessary to weigh what hath been said in opposition to it.

The arguments urged on the other side, related either to the ingredients or circumstances of this action, or to the foundation or substance of it.

I call the ingredients and circumstances of the action, that it is laid with these words, falso, malitiose, deceptive, et scienter: and that there is a verdict in this case, and damages are found.

The words falso, malitiose, et deceptive, will sometimes make a thing actionable, which is not so in itself, without malice proved, though there be the same damage to the party.

As where a man causes another to be falsely indicted, yet if it be not malitiose, no action lies; though there be the same trouble, charge and damage in one case as the other.

But it is only where a man is a voluntary agent; for if a man be compellable to act, you cannot molest him upon any averment of malice: as if a grand-jury-man causes another to be indicted, though you aver malice, you cannot have an action against him; so for a witness that doth testify, or a judge that judgeth.

In the case at bar, the sheriff is compellable to act, and not barely as a minister to send the indenture, but as a judge to say which is the major part of the due electors; and if he mistakes, there is no reason it should subject him to an action upon an artificial averment of malice.

I remember in Shepherd and Wakeman's case in the King's Bench, Mr. justice Wyndham said well, that the words falso et malitiose were grown words of course, and put into every action; so that to his knowledge juries many times had no regard to them, that he looked upon them as words of form.

If we should make the words falso et malitiose support an action without a fit subject matter, all the actions of mankind would be liable to suit and vexation: they that have the cooking (as we call it) of declarations in actions of the case, if they be skilful in their art, will be sure to put in the words falso et malitiose, let the case be what it will; they are here pepper and vinegar in a cook's hand, that help to make sauce for any meat, but will not make a dish of themselves.

Falso et malitiose will not enable an action against a judge.

Nor against an indictor or witness, nor where words are not actionable, though the plaintiff hath a verdict and damages found; nor for a breach of trust, which is alieni fori.

The reason of every one of these cases holds in the case at bar: therefore it ought to have the same resolution.

As to the word scienter, it hath weight sometimes; and if an action be brought for keeping a dog that worried another's sheep, sciens eam ad mordend' oves esse consuetud. or for detaining the servant or wife of another, scienter: in these cases, if the defendant hath been told that the dog did worry sheep, or that it was the servant or wife of another, though it may be he did not believe it, yet it was scienter; for the word implies no more than having notice: and in those actions he must inform himself at his peril, and may, if he doubts, avoid danger by putting away those things which give offence. But in this case he could receive information by none, and is not to believe or misbelieve any body, but is bound to judge of the thing himself, and to act according to his judgment; so that no proof could be made of the scienter, for one side tells him the election was one way, and the other side tells him it is the other way; but he being present to the whole action, must follow the dictates of his own judgment. Hence it appears, scienter, in this case, is an empty word not referring to notice of a fact, but a matter of judgment, which cannot any way be proved.

It has been often urged, that this case is stronger by being after a verdict and damages found by the jury; and it has been said, that perhaps upon a demurrer, it might have been found more doubtful.

The case is the same to me upon a verdict, that it would have been upon a general demurrer, and no stronger; for a demurrer is the confession of the party, of all that can be proved, or can possibly be found upon that declaration.

It is my lord Coke's advice in Cromwel's case, 4th part, 14. a. never to demur to a declaration, if there be any hopes of the matter of fact; for the matter in law will as well serve after a verdict as upon a demurrer.

It had been a very odious case, if the sheriff should have admitted all this fast to be true, by a demurrer.

The finding the plaintiff's damages adds no strength to the case; for we see every day upon actions for words, though the jury find the defendant guilty for speaking words false et malitiose, and find it to be to the plaintiff's great damages; yet if the words are not such as will bear an action, the court stays judgment: and if judgment happens to be given, it is reversible for error; which shews that the finding damages by the jury cannot make an action better than if it were to be adjudged upon demurrer.

I shall now consider what hath been said to maintain this action upon the main substance and foundation of it. They say, this is a case within the general reason of the common law, for here is malice, falsity and damage; and where they concur, there ought to be remedy. And although this be a new case, it ought not for that reason to be rejected; for other kind of actions have been newly introduced, and this is as fit to be entertained as any.

My brothers that argued even now for the action, shewed great learning and great pains; and certainly have said all that can be invented in support of this case; but as far as I could perceive, they have spoken only upon general notions to that purpose I just now mentioned; but nothing that I could observe applicable to the reasons and differences I go upon.

As for the rule they go upon, that where falsity, malice and damage do concur, there must be remedy; I confess it is true generally, but not universally, for it holds not in the case of a judge, nor an indictor, nor a witness, nor of words that import not legal slander, though they are found to bring damage, as I have shewn before. And the reasons that exempt these cases from the general rule, have the same force in the case at bar.

I must confess the judges have sometimes entertained new kinds of actions, but it was upon great deliberation, and with great discretion, where a general inconvenience required it.

If Slane's Case were new (for my brother Thurland observed truly it was said in that Case, that there were infinite numbers of precedents) that Case imported the common course of justice. Actions for words that are said to be new, though they have been used some hundreds of years, are a necessary means to preserve the peace of the kingdom. The Case of Smith and Craschaw, Cro. Car. 15, was a Case of general concern, being that prosecutions for treasons may be against any man, and at any time.

But in the Case at bar, neither the peace of the kingdom, nor the course of justice is concerned in general, but only the administration of officers of the parliament, in the execution of parliamentary writs; and can never happen but in time of parliament, and must of necessity fall under the notice of the parliament; so that if the law were deficient, it is to be presumed the parliament would take care to supply it: discretion requires us rather to attend that, than to introduce new precedents upon such general notions that cannot govern the course of parliament.

My brother Atkins said, the common law complied with the genius of the nation; I do not understand the argument. Does the common law change? Are we to judge of the changes of the genius of the nation? Whither may general notions carry us at this rate? For my own part, I think, though the common law be not written, yet it is certain, and not arbitrary. We are sworn to observe the laws as they are, and I see not how we can change them by our judgments; and as for the genius of the nation, it will be best considered by the parliament, who have power of the laws, and may bring us to a compliance with it.

In the Case at bar, I look upon the sheriffs as a particular officer of the parliament for the managing elections, and as if he were not sheriff; I look upon the writ as if it were an order of parliament, and had not the name of a writ; I look upon the course of parliament, which we pretend not to know, to be incident to the consideration of it; so that it stands not upon the general notion of remedy in the common course of justice.

The arguments of the falling of the value of money, whereby the penalty of 100*l.* provided by the 23 H. 6. is become inconsiderable; and the increase of the estimation of being a member of parliament; if they were true, are arguments to the parliament to change the law by increasing the penalty, but we cannot do it.

My brother Maynard, in his argument, would embolden us; telling us we are not to think the case too hard for us, because of the name or course of parliament; for judges have punished absentees: they may determine what is a parliament, what is an act of parliament, how long an ordinance of parliament shall continue, and may punish trespasses done in the very parliament.

I will not dispute the truth of what he said in this, but if his arguments were artificial, he might have spared them; for they have no manner of effect to draw me beyond my sphere.

I will not be afraid to determine any thing that I think proper for me to judge; but seeing I cannot find the courts of justice have at any time meddled with cases of this nature, but upon express power given them by acts of parliament, I cannot consent to this precedent; I am confident when there is need, the parliament will discern it, and make laws to enlarge our power, so far as they shall think convenient.

I see no harm that sheriffs in the mean time should be safe from this new-devised action, which they call the common law; if they misdeemean themselves, they are answerable to the parliament, whose officers they be, or may be punished by the statute, made for regulating elections.

It is time for me to conclude, which I shall do by repeating the opinion I at first delivered, viz. That this judgment is not warranted by the rules of law; that it introduceth novelty of dangerous consequence, and therefore ought to be reversed. 'Sæpe viatorem nova, non vetus orbita, fallit.'

North, Chief-Justice, and five other Judges (against Ellis and Atkins) reversed the judgment upon the matter in law, That the action lies not.

[Note, The Lord Chief-Justice Vaughan, and Lord Chief-Baron Turner, both deceased, who in their lives were eminent members of parliament, were of the same opinion.]

Soon after the Revolution, sir Samuel Barnardiston brought his Writ of Error into the House of Peers, to reverse the reversal of the Judgment given in the Exchequer; but the House affirmed the reversal of the said Judgment, as appears by the following Resolutions:

May 24, 1689.

This day the Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of King's-Bench brought into this House a transcript of a Writ of Error, to reverse a Judgment given against Barnardiston at the suit of Soame.

May 25, 1689.

Whereas sir Samuel Barnardiston brought his Writ of Error into this House, and hath assigned errors thereupon, to which sir William Soame was Defendant; who left Dame Catherine Soame, his widow, his executrix; and the House being moved, that the said Dame Catherine Soame may join issue thereupon; it is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That the said Dame Catherine Soame be, and is hereby required to join issue to the said Writ, on or before Thursday next, being the 30th instant, at ten o'clock in the forenoon; whereof the said sir Samuel Barnardiston is to cause notice to be given to the said Dame Soame, to the end she join issue accordingly.

June 1, 1689.

The House being moved, that they would be pleased to appoint a day for hearing the errors argued upon the Writ of Error brought into this House, wherein sir Samuel Barnardiston is plaintiff, and dame Catherine Soame, widow executrix of sir William Soame, defendant: It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That this House will hear the said errors argued by counsel on both sides, at the bar, on Saturday next, being the 8th instant, at 10 of the clock in the forenoon; and in the mean time she may join issue if she please: whereof the said sir Samuel Barnardiston is to cause notice to be given to the said dame Catherine Soame, to the end she attend accordingly.

June 8, 1689.

This day being appointed for hearing errors argued by counsel, upon the Writ of Error between sir Samuel Barnardiston and the lady Soame, the counsel for the plaintiff appeared, but none appeared for the defendant: And upon oath made at the bar by Nicholas Baker, solicitor, that he served the order of this House at the house of the lady Soame; thereby giving notice, that the cause was to be heard this day; whereupon the House heard the counsel of the plaintiff, and made the ensuing Order, viz

After hearing counsel this day, upon the Writ of Error depending in this House, wherein sir Samuel Barnardiston is plaintiff, and dame Catherine Soame is defendant; it is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, the giving judgment on this Writ of Error be, and is hereby suspended, until Monday next; and those that are, or were judges, and now in town, do attend this House that day, to inform the House of their reasons and grounds for their judgment for reversal of the judgment in sir Samuel Barnardiston's case.

Ordered, That all the judges be present on Monday morning, to assist this House in this business of sir Samuel Barnardiston.

June 10, 1689.

William Mountague, esq. was called in, and the Speaker told him, That the House desired to hear from him, upon what grounds and opinions he gave his opinion for the reversal of the judgment for giving 800*l.* to sir Samuel Barnardiston?

He taking notice that there was counsel present for sir Samuel Barnardiston, but no counsel for the lady Soame, he said, seeing the defendant did not appear with counsel, he desired he might not be looked upon as counsel for the defendant; upon that the company was commanded to withdraw: And the House ordered Mr. Mountague should be admitted to come in alone; who being come in, said, he would, for their lordships satisfaction, (as well as he can remember) acquaint them with the grounds and reasons which induced him to give his opinion for the reversal of that judgment; and so he proceeded to give the heads of what he said, which being ended, he withdrew.

And after consideration thereof, it was moved that the counsel for sir Samuel Barnardiston should be called in, and the Speaker to acquaint them with the effect of what Mr. Mountague had said; that so the counsel might be able thereby to reply, for the better information of their lordships and the judges then present. And after some debate, the question was put, whether the counsel shall be called in? It was resolved in the negative.

Then it was moved to make use of proxies, which was opposed, as concerning their not being admitted in preliminary cases of judicature.

After hearing William Mountague, esq. for his judgment in sir Samuel Barnardiston's case, and debate thereupon, it is ordered, That the clerk do inspect the books concerning proxies; and whether they have been used in cases of judicature; and give an account to-morrow morning what he finds therein: And that all the judges do attend the House to-morrow.

June 11, 1689.

The clerk of the parliament, in pursuance of the Order yesterday, shewed several instances where proxies have been used in preliminaries to private causes: It is ordered by the Lord spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That proxies may be used in such preliminary cases, but not in giving judgment; and that this Order be added to the roll of Standing Orders.

Ordered, That the counsel of sir Samuel Barnardiston shall be heard on Friday next, to reply to what Mr. Mountague gave for his reasons for reversal of sir Samuel Barnardiston's judgment; and that all the judges do attend at the same time.

June 14, 1689.

After hearing counsel in sir Samuel Barnardiston's case this day, to reply to what Mr. William Mountague said for his reasons to reverse the judgment given in the Exchequer; it is ordered, That this House will hear all the judges give their opinions in this case on Tuesday the 25th of this instant June, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

June 25, 1689.

The House heard the opinion of all the judges in the case of sir Samuel Barnardiston, upon his Writ of Error depending in this House.

And the question being put, Whether to go on in the debate of this business now? It was resolved in the affirmative.

After debate, the question being put, Whether to reverse the reversal of the judgment given between sir Samuel Barnardiston and sir William Soame? It was resolved in the negative.

Leave is given to several Lords to enter their dissent to the abovesaid question, and accordingly do enter their dissent for the reasons ensuing.

1. Because it is a denying sir Samuel Barnardiston the benefit of law, which gives relief in all wrong and injury: And though this be an action of the first impression, yet there being a damage to the plaintiff, the common law gives him this action to repair himself; and if it were not so, there would be a failure of justice, which cannot be admitted.

2. Because the allowing this reversal tends towards the giving the power and encouragement to Sheriffs to make false and double returns; by which means the right of elections will be avoided, and it tends thereby to the packing of a House of Commons, which may overturn the whole frame of the government, and establish what religion and government a packed parliament shall think fit.

236. CASE OF PRIVILEGE OF PARLIAMENT: being Proceedings in Parliament, on an Appeal brought in the House of Lords, by Dr. SHIRLEY, against Sir JOHN FAGG, and other Members of the House of Commons: 27 CHARLES II. A. D. 1675.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, May 4, 1675.

A MOTION being made in the House of Commons, on the behalf of sir John Fagg, a member of this House, That he is served with an Order of the House of Lords, made on the Petition of Thomas Shirley, esq. to put in an Answer to the Petition on Friday next;

* The whole of the first volume of Mr. Hatsell's valuable Collection of Precedents relates to the matter of Parliamentary Privilege, and from the perusal of that volume it should seem to be a subject of considerable uncertainty. Neither its antiquity, nor its origin, nor its extent, appears to be well ascertained; and the diversity of opinions respecting it, is very remarkable.

It is part of that Lex et Consuetudo Parliamenti of which lord Coke tells us 'ista lex est ab omnibus quærenda, à multis ignorata, à paucis cognita.' "We have seen," says Mr. Hatsell in the beginning of the fifth chapter of his first volume, "in what manner the Commons were at different periods obliged to make new claims of privilege, and to exert new modes of maintaining and defending those claims, in proportion as the lengthening the duration of the session made other avocations inconvenient and incompatible with their first duty, and as the increase of their consequence in the state and their influence in the management of affairs, rendered them more an object of the attention of the ministers of the crown."

The whole of Mr. Hargrave's very learned Preface to lord Hale's Treatise on the Jurisdiction of the Lords' House of Parliament, is one continued commentary of the unsettledness of this Lex et Consuetudo Parliamenti, and of disputes between the two Houses concerning their respective privileges. And the same topics are still farther illustrated by his opinions on the Cases of Bond and Butler, and of Perry. See Juridical Arguments, &c. vol. 1, p. 1. vol. 2, p. 183. I will add a few particulars. The House of Commons in their Apology and satisfaction to be presented to his majesty,* (after asserting that their privileges and liberties were their right and due inheritance no less than their very lands and goods, and that their making of request in the entrance of parliament to enjoy their privilege, is an act only of manners, and doth weaken their right no more than their suing to the king for their lands by petition; whereas the king would have it that their privileges were derived

And the opinion of the House being desired, Whether by his Privilege, as a member of this house, he is not excused from answering the Petition in the Lords house; and a Precedent being urged in the like case;

Ordered, That the further consideration of the matter touching the Privilege of sir John Fagg, a member of this House, be adjourned from the grace and permission of his ancestors and himself, see 1 Hatsell 78, 138. 2 Hatsell 214, 215, 216.) avouch that their House is a court of record, and so ever esteemed; and in Fitzherbert's case, 1 Hatsell 109, they recite that they are a court of record. Lord Coke (Co. Litt. 260, a. see also 117, b.) describes a court of record to be a court of justice, which hath power to hold plea according to the course of the common law of real or mixed actions or of actions quare vi et armis, or of personal actions whereof the debt or damage amounts to 40 shillings or above. (No other court hath authority to fine or imprison. See 8 Coke's Reports 38 b. 60 b. 120 a. 1 Salk. 200. 3 Blackst. Comm. 24.) The House of Commons (see the Journals 10th and 11th of May, 1571,) assert, That they ordered a fine of 20*l.* to be assessed upon the corporation of Westbury. Lord Mansfield, Burr. Rep. 1336, in speaking of that particular case asserts, that no fine could be imposed in the House of Commons, and lord Hobart, in the case of the King against lady Arundel and Howard, Hob. Rep. 110, cited by Mr. Clifford in Flower's case, and lord Holt in the King and Queen against Knollys, 1 Salk. 511, do, it may be argued, deny that the House of Commons is a court of record, in asserting that the Journals are no records. Mr. Hatsell's book abounds in reports of contradictory interpretations as to the extent of the Privilege of Parliament, in matters of criminal prosecutions against members. In April, 1763 (see Wilkes's Case in that year; infra.) the Judges of the court of Common Pleas unanimously decided, That privilege of parliament extended to cases of writing and publishing seditious libels. Six months afterwards both Houses of Parliament resolved, that privilege of parliament did not extend to such cases. On Feb. 17, 1769, the House of Commons resolved, "That John Wilkes esq. having been in this session of parliament expelled this house, was and is incapable of being elected a member to serve in this present parliament," and in the course of several proceedings which subsequently occurred respecting Mr. Wilkes, that House of Commons uniformly adhered to that same doctrine. On May 8, 1782, it was resolved, That the resolve till to-morrow morning. And it is referred to sir Trevor Williams, Mr. Hales, sir Rob. Carr, sir Anth. Irby, or any one of them, to inspect the journals; and give an account to the House, of the Precedent in the case of Mr. Hales.

* Inserted in Hatsell's Precedents Appendix to vol. 1, and also in 1 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1030, from Petyt's Jus Parliamentarium.

tion Feb. 17, 1769, should be expunged from the Journals of the House, as being subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this kingdom, and ordered, That all the Declarations, &c. respecting the election of John Wilkes, esq. should be expunged.

Lord Coke, as we have seen, writes that the ‘Lex Parliamenti est à multis ignorata,’ and it is plain that in the passage where that phrase occurs he means to represent the knowledge of it as very difficult of acquisition: but lord Holt tells us, that as to what my lord Coke says, “that the ‘lex parliamenti est à multis ignorata,’ it is only because they will not apply themselves to understand it.” See Ld. Raym. Rep. 1114.

In Crosby’s case, A. D. 1771, infra, Lord Chief Justice De Grey says, “I wish we had some code of the law of parliament, but till we have such a code it is impossible we should be able to judge of it.” But Mr. Justice Blackstone on the other hand tells us, that the dignity and independence of the two Houses are in great measure preserved by keeping their privileges indefinite: and according to him, if all the privileges of parliament were once to be set down and ascertained, and no privilege to be allowed but what was so defined and determined, it were easy for the executive power to devise some new case not within the line of privilege, and under pretence thereof to harass any refractory member and violate the freedom of parliament. His editor, Mr. Christian, observes upon the fallacy of this reasoning: and, most undoubtedly, the uncertainty of the extent of parliamentary privileges must afford a refractory or arbitrary House of Parliament, the means on the one hand of usurping upon the rightful prerogatives of the crown, and on the other, of invading the just liberties of the people. And accordingly the House of Lords on Feb. 25, 1705, resolved, “That neither House of Parliament hath any power by any Vote or Declaration, to create to themselves any new privilege that is not warranted by the known Laws and Customs of Parliament.” See the Case of Ashby and White, infra.

In Crosby’s Case, the Chief Justice lays it down; that when the House of Commons adjudge any thing to be a contempt or a breach of privilege, their adjudication is a conviction, and their commitment in consequence is execution: and that case seems to assert the doctrine, that the courts of law have no cognizance of questions of contempt or breach of privilege of the House of Commons. “It is true,” said Gould, Justice, “this court did in the instance alluded to (Wilkes’s case) determine upon the privilege of parliament in the case of a libel; but then that privilege was promulged and it existed in records and law books,

May 5.—Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Lords, to acquaint them that this House hath received information, That there is a Petition of Appeal depending before them, at the suit of and was allowed by parliament itself. But even in that case we now know that we were mistaken; for the House of Commons have since determined, that privilege does not extend to matters of libel.”

Blackstone, after telling us that the privileges of parliament are very large and indefinite, proceeds:

“And therefore when in 31 Hen. 6, the House of Lords propounded a question to the judges concerning them, the Chief Justice, sir John Fortescue, in the name of his brethren declared, ‘That they ought not to make answer to that question: for it hath not been used aforetime that the justices should in any wise determine the privileges of the High Court of Parliament. For it is so high and mighty in it’s nature, that it may make laws: and that which is law, it may make no law: and the determination and knowledge of that privilege belongs to the lords of parliament, and not to the justices.’ [Seld. Baronsage.]”

In this passage it is material to note the phrase ‘High Court of Parliament,’ and also to consider how far the premises establish the conclusion. This declaration of Fortescue was made in the notable Case of Thomas Thorpe, 31 Hen. 6, which is reported at some length in 1 Hatsell’s Precedents, 28, and the like doctrine is to be found in many other places. [See what is said by the Managers of the Commons on the fifth day of Lord Stafford’s Trial, A. D. 1680, infra. See also the Case of Lord Delamere, A. D. 1685, infra, where, as it seems, a very nice and subtle distinction, as to the concurrence of the Judges, is made between the privilege of the peerage, and another point of the Lex Parliamenti. See, too, the proceedings upon the matter of Jay and Topham, A. D. 1689, and those in the earl of Devonshire’s Case, A. D. 1687, infra.] But it has not by any means been uncontested. See the Observations of lord Clarendon (note to lord Shaftesbury’s Case, A. D. 1677, infra.) See also the language of Holt, C. J. in the cases of the King v. Knollys, of Ashby and White, and of the Queen v. Paty. So likewise lord Kenyon, in the case of Rex v. Wright, 8 Term Rep. says, “I do not say there can be no case in which the House of Commons, and House of Lords too, may carry their privileges beyond the law; and when that is the case, and the subject comes judicially before a court of law, a court of law will not swerve from its duty, but will decide according to law.” See, too, Mr. Hargrave’s writings already referred to, and particularly his opinion in the case of Bond and Butler. In addition to which (not to mention Wilkes’s case) Mr. Hatsell (see 1 Prec. 41, et seq.) has given us two ancient cases copied by Frynne in the Fourth Register, p. 752, from the Records in the court of Ex-

Thomas Shirley, esq. against sir John Fagg, a member of this House; to which petition, he is, by order of the House of Lords, directed to answer on Friday next; and to desire the Lords to have a regard to the privileges of this chequer, in both which it appears that the judges did take upon them to determine privilege of parliament:

"The first is that of Donne and Walsh, 12 Edw. 4, Rot. 20.

"Barthol. Donne brings his bill against John Walsh, a servant of Henry earl of Essex, for the sum of 14*l.* 18*s.* which Walsh owed upon his bond: To this John Walsh in his answer, produces the king's writ under the great seal; cujus tenor sequitur in hac verba:

"Edwardus Dei gratia rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ, thesaur. et baronibus suis de scaccario, salutem. Cum secundum consuetudinem in regno nostro hactenus optentam et approbatam, domini magnates, milites comitatum, ac cives et burgenses civitatum et burgorum, ad parlamenta nostra de summonitione nostra venientes, ac eorum familiares, ratione alicujus transgressionis, debiti, computi, conventionis aut alterius contractus cujuscunque, dum sic in parlamentis nostris morentur, arrestari minime debeant, imprisonari, aut "implacitari;" ac jam ex querela &c. &c. vobis mandamus, quod si ita est, tunc placito illi coram vobis ulterius tenendo supersedeatis omnino, et ipsum a prisona, siqua occasione prædicta et non alia, detineatur in eadem sine dilutione deliberari faciat. Teste meipso apud Westm. 25 die Novembris, anno regni nostri 12.

"Et prædictus Johannes Walshe jam defendens dicit, quod ipse est et dicto 25 die Novembris et semper postea fuit serviens familiaris prædicti comitis, et cum eo ad prædictum parlamentum venit. Et petit judicium &c. Et super hoc prædictus Bartholomæus petit, quod breve illud, pro eo quod non habetur nec unquam habebatur talis consuetudo, quod magnates et milites comitatum, ac cives et burgenses civitatum et burgorum ad parlamentum de summonitione regia venientium, ac eorum familiares ratione alicujus transgressionis, debiti, computi, conventus, aut alterius contractus cujuscunque dum sic in parlamento regio morentur, minime debeant implacitari, prout in brevi illo specificatur et recitatur, disalloceatur.

"Et super hoc viso et prælecto brevi prædicto per barones, &c. habitoque avisamento justiciariorum domini regis de utroque banco; Quia videtur præfatis baronibus de avisamento justiciariorum prædictorum, quod talis habetur et habebatur consuetudo, quod magnates et milites comitatum, ac cives et burgenses civitatum et burgorum ad parlamentum de summonitione regia venientes, ac eorum familiares, ratione alicujus transgressionis, debiti, computi, conventionis, contractus cujuscunque, dum sic in parlamento regis morentur, capi aut arrestari non debent: sed nullam

House; and that sir Trevor Williams do go up with the Message to the Lords.

Sir Trevor Williams reports, That he had attended the Lords with the Message of this House, concerning sir John Fagg: and that the hujusmodi consuetudinem fore, quod quia implacitari debent, prout in brevi illo supponitur; ideo consideratum est per barones prædictos, quod breve illud disalloceatur, et quod prædictus Johannes Walshe respondeat, brevi prædicto non obstante &c.

"The next case is that of Ryver and Cosyn, taken from the plea roll of the Exchequer, Hil. term, 12 Edw. 4, rot. 7. Here the defendant pleads the king's writ, in which the custom is set forth as followeth:

"Edwardus Dei gratia rex &c. thes. et baronibus suis de scaccario, salutem. Cum, secundum consuetudinem in regno nostro Angliæ hactenus obtentam et approbatam, domini magnates et milites comitatum, ac cives et burgenses civitatum et burgorum ad parlamenta nostra de summonitione nostra venientes, et in eisdem morantes seu residentes, ac eorum familiares et servientes ratione alicujus transgressionis, computi, conventionis, seu alterius contractus cujuscunque, dum sic in parlamentis nostris morentur, arrestari minime debeant, imprisonari, "seu implacitari." Et jam ex gravi querela &c. vobis mandamus quod, si ita est, tunc placito illi supersedeatis omnino &c. &c. Et prædictus Robertus Cosyn jam defendens dicit, quod ipse ad respondendum non compelli debeat, et petit judicium et breve prædictum sibi allocari, &c.

"Et super hoc, prædictus Johannes Ryver petit, quod breve illud, pro eo quod non habetur, nec unquam habebatur talis consuetudo, quod magnates &c. minime debeant implacitari, disalloceatur."

"Et super hoc, The barons with the advice of the judges of both the other courts, reciting, verbatim, their opinion in the former case of Walsh and Donne, "That no such custom existed to prevent their being impleaded," disallow the writ."

Mr. Hatsell refers his readers to Prynne's Observations on these two cases in the 4th Register, p. 762, as containing matter of much parliamentary instruction, but I have not now an opportunity of making such reference.

Mr. Hargrave [See his Preface to lord Hale's Treatise on the Judicature of the Lords' House, p. cxxxix.] possesses a very full report in MS. of Lord Chief Justice Bridgeman's learned judgment in the Case of Benyon and Evelyn, C. B. Trin. 14 Car. 2, in which after a very extensive investigation of the law upon the subject, the authority of the judges to take cognisance of questions of Privilege of Parliament is asserted, and that authority was accordingly exercised in that Case.

This topic of the unsettledness of the Lex et Consuetudo Parliamenti, might be enlarged by Lords will return an answer by messengers of their own.

May 7.—A Message from the Lords by sir William Baversham, and sir Samuel Clarke.

“Mr. Speaker, The Lords have considered of the Message received from the House of Commons, concerning privilege in the case of sir John Fagg, and do return this answer, That the House of Commons need not doubt, but that “the Lords will have a regard to the “Privileges of the House of Commons as they “have of their own.”

May 8.—A Committee was appointed to inspect the Lords Journals, to see what entries the introduction of other particulars, such for instances, as the anciently contested question, Whether Privilege of the House of Commons should be enforced by Writ of Privilege (operating as a supersedeas), or the Speaker's Letter (operating as a prohibition or injunction); the attempt made by the House of Lords, and successfully resisted by Chief Justice Holt, to compel that magistrate to give the reasons of his judgment in Rex v. Knollys [See the Case, infra.]; the sharply-mooted question whether proceedings upon impeachments are abated by dissolution of parliament; the changes in practice set forth by Mr. Hargrave in his learned opinions on the Cases of Bond and Butler and of Perry [See his Juridical Arguments and Collections.]; the uncertainty which prevailed as to the course to be pursued when the exercise of the royal functions was interrupted by his majesty's illness in 1783; the questions frequently agitated and perhaps not yet finally set at rest, concerning the Bishops' right of judicature in cases of blood, and the Lords' interference in money bills. See also in Lord Shaftesbury's Case, A. D. 1677, infra, the proceedings in the House of Lords against him and other peers, and the order for rescinding the same. But enough has already been said upon the subject.

“All privileges,” says Blackstone, “which derogate from the common law are now at an end, save only as to the freedom of the member's person: which in a peer, by the privilege of peerage, is for ever sacred and inviolable; and in a commoner, by the privilege of parliament, for forty days after every prorogation, and forty days before the next appointed meeting [2 Lev. 72.]; which is now in effect as long as the parliament subsists, it seldom being prorogued for more than fourscore days at a time. As to all other privileges which obstruct the ordinary course of justice, they were restrained by the statutes 12 W. 3, c. 3. 2 and 3 Anne c. 18, and 11 Geo. 2, c. 24, and are now totally abolished by statute 10 Geo. 3, c. 50, which enacts, that any suit may at any time be brought against any peer or member of parliament, their servants or any other person entitled to privilege of parliament; which shall not be impeached or delayed by pretence of any such privilege; except that the person are therein made against sir John Fagg a member of this House, and to report the same.

May 12. Dr. Shirley ordered by the Commons to be sent for in custody, to answer his breach of the Privileges of this House, in prosecuting a suit by petition of appeal in the Lords' house, against sir John Fagg a member of this House during the session and privilege of parliament.

And a Committee is also appointed to inspect the Lords Journals, to see what has been done in like cases; and the said sir John Fagg is ordered not to proceed, or make any answer to the said appeal, without the license of this House.

May 14. Sir T. Lee reports from the Committee of a member of the House of Commons shall not thereby be subjected to any arrest or imprisonment. Likewise, for the benefit of commerce, it is provided by statute 4 Geo. 3, c. 33, that any trader having privilege of parliament, may be served with legal process for any just debt, (to the amount of 100*l*.) and unless he makes satisfaction within two months, it shall be deemed an act of bankruptcy; and that commissions of bankrupt may be issued against such privileged traders, in like manner as against any other.”

By stat. 47 G. 3, st. 2, c. 40, it is enacted, That when any bill shall be exhibited in a court of equity against a member of the House of Commons, a sequestration for non-appearance may be obtained, without previously leaving a copy of such bill with such defendant.

Mr. Hatsell informs us :

“On the meeting of the new parliament in November, 1774, a doubt was conceived whether the act which had lately passed, and which had taken away all privilege of parliament [the 10th Geo. 3, ch. 50.] from the servants of members, ought not to have made some alteration in the form of the Speaker's prayer. I confess I was of that opinion; and sir Fletcher Norton at first intended to make an alteration, by claiming all the usual privileges, except where the same had been varied or taken away by any act of parliament. And accordingly as soon as he was elected Speaker, he communicated this his intention to the House. However, upon further consideration and conversation with lord Apsley the Lord Chancellor, he thought it better to abide by the ancient form: Lord Apsley advised this and said, ‘That as no alteration had been made formerly on the passing of the act in king William's time, relating to the privilege of parliament; and as whatever the Commons claimed, neither the allowance of the king, nor indeed the claim itself, could be supposed to include privileges not warranted by law;’ he was of opinion that it would be the safer way, in order to prevent any difficulties which might arise upon an alteration, to adhere to the usual form; and that he was ready to give the king's answer in the accustomed words.’ Sir Fletcher Norton acquiesced in appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords, and the entries therein, in the case between Dr. Thomas Shirley and sir John Fagg a member of this House, That the Committee had perused the Lords' Journals, and found the entries to be as follows :

" April 30. Thomas Shirley, esq. presented a Petition to the Lords.

" Ordered, That the said sir John Fagg may have a copy of the said Petition, and put in his answer thereunto, in writing, on Friday the 7th day of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, if he thinks fit.

" May 5. The Commons send a Message by sir Trevor Williams :

" The Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons in parliament assembled, have been informed, that there is a Petition of appeal depending before their lordships, at the suit of Thomas Shirley, esq. against sir John Fagg a member of their House. To which Petition he is, by their lordships order, directed to answer on Friday next, and desire their lordships to take care of their privileges.

" Answer, That this House have considered of their Message, and will send an Answer by messengers of their own.

" Ordered, That the Committee for Privileges do meet this afternoon, to consider of the Message received from the House of Commons this day, concerning Thomas Shirley, esq. and sir John Fagg, a member of the House, and search precedents in the case, and report to the House to morrow morning.

" May 6. The earl of Berks reported, " That the Committee of Privileges having met and considered of what was referred to them in the case between Thomas Shirley, esq. and sir John Fagg a member of the House of Commons, and the Message from the House of Commons thereupon ; have ordered him to this ; and accordingly sent to acquaint lord Ashley, that he would make the claim in the ancient form of words, without any alteration ; he did so, and received the usual answer.

" This matter, therefore, whether at the time decided right or wrong, is now at rest."

Upon this Mr. Hatsell, after referring to st. 12 and 13 W. 3, c. 3, observes :

" But the difference between this act and the statute of the 10th of Geo. 3, ch. 50, with respect to this question is, that the former act left certain privileges to the servants of members ; so that the Speaker might still very properly claim those privileges, whatever they were : But the latter act expressly takes away from servants all privilege whatever, personal, as well as privilege from suits : It seems therefore rather particular, that the Speaker of the House of Commons should pray, and the Lord Chancellor in his majesty's name should allow, privileges to a set of men, who, by law, have no privilege at all."

It appears that the claim is still made in the ancient form of words, See Cobb, Parl. Deb.

report, That the Committee have found that the House did refer the business of Mr. Hale and Mr. Slingsby,* upon the like Message of the House of Commons, to the Committee of Privileges ; who did report to the House, That it is the undoubted right of the Lords in judicature, to receive and determine in time of parliament, appeals from inferior courts, though a member of either House be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the land ; and the House did agree with the Committee therein : and thereupon the Committee do humbly offer to their lordships, upon this occasion, to take the same course, and to insist upon their just rights in this particular, which their lordships will be pleased to signify to the House of Commons, in such manner as they shall think fit."

" The House agreed with the Committee in this Declaration, and ordered the same to be entered into the Journal-book of this House, as their Declaration, viz.

" That it is the undoubted right of the Lords " in judicature, to receive and determine in " time of parliament, appeals from inferior " courts, though a member of either House be " concerned, that there may be no failure of " justice in the land."

" Then it was moved, That the former Answer sent to the House of Commons, in the case of Mr. Slingsby and Mr. Hale, might be given now to the House of Commons, in this case of sir J. Fagg ; and that the Declaration and Report agreed to this day, might be added to it.

" The Declaration aforesaid was read, and the question being put, Whether this shall be as a part of the Answer to be given to the House of Commons ? It was negatived.

" The Answer returned formerly to the House of Commons, in the case of Mr. Slingsby, and Mr. Hale, was in these words ; " That the " House of Commons need not doubt but that " their lordships will have a regard to the privileges of the House of Commons, as they " have of their own."

" The question being put, Whether this Answer shall be now returned to the Message from the House of Commons ? It was resolved in the affirmative.

" May the 7th, it was sent accordingly.

" May 7. Whereas this day was appointed for sir John Fagg to put in an Answer to the petition and appeal of Thomas Shirley, esq. depending in this House, if he thought fit ; the said sir John Fagg appearing personally this day at the bar, and desiring longer time to put in an Answer thereunto ; It is thereupon ordered, That the said sir John Fagg hath hereby further time given him for putting in his Answer, till Wednesday next, being the 12th day of this instant May, at ten o'clock in the forenoon."

HOUSE OF LORDS, May 14.

The Lord Mohun acquainted the House of

* See the quotation from Hargrave concerning this affair, at the end of this Case,

Lords, "That going out of this House into the Lobby, Dr. Thomas Shirley, calling to his lordship, told him, That a messenger of the House of Commons had arrested him, by virtue of a Warrant under the Speaker's hand, dated the 14th of this instant May; and told him he would not leave him, but follow him until he submitted himself: upon this, the messenger came to the lord Mohun, and delivered him the Warrant; who having read it, the officer would have snatched it out of his hand; but his lordship told him, he would carry it where another use should be made of it."

And his lordship presented the said Paper to this House; which was read as followeth: 'By virtue of an order, made the 12th day of May 1675, by the honourable the House of Commons assembled in parliament, these are to require and authorize you forthwith to apprehend Dr. Thomas Shirley, and bring before the House, to answer his breach of privilege, in prosecuting a suit, by petition of appeal, in the Lords House, against sir John Fagg a member of this House: And for so doing, this shall be your Warrant. Given under my hand on Friday the 14th day of May, in the 27th year of the reign of our sovereign lord king Charles the second, &c. Annoque Domini 1675. 'EDWARD SEYMOUR, Speaker.'

"To sir James Northfolk knight, one of his majesty's serjeants at arms in ordinary now attending the hon. House of Commons, his deputy or deputies."

The House took this matter into consideration, as being a violation of their Privileges. And after some debate, a question being put, "Whether Dr. Thomas Shirley shall be now called in?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Upon this Dr. Thomas Shirley, Patrick Porter, and Richard Clayton, were examined, upon oath, at the bar, concerning this business.

After a further debate, it is ordered, That this Message should be sent to the House of Commons; viz. "That the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, having received a Warrant brought before them, for the apprehending Dr. Thomas Shirley, signed 'Edw. Seymour, Speaker,' which they have herewith sent to be shewed to the House of Commons, do desire to know from that House, whether it be a Warrant ordered by that House or no?"

This Message was sent by sir M. Brampton and sir Wm. Glascocke: who are to let the House of Commons know, "That they are appointed to return with the original Warrant."

HOUSE OF COMMONS, May 14.

Sir John Fagg put in his Answer to the petition of Mr. Shirley.—A debate arising thereupon, touching the privilege of the House,

Resolved, That the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley in the House of Lords, against sir John Fagg, a member of this House, and the proceedings thereupon, are a breach of the undoubted right and privileges of this House."

The House of Commons being informed, that the Warrant of this House for taking of the said Dr. Shirley into custody, was forcibly taken away and detained from the Serjeant at arms his deputy, attending this House, by the lord Mohun;* And the serjeant's deputy being called in and examined as to the matter of fact gave this testimony:

"That he found Dr. Shirley in the inner lobby of the House of Lords, and that he came to him, and desired to speak with him, and acquainted him that he had a warrant from the House of Commons to apprehend him, and desired to know, whether he could shew him any reason to excuse him, that he might not serve the warrant on him: and that he likewise told him, that he would not execute the warrant on him in that place, but desired of him, that he would go along with him freely; and that in case he would not, he would take his opportunity in another place.

"And that the said lord Mohun coming in, in the mean time, required him to shew his warrant; which he producing, the lord Mohun laid hands on it, and held it so fast, that it was in danger of being torn, and that therefore he was forced to part with it, and desiring to have it again, the lord Mohun refused it, but carried the warrant into the House of Lords. That Dr. Shirley afterwards refused to go along with him, saying, that he was not then his prisoner; and that several persons interposing, the doctor escaped from them." Upon debate,

Resolved, "That a Message be sent to the Lords to complain of the lord Mohun for forcibly taking away and detaining the warrant of this House, from the deputy serjeant at arms, for taking of Dr. Shirley into custody; and to demand the justice of the Lords House against the said lord Mohun."

And that the lord Ancram do go up to the Lords with the Message.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue forth a new warrant to the serjeant at arms attending this house, for apprehending Dr. Thomas Shirley, to answer his breach of privilege, for prosecuting a suit by petition of appeal in the Lords House, against sir John Fagg a member of this House, during the session and privilege of parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS, May 14.

A Message was brought from the Commons, by the earl of Ancram and others, to this effect:

"My Lords; I am commanded, by the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons, to complain to your lordships of the lord Mohun, for forcibly taking, and detaining from the deputy serjeant of this House, the warrant of this House, for the apprehending of Dr. Thomas Shirley; and demand the justice of your lordships against lord Mohun."

Ordered, That this Answer be returned to this Message brought from the House of Commons: "That this House hath considered of the Message, and the matter therein complained of; and do find that the lord Mohun hath done nothing herein but what was according to his duty."

The messengers were called in; and the lord-keeper gave them the answer abovesaid.

Whereas Thomas Shirley, esq. his majesty's physician in ordinary, hath a cause depending in this House, by way of appeal, against sir John Fagg, a member of the House of Commons, and, by law and course of parliament, ought to have privilege and freedom from arrest:

It is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, "That the said Thomas Shirley be, and he is hereby, privileged and protected accordingly, by the authority of this House, during the depending of his said cause in this House; and all persons whatsoever are hereby prohibited from arresting or otherwise molesting the said T. Shirley upon any pretence whatsoever, as they and every of them will answer the contrary to this House."

HOUSE OF COMMONS, May 15.

The lord Ancrum reports, from the Lords, that he had in obedience to the commands of the House of Commons attended the Lords, and delivered the Message concerning the lord Mohun's taking away and detaining the warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley: And that the Lords had returned this Answer;

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons; The Lords have considered of your Message, and of the complaint therein; and they return you this Answer, That they find lord Mohun hath done nothing but what is according to his duty."

Resolved, That the appeal brought by Dr. Shirley in the House of Lords against Sir John Fagg, a member of the House of Commons, and the proceedings thereupon, is a breach of the undoubted Rights and Privileges of the House of Commons; and therefore the Commons desire, that there be no further proceedings in that cause, before their lordships.

Ordered, That a Conference be desired with the Lords concerning the privileges of this House, in the Case of sir John Fagg; and that sir Thomas Lee do go up to the Lords to desire a Conference.

A Message from the Lords by sir Mondeford Brampston, and sir William Glascock:

"Mr. Speaker; We are commanded to let this House know, that the Lords spiritual and temporal assembled in parliament, have received a Warrant, signed Edward Seymour, which they have appointed us to shew you; and desire to know, whether it be a warrant ordered by this House?"

The matter of the Message being debated, the question being put, that the word 'unparliamentary,' be part of the Answer to the Lords Message.—It passed in the negative.

Resolved, That the messengers be called in, and that this Answer be returned, "That this House will consider of the Message."

The messengers being called in, Mr. Speaker does acquaint them, that the House will consider of the Message.

Resolved, That the Message last received from the Lords, is an unparliamentary Message.

Resolved, That a Conference be desired to be had with the Lords upon the subject matter of the last Message received from the Lords.

Resolved, That it be referred to Mr. Garraway, &c. to draw up Reasons to be offered at the said Conference.

Then the House being informed, that there is a cause upon an appeal brought up by sir Nicholas Stoughton, against Mr. Onslow, a member of this House, appointed to be heard at the bar of the Lords House:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Lords to acquaint them, that this House has received information that there is a cause upon an appeal brought by sir Nicholas Stoughton against Mr. Onslow a member of this House, appointed to be heard at the bar of their House, on Monday next; and to desire their lordships to have regard to the privileges of this House: And that sir Richard Temple do go up with the Message to the Lords.

Ordered, That Mr. Onslow do not appear any further in the prosecution of the Appeal brought against him by sir Nicholas Stoughton, in the House of Lords.

Ordered, That sir Nicholas Stoughton be sent for in custody of the serjeant at arms attending this House, to answer his breach of privilege in prosecuting a suit in the House of Lords, against Arthur Onslow, esq. a member of this House, during the session and privilege of parliament.

Resolved, That whoever shall appear at the bar of the Lords House, to prosecute any suit against any member of this House, shall be deemed a breaker and infringer of the rights and privileges of this House.

HOUSE OF LORDS, May 17.

The Messengers sent to the House of Commons on Friday last, with the Message concerning the business between Dr. Tho. Shirley and sir John Fagg, return with this Answer:

That they have delivered their lordships Message, with the warrant, to the House of Commons; who return this answer, That they will consider of their lordships Message, as to return of the warrant (which they demanded), they had no answer from the House of Commons.

A Petition of sir Nicholas Stoughton was read; complaining, "That there is an Order of the House of Commons issued out, to attach his person, and so deprive him of his liberty from following his Appeal depending in this House against Mr. Onslow."

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by sir Thomas Lee and others; who did, in the name of the House of Commons, desire a Conference, touching their Privileges in the case of sir John Fagg.

The Answer returned was : That this House agrees to a Conference, and do appoint the same to be presently, in the Painted Chamber. The Lord-Keeper, the Lord-Privy-seal, E. Bridgewater, R. Bolinbroke, E. Shaftsbury. Bp. Sarum, Bp. Rochester, Ld. Hollis, were appointed reporters of this Conference.

The House was adjourned during pleasure, and the Lords went to the Conference : which being ended, the House was resumed.

Then the Lord Keeper and the rest of the Reporters gave the House a Report of the effect of the late Conference ; which was, " to communicate to their lordships, by Richard Temple (who said he was appointed by the House of Commons to communicate to you), a Resolve of that House ; viz. Resolved, &c. That the appeal brought by Dr. Shirley, in the House of Lords, against sir John Fagg, a member of the House of Commons, and the proceeding thereupon, is a breach of the undoubted rights and privileges of the House of Commons ; and therefore the Commons desire, that there be no further proceedings in that cause before their lordships."

The House took the matter of this Conference into consideration ; and, after a serious debate, made this declaration following ;

" The Lords do order and declare, That it is the undoubted right of the Lords, in judicature, to receive and determine, in time of parliament, appeals from inferior courts, though a member of either House be concerned therein, that there may be no failure of justice in the land ; and from this right, and the exercise thereof, the Lords will not depart."

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by sir Richard Temple and others : To acquaint their lordships, that the Commons have received information, that there is a cause upon an appeal brought by sir Nicholas Staughton against Mr. Onslow, a member of the House of Commons, to be heard at the bar of their Lordships House on this day ; and to desire their Lordships to have regard to the privileges of the House of Commons.

The Messengers were called in ; and had this answer returned to their Message :

" That the Lords have considered of their Message : and do declare, That it is the undoubted right of the Lords, in judicature, to receive and determine, in time of parliament, appeals from inferior courts, though a member of either House be concerned therein, that there may be no failure of justice in the land ; and from this right, and the exercise thereof, the Lords will not depart."

The House, taking the petition of sir Nicholas Staughton into consideration, made this ensuing Order

" Upon reading the petition of sir Nicholas Staughton ; shewing, That, having an appeal depending in this House, against Arthur Onslow, esq. a member of the House of Commons, he is in danger of being arrested, by an order of the House of Commons, for that appeal ; and therefore prayeth the protection of this House, that he may have liberty to prosecute his said appeal with freedom : It is thereupon Ordered, That the said sir Nicholas Staughton, and his attorney, and such other person or persons as he shall employ in prosecuting the said appeal before this House, be, and are hereby, privileged and protected accordingly by this House, during the depending of the said appeal before this House ; and all persons whatsoever are hereby prohibited from arresting, imprisoning, or otherwise molesting, the said sir Nicholas Staughton, or his said attorney or agents upon any pretence whatsoever, during the time aforesaid, as they and every of them will answer the contrary to this House."

HOUSE OF COMMONS, May 17.

Sir Richard Temple reports, That the person appointed had attended the Lords, and delivered the Vote of this House, concerning the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley against sir John Fagg.

Sir Thomas Lee reports from the committee appointed to draw up Reasons for the Conference to be had with the Lords, Reasons agreed by the committee ; which are as follow,

" For that the Message is by way of interrogatory upon the proceedings of the House of Commons, in a case concerning the privilege of a member of that House, of which they are proper judges. For that the matter of the Message carries in it an undue reflection upon the Speaker of the House of Commons. For that the matter of the Message doth highly reflect upon the whole House of Commons, in their Lordships questioning that House concerning their own orders ; which they have the more reason to apprehend, because the day before this message was brought to them, the warrant was owned by the complaint of the House of Commons to their lordships, that the same was taken and detained from a servant of theirs, by a peer ; which imports, that the question in that Message could not be for information only, and so tends to interrupt that mutual good correspondence, which ought to be preserved inviolably between the two houses of parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, May 18.

Sir Richard Temple reports from the Lords, That he had attended their lordships according to the command of this House, with the Message in the case of Mr. Onslow : to which the Lords returned an answer, which being in writing, was delivered in at the clerk's table, and read ; and is as followeth :

" The Lords do declare, That it is the undoubted right of the Lords in judicature, to receive and determine in time of parliament appeals from inferior courts, though a member of either House be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the land : and from this right, and the exercise thereof, their lordships will not depart."

The matter of the Lords Answer being debated, Resolved, " That it is the undoubted right of this House, that none of their members be summoned to attend the House of Lords during the sitting or privilege of parliament."

Ordered, That Sir Henry Ford do go up to the Lords, to desire a Conference upon the subject-matter of their Message concerning the Warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley.

HOUSE OF LORDS, May 19. 1

The same Lords that reported the last Conference with the Commons are appointed to report this Conference the Lords are going to. The House was adjourned during pleasure, and the Lords went to the Conference; which being ended, the House was resumed.

The Lord Keeper reported the effect of the Conference; which was managed by Mr. Powle, who said, "That the House of Commons had desired this Conference upon the subject-matter of the Message which the Lords sent to them the 14th of May, concerning the Warrant for apprehending of Dr. Thomas Shirley; to which that House had returned Answer, That they would consider of it; and they found great cause so to do, it being a strange and unusual Message, and that for these reasons following: For that this Message is by way of interrogatory upon the proceedings of the House of Commons, in a case concerning the privilege of a member of that House, of which they are proper judges. 2. For that the matter of the Message carries in it an undue reflection upon the Speaker of the House of Commons. 3. For that the matter of the Message doth also highly reflect upon the whole House of Commons, in their lordships questioning that House concerning their own Orders; which they have the more reason to apprehend, because the day before the Message was brought to them, the warrant was owned, by the complaint of the House of Commons to their lordships, that the same was taken and detained from a servant of theirs by a Peer; which imports that the question in that Message could not be for information only, and so tends to interrupt that mutual good correspondency which ought to be preserved inviolably between the two houses of parliament. Then sir Thomas Lee added, That the House of Commons had hereupon resolved, That it was an unparliamentary Message."

Upon this, the House made this Order following:

"It is Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That it be referred to the Committee for Privileges, to consider and prepare what is fit to be done upon the matters offered this day by the House of Commons, at a Conference had touching the Message of the Lords concerning the warrant for apprehending Dr. Thomas Shirley, and report unto the House; and that the committee meet this afternoon."

HOUSE OF COMMONS, May 20.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the Committee.

tee appointed to draw up Reasons to be offered at the Conference to be had with the Lords upon the Privileges of this House, contained in the Lords' Answer to the last Message of this House, in the case of Mr. Onslow; which Reasons were twice read, and with some alterations at the clerk's table (upon the question severally put) agreed to: which are as follow, viz.

1. "That by the laws and usage of parliament, privilege of parliament belongs to every member of the House of Commons, in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace; which hath often been declared in parliament, without any exception of appeals before the Lords.

2. "That the reason of that privilege is, that the members of the House of Commons may freely attend the public affairs of that House, without disturbance or interruption; which doth extend as well to appeals before the House of Peers, as to proceedings in other courts.

3. "That by the constant course and usage of parliament, no member of the House of Commons can attend the House of Lords, without the especial leave of that House first obtained, much less be summoned or compelled so to do.

4. "If the Lords shall proceed to hear and determine any appeal where the party neither can, nor ought to attend, such proceedings would be contrary to the rules of justice.

5. "That the not determining of an appeal against a member of the House of Commons, is not a failure of justice, but only a suspension of proceedings in a particular case, during the continuance of that parliament, which is but temporary.

6. "That in case it were a failure of justice, it is not to be remedied by the House of Lords alone, but it may be by act of parliament."

Then sir Trevor Williams reports from the Lords, That he had attended, and desired a Conference with the Lords on the Privilege of this House, contained in the Lords Answer to the Message of this House, in the case of Mr. Onslow: And that the Lords will return an Answer by messengers of their own.

Mr. Powle reports, from the Conference had with the Lords upon the subject matter of the former Conference, concerning the Warrant for apprehending Dr. Shirley, That the Lords had returned an Answer to the Reasons of this House, delivered at the former Conference, and are as follow:

"The Lords have appointed this Conference, upon the subject matter of the last Conference, and have commanded us to give these Answers to the Reasons and other matters then delivered by the House of Commons.

"To the first Reason the Lords conceive; that the most natural way of being informed; is by way of question; and seeing a paper here which did reflect upon the privileges of the Lords' House, their lordships would not proceed upon it till they were assured it was owned by the House of Commons: But the Lords had no occasion at that time, nor do they now think fit to enter into the debate of the House of Commons being or not being proper judges in the case concerning the privilege of a member of that House; their lordships necessary consideration upon sight of that paper, being only, how far the House of Commons ordering (if that paper was theirs) the apprehension of Dr. Shirley, for prosecuting his appeal before the Lords, did entrench upon their lordships' both privilege and undoubted rights of judicature in the consequence of it, exempting all the members of both Houses from the judicature of this the highest court of the kingdom; which would cause a failure of that supreme justice, not administrable in any other court, and which their lordships will never admit.

"As to the second Reason, the Lords answer, That they do not apprehend how the matter of this Message is any reflection upon the Speaker of the House of Commons.

"To the third Reason. The Lords cannot imagine how it can be apprehended in the least to reflect upon the House of Commons, for the House of Peers, upon a paper produced to their lordships, in form of a warrant of that House, whereof doubt was made among the Lords, whether any such thing had been ordered by that House, to enquire of the Commons, whether such warrant was ordered there or no? And without such liberty used by the Lords, it will be very hard for their lordships to be rightly informed, so as to preserve a good correspondence between the two Houses, which their lordships shall endeavour; or to know when warrants in the name of that House are true or pretended: And it is so ungrounded an apprehension, that their lordships intended any reflection in asking that question, and not taking notice in their Message of the complaint of the House of Commons owning that warrant, that the Lords had sent their Message concerning that paper to the House of Commons, before the Lords had received the said Commons' complaint.

"But their lordships have great cause to except against the unjust and strained reflection of that House upon their lordships, in asserting that the question in the Lords' Message could not be for information, as we affirm, but tending to interrupt the mutual correspondence between the two Houses; which we deny, and had not the least thought of.

"The Lords have further commanded us to say, That they doubt not when the House of Commons have received what we have delivered at this Conference, they will be sensible of their error, in calling our Message strange, unusual, or unparliamentary. Though we cannot but take notice, that their Answer to our Message, That they would consider of it, was the first of that kind that we can find to have come from that House."

The question being put, Whether the House be satisfied with the Reasons delivered by the Lords at the last Conference? it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That a Free Conference be desired with the Lords upon the matter delivered at the last Conference; and that the former managers do attend, and manage the Free Conference.

May 21.

The House resolved on Wednesday next to proceed in the further consideration of that part of the Message relating to appeals from inferior courts. Sir Trevor Williams ordered to go up to the Lords, to desire a Conference upon the privileges of this House, contained in their Answer to the Message touching Mr. Onslow's case, which he accordingly did; and reports, That the Lords will return an Answer thereto by messengers of their own.

HOUSE OF LORDS, May 27.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by Sir Thomas Lee and others, to this effect:

That the House of Commons heretofore did desire a Conference, touching their privileges, in the case of Mr. Onslow; and their lordships returned Answer, That their lordships would send an Answer by messengers of their own. The House of Commons looks upon this as a case of great consequence to the privileges of their House; and therefore now desire a Conference, concerning the privileges of their House in the case of Mr. Onslow."

The Lords entered into a serious debate of this Message, and a paper was offered to the House, as an Answer to be returned to this Message. The said Paper was read, as followeth:

"The Lords have considered of their Message; and shall be ever ready to grant the House of Commons a Conference, in any thing which may concern the privileges of their House: but they find that the desire of this Conference is upon the same ground with the former Message of 12th instant, which was upon the Answer sent by the Lords in the case of Mr. Onslow on the 17th instant, wherein the whole case concerns the judicature of the Lords, on which they can admit of no debate, nor grant any Conference."

The question being put, "Whether the Answer which shall be returned to this Message from the House of Commons shall be the substance contained in this Paper?"

It was resolved in the negative.

Memorandum, Before the putting of the abovesaid question, these Lords following desired leave to enter their dissents, if the question was carried in the negative, which accordingly they did:

"Because, they do humbly conceive, this question being carried in the negative, deprives this house of the advantage of making use of that Answer to the House of Commons, which would have been the surest way to have justifi-fed and preserved the right of the Lords in judicature upon this occasion. (Signed) J. BRIDGWATER. MOHUN. STAMFORD. GREY DE ROLLESTON.

Then a second Paper was offered to the consideration of the House, and read as followeth:

"That the Lords did not agree to a Conference on the Message of 21st instant, because it was desired upon the Answer sent by the Lords in the case of Mr. Onslow on the 17th instant, wherein the whole matter concerns the judicature of the Lords, on which they can admit no debate, nor grant any conference: but this present Message being for a Conference concerning the privileges of the House of Commons; the Lords have agreed to a Conference and appoint it to be to-morrow morning, at ten of the clock, in the Painted Chamber; always provided, That nothing be offered at the Conference that may any ways concern their lordships judicature."

The question being put, "Whether this Paper shall be the Answer returned to this Message of the House of Commons?"

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Dissentiente, "STAFFORD."

The messengers that brought this Message from the House of Commons were called in, and had the abovesaid Answer delivered to them by the lord keeper.

Then the House nominated these Lords following to be reporters of this Conference with the House of Commons: Ld. Privy Seal. Marq. Winton, Earl Bridgwater, Earl Bolingbrooke, Abp. York, Bp. Sarum, Bp. Rochester.

The Instructions to be given to the Reporters of the Conference with the House of Commons to-morrow are, "That they be limited, in case the managers of the said Conference from the House of Commons shall enter upon any reasons contrary to the proviso upon which the same was granted, and particularly if they shall offer any thing against the judgment of this House delivered the 17th instant, in answer to the Message brought by sir Richard Temple in the case of Mr. Onslow, the Reporters shall withdraw from the said Conference, and resort to the Lords, without further attendance."

HOUSE OF COMMONS, May 28.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the Committee to whom it was referred to draw up Reasons to be offered at a Conference to be had with the Lords upon the subject-matter of their Answer to the last Message of this House, in the case of Mr. Onslow, several Reasons agreed by the said committee; which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered the same in at the clerk's table; where the same being twice read were, upon the question, severally agreed unto, and are as follow, viz.

"For that the Commons desired a Conference upon their privileges concerned by the Lords' Answer to a Message sent to the Lords the 18th of May, in the case of Mr. Onslow; their lordships have not agreed any Conference in the case of Mr. Onslow; but have only agreed a Conference concerning their privileges in general, without reference to the case of the said Mr. Onslow; which was the only subject-matter of the desired Conference.

"The limitation in the Lords' agreement to a Conference, with proviso that nothing be offered at the Conference that may any way concern their lordships judicature, is in effect a denial of any Conference at all, upon the subject on which it was desired; which ought not to be: the judicature which their lordships claim in appeals against a member of the House of Commons, and the privilege of that House, being in that case so involved, that there can be no Conference upon the latter, without some way touching upon the former.

"That this manner of agreeing to a Conference with any limitation or proviso, is against the course of proceedings betwixt the two Houses of parliament, in coming to Conference; and doth seem to place a power in the managers of such Conferences, to judge whether such provisos be broken or not; and accordingly to proceed, or break off the Conference upon their own judgments."

HOUSE OF LORDS, May 31.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by sir Lionel Jenkins and others: To desire a Conference, upon the matter of the Lords Answer to the desire of the Commons, for a Conference in the case of Mr. Onslow.

The messengers of the House of Commons were called in, and had this Answer returned: That the Lords have considered of this Message, and will send them an Answer by messengers of their own.

A Message was sent to the House of Commons, by sir Mundiford Brampston and sir William Beversham: That the Lords desire a present Conference, in the Painted Chamber, upon their not coming to the Conference desired by them on Thursday last, and by the Lords appointed to be at ten of the clock, in the Painted Chamber, on Friday the 28th of this instant May.

Ordered, That the Lord Treasurer, Lord Privy Seal, earl of Bridgwater, earl of Shaftsbury, and the lord Hules, do presently withdraw, and prepare what is fit to be said to the House of Commons at this Conference, and report the same to the House.

The Lord Privy Seal reported what the Lords had prepared to be said at the Conference; which was read as followeth:

"The Lords have appointed this Conference, out of that constant desire and resolution they have to continue a fair correspondence between the two Houses, which is of the essence of parliamentary proceedings.—For this end, their lordships have commanded us to tell you, That they cannot but take notice of the House of Commons failing to be on Friday last at a Conference desired by themselves; and appointed by the Lords, at ten of the clock, in the Painted Chamber. That they conceive it tends to an interruption of all Parliamentary Proceedings, and to evade the right of the Lords, to appoint time and place for Conferences."

The House approved of this, to be delivered to the House of Commons at this Conference.

Whereas Thomas Shirley, esq. hath an Appeal depending in this house, to which sir John Fagg, a member of the House of Commons, hath put in his answer as defendant: it is this day ordered, That this house will hear counsel at the bar, in the cause upon the said appeal and answer, on Tuesday the 8th day of June next.

Whereas Thomas Shirley, esq. hath a Petition and Appeal depending in this house, against sir John Fagg, a member of the House of Commons: This House being moved, "That counsel may be assigned to plead the cause of the said Thomas Shirley, upon his said Appeal;" it is ordered, That serjeant Pemberton, Mr. Osley, Mr. Richard Edwards, and Mr. Samuel Trist, (named for the said Thomas Shirley) be, and are hereby, appointed to manage and plead the said cause, at the bar of this house, on the part and behalf of the said Thomas Shirley, on Tuesday the 8th day of June next, and at such other times as it shall be depending in this house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, May 31.

Sir Isacoline Jenkins reports, That he had attended the Lords, with the Message of this House, for a Conference upon the subject matter of the Lords' Answer to the last Message of this House, in the case of Mr. Onslow; and that the Lords had sent answer, that they would return Answer by messengers of their own.

A Message from the Lords by sir Mondeford Brampston, and sir William Beversham.

"Mr. Speaker; The Lords have commanded us to acquaint you, that they desire a Conference presently in the Painted Chamber, with the House of Commons, upon their not coming to the Conference desired by them on Thursday last, and by the Lords appointed to be at ten of the clock in the Painted Chamber, on Friday the 28th of this instant May."

The messengers being withdrawn, and the Message debated, a present Conference upon the question was agreed. And the messengers being called in, Mr. Speaker acquaints them, that the House had agreed to a present Conference.

Ordered, That the former members that were appointed to manage the former Conference in the case of Mr. Onslow, do attend and manage this Conference.

Ordered, That it be referred to the former Committee, who are appointed to draw up Reasons, to be offered at a Conference to be had with the Lords, upon the subject matter of their Answer to the Message of this house, in the case of Mr. Onslow; to consider of the matter delivered by the Lords at the last Conference; and to prepare and draw up further Reasons, to be offered at another Conference to be had with the Lords; upon the subject matter of the last Conference. And that the Committee do meet this afternoon at five of the clock in the Speaker's chamber. And Mr. serjeant Maynard, and Mr. Sawyer, are to have notice to attend the same.

June 1.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords, and to see what proceedings have been entered, in the case of Mr. Dalmahoy and Mr. Onslow; that they had inspected the Lords Journals, as to the case of Mr. Dalmahoy, and collected what proceedings had been in that case; but had no opportunity or time, yet to do it in the case of Mr. Onslow. Which proceedings being reported, were read, and delivered in at the clerk's table; and are as follow, viz.

"April 19, 1675. The Appeal brought by Crispe and Crispe, complaining against a decree in Chancery made, wherein Mr. Dalmahoy is recited to be one of the petitioners; Cranbourne and Bowyer are ordered to put in an Answer, and Dalmahoy, if he please.

"May 12. Ordered, That this house will hear counsel at the bar, upon the petition and appeal of sir Nicholas Crispe and others, against the lady viscountess Cranbourne, the lady Anne Bowyer, and Thomas Dalmahoy, esq. and their answer thereunto, depending in this house, on Wednesday the 19th of this instant May, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; whereof the petitioners are to cause timely notice to be given to the said defendants, or their agents in the said cause, for that purpose.

May 16. Whereas sir Nicholas Crispe, bart. having an appeal depending in this house, against the lady Cranbourne, lady Bowyer, and Thomas Dalmahoy, esq. a member of the House of Commons; hath prayed that counsel may be assigned him to plead his cause upon the said appeal, and hath named counsel for that purpose:

"It is ordered, That sir John Churchill, serjeant Peck, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, named by the said sir Nicholas Crispe, be, and are hereby appointed to open, and manage the said cause, on the part and behalf of the said sir Nicholas Crispe, on Thursday the 27th day of this instant May, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; and at such other times, as it shall be depending in this house.

"Upon reading the Petition of sir Nicholas Crispe, bart. Thomas Crispe and John Crispe, esqrs. shewing, that having an appeal depending in this house against Thomas Dalmahoy, esq. a member of the House of Commons, and others; they are in danger of being arrested by an Order of the House of Commons; and therefore pray the protection of this house, that they may have liberty to prosecute their said appeal with freedom.

It is thereupon ordered, That the said sir Nicholas Crispe, bart. John Crispe, and Thomas Crispe, or any of them, their or any of their counsel, agents or solicitors, or such other person or persons as they shall employ, in prosecuting the said Appeal before this House, be, and are hereby privileged, and protected accordingly by this house, until the matter upon the Appeal be determined by their lordships. And all persons whatsoever are hereby prohibited from arresting, imprisoning, or otherwise molesting the said sir Nicholas Crispe, John Crispe, and Thomas Crispe, or any of them, their or any of their counsel, agents, or solicitors, upon any pretence whatsoever, during the time prefixed, as they or such of them will answer the contrary to this house.

"May 26. The cause between sir Nicholas Crispe, &c. plaintiffs, and Thomas Dalmahoy, esq. defendant, appointed to be heard the 27th, was ordered to be heard the 28th May.

"May 27. Upon reading the petition of sir Nicholas Crispe, complaining, that the counsel, assigned him by this house, to plead his cause at the bar, wherein Mr. Dalmahoy is one of the defendants, do refuse to plead for him in this case, in regard of a vote of the House of Commons; sir Nicholas Crispe was called in, and testified, that he shewed the order of this house to serjeant Peck, serjeant Pemberton, sir John Churchill, and Mr. Porter.

"Whereupon it is ordered, That whereas sir John Churchill, serjeant Peck, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, were by order of this house, dated on the 19th instant, assigned to be of counsel for sir Nicholas Crispe, John Crispe, and Thomas Crispe, in their cause depending in this house against Thomas Dalmahoy, esq. a member of the House of Commons, and other defendants, at such time as the said cause shall be appointed to be pleaded at the bar of this house; having appointed to hear the said cause by counsel on both sides, to-morrow at three of the clock in the afternoon: it is this day ordered, That the said John Churchill, serjeant Peck, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, be, and are hereby required, to appear at the bar of this house, to-morrow, at three of the clock in the afternoon, as counsel to plead in the said cause, on the behalf of the said sir Nicholas Crispe, John and Thomas Crispe, as they will answer the contrary to this house.

"May 28. Counsel heard at the bar on both parts, upon the Petition and Appeal of sir Nicholas Crispe, &c. and the answer of Diana viscountess Cranbourne, &c. and Thomas Dalmahoy, esq. put in thereunto, concerning a decree in Chancery: Resolved, the petition and decree be dismissed.

"May 28. This day the house heard the counsel of sir Nicholas Crispe, John Crispe, and Thomas Crispe, upon their petition and appeal depending in this house; and also the counsel of the lady Bowyer, and Mr. Dalmahoy, upon their answer thereunto; and after a serious consideration thereof, the question being put, Whether this petition and appeal shall be dismissed this House?

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, sir John Churchill,

Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Mr. Porter, attending at the door, in obedience to the order of this house; and being severally called in; Mr. Speaker did severally acquaint them, that they were summoned to give an account to the house of their appearing as counsel at the bar of the House of Lords, in the prosecution of a cause depending upon an Appeal, wherein Mr. Dalmahoy, a member of this house, is concerned; in the manifest breach of the order of this house; and giving up, as much as in them lies, the rights and privileges of the Commons of England.

And they having answered, and made their excuses to the effect following, That they had no notice of the Order or Vote of this house, but what they had heard in common discourse abroad; and because they conceived Mr. Dalmahoy, a member of this house, might be concerned, they refused several times to appear as counsel, or to accept their fees: but being assigned of counsel, for sir Nicholas Crispe; and an Order of the House of Lords being served on them, to attend, at their peril; and that then attending; and Mr. Dalmahoy having put in his Answer in the Lords House, and not insisting on his Privilege afterwards; and the counsel for the lady Bowyer, who was the principal party concerned, denying to be of counsel for Mr. Dalmahoy; they conceived they might safely appear as counsel, without breach of the Order, or invading the rights and privileges of this House; which was not intended by them. And sir John Churchill, by way of further excuse for himself, said, that he had witnesses ready to prove, that Mr. Dalmahoy was willing and desirous to have the business go forward. And the said Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, and Mr. Porter, did all of them humbly submit themselves to the pleasure of the House, if they had in any thing misbehaved themselves:

And being withdrawn; and the matter debated;

The question being put, That Serjeant Pemberton be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House:

The House divided; for the Yeas, 154; for the Noes, 146.

And so it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That serjeant Pemberton,* sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Peck, and Charles Porter, esq. be taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms attending this house, for their breach of the privilege of this house.

* "During the debate upon this Resolution, some ladies were in the gallery peeping over the gentlemen's shoulders. The Speaker spying them, called out, 'What Borough do those ladies serve for?' to which Mr. Wm. Coventry replied, 'They serve for the Speaker's Chamber!' Sir Thomas Littleton said, 'The Speaker might mistake them for gentlemen with fine sleeves, dressed like ladies.' Says the Speaker, 'I am sure I saw petticoats.' 4 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 732.

A motion being made, That sir John Fagg, a member of this house, who without leave, has appeared in the Lords house, and put in his Answer to the appeal of doctor Shirley; after the matter of his privilege was, at his instance, in question in this house, and a message sent up to the Lords, on his behalf; for his breach of privilege of this house, might be sent prisoner to the Tower; And the matter being debated;

Ordered, That sir John Fagg, a member of this house, be sent to the prison of the Tower: And that Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the serjeant at arms attending this house, for conveying him to the Tower, to be there kept in safe custody, during the pleasure of the house, for his offence in breaking the privilege of this house.

Ordered, That the lieutenant of the Tower of London, do take sir John Fagg, a member of this house, into his custody, for his offence in breaking the privilege of this house; and him to detain in safe custody, during the pleasure of the house.

A motion being made, That Mr. Dalmahoy might be sent to the Tower, for waving his privilege, and putting in an Answer to a Petition exhibited against him in the House of Lords; but it appearing, that his Answer was put in, before any thing of the privilege of this house was in question; and that he had since stood upon his privilege, without appearing any further, or making any defence therein;

The question being put, that Mr. Dalmahoy be sent to the prison of the Tower; It passed in the Negative.

Ordered, that sir Nicholas Crispe, Mr. John Crispe, and Mr. Thomas Crispe, be summoned to attend this house to-morrow morning, ten of the clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS, June 1.

Information was given to this house, by the oaths of sir William Waller and Mr. Buchanan, "That they did see serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, and one more, going with a Serjeant at Arms to the Speaker of the House of Commons, being in the custody of the Serjeant upon account of being committed by the House of Commons; and that serjeant Pemberton desired Mr. Buchanan to acquaint the Lord Privy Seal, that they were in the custody of the Serjeant at Arms of the House of Commons."

The like sir William Waller testified.

Mr. Buchanan, being called in again, said, "That he discoursing with them as they were going into the House of Commons to appear there, they told him it was because they were of counsel with sir Nicholas Crispe."

The house entering into debate of this business, appointed the Lord Privy Seal, the earl of Bridgwater, the earl of Shaftsbury, and the lord Holles, to draw and pen an Order, in this extraordinary case: to declare the sense and resolution of the house according to the debate, and for the bringing these persons before this House to-morrow morning, to be released.

The Lord Privy Seal reported the draught of the ensuing Order; which was read, as followeth:

"The House of Peers being made acquainted by examination of two witnesses upon oath at their bar, that the lower house of parliament had ordered into custody of their serjeant, Mr. Serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, heard at their lordships bar, for doing their duty therein; and judging this to be a great indignity to the king's majesty in this his highest court of judicature in this kingdom, and an unexampled usurpation, and breach of privilege against the whole House of Peers, and tending to the subversion of the government of this kingdom, and a transcendent breach on the right and liberty of the subject, which is not to be impeached but by due process of law, and being by the law of the land concerned in all respects to do themselves and any oppressed subjects right; do order the gentleman usher of the black-rod attending this house to repair to any place or prison within the kingdom of England where the said persons, or any of them, or Mr. Charles Porter counsellor at law, are, or shall be, detained or held in custody; and from any person or persons detaining them, or any of them, to demand delivery of them without fees; and the said usher of the black-rod is hereby empowered to call all persons necessary to his assistance herein, and to make return of this warrant to-morrow morning, by eight of the clock, to this House; and this shall be a sufficient authority on that behalf."

"To the gentleman usher of the black rod attending this House, his deputy and deputies; and to all mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, constables, and other his majesty's officers and loving subjects, who are to be aiding and assisting in the execution hereof."

The House approved of this Order, and ordered it to be signed by the clerk of the parliaments.

HOUSE OF LORDS, June 2.

The gentleman usher of the Black Rod gave the House an account of the execution of the Warrant of this House made yesterday: which was to this effect:

"That he hath met with serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter: and sir John Churchill only was in the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending the House of Commons; whom he took into his care, and required him and the other persons, by virtue of his warrant, to appear before the Lords in parliament this morning."

He further said, "That this morning, sir John Churchill being in the room adjoining to this house, the Serjeant at Arms attending the House of Commons came to him, and would have had him go along with him as his prisoner: upon this the gentleman usher took sir John Churchill into his care, from the custody of the serjeant."

Then serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, were called one after another; and gave the House a large and particular account of the proceedings against them by the House of Commons, and their Serjeant at Arms. They all confessed, "That they were all called into the House of Commons and told by the Speaker, That they had subverted and betrayed the liberty of the subject and privilege of parliament, in pleading for sir Nicholas Crispe, against Mr. Dalmahoy, at the bar of the House of Lords."

After a serious debate of this business, it was proposed, "To send a Message, to have a Conference with the House of Commons to-morrow morning, in the Painted-Chamber, upon matters of high importance, concerning the dignity of the king, and the safety of the government."

Then it was moved, "That these words ["In his highest court of judicature"] might be part of the Message."—And the question being put "Whether these words shall be part of the Message?" It was resolved in the Negative.

A Message was sent to the House of Commons, by the Lord Chief Justice of the court of Common Pleas and the Lord Chief Baron: to let them know, that the Lords desire a Conference with the House of Commons, at ten of the clock tomorrow morning, in the Painted Chamber, upon matters of high importance, concerning the dignity of the king, and the safety of the government.

Next, the House thought it requisite to give sir John Churchill and the other counsellors the protection of this House, to preserve them from any future arrests concerning this business.

Whereupon the Order following was made:

"Whereas sir John Churchill hath been taken into custody by the Serjeant at Arms attending the House of Commons, by virtue of a warrant signed by the Speaker of that House, and that endeavours have been to take Mr. Serjeant Peck, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, into custody, by that or the like warrant, for appearing at the bar of the House of Peers, as counsel for sir Nicholas Crispe, in his appeal against Thomas Dalmahoy esq. a Member of the House of Commons, as upon the several examinations of them at the bar of this house, and by other proofs, was attested: it is this day ordered, That the said Serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, and every of them, be and are hereby privileged and protected by this House: and all persons whatsoever are hereby prohibited from arresting, imprisoning or otherwise molesting, the said Serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, or any of them, upon any pretence of authority whatsoever, for the cause aforesaid, as they will answer the contrary to this House.

Then serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serj. Pemberton, and Mr. Porter were called in.

And the Lord-Keeper told them, "That this House takes notice that they had done their duty, in attending at the bar, as they were commanded, in the case of sir Nicholas Crispe and others; and did commend them for it; That this House will never suffer those who obey their commands to be arrested, or detained by any arbitrary or illegal imprisonment: That therefore this House had resolved to take them into their protection, and for that end have caused the Order of this House for their protection to be delivered to each of them; to the end that whosoever shall presume to attach them may be the more inexcusable, when they shall see the Order of this House to the contrary, And this House expects from them, that they do not presently submit to any illegal imprisonment; and if any attempt shall be made upon them, that then they resort to this House for further directions."

And then an Order of Protection was delivered to each of them.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by sir Edward Deering and others: To desire a Conference upon the subject matter of the last Conference.

The Answer returned was: That the Lords have taken their Message into consideration; and do agree to a Conference, as is desired: And they do appoint it to be presently, in the Painted Chamber.

The House was adjourned during pleasure, and the Lords went to the Conference; which being ended, the House was resumed.

Then the Lord Privy Seal reported the effect of this Conference; which was managed by Mr. Vaughan, who said, "That this Conference was desired by the House of Commons upon the matter delivered by the Lords at the last Conference.

"The House of Commons do agree with the Lords, that Conferences between the two Houses of Parliament are essential to parliamentary proceedings, when they are agreed in the usual and parliamentary way: But the manner of the Lords agreement to a Conference to have been upon Friday the 28th of May last at ten of the clock, in the Painted Chamber, with limitation and proviso, was such as did necessitate the House of Commons to forbear to meet at that Conference, and gave the first interruption to parliamentary proceedings in Conferences between the two Houses.

"For that the Conference desired by the Commons was upon their privilege, concerned in the Answer of the Lords to a Message of the House of Commons sent to the Lords the 17th of May, in the case of Mr. Onslow, to which the Lords did not agree; but did only agree to a Conference concerning their Privileges in general, without reference to the case of the said Mr. Onslow, which was the only subject matter of the desired Conference.

"The limitation in the Lords agreement to a Conference, 'with proviso that nothing be offered at the Conference that may any way concern the Lords Judicature,' is in effect a denial of any Conference at all upon the subject upon which it was desired; which ought not to be.

"The judicature which the Lords claim in appeals against a member of the House of Commons, and the privilege of that House in that case, is so involved, that no Conference can be upon the latter, without some-way touching the former.

"That this manner of agreeing to a Conference with any limitation or proviso, is against the course of proceedings between the two Houses of Parliament in coming to Conferences; and doth seem to place a power in the managers of such Conferences to judge whether such provisos be broken or not, and accordingly to proceed, or break off the Conference, upon their own judgments.

"That the particular limitation, 'that nothing be offered at the Conference that may any way concern the judicature of the Lords,' appears unreasonable; for that your lordships judicature in parliament is circumscribed by the laws of the land, as to your proceedings and judgments; and is, as well as all other courts, subject to parliament.

"The House of Commons doubt not but that, when the Lords have considered of what is delivered at this Conference, the good correspondence which the Lords express they desire to continue between the two Houses (which the Commons also are no less careful to maintain) will induce them to remove the present interruption of coming to Conferences; and therefore to agree to the Conference, as it was desired by the House of Commons, upon the Privileges of their House, concerned in the Lords' Answer to the Message of the House of Commons in the Case of Mr. Onslow."

HOUSE OF COMMONS, June 2.

The House called upon sir James Norfolke, the Serjeant at Arms attending this House, to give an account of Mr. serjeant Pemberton, sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Peck, and Mr. Charles Porter, who were yesterday committed to his custody for their breach of privilege of this House: who thereupon informed the House, That he was, by force, interrupted in the execution of the Order, and they were escaped from his custody.

And the matter being debated; and the House altogether unsatisfied with the Account given, and the excuse by him made, for not executing the Order of this House;

Resolved, That sir James Norfolke, the present Serjeant at Arms attending this House, for betraying his trust, in not executing his office, according to the Order of this House, in bringing in custody sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, serjeant Peck, and Mr. Charles Porter, to answer their breach of privilege against this House, be sent prisoner to the Tower: and that Mr. Speaker do issue out his warrant to the lieutenant of the Tower, for taking him into custody.

Ordered, That his majesty be addressed to appoint another Serjeant at Arms to attend this House, in the stead of sir James Norfolke; he having betrayed his trust, in not executing his office, according to the orders and direction of this House: and that such members of this House, as are of his majesty's privy council, do present the Address of this House to his majesty.

Whereas sir James Norfolke, Serjeant at Arms attending this House, after the order of this House pronounced for his commitment to the Tower, did withdraw himself, without leave of the House; and being not to be found, though inquiry and search was made for him;

Ordered, That Robert Read, esq. the Serjeant at Arms now attending this House pro tempore, by direction of this house, do apprehend sir James Norfolke; and bring him to the bar of this House.

Resolved, That sir James Norfolke shall not any longer have the privilege of this House.

Ordered, That the thanks of this House be returned to Mr. Speaker, for his great care of the honour and service of this House, in issuing his warrant for executing the Order of this House, for taking the persons into custody, which were committed yesterday to the Serjeant at Arms.

Whereas sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Peck, and Mr. serjeant Pemberton, were, by virtue of an Order of this House yesterday, in the custody of the Serjeant at Arms then attending this house; and, by the negligence of the said Serjeant, have made their escape:

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue out his warrant to Robert Read, esq. the Serjeant at Arms now attending this House, to bring the said sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Peck, and Mr. serjeant Pemberton, in custody to the bar of this House to-morrow morning, nine of the clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS, June 3.

Whereas Mr. serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter counsellor at law, have the protection of the House of Peers granted to them, and every of them, from all arrests and imprisonments, for appearing as counsel at the bar of this House, upon an appeal brought by sir Nicholas Cripe, against the lady Bowyer, Mr. Dalmahoy, and others:

It is this day ordered, That the lieutenant of the Tower of London, and all other keepers of prisons, and gaolers, and all other persons whatsoever, be, and they and every of them is and are hereby, strictly prohibited from arresting, imprisoning, detaining, or otherwise molesting or charging, the said gentlemen, or any of them, in this case, as they and every of them will answer the contrary to this House at their peril.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, June 3.

Mr. Vaughan reports, That the Lord Privy Seal did manage the Conference; and had delivered the occasion and intent of the Conference: Which Mr. Vaughan did report to the House, to the effect following; viz.

"The Lords do take notice of the House of Commons their ordering into custody of their serjeant, Mr. serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, counsellors at law, assigned by their lordships to be of counsel in an appeal, heard at their lordships bar, in the case of sir Nicholas Crispe, against the lady Bowyer, Mr. Dalmahoy, and others. The Lords in parliament, where his majesty is highest in his royal estate, and where the last resort of judging upon Writs of Error, and appeals in equity, in all causes, and over all persons, is undoubtedly fixed, and permanently lodged.

"It is an unexampled usurpation, and breach of privilege, against the House of Peers, that their orders or judgments should be disputed, or endeavoured to be controuled, or the execution thereof obstructed, by the lower house of parliament, who are no court, nor have authority to administer an oath, or give any judgment.

"It is a transcendent invasion on the right and liberty of the subject, and against Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and many other laws, which have provided, that no freeman shall be imprisoned, or otherwise restrained of his liberty, but by due process of law."

"This tends to the subversion of the government of this kingdom, and to the introducing of arbitrariness and disorder:

"Because it is in nature of an injunction from the lower house, who have no authority nor power of judicature over inferior subjects; much less over the King and Lords, against the orders and judgments of the supreme court."

"We are further commanded to acquaint you, That the Lords have therefore, out of that justice, which they are dispensers of, against oppression, and breach of laws, by judgment of this court, set at liberty, by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, all the said serjeants and counsellors; and prohibited the lieutenant of the Tower, and all other keepers of prisons, and gaolers, and all persons whatsoever, from arresting, imprisoning, detaining, or otherwise molesting or charging the said gentlemen, or any of them, in this case: and if any person, of what degree soever, shall presume to the contrary, their lordships will exercise the authority with them intrusted, for putting the laws in execution: and we are further commanded to read to you a roll of parliament in the first year of the reign of king Hen. the fourth, whereof we have brought the Original with us."

And a debate arising thereupon;

Resolved, That a Conference be desired with the Lords, upon the subject matter of the last Conference.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the Serjeant at Arms attending this House, for the apprehending Charles Porter, esq. and bring him to the bar of this House, to answer the breach of privilege objected against him.

A petition of sir John Fagg, was read, submitting himself to the House, and craving their pardon for his offence, and praying, he might be released of his imprisonment.

Ordered, That sir John Fagg be released and enlarged from his imprisonment in the Tower.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, June 4.

Ordered, That the thanks of the House be returned to Mr. Speaker, for causing Mr. serjeant Pemberton, formerly committed, by order of this House, to the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House, for a breach of privilege, to be seized, and taken into custody, in Westminster-Hall, for his breach of privilege.

The House being informed, That sir Jo. Churchill, Mr. Serj. Peck, and Mr. Charles Porter, who were ordered to be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House, are now in Westminster Hall;

Ordered, That the Serjeant at Arms now attending this House do go with his mace into Westminster-Hall, and do execute the order of this House, and the warrant of Mr. Speaker thereupon, for seizing and bringing in custody Mr. serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, for their breach of the privilege of this House.

The Serjeant returning, gave an account, That he had executed the order of this House, and Mr. Speaker's warrant thereupon; and had brought the said Mr. serjeant Peck, sir Jo. Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, in custody, into the Speaker's chamber.

The question being put, That sir Jo. Churchill be sent to the Tower, for his breach of privilege, and contempt of the authority of this House; the House divided. For the Yeas, 152. For the Noes, 147: and so it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Mr. serjeant Peck, for his breach of privilege and contempt of the authority of this House, be sent to the Tower.

Ordered, That Mr. serjeant Pemberton be sent to the Tower, for his breach of privilege, and contempt of the authority of this House.

Ordered, That Mr. Charles Porter be sent to the Tower, for his breach of privilege and contempt of the authority of this House.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the lieutenant of the Tower, to take into his custody the bodies of sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Peck, Mr. serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, for their offence in breaking the privileges, and contemning the authority of this House; there to remain in safe custody during the pleasure of this House.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue his warrant to the Serjeant at Arms now attending this House, to convey sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Peck, Mr. serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Cha. Porter to the Tower, there to be kept in safe custody during the pleasure of this House, for their offence in breaking the prisoners, and contemning the authority of this House.

HOUSE OF LORDS, June 4.

It was moved, "That this House would proceed to take into consideration the great Breach of Privilege committed in Westminster Hall this morning, whereof a member of this House can give an account."

Whereupon the Lord Lovelace said, "That, being in the Court of Chancery this morning, he did see the serjeant of the House of Commons, come down into the Court of Chancery, and seize sir John Churchill within the bar, and Mr. Porter at the bar: that they refused to go with him, and did read the protection of the Lords: notwithstanding that, he seized them; and would not suffer Mr. Porter to go on in a cause that he was then pleading."

Several persons, that were eye-witnesses to the matter of fact, did deliver their knowledge at the bar upon oath, as followeth:

Nathaniel Reading, esq. saith, "That he was present in the Court of Chancery, when the Serjeant at Arms attending the House of Commons, being accompanied with several of the door keepers of that House, and others, went into the said Court; and saw him lay his hand upon sir John Churchill, and demanded him to go along with him: whereupon the said sir John Churchill desired that he might not be taken out of the said Court, for that he was under the protection of the House of Lords, and desired that the said serjeant would hear the said protection read; and some part of the same was read by the said sir John Churchill accordingly. But, notwithstanding the same, the said Serjeant took the said sir John Churchill, and forced him to rise up. Whereupon the said sir John Churchill, before his being carried away out of the Court, applied himself to the Honourable the Master of the Rolls, and said, "That he was very sorry to see that he was so carried away in the face of that Court where his majesty was always taken to be personally present." And the said sir John Churchill and Mr. Charles Porter (who read his protection from the House of Lords to the said Serjeant likewise) were carried up, by the said Serjeant and several others who attended him, into the lobby before the door of the House of Commons, and were clapped up into the little room belonging to the said Serjeant; and the door was shut upon them, and guarded by Cary, one of the servants belonging to the said Serjeant."

And he further declared, "That going along with the said Serjeant, as he was carrying up his prisoners, he said to him, "That he believed the House of Lords would ill resent what had been done by him; and that he believed the Gentleman Usher would be sent again to demand the prisoners." And thereupon the said Serjeant declared to him, "That, in case the Black Rod came to demand the prisoners, he would not deliver them."

And further he testified, "That he was present in the said lobby when the Speaker of the House of Commons brought Mr. serjeant Pemberton up with him, and heard the Speaker give order to the Serjeant attending the House of Commons to secure Mr. serjeant Pemberton; and the door was forthwith locked up, and Mr. serjeant Pemberton was presently after carried up into the Speaker's chamber."

Next, Jasper Churchill, gentleman, testified, "That he was at the bar of the Court of Chancery, when the Serjeant at Arms attending the House of Commons, being accompanied with sir Henry Ford and several other members of the said House, and Mr. Goldsborough the younger, clerk of the said House, and several others of the officers of the said House, did go into the said Court; and saw the said Serjeant take sir John Churchill by the hand, and bring him forth of the said Court; and some of the said Serjeant's servants laid hands on the said sir John Churchill, and they carried him and Mr. Charles Porter into the lobby of the House of Commons; and the said Mr. Goldsborough, and Cooper the door-keeper told him, that thirty or forty of the members of the House of Commons went along with them."

Then this House being informed, "That sir William Beversham and sir Edward Lowe sat in the Chancery as masters of the Chancery when this fact was done;" they were sent for. Who, being come, declared upon oath their knowledge in this business.

Sir William Beversham testified, "That he did see the Serjeant of the House of Commons, with his mace, come this morning into the Court of Chancery, the Court then sitting, and the Master of the Rolls then sitting judge, with two masters (whereof he was one; and the Serjeant did lay hold upon sir John Churchill, then sitting within the bar, and charged him to go along with him. Upon which demand, sir John Churchill pulled out of his pocket a paper, purporting a protection of the Lords in parliament (as he said), and read it to the Serjeant openly in the said Court: yet, notwithstanding, the Serjeant pulled him up, and caused him to go along with him; who, before his going out of the Court, turned to the bench, and declared, "That it was the first time that any person was taken out of that Court by any such means," or used words to that effect; and was then led away by the Serjeant."

He said further, "That soon after, the same Serjeant came again, with his mace, and took hold of Mr. Porter, then standing without the bar of the Chancery, and demanded him to go along with him: to which the said Mr. Porter replied, "That he had a protection from the Lords in parliament," and openly shewed and read the same to the said Serjeant: howbeit, the said Serjeant pulled him down by the sleeve, and led him away."

He testified further, "That about half a quarter of an hour after, the same Serjeant came again, with his mace, into the Court of Chancery, and demanded serjeant Peck to go along with him; who made answer, "That he had a protection from the House of Lords," and showed the same unto him: yet, nevertheless, the said Serjeant took him out of the said Court, and led him away.

"That there was a great multitude of people standing in and about the Court when the said Serjeant did carry the said persons away; so as, by reason of such interruption, the Court could not proceed in their business for some time."

Then sir Edward Lowe, One of the masters of the chancery, declared upon oath, "That he this morning, about ten of the clock, sitting in the High Court of Chancery, did see and observe the Serjeant of the House of Commons, with his mace, come into the said Court, and made towards sir John Churchill, one of his majesty's counsel; and laying his hand on him, the said sir John Churchill told the Serjeant, "That he had the protection of the House of Lords; and, as he believes (he not being able, by reason of the noise in and about the Court, and a crowd of people then interposing, to hear distinctly), read the same: Which being done, the said Serjeant, being within the Court, reached over the bar, and in like manner laid his hand on Mr. Charles Porter counsellor of law (at that time either making or defending a motion); who also declared he had the Lords' protection, and taking it out of his pocket, did very audibly read the same all over. After which, the Serjeant taking sir John Churchill with him, the said sir John, as he was going away through the Court, turning his face towards the bench, spoke these, or words to the like effect: (videlicet,) "I am the first man that ever after this manner was taken out of this Court, where the king is, or is supposed to be personally present." The said Serjeant then, going on the outside of the bar, took down the said Mr. Charles Porter from the place wherein he stood before the motion was over wherein he was engaged."

He further said, "That whilst these things as above mentioned were acting, the business of the Court was somewhat interrupted."

"That the said Serjeant of the House of Commons, about half a quarter of an hour after he had taken away sir John Churchill and Mr. Charles Porter, he came a second time into the Court of Chancery, and there took into custody Mr. serjeant Pecke, one other of his majesty's counsel; but whether the said Mr. serjeant Pecke did produce, read, or declare he had any protection, he did not observe."

Then William Pecke, esq. upon oath, declared, "That he, being this morning at the bar of the Court of Chancery, did see one bearing a mace (which was said to be the mace of the House of Commons) come into the Court of Chancery, to sir John Churchill; who publicly reading in the said Court a writing, which he doth apprehend to be the protection of the House of Lords, the said sir John Churchill did soon after go along with the said Serjeant; and presently after the said Serjeant came to Mr. Charles Porter, and took him away from the said Court; and about half a quarter of an hour after, the said Serjeant came to Mr. serjeant Pecke, and took him also from the said Court."

He further said, "That about one hour before the Court of Chancery sat, he did see Mr. serjeant Pemberton go along part of Westminster Hall, with the Speaker and the said Serjeant of the House of Commons; and did hold a paper towards the said Speaker and Serjeant, which he doth believe was the protection of the House of Lords."

Paul Bowes, esq. upon his oath, declared, "That he was this morning at the Court of Chancery bar, and did see one bearing a mace (which was said to be the mace of the House of Commons) come into the Court of Chancery, and did lay his hand upon sir John Churchill, then in the said Court; and said, "That he arrested him:" And thereupon the said sir John Churchill did take out of his pocket a paper which he declared to be the protection of the House of Lords, and did read part of the same openly, without interruption: and then a gentleman, who was affirmed to be one of the House of Commons, and followed the Serjeant who bare the said mace, said, "Do not let him read it," or used words to that effect. Notwithstanding which, the said sir John Churchill did proceed in reading the said protection; and afterwards the said Serjeant told him, "That (notwithstanding the said protection) he must go with him;" or used words to that effect. And the said sir John Churchill did then rise from his seat, and went with the said Serjeant; and the said Serjeant did then also put forth his hand to Mr. Charles Porter, and told him, "He arrested him:" And the said Mr. Porter did acquaint him, "That he had the protection of the House of Lords;" and did openly read part of the same; but, by reason of the noise in the Court, he did not bear the same read out: But the Serjeant said, "He must go with him;" and then came to the outside of the bar, where the said Mr. Porter stood, and took him along with him; and about half a quarter of an hour after, the said Serjeant came into the Court of Chancery again, with his mace, and arrested Mr. serjeant Pecke, who told him, "He had the like protection of the House of Lords;" and the said Serjeant did reply, "That he had the like warrant against him;" or used words to that effect: And thereupon the said Mr. serjeant Peck did go along with the officer that bare the mace."

The House hereupon Ordered, That the gentleman usher of the black rod attending this house do forthwith attach the body of serjeant Topham, at present attending the House of Commons, for having seized and taken into custody Mr. serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Pemberton, and Mr.

Porter, contrary to the order and protection of this House granted to them, and produced to him; and that the said Usher of the Black Rod is hereby authorized and required to demand the persons of the said serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, from what person soever he shall find them to be in the custody of, without paying fees; and this shall be a sufficient warrant in that behalf.

To the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod attending this House, his Deputy and Deputies.

Ordered, That an humble Address be made to his majesty (by the Lord Treasurer, Lord Great Chamberlain, Lord Steward, viscount Newport, and the lord Maynard), from this House, to desire that his majesty would be pleased to appoint another Serjeant to attend the House of Commons, in the place of serjeant Topham, whom the Lords have, for some great offences, ordered to be taken into custody by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod.

HOUSE OF LORDS, June 4, p. m.

A question was propounded: "Whether this House will proceed upon no other business, except what shall be recommended by his majesty, till they have received full satisfaction, and vindicated themselves in this breach of their privileges." The question being put, "Whether this question shall be put?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Then, instead of putting the question, it was ordered, That this House will proceed upon no other business (except what shall be recommended by his majesty), till they have received full satisfaction, and vindicated themselves in this breach of their privileges.

Then the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod gave the House an account of what was committed to his care, as followeth:

"My Lords; In pursuance of your lordships Order committed to my charge, I enquired where serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter, were gone; and being informed that they were sent by water through sir John Cotton's garden to the Tower, I took a pair of oars, and so I went to the Tower, and went to the lodging of the Lieutenant of the Tower, and so went up stairs; and in a great room I found the said Lieutenant, and in the said room were serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter: And so, taking my black rod in one hand, and the Lords' warrant in the other, I did address myself to the said Lieutenant, and told him, 'That I was commanded, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, to demand the persons of Mr. serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Porter: I did, therefore, in the name of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and by the authority of the black rod, command him to deliver me the afore-named persons.' He did after demand to see my warrant: I did shew it him; and he would have shewed me his, but I would not look upon it, but demanded his answer: and he told me, 'That they were committed by order of the Commons, and that he could not release them without their order; and if the Lords did commit any to him, he could not release them without their lordships' order.'

"My Lords; I did likewise endeavour to take serjeant Topham, according to your lordships' order and command; but was informed that he kept himself up with Mr. Speaker, in the Speaker's chamber, so that I could not come at him."

The Lord Treasurer reported, "That the Lords appointed to present the humble Address of this House to his majesty, for appointing a new serjeant at arms to attend the House of Commons in the place of serjeant Topham, have attended his majesty with the said Address; who returns this Answer; That his majesty had given order for sending a new serjeant to attend the House of Commons, before the Address was presented to him."

Ordered, That the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Great Chamberlain, Lord Steward, viscount Newport, and the lord Maynard, do present the humble thanks of this House to his majesty, for appointing a new serjeant at arms to attend the House of Commons, in place of serjeant Topham.

Ordered, That the humble Address of this House be presented to his majesty, by the Lord Treasurer, Lord Great Chamberlain, Lord Steward, viscount Newport, and lord Maynard; shewing, "That whereas this House directed the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to demand the persons of serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, of what person soever he should find them in custody of; and, in pursuance of that direction, finding them to be committed prisoners to the Tower of London by order of the House of Commons, repaired to sir John Robinson, his majesty's Lieutenant of the Tower, and demanded them of him, who refused to deliver them otherwise than by order of the House of Commons; This House humbly desires his majesty, that he will be pleased to remove the said sir John Robinson from that trust, and to appoint some other person to be his Lieutenant of the Tower."

The Lord Treasurer reported, "That he and the rest of the Lords have presented the humble Address of this House to his majesty, for removing sir John Robinson from his trust of being lieutenant of the Tower; and his majesty says, he will return an Answer thereunto at the first sitting of the House to-morrow."

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by sir Henry Capell, &c. To desire a Conference, upon the matter delivered by their lordships at the last Conference.

The Answer returned was: That the Lords have considered their Message, and will return an Answer by messengers of their own.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, June 4, p. m.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue out a warrant to John Topham, esq. serjeant at arms now attending this House, to authorize and require him, that, if any person or persons shall attempt or go about to arrest, imprison, or detain him from executing his office, or from his attendance upon this House, to apprehend such persons, and bring them in custody, to answer their breach of privilege; and to require and authorize all persons to be aiding and assisting to him therein.

Resolved, That John Topham, esq. serjeant at arms now attending this House, shall have the privilege of this House.

Resolved, That sir Henry Capell do go up to the Lords, to desire a Conference upon the matters delivered at the last Conference.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the committee, the Reasons agreed to be offered at the Conference to be had with the Lords, upon the matters delivered at the last Conference: which were twice read; and, with some amendments made at the table, severally agreed; and are as followeth; viz.

"Your lordships having desired the last Conference upon matters of high importance, concerning the dignity of the king, and the safety of the government; the Commons did not expect to hear from your lordships at that Conference, things so contrary to, and inconsistent with, the matter upon which the said Conference was desired, as were then delivered by your lordships.

"It was much below the expectation of the Commons, that, after a representation in your lordships' Message of matters of so high importance, the particular upon which the Conference was grounded, should be only the commitment of four lawyers to the custody of their own serjeant at arms, for a manifest violation of the privileges of their House.

"But the Commons were much more surprised, when your lordships had introduced the Conference, with an assurance it was in order to a good correspondency between the two Houses, that your lordships should immediately assume a power to judge the order of the House of Commons, for the imprisonment of Mr. serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, Mr. serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, to be illegal and arbitrary, and the execution thereof a great indignity to the king's majesty, with many other high reflections upon the House of Commons, throughout the whole Conference; whereby your lordships hath condemned the whole House of Commons as criminal: Which is without precedent, or example, or any ground of reason so to do.

"It is not against the king's dignity for the House of Commons to punish by imprisonment a commoner, that is guilty of violating their privileges, that being according to the known laws and custom of parliament, and the right of their privileges, declared by the king's royal predecessors in former parliaments; and by himself in this.

"But your lordships claiming to be the supreme court, and that his majesty is highest in his royal estate in the court of judicature, there is a diminution of the dignity of the king; who is highest in his royal estate, in full parliament; and is derogatory to the authority of the whole parliament, by appropriating it to yourselves.

"The Commons did not infringe any privileges of the House of Peers, but only defend and maintain their own; On the other side, your lordships do highly intrench upon the rights and privileges of the House of Commons, denying them to be a court, or to have any authority or power of judicature; which, if admitted, will leave them without any authority or power to preserve themselves.

"As to what your lordships call a transcendent invasion of the rights and liberty of the subject, and against Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and many other laws; the House of Commons presume, that your lordships know, that neither the Great Charter, the Petition of Right, nor many other laws, do take away the law and custom of parliament, or of either House of parliament; or else your lordships have much forgotten the Great Charter, and those other laws, in the several judgments your lordships have passed upon the king's subjects, in cases of privilege.

"But the Commons cannot find, by Magna Charta, or by any other law or ancient custom of parliament, that your lordships have any jurisdiction, in cases of appeal from courts of equity.

"We are further commanded to acquaint you, that the enlargement of the said persons imprisoned by order of the House of Commons, by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod; and the prohibition, with threats to all officers and other persons whatsoever, not to receive or detain them, is an apparent breach of the rights and privileges of the House of Commons: and they have therefore caused them to be retaken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms, and hath committed them to the Tower.

"As to the Parliament-Roll of 1st Hen. 4. caused to be read by your lordships at the last Conference, but not applied, the Commons apprehend it doth not concern the case in question; for that this record was made upon occasion of judgments given by the lords, to depose and imprison their lawful king; to which the Commons were unwilling to be made parties: and therefore the Commons conceive it will not be for the honour of your lordships, to make further use of that record.

"But we are commanded to read to your lordships the Parliament-Roll of the 4th of Edward the 3rd, n. 6; which if your lordships please to consider, they doubt not but your lordships will find occasion to apply it to the present purpose."

Sir Hen. Capell reports, that he had attended the Lords, to desire a Conference: and that the Lords made Answer, that they would return Answer by messengers of their own.

HOUSE OF LORDS, June 5.

The Lord Treasurer reported, "That his majesty intends to give their lordships an Answer to their Address about removing the lieutenant of the Tower himself; therefore it is his majesty's pleasure, that this House do wait upon him in the banquetting house at Whitehall at four of the clock this afternoon; and his majesty desires their lordships would adjourn to that time."

He was further commanded to let their lordships know, "That his majesty had sent the like Message to the House of Commons."

The Lords agreed to meet here half an hour after three of the clock; and go in a body to Whitehall, to attend his majesty.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, June 5.

Mr. Secretary Coventry acquainted the House, that it was his majesty's desire, that the House would adjourn till four of the clock in the afternoon, and that both Houses should at that time attend him in the banquetting house at Whitehall.

A debate arising touching the removal of John Topham, esq. Serjeant at Arms in ordinary, attending the House yesterday, the further debate thereof was adjourned till five of the clock in the afternoon. And then the House adjourned till four in the afternoon.

HOUSE OF LORDS, June 5, p. m.

The House was adjourned till five of the clock; and the Lords went to attend the king at Whitehall. The Lords being returned, the House was resumed.

Then the Lord Keeper reported, "That the Lords and Commons attended the king, in the Banquetting House at Whitehall, this afternoon; where his majesty told them, he had something to say wherein he desired he might not be mistaken, and therefore had put it in writing."

Which the Lord Keeper read as followeth:

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"You may remember that at the meeting of this session, I told you, no endeavours would be wanting to make the continuance of this parliament unpracticable. I am sorry that experience hath so quickly shewed you the truth of what I then said: but I hope you are all convinced that the intent of all this, in the contrivers, is to procure a dissolution. I confess, I look upon it as a most malicious design of those who are enemies to me and to the church of England; and were the contrivers known, I should not doubt but the dislike of their practices would alone be a means of bringing the Houses to a good understanding. But, since I cannot prescribe any way how to arrive at the remedy of it, I must tell you plainly my opinion, that the means of coming to any composition betwixt yourselves cannot be without admitting of such full Conferences as either convince one another by the reasons then offered, or enable me to judge rightly of the differences when all hath been said upon both sides which the matter will afford: for I am not to suffer these differences to grow to disorders in the whole kingdom, if I can prevent it; and I am sure my judgment shall always be impartial between my two Houses of parliament: but I must let you know, that whilst you are in debate about your privileges, I will not suffer my own to be invaded.

"I have nothing more to say to you at this time; but to desire, as I did when we met first, that you would consider, and not suffer ill mens designs to hinder this session from a happy conclusion."

After this, his majesty said to the Lords, "That he would give them an Answer to their Address concerning the removal of the Lieutenant of the Tower, so soon as their lordships should return to their House; thinking it not fit to do it before the House of Commons."

Then the Lord Treasurer reported, "That his majesty's Answer to the Lords' Address, for the removing sir John Robinson from being Lieutenant of the Tower, is, That his majesty hath considered the circumstances of that matter, and is not satisfied how with justice he can remove him."

HOUSE OF COMMONS, June 5, p. m.

The House then took into consideration his majesty's Speech, and resolved nem. con. That the humble Thanks of this House be returned to his majesty, for the gracious expressions in his speech this day made to both Houses of parliament; and such members of this house as are of his majesty's privy-council are desired to present the humble thanks of this House to his majesty.

Resolved, That it doth not appear to this House, that any member thereof hath either contrived or promoted the difference between the two Houses of Parliament; or in asserting the rights of the Commons of England, and the privileges of this House; or to have done any thing inconsistent with his duty, or the trust reposed in him.

HOUSE OF LORDS, June 7.

The Serjeant at Arms attending this House was called upon, to give an account what he hath done in the execution of the delivery of the four writs of Habeas Corpus delivered to him by the Lord Keeper. And he gave this account following:

"In obedience to your lordships' commands, I received from the right hon. the lord keeper of the great seal of England, about half an hour past eight of the clock, or thereabouts, four writs of Habeas Corpus; and immediately I did repair to the Tower, and delivered them to the Lieutenant of the Tower; and after he received them, he desired me to present his humble duty and service to this honourable house, and that he should do his duty inasmuch as in him lay to both houses; and desired me to let the right hon. the lord keeper know, that he would wait upon him to-morrow morning; or words to that effect."

Then the Lord Keeper gave the house an account of sir John Robinson's coming to him early this morning: "That he acknowledged the receipt of the Habeas Corpus; and would have excused himself to his lordship, by reason of some votes or orders of the House of Commons, which his lordship would not examine; but told him, the writs were not returnable to him, but to the Lords in parliament whose servant the lieutenant of the Tower is, and ought to do his duty according to law."

The Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod was commanded to enquire without, whether the Lieutenant of the Tower did appear; who returned this account "that the lieutenant did not appear."

Whereupon the House commanded the serjeant at arms to go, with his mace, into Westminster-hall, and make O yes three times, and then make proclamation in these words: "Sir John Robinson, Lieutenant of the Tower, come forth, and return the writs of Habeas Corpus before the Lords in parliament, as you are commanded."

The Serjeant at Arms gave the House an account "that he had made proclamation, at the top of the stairs between the court of Chancery and the court of King's-bench in Westminster-hall, to command sir John Robinson to return the writs of Habeas Corpus before the Lords in parliament, as he was commanded."

Upon consideration what to do next.

The Lord Keeper gave an account, "That the Order yesterday was directed to the cursitors, to prepare the writs of Habeas Corpus; whereas the said writs should have been made by the clerk of the crown in Chancery."

Hereupon the House had the Opinion of the Judges this day present; viz. The Lord Chief Justice of the court of Common Pleas, and Judge Atkins.

And these two questions were propounded to them:

"Whether these writs of Habeas Corpus, sealed with the great seal of England, be effectual in law, though the writs be written by the cursitors, and not by the clerk of the crown?"

The Opinion of the Judges was, "That the writs, being under the great seal of England, are good and effectual in law, by what hand soever they were written."

"Whether there may an alias Habeas Corpus be issued out of the office of the clerk of the crown, notwithstanding the former were issued out as aforesaid, and not returned by the lieutenant of the Tower?"

And the Opinion of the Judges is, "That an alias Habeas Corpus is good in law, and well issued in that case; else it were in the power of the gaoler, by the not returning the first writ, to hinder the issuing out of an alias."

The same Opinion Mr. Attorney General was of.

Upon this, the House made this Order following:

"Forasmuch as oath hath been made, that four writs of Habeas Corpus have been delivered to the Lieutenant of the Tower, returnable in parliament this day, which are not returned: It is ordered, That the clerk of the crown in Chancery do prepare four several and respective writs of alias Habeas Corpus (with a penalty of 40*l.* in each writ to be contained), to be sealed by the Lord Keeper of the great seal of England, and directed to the Lieutenant of the Tower, and returnable into the House of Peers, for bringing the bodies of Edward Peck serjeant at law, sir John Churchill knight, Francis Pemberton serjeant at law, and Charles Porter, esq. counsellor at law, with the cause of their commitment, to the House of Peers, to-morrow morning, at ten of the clock; and that the Serjeant at Arms attending this House, or his deputy, be, and is hereby required to carry the said writs to the lieutenant of the Tower for that purpose."

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by sir Thomas Littleton and others; "For preserving a good correspondence between the two Houses, he was commanded to put their lordships in mind of a Message from the House of Commons lately, to desire a Conference, concerning the matter of the last Conference; to which the Lords had returned this Answer, That they would send an Answer by messengers of their own."

HOUSE OF COMMONS, June 7.

The House resumed the adjourned debate concerning John Topham, esq. serjeant at arms.

Resolved, That what John Topham, esq. serjeant at arms attending this House did, in retaking, bringing in custody, and conveying to the Tower, sir Jo. Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Peck, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Ch. Porter, was in pursuance of his duty and by the order of the House.

Resolved, That the further debate concerning Jo. Topham, esq. serjeant at arms, be adjourned till Wednesday morning next.

A copy of an Order of the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, dated the 31st of May last, and served on sir John Fagg on Friday last, was tendered and read; whereby the Lords have ordered to hear counsel at the bar, in the cause upon the Appeal there brought by Thomas Shirley, esq. against the said sir John Fagg, and the Answer thereunto on Tuesday the 8th of this instant June, at ten o'clock in the forenoon: And a debate arising thereupon;

Resolved, nem. con. That as to the case of Appeal, brought against sir John Fagg in the House of Lords, sir John Fagg shall have the protection and the assistance of this House.

Resolved, nem. con. That if any person or persons shall be aiding or assisting in putting in execution any Sentence or Judgment that shall be given by the House of Lords, upon the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley, against sir John Fagg, a member of this House; such person and persons shall be adjudged and taken to be betrayers of the rights and liberties of the Commons of England, and the privileges of this House; and shall be proceeded against accordingly.

Ordered, That these Votes be made public, by setting them up in Westminster-hall, and in the lobby of this House: And that the clerk of the House do take care to see it done.

The House being informed, that the House of Lords have ordered a Habeas Corpus to issue forth under the great seal, for bringing sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton and Mr. Charles Porter, to the bar of their House;

Ordered, That those members that were appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords, in the case of the Lords' proceedings touching the making navigable the rivers in the counties of Hertford and Bedford, do inspect the Journals and Minutes of the proceedings of the House of Lords, touching the commitment of the said sir Jo. Churchill, Mr. Serj. Peck, Mr. Serj. Pemberton and Mr. Ch. Porter, by order of this House.

June 7, p. m.

Sir Thomas Littleton reports, That in pursuance of the Order of the House, the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords, went to Mr. Browne's house; and that Mr. Walker went to Mr. Browne to acquaint him therewith: And that Mr. Browne returned this answer, That he could not shew the Minutes, or acquaint them with any thing that hath been done this day.

Resolved, nem. con. That no person committed for breach of privilege by order of this House, ought to be discharged during the session of parliament but by order or warrant of this House.

Resolved, nem. con. That the Lieutenant of the Tower in receiving and detaining in custody sir John Churchill, Serjeant Peck, Serjeant Pemberton and Mr. Porter, performed his duty according to law: And for so doing he shall have the assistance and protection of this House.

Resolved, nem. con. That the Lieutenant of the Tower, in case he hath received or shall receive any writ, warrant, order or commandment to remove or deliver any person or persons committed for breach of privilege, by any order or warrant of this House, shall not make any return thereof, or yield any obedience thereunto before he hath first acquainted this House, and received their order and directions how to proceed therein.

Ordered, That these Resolves be immediately sent to the Lieutenant of the Tower.

June 8, 1675.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Lords to acquaint them, That in order to preserve a good correspondence between the two Houses, the knights, citizens and burgesses in parliament assembled, had sent to remind their lordships of the last Message, wherein a Conference was desired with them by this House, upon the matters delivered at the last Conference by the Lords: And that sir Thomas Littleton do go up to the Lords with the said Message.

Sir John Robinson, Lieutenant of the Tower, gives an account to the House of his receiving the persons committed to the Tower into his custody, in obedience to the Order of this House; and that the black rod coming afterwards with an Order from the Lords, and demanding them out of his custody, he denied to deliver them because they were committed by Order of this House: And that after he had received the Votes of this House last night, relating to the said persons now prisoners in the Tower by Order of this House, sir George Charnock serjeant at arms, attending the Lord Keeper of the great seal of England, brought him four several writs of Habeas Corpus under the great seal of England, for bringing the said several persons this morning at ten o'clock, before his majesty in his present parliament at Westminster: and that he did, according to the vote of this House, humbly crave the advice and direction of this House, what he should do therein.—And the matter being debated;

Resolved, That the Thanks of the House be given to the said sir John Robinson.

Mr. Speaker did, by the direction of the House, intimate to sir John Robinson Lieutenant of the Tower, that he should forbear to return the said writs of Habeas Corpus; acquainting him, that it was the opinion of that House, that he could be in no danger in not returning the same.

The several writs of Habeas Corpus issued out under the great seal of England, and directed to sir John Robinson, Lieutenant of the Tower, for bringing the bodies of Mr. Serjeant Peck, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, sir John Churchill and Mr. Porter, before his majesty in his present parliament at Westminster, about ten o'clock this morning, being severally read; and the matter debated;

Resolved, That the Committee that was yesterday appointed to inspect the Journals of the Lords' House, do inspect the said Journals and see what proceedings hath been since had there, concerning Mr. Serjeant Peck, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, sir John Churchill and Mr. Porter; and report the same to the House.

Resolved, That it be referred to the Committee formerly appointed to inspect the Lords' Journals, and all the gentlemen of the long robe, or any three of them, to inspect and search all such rolls, records and entries, as they shall think necessary; and see what precedents they can find in cases of like nature, concerning writs of Habeas Corpus and returns thereof; and to report the state of the whole matter, with their opinions therein, to the House to-morrow morning: And they are to meet at three o'clock this afternoon, in the Speaker's chamber: And are empowered to send for persons, papers and records.

Ordered, That all committees that were to sit this afternoon (except the said committee last appointed) be adjourned.

Resolved, That the further debate of the matter touching the writs of Habeas Corpus, directed and delivered to the Lieutenant of the Tower, be adjourned till to-morrow morning.

June 9.

Sir Thomas Clarges reports, from the committee, to whom it was referred to search for Precedents, touching writs of Habeas Corpus returnable in parliament; That the Committee had found several precedents of writs of Habeas Corpus returnable in parliament, and had considered of them; and that the committee thereupon had agreed upon four resolves, to be presented to the House: Which he read in his place; and afterwards, delivered the same in at the clerk's table: Where they, being twice read, were, upon the Question, severally agreed: and are as followeth:

Resolved, nem. con., That no commoners of England, committed by order or warrant of the House of Commons for breach of privilege or contempt of that House, ought, without order of that House, to be by any writ of Habeas Corpus, or other authority whatsoever, made to appear, and answer, and do and receive a determination in the House of Peers, during the session of parliament, wherein such person was so committed.

Resolved, nem. con., That the order of the House of Peers, for the issuing out of writs of Habeas Corpus, concerning serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, is insubstantial and illegal; for that it is general, and expresses no particular cause of privilege; and commands the king's great seal to be put to writs not returnable before the said House of Peers.

Resolved, nem. con., That the Lord Keeper be acquainted with these resolutions; to the end that the said writ of Habeas Corpus may be superseded, its contrary to law, and the privileges of this House.

Resolved, nem. con., That a Message be sent to the Lords, to acquaint them, that serjeant Peck, sir John Churchill, serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, were committed by order and warrant of this House, for breach of the privilege, and contempt of the authority of this House.

Resolved, That a Conference be desired with the Lords, upon the subject matter of the last Conference.

A Message was this day sent from his majesty in the House of Lords, by sir Edward Carteret, Usher of the Black-Rod, commanding this honourable House to attend his majesty forthwith in the House of Peers; and accordingly Mr. Speaker went up with the House.

VOL. VI.

where his majesty was pleased to make the following Speech to them:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I think I have given sufficient evidence to the world, that I have not been wanting on my part, in my endeavours to procure the full satisfaction of all my subjects, in the matters both of religion and property: I have not only invited you to those considerations at our first meeting, but I have been careful, through this whole session, that no concern of my own should divert you from them.

"Besides, as I had only designed the matter of it to be the procuring of good laws, so for the gaining of them, I have already waited much longer than I intended; and should have been contented still to have continued my expectation, had there any hopes remained of a good conclusion. But I must confess, the ill designs of our enemies have been too prevalent against those good ones I had proposed to myself, in behalf of my people; and those unhappy differences between my two Houses are grown to such a height, that I find no possible means of putting an end to them, but by a prorogation. It is with great unwillingness that I make use of this expedient, having always intended an adjournment for the preserving of such bills as were unfinished. But my hopes are, that by this means the present occasion of differences being taken away, you will be so careful hereafter of the public, as not to seek new ones, nor to revive the old.

"I intend to meet you here again in winter, and have directed my Lord-Keeper to prorogue you till the 13th of October next."

October 13, 1675.

The King came to the House and began thus:

"I meet you now with more than an usual concern for the event of this session; and I know it is but what may be reasonably expected from the care I have for the preservation of the government. The causes of the last prorogation, as I for my part do not desire to remember, so I hope no man else will, unless it be to learn from thence how to avoid the like occasion for the future: And I pray consider how fatal the consequences may be, and how little benefit is like to redound to the people by it. However, if any of that kind shall arise, I desire you would defer those debates, till you have brought such public bills to perfection, as may conduce to the good and safety of the kingdom." [The rest of the speech relates to his majesty's recommending the security of the protestant religion, the supply for building ships, and public debts, &c.]

Then the lord Finch, by his majesty's order, made a Speech to both Houses, recommending unanimity, and making good laws, and the care of religion, &c.

HOUSE OF LORDS. October 19.

A Petition was presented to the House, from Thomas Shirley, to desire a day for hearing the cause depending in this House the last session, between him and sir John Fagg, which is now sine die.

But, in regard some matter in his majesty's Speech on the 13th of October instant will concern this Petition, the House appointed his majesty's Speech to be first read, according to the order of the 14th of October instant. Then his majesty's and the Lord-Keeper's Speech were read throughout. And afterwards the first paragraph was read, being,

"The causes of the last prorogation, as I, for my part, do not desire to remember, so I hope no man else will, unless it be to learn from thence how to avoid the like occasions for the future; and I pray consider how fatal the consequences may be, and how little benefit is like to redound to the people by it: However, if any thing of that kind shall arise, I desire you would defer those debates, till you have brought such public bills to perfection as may conduce to the good and safety of the kingdom."

And, after a long debate, It is ordered, That this debate be adjourned till to-morrow morning, at 10 of the clock; and nothing to intervene.

October 20.

According to the order yesterday, the house proceeded in the debate, which was then adjourned till this day; and, for the freer debate thereof, the House was adjourned into a Committee.

The House being resumed; It was moved, "That the last Petition of Thomas Shirley might be read:" Which was done. And, after a long debate, it is ordered, That this House shall be adjourned to Monday morning next, at ten of the clock.*

The Earl of SHAFTSBURY's Speech in the House of Lords, upon the Debate of appointing a day for the hearing Dr. Shirley's Cause, the 20th of October, 1675.

"My Lords,

"Our all is at stake, and therefore you must give me leave to speak freely before we part with it. My lord bishop of Salisbury† is of opinion, That we should rather appoint a day to consider what to do upon the Petition, than to appoint a day of hearing; and my Lord-Keeper, for I may name them at a Committee of the whole House, tells us in very eloquent and studied language, That he will propose us a way far less liable to exception, and much less offensive and injurious to our own privileges, than that of appointing a day of hearing. And I beseech your lordships, did you not after all these fine words expect some admirable proposal? But it ended in this; That your lordships should appoint a day, nay, a very long day, to consider what you would do in it: And my lord hath undertaken to convince you, that this is your only course, by several undeniable reasons; the first of which is, That it is against your judicature to have this cause, which is not proper, before us, nor ought to be relieved by us. To this, my Lords, give me leave to answer, That I did not expect from a man professing the law, that after an answer by order of the Court was put in, and a day had been appointed for hearing, which by some accident was set aside; and the Plaintiff moving for a second day to be assigned, that ever, without hearing counsel of both sides, the Court did enter into the merits of the cause. And if your lordships should do it here in a cause attended with the circumstances this is, it would not only be an apparent injustice, but a plain subterfuge, to avoid a point you durst not maintain.

* "Some thought that the king had consented to the renewal of this Appeal-dispute, as disliking the warm proceedings of both houses; of which opinion was Marvell. Others believed that the lords of the country interest had persuaded the doctor thereto, with a view thereby to kindle such a flame between the two houses, as should oblige the king either to prorogue or dissolve them; the said lords apprehending that if this parliament should sit much longer, the majority might be gained over by places and money, so as to become quite obsequious to the court; and this, Savile lord Halifax, then in the interest of lord Shaftsbury, his uncle, told sir John Reresby was his opinion." Halph.

"But my Lord's second reason speaks the matter more clearly; for that is, Because it is a doubtful case, whether the Commons have not privilege, and therefore my Lord would have you to appoint a further, and a very long day to consider of it: Which, in plain English is, that your lordships should confess upon your books, that you conceive it on second thoughts a doubtful case; for so your appointing a day to consider will do: and that for no other reason, but because my Lord-Keeper thinks it so: which I hope will not be a reason to prevail with your lordships, since we cannot yet, by experience, tell that his lordship is capable of thinking your lordships in the right, in any matter against the judgment of the House of Commons; it is so hard a thing even for the ablest of men to change ill habits.

"But my Lord's third reason is the most admirable of all, which he styles unanswerable, viz. That your lordships are all convinced in your consciences, that this (if prosecuted) will cause a breach. I beseech your lordships consider, whether this argument, thus applied, would not overthrow the law of nature, and all the laws of right and property in the world: for 'tis an argument, and a very good one, that you should not stand or insist on claims, where you have not a clear right, or where the question is not of consequence and moment, in a matter that may produce a dangerous and pernicious breach between relations, persons, or bodies politic, joined in interest and high concerns together. So, on the other hand, if the obstinacy of the party in the wrong, shall be made an unanswerable argument for the other party to recede and give up his just rights? how long shall the people keep their liberties, or the princes or governors of the world their prerogatives? How long shall the husband maintain his dominion, or any man his property, from his friends or his neighbours obstinacy? But, my lords, when I hear my Lord Keeper open so eloquently the fatal consequences of a breach, I cannot forbear to fall into some admiration how it comes to pass, that (if the consequences be so fatal) the king's ministers in the House of Commons, of which are several that are of the cabinet, and have daily resort to his majesty, and have the direction and trust of his affairs; I say, that none of these should press these consequences there, or give the least stop to the career of that House in this business: but that all the votes concerning this affair, nay, even that very vote, That no appeal from any court of equity is cognizable by the House of Lords, should pass nem. con. And yet all the great ministers with us here, the bishops and other lords of greatest dependance on the court, contend this point, as if it were pro aris & focis. I hear his majesty in Scotland hath been pleased to declare against appeals in parliament: I cannot much blame the court, if they think (the Lord-Keeper and the judges being of the king's naming, and in his power to change) that the justice of the nation is safe enough; and I, my lords may think so too, during this king's time, though I hear Scotland, not without reason, complain already. Yet how future princes may use this power, and how judges may be made not men of ability or integrity, but men of relation and dependance, and who will do what they are commanded: and all men's causes come to be judged, and estates disposed on, as great men at court please.

"My lords, the constitution of our government hath provided better for us; and I can never believe so wise a body as the House of Commons will prove that foolish woman which plucks down her house with her hands.

"My Lords, I must presume in the next place, to say something to what was offered by my lord bishop of Salisbury, a man of great learning and abilities, and always versed in a stronger and closer way of reasoning, than the business of that noble lord I answered before did accustom him to; and that reverend prelate hath stated the matter very fair upon two heads:

"The first, Whether the hearing of causes and appeals, and especially in this point, where the members have privilege, be so material to us, that it ought not to give way to the reason of state, of greater affairs that pressed us at that time?

"The second was, If this business be of that moment, yet whether the appointing a day to consider of this petition, would prove of that consequence and prejudice to your cause?

"My lords, to these give me leave in the first place to say, that this matter is no less than your whole judicature; and your judicature is the life and soul of the dignity of the peerage of England; you will quickly grow burdensome, if you grow useless: you have now the greatest and most useful end of parliaments principally in you, which is not to make new laws, but to redress grievances, and to maintain the old land-marks. The House of Commons business is to complain, your lordships to redress, not only the complaints from them that are the eyes of the nation, but all other particular persons that address to you. A land may groan under a multitude of laws, and I believe ours does: and when laws grow so multiplied, they prove oftener snares than directions and security to the people. I look upon it as the ignorance and weakness of the latter age, if not worse, the effect of the designs of ill men; that it is grown a general opinion, that where there is not a particular direction in some act of parliament, the law is defective; as if the common law had not provided much better, shorter, and plainer, for the peace and quiet of the nation, than intricate, long perplexed statutes do; which has made work for the lawyers, given power to the judges, lessened your lordships power, and in a good measure unlinged the security of the people.

"My lord bishop tells us, that your whole judicature is not in question, but only the privilege of the House of Commons, of their members not appearing at your bar: my lords, were it no more, yet that for justice and the people's sake you ought not to part with: how far a privilege of the House of Commons, their servants, and those they own, doth extend, Westminster-Hall may with grief tell your lordships. And the same privilege of their members being not sued, must be allowed by your lordships as well; and what a failure of justice this would prove, whilst they are lords for life, and you for inheritance, let the world judge: for my part, I am willing to come to conference whenever the dispute shall begin, and dare undertake to your lordships, that they have neither precedent, reason, nor any justifiable pretence to shew against us; and therefore, my lords, if you part with this undoubted right merely for asking, where will the asking stop? And, my lords, we are sure it doth not stop here; for they have already, nemine contradicente, voted against your lordships power of appeals from any Court of Equity! so that you may plainly see where this caution and reason of state means to stop; not one jot short of laying your whole judicature aside, for the same reason of passing the king's money, of not interrupting good laws, and whatever else must of necessity avoid all breach, upon what score soever; and your lordships plainly see the breach will be as well made upon your judicature in general, as upon this; so that when your lordships have appointed a day, a very long day, for to consider whether Dr. Shirley's cause be not too hot to handle; and when you have done the same for sir Nicholas Stanton, whose petition I hear is coming in, your lordships must proceed to a vote, to lay all private business aside for six weeks : for that phrase of private business hath obtained upon this last age, upon that which is your most public duty and business ; namely, the administration of justice. And I can tell your lordships, besides the reason that leads to it, that I have some intelligence of the designing such a vote. For on the second day of your sitting, at the rising of the Lords House, there came a gentleman into the lobby, belonging to a very great person, and asked in very great haste, Are the Lords up? Have they passed the vote? And being asked, What vote? He answered, The vote of no private business for six weeks.

“ My lords, if this be your business, see where you are ; if we are to postpone our judicature for fear of offending the House of Commons for six weeks, that they in the interim may pass the money, and other acceptable bills that his majesty thinks of importance ; are so many wise men in the House of Commons to be laid asleep, and to pass all these acceptable things ; and when they have done, to let us be let loose upon them ?

“ Will they not remember this next time there is want of money ; or may not they rather be assured by those ministers that are amongst them, and go on so unanimously with them, that the king is on their side in this controversy ? And when the public businesses are over, our time will be too short to make a breach, or vindicate ourselves in the matter. And then I beg your lordships, where are you, after you have asserted but the last sessions your right of judicature, so highly, even in this point ; and after the House of Commons had gone so high against you on the other hand, as to post up their declaration and remonstrances on Westminster-Hall doors ; the very next session after, you postpone the very same causes ; and not only those, but all judicatures whatsoever ? I beseech your lordships, will not this prove a fatal precedent and confession against yourselves ? It is a maxim, and a rational one among the lawyers, That one precedent where the case hath been contested, is worth a thousand where there hath been no contest. My lords, in saying this, I humbly suppose I have given a sufficient answer to my lord bishop's second question ; Whether the appointing a day to consider what you will do with this petition, be of that consequence to your right ? For it is a plain confession, that it is a doubtful case, and that infinitely stronger than if it were a new thing to you, never heard of before : for it is the very same case, and the very same thing desired in that case, that you formerly ordered, and so strongly asserted ; so that upon time, and all the deliberation imaginable, you declare yourselves to become doubtful, and you put yourselves out of your own hands, into that power that you have no reason to believe on your side in this question.

“ My lords, I have all the duty imaginable to his majesty, and shall with all submission give way to any thing he should think of importance to his affairs : but in this point it is to alter the constitution of the government, if you are asked to lay this aside ; and there is no reason of state can be an argument to your lordships to turn yourselves out of that interest you have in the constitution of the government ; it is not only your concern that you maintain yourselves in it, but it is the concern of the poorest man in England, that you keep your station : it is your lordships concern, and that so highly, that I will be bold to say, the king can give none of you a requital or recompence for it. What are empty titles ? What is present power, or riches, and a great estate, wherein I have no firm nor fixed property ? It is the constitution of the government, and maintaining it, that secures your lordships and every man else in what he hath : the poorest Lord, if the birth-right of the peerage be maintained, has a fair prospect before him for himself or his posterity ; but the greatest title, with the greatest present power and riches, is but a mean creature, and maintains those in absolute monarchies, no otherwise than by servile and low flatteries, and upon uncertain terms.

“ My lords, it is not only your interest, but the interest of the nation, that you maintain your rights ; for let the House of Commons and gentry of England think what they please, there is no prince that ever governed without nobility or an army : if you will not have one, you must have the other, or the monarchy cannot long support, or keep itself from tumbling into a democratical republic. Your lordships and the people have the same cause, and the same enemies. My lords, would you be in favour with the king ? It is a very ill way to it, to put yourselves out of a future capacity, to be considerable in his service. I do not find in story, or in modern experience, but that it is better, and a man is much more regarded that is still in a capacity, and opportunity to serve, than he hath wholly deprived himself of all for his prince's service. And I therefore declare, that I will serve my prince as a peer, but will not destroy the peerage to serve him.

“ My lords, I have heard of twenty foolish models and expedients to secure the justice of the nation, and yet to take this right from your lordships, as the king by his commission appointing commoners to hear appeals ; or that the twelve judges should be the persons, or that persons should be appointed by act of parliament, which are all not only to take away your lordships just right, that ought not to be altered any more than any other part of the government, but are in themselves, when well weighed, ridiculous : I must deal freely with your lordships, these things could never have risen in men's minds, but that there have been some kind of provocation that has given the first rise to it. Pray, my lords, forgive me, if on this occasion I put you in mind of Committee dinners, and the scandal of it, those droves of ladies that attended all causes ; it was come to that pass, that men even hired or borrowed of their friends handsome sisters or daughters to deliver their petitions: but yet for all this, I must say that your judgments have been sacred, unless in one or two causes; and those we owe most to that bench, from whence we now apprehend most danger.

"There is one thing I had almost forgot to speak to, which is the conjuncture of time, the hinge upon which our reason of state turns; and to that, my lords, give me leave to say, if this be not a time of leisure for you to vindicate your privileges, you must never expect one. I could almost say, that the harmony, good agreement, and concord that is to be prayed for at most other times, may be fatal to us now; we owe the peace of these last two years, and the disengagement from the French interest, to the two houses differing from the sense and opinion of Whitehall: so at this time, the thing in the world this nation has most reason to apprehend, is a general peace, which cannot now happen without very advantageous terms to the French, and disadvantageous to the House of Austria. We are the king's great counsellors, and if so, have a right to differ, and give contrary counsels to those few that are nearest about him: I fear they would advance a general peace, I am sure I would advise against it, and hinder it at this time by all the ways imaginable. I heartily wish nothing from you may add weight and reputation to those counsels who would assist the French. No money for ships, nor preparations you can make, nor personal assurances our prince can have, can secure us from the French, if they are at leisure. He is grown the most potent of us all at sea: he has built 24 ships this last year, and has 30 more in number than we; beside the advantage, that our ships are all out of order, and his so exquisitely provided for, that every ship has his particular storehouse. It is incredible the money he hath, and is bestowing in making harbours; he makes nature itself give way to the vastness of his expence: and after all this, shall a prince so wise, so intent upon his affairs, be thought to make all these preparations to sail over land, and fall on the back of Hungary, and batter the walls of Kaminitz? Or is it possible he should oversee his interest in seizing of Ireland, a thing so feasible to him, if he be master of the seas, as he certainly now is; and which, when attained, gives him all the Southern Mediterranean, East and West India trade, and renders him both by situation, and excellent harbours, perpetual master of the seas without dispute?

"My lords, to conclude this point, I fear the court of England is greatly mistaken in it, and I do not wish them the reputation of the concurrence of the kingdom: and this out of the most sincere loyalty to his majesty, and love to my nation.

"My Lords, I have but one thing more to trouble you with, and that peradventure is a consideration of the greatest weight and concern, both to your lordships and the whole nation. I have often seen in this House that the arguments, with strongest reason, and most convincing to the lay-lords in general, have not had the same effect upon the bishops bench; but that they have unanimously gone against us in matters, that many of us have thought essential and undoubted rights: and I consider, that it is not possible that men of great learning, piety, and reason, as their lordships are, should not have the same care of doing right, and the same conviction what is right, upon clear reason offered, that other your lordships have. And therefore, my lords, I must necessarily think we differ in principles; and then it is very easy to apprehend, what is the clearest sense to men of my principle, may not at all persuaile or affect the conscience of the best man of a different one. I put your lordships the case plainly, as it is now before us. My principle is, That the king is king by law, and by the same law that the poor man enjoys his cottage; and so it becomes the concern of every man in England, that has but his liberty, to maintain and defend, to his utmost, the king in all his rights and prerogatives. My principle is also, That the Lords House, and the judicature and rights belonging to it, are an essential part of the government, and established by the same law: the king governing and administering justice by his House of Lords, and advising with both his Houses of parliament in all important matters, is the government I own, I am born under, and am obliged to. If ever there should happen in future ages (which God forbid) a king governing by an army, without his parliament, it is a government I own not, am not obliged to, nor was born under. According to this principle, every honest man that holds it, must endeavour equally to preserve the frame of the government, in all the parts of it, and cannot satisfy his conscience to give up the Lords House for the service of the crown, or to take away the just rights and privileges of the House of Commons to please the Lords. But there is another principle got into the world, my Lords, that hath not been long there; for archbishop Laud was the first author that I remember of it; and I cannot find that the Jesuits, or indeed the Popish clergy, have ever owned it, but some of the Episcopal clergy of our British isle; and it is withal, as it is new, so the most dangerous, destructive doctrine to our government and law, that ever was. It is the first of the canons published by the Convocation 1640, That monarchy is of Divine Right. This Doctrine was then preached up, and maintained by Sibthorp, Manwaring, and others, and of later years, by a book published by Dr. Sanderson, bishop of Lincoln, under the name of archbishop Usher; and how much it is spread amongst our dignified clergy is very easily known. We all agree, That the king and his government is to be obeyed for conscience sake; and that the divine precepts require not only here, but in all parts of the world, obedience to lawful governors. But that this family are our kings, and this particular frame of government is our lawful constitution, and obliges us, is owing only to the particular laws of our country. This Laudean Doctrine was the root that produced the Bill of Test last session, and some very perplexed oaths, that are of the same nature with that, and yet imposed by several acts of this parliament.

"In a word, if this doctrine be true, our Magna Charta is of no use, our laws are but rules amongst ourselves during the king's pleasure. Monarchy, if of divine right, cannot be bounded or limited by human laws; nay, what is more, cannot bind itself: and all our claims of right by the law, or constitution of the government, all the jurisdiction and privileges of this House, all the rights and privileges of the House of Commons, all the properties and liberties of the people, are to give way not only to the interest, but the will and pleasure of the crown. And the best and worthiest of men, holding this principle, must vote to deliver up all we have, not only when reason of state, and the separate interest of the crown require it; but when the will and pleasure of the king is known would have it so. For that must be, to a man of that principle, the only rule and measure of right and justice. Therefore, my Lords, you see how necessary it is, that our principles be known; and how fatal to us all it is, that this principle should be suffered to spread any further.

"My Lords, to conclude, your lordships have seen of what consequence this matter is to you, and that the appointing a day to consider, is no less than declaring yourselves doubtful, upon second and deliberate thoughts; that you put yourselves out of your own hands, into a more than a moral probability of having this session made a precedent against you. You see your duty to yourselves and the people, and that it is really not the interest of the House of Commons, but may be the inclination of the court, that you lose the power of appeals: but I beg our House may not be Felo de se, but that your lordships would take in this affair the only course to preserve yourselves, and appoint a day, this day three weeks, for the hearing of Dr. Shirley's cause, which is my humble motion."

October 25.

The House being resolved to resume the whole debate which was on Wednesday last, the House was adjourned into a Committee, for the freer debate thereof. After a long debate, the House was resumed. And it being moved, "That the order concerning Judicature, made the 29th of March, 1673, might be considered; it was directed, that those precedents mentioned therein be in readiness to-morrow morning; and likewise the precedents reported in Slyngsby's and Hale's Case. Then it was ordered, That the present debate be adjourned, to be resumed to-morrow morning."

October 26.

The House resumed the debate which was yesterday. For the better consideration thereof, the House was adjourned into a Committee. And, after a long debate, the House was resumed. And it is ordered, That to-morrow morning this House be put into a Committee, to carry on the debate as was this day in the Committee of the House.

October 27.

The House was adjourned into a Committee, to carry on the debate as was yesterday in the Committee of the House. And, after a long debate, the House being resumed; it is ordered, That the debate which was in the Committee of the House this day shall be taken up at the next sitting of this House, in a Committee of the whole House; and no other business to intervene.

November 4.

The House was adjourned into a Committee, and took up the debate which was in a Committee of the House on Wednesday the 27th of October last. And, after a serious debate, the House was resumed.

And this question was proposed, "Whether the 20th of this instant November shall be the day appointed for the hearing of the cause between Dr. Thomas Shirley and sir John Fagg?"

Then this previous question was put, "Whether this abovesaid question shall be now put?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Upon this, the question being put, "Whether the 20th day of this instant November shall be the day appointed for the hearing of the cause between Dr. Thomas Shirley and sir John Fagg?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Before the putting of the said question, leave being demanded, and given to such lords as thought fit (if the same were carried in the affirmative) to enter their protestation and dissent; accordingly this protestation is entered against the said vote, for the reasons following:

"1. Because it seems contrary to the use and practice of this high court (which gives example to all other courts), upon a bare petition of the plaintiff Dr. Shirley, in a cause depending last session, and discontinued by prorogation, to appoint a day of hearing of the cause, before the defendant is so much as summoned, or appears in court, or to be alive.

"2ndly. The defendant, by the rules of this court, having liberty upon summons to make a new answer, as sir Jeremy Whitchott was admitted after summons to do last session in Darrell's cause against him, discontinued by prorogation, or to mend his answer, or to plead as he shall see cause, is deprived of this and other benefits of law, by appointing a day of hearing without these essential forms.

"3rdly. It appears by the plaintiff's own shewing in his petition, that his case against a purchaser is not relievable in equity; and therefore ought to be dismissed, without putting the parties to further charge.

"4thly. It appears, by his own shewing, and the defendant sir John Fagg's plea, that he comes hither per saltem, and ought to attend judgment in the inferior courts, if his cause be relievable; and not to appeal to the highest court till either injustice is done him below, or erroneous judgment given against him, and relief denied him upon review.

"5thly. The danger of this precedent is so universal, that it shakes all the purchasers of England.

"ANGLESEY."

Whereas Thomas Shirley, esq. hath an appeal depending in this House, to which sir John Fagg, a member of the House of Commons, hath put in an Answer as defendant:

It is resolved, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled, That Saturday the 20th day of this instant November shall be the day appointed for hearing the cause between the said Thomas Shirley and the said sir John Fagg.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, November 13.

The House being informed, That the House of Lords had appointed to hear the cause upon the appeal brought by Dr. Shirley against sir John Fagg, a member of this House, on Saturday the twentieth of this instant November; and that the said order was this day served upon sir Jo. Fagg; And the order being read;

Resolved, That the further consideration thereof be adjourned till Monday morning next.

November 15.

The House resumed the adjourned debate of the matter concerning the appeal, brought in the House of Lords by Thomas Shirley, esq. against sir John Fagg a member of this House.

Resolved, That the prosecuting of an Appeal, by Thomas Shirley, esq. in the House of Lords, against sir John Fagg a member of this House, is a breach of the privilege of this House.

Resolved, That sir John Fagg do not proceed to make any defence in this cause.

Resolved, That the further consideration of the matter concerning the Appeal, brought by Thomas Shirley, esq. in the House of Lords against sir John Fagg, a member of this House, be adjourned till to morrow morning ten of the clock.

November 16.

Resolved, That this House will to-morrow morning, at ten of the clock, proceed in the consideration of the matter concerning the Appeal brought by Thomas Shirley, esq. in the House of Lords, against sir John Fagg a member of this House.

HOUSE OF LORDS, November 17.

Whereas Thomas Shirley, esq. hath a Petition and Appeal depending in this House against Sir John Fagg; this House being moved, "That Counsel may be assigned, to plead the cause of the said Thomas Shirley upon the said Appeal:"

It is ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That Mr. Richard Wallop, Mr. Thomas Turner, and Mr.

Samuel Tryst (named for the said Thomas Shirley), be, and are hereby appointed to plead the said cause, at the bar of this House, on the part and behalf of the said Thomas Shirley, on Saturday the 20th day of this instant November, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, and at such other times as it shall be appointed by this House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, November 18.

The House proceeded in the debate of the matter concerning the Appeal, brought in the House of Lords by Thomas Shirley, esq. against sir John Fagg, a member of this House.

A motion being made, That the House would renew the vote made last session, that whosoever shall appear at the bar of the House of Lords, to prosecute any suit against any member of this House, shall be deemed a breaker and infringer of the rights and privileges of this House; or declare the same to be now in force.

The question being put, That candles be now brought in: it was resolved in the affirmative.

The question being propounded, That this House will declare the vote of the last session, that whosoever shall appear at the bar of the Lords House to prosecute any suit against any member of this House, shall be deemed a breaker and infringer of the rights and privileges of this House, to be now in force;

The question being put, That this question be now put; It passed in the negative.

The question being propounded, That a Conference be desired with the Lords for avoiding the occasions of reviving the differences between the two Houses in matters of Appeal;

A motion being made, That these words, "brought by Dr. Shirley," may be added to the question;

The question being put, That the words "brought by Dr. Shirley," be made part of the question; It passed in the negative.

A motion being made, That the words "in matters of Appeals," may be left out of the question;

The question being put, That the words "in matters of appeals," do stand in the question

The House divided: Noes, 130, Yeas, 84: And so it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That a Conference be desired with the Lords, for avoiding the occasions of reviving the differences between the two Houses.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and draw up reasons to be offered at the said Conference.

November 19.

Sir William Coventry reports, from the committee to whom it was referred to prepare and draw up Reasons to be offered at the Conference to be desired of the Lords, for avoiding the occasions of reviving the differences between the two Houses, a paper of Reasons, agreed by the said committee to be reported to the House:

which he read in his place ; and afterwards delivered the same in at the clerk's table : Where it was again read : and, upon the question, agreed to ; and is as followeth ; viz.

“ His majesty having recommended to us, at the opening of this session of parliament, the avoiding this difference, if possible ; and, if it could not be prevented, that we should defer those debates till we had brought such public bills to perfection, as may conduce to the good and safety of the kingdom ; the Commons esteem it a great misfortune, that contrary to that most excellent advice, the proceedings in the appeal brought the last sessions against sir John Fagg, by Mr. Shirley, have been renewed, and a day set for hearing the cause : and therefore the Commons have judged it the best way, before they enter into the argument for defence of their rights in this matter, to propose to your lordships the putting off the proceedings in that matter for some short time ; that so they may, according to his majesty's advice, give a dispatch to some bills now before them of great importance to the king and kingdom : which being finished, the Commons will be ready to give your lordships such reasons against those proceedings, and in defence of their rights, as we hope may satisfy your lordships, that no such proceedings, ought to have been.”

Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Lords, to desire a Conference to preserve the good correspondence between the two houses.

Ordered, That sir Wm. Coventry do go up to the Lords with the said Message.

Sir William Coventry reports, from the Lords, that he had attended their lordships with the Message to desire a Conference ; and that their Lordships had agreed to a present Conference in the Painted Chamber.

Resolved, That the several members to whom it was referred to prepare and draw up Reasons to be offered at the said Conference ; do attend and manage the said Conference.

Sir Wm. Coventry reports from the Conference had with the Lords, that they had attended, and delivered the Lords the Reasons agreed by this House.

Whereas this House hath been informed of several Appeals depending in the House of Lords, from courts of Equity, to the great violation of the Rights and Liberties of the Commons of England ; it is this day

Resolved and Declared, “ That whosoever shall solicit, plead, or prosecute any appeal against any Commoner of England, from any Court of Equity, before the house of Lords, shall be deemed and taken a betrayer of the Rights and Liberties of the Commons of England ; and shall be proceeded against accordingly.”

Resolved, That copies of this Resolution and Declaration be forthwith publicly affixed upon the door of the lobby of this house, and Westminster Hall gate, and upon the gates of the two Serjeants-Inns, and the four inns of court and the several inns of Chancery ; to the end all persons concerned may take notice thereof :

and that the Serjeant at Arms now attending this House do cause the same to be so affixed accordingly.

November 20.

Ordered, That Thomas Shirley, esq. be taken into custody of the Serjeant at Arms now attending this house, for his breach of privilege in prosecuting an Appeal in the House of Lords against sir John Fagg, a member of this House.

The House being informed, That sir Nicholas Staughton did yesterday serve Mr. Onslow, a member of this house, in Westminster-Hall, with an Order of the House of Lords for hearing an Appeal brought there by the said sir Nicholas Staughton against the said Mr. Onslow on the day of November instant ; and that he refused to retract the same, after he had notice of the resolution of this House, made yesterday, about Appeals to the Lords from Courts of Equity ;

Ordered, That sir Nicholas Staughton be taken into custody of the Serjeant at Arms now attending this House, for his breach of privilege in prosecuting an Appeal in the House of Lords against Mr. Onslow, a member of this House.

Ordered, That Mr. Onslow do not proceed to make any defence in this cause.

HOUSE OF LORDS, November 20.

This day being appointed for hearing counsel at this bar, upon the Petition and Appeal of Thomas Shirley esquire, against sir John Fagg :

Thomas Shirley appeared in person, with Mr. Richard Wallop, one of those assigned counsel ; who made it his humble desire, that he might be excused from being of counsel with Mr. Shirley in this cause, in regard he is utterly unacquainted with the proceedings in chancery, neither is he now instructed in the cause, being not served with the Order of this House until last night.

As for Mr. Turner, one other counsel assigned Mr. Shirley ; the House was satisfied that he was sick, and so not able to come and plead.

But neither sir John Fagg appeared (though it appeared upon oath at the bar that he was served with the order of this House at his lodging, by leaving it at his lodging), nor any counsel for him.

Then Dr. Shirley was asked, “ Whether he would go on with this cause now ? ” And he said “ He desired to go on presently, if he could have counsel to plead his cause.”

Whereupon Mr. Wallop was called in ; and told, “ That this House allows not of his excuse, but commands and enjoins him to be of counsel with Mr. Shirley in this cause ; and this House will protect him for so doing.”

And in regard of the shortness of time now to hear this cause, and instruct counsel, this House made the ensuing Orders :

“ Whereas this day was appointed for hearing the cause, at the bar, upon the appeal of Dr. Thomas Shirley against sir John Fagg, at which time the said Thomas Shirley appearing in prison, but no counsel instructed for him ;

nor did sir John Fagg, or any counsel for him appear, though notice of this day was left at the said sir John Fagg's lodgings, as appeared by oath made at the bar this day : it is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled, That this House will hear the said cause, by counsel, at the bar, on Monday the 22th instant, at ten of the clock in the forenoon."

And the said Dr. Shirley, Mr. Wollop, and sir N. Staunton, were ordered to have the protection of the House.

And upon debate of the Commons' Vote made yesterday, it was ordered, "That the Paper posted up in several places, signed by William Goldsbro, Cler. Dom. Com. against the Judicature of the House of Peers in Cases of Appeals from Courts of Equity, is illegal, unparliamentary and tending to the dissolution of the government."

DEBATE in the House of Lords on a Motion for an Address to the King to dissolve the Parliament.

Upon consideration of the said Vote of the Commons, it was proposed by lord Mohun to address his majesty to dissolve the parliament. This gave rise to a vehement debate, "in the course of which," says Mr. Ralph, "all imaginable arguments that could either influence court or country, were made use of to procure an affirmative : the king was flattered with the hopes, or rather bribed with the promise, of a large sum to pay his Debts : and the Church received the warmest assurances, that though Protestant Dissenters should find some favour and ease, her lands and dignities should be safe : and on the popular side of the question, the conduct of the present House of Commons was exposed with as much severity, as if the nation had not one true representative. From the length of time which the purse of the people had been in their hands, and the free use they had made of it, it was urged that they were become 'more than lords.' They were charged with having violated the ancient rules of parliament, by not admitting the right of the Lords to reduce their grants. They were reproached for having several times rejected with scorn, a Bill for the more fair and equal Trial of the Peers. It was said seriously, that they had never met without exciting the greatest apprehensions in all sober and wise men, and ironically, that it was owing to the goodness of the prince and the virtue of the members, that honours, offices, pensions, money, employments and gifts, had not been bestowed and accepted as a consideration for reducing the government to the model of France, Denmark, &c. where the will and pleasure of the prince had taken place of the laws. It was added, How easily this may be done in future ages, under such princes, and such an House of Commons as may happen if 'long and continued parliaments' be allowed for law, may be had some measure of judging by this ; where though the prince had no design, and the members of the House of Commons have shewed so great candour and self-denial, yet the best observers are apt to think, that we owe it to the strong and opposite factions at court, that many things of great alterations have not passed.—It was also observed, that in former times when parliaments were short and frequent, the members constantly received their Wages, both from their counties and boroughs ; many of the poorer boroughs petitioned to be excused from sending members, as not being able to bear their charge, and were so : laws were made in favour of the gentry, that corporations should compel none but the freemen of their own town to serve for them ; nay, that in all the ancient returns of writs for knights of the shires, their sureties for their appearance were returned with them. But that now the case was so altered, that 1,500*l.* and 2,000*l.* and lately 7,000*l.* was a price that men paid to be entrusted. That it was to be hoped the charity of those worthy persons, and their zeal for the public interest, had induced them to be at this expence : but that it were better to be otherwise, there being a scurvy English Proverb, 'That men that buy dear, cannot live by selling cheap.'"

The debate continued till 8 o'clock, when it passed in the negative by two voices. Content, 48 ; not content, 50.

The House then adjourned to Monday.

On which day the House being met, a Message was sent by his majesty, for the House to attend him forthwith in the House of Peers ; which the House accordingly did, when his majesty passed three bills, and the Lord Keeper by his majesty's order, prorogued both Houses of Parliament till the 15th day of February come twelvemonth, 1676, which ended the Dispute.

THE PROTESTATION, with Reasons of several Lords for the Dissolution of this Parliament, entered in the Lords' Journal, Nov. 22, 1675, the day the Parliament was prorogued.

"We whose names are under-written, peers of this realm, having proposed, 'That an humble Address might be made to his majesty 'from this House, that he would be graciously pleased to dissolve this parliament ;' and the House having carried it in the negative : for the justification of our loyal intentions towards his majesty's service, and of our true respect and deference to this honourable House ; and to shew that we had no sinister and indirect ends in this our humble proposal, do with all humility herein set forth the grounds and reasons why we were of opinion, that the said humble Address should have been made.

"1. We do humbly conceive that it is according to the ancient laws and statutes of this realm, that there should be frequent and new parliaments, and that the practice of several years hath been accordingly.

"2. It seems not reasonable that any particular number of men should for many years engross so great a trust of the people, as to be their representatives in the House of Commons: and all other the gentry and the members of corporations of the same degree and quality with them, should be so long excluded. Neither, as we humbly conceive, is it advantageous to the government, that the counties, cities and boroughs should be confined for so long a time to such members as they have once chosen to serve for them; the mutual correspondence and interests of those who chuse and are chosen, admitting of great variations in length of time.

“3. The long continuance of any such as are entrusted for others, and who have so great a power over the purse of the nation, must, in our humble opinion, naturally endanger the producing of factions and parties, and the carrying on of particular interests and designs, rather than the public good.

“And we are the more confirmed in our desires for the said humble Address, by reason of this unhappy breach fallen out betwixt the two Houses, of which the House of Peers hath not given the least occasion; they having done nothing but what their ancestors and predecessors have in all times done, and what is according to their duty, and for the interest of the people that they should do: which notwithstanding the House of Commons have proceeded in such an unprecedented and extraordinary way, that it is, in our humble opinion, become altogether unpracticable for the two Houses, as the case stands, jointly to pursue those great and good ends for which they were called. For these reasons we do enter our Protestation against, and dissent unto, the said Vote. (Signed.) Buckingham, Winchester, Salisbury, Bridgewater, Dorset, Westmoreland, Chesterfield, Stamford, Berks, Clarendon, Shaftesbury, Faulconbridge, Halifax, Yarmouth, Newport, Sandys, Wharton, Petre, Mohun, De la Mer Townsend, Grey of Rolston.”

These were all the Lords that were in the House early enough to sign the Protestation before the parliament was prorogued.

Mr. Hargrave in his Preface to lord Hale's Treatise on the Jurisdiction of the Lords' House of Parliament, gives a concise but satisfactory account of this business, as follows

“After the compromise in Skinner's case, the business of the session both on the supply to the crown and otherwise went on smoothly for many months. More particularly nothing further appears to have occurred between the two Houses as to judicature, except a slight communication between them about a summons or notice to Mr. Hale a member of the Commons on a petition of appeal against him by a Mr. Slingsby to the Lords. Sir Thomas Lee, father of the late Lord Chief Justice of that name, and his brother the judge of the prerogative court, moved for a Conference with the Lords, the summons of Mr. Hale noticing him as a member. But after some short conversation, the House only resolved upon a Message to the Lords, desiring them To have regard to the privileges of the House of Commons. The Answer of the Lords was, That the House of Commons need not doubt, but that their lordships will have a regard to their privileges as they have of their own. After this Answer, the Lords examined Mr. Slingsby, as to the manner of intimating to Mr. Hale the hearing of the cause. On a subsequent day Mr. Slingsby petitioned the Lords to withdraw his original petition, on the ground of his being advised by his counsel, that he might have his remedy in Chancery, and that there was no order entered upon which he could ground an appeal. But the Lords, perhaps jealous of having the relinquishment of the appeal construed to the prejudice of their judicature, and perhaps also suspicious that fear of the privilege of the Commons was the real cause of the application, referred the business to the consideration of their committee of privileges. After almost a month's consideration, the earl of Anglesey reported from the committee as their opinion, “That the Lords do declare, that their proceedings had been according to the course of parliament and former precedents; and that the Lords do assert it to be their undoubted right in judicature to receive and determine in time of parliament appeals from inferior courts, though a member of either House be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the land.”—To this report the Lords immediately assented; and it is observable, that on the afternoon of the very day upon which it was made and approved, the king made a good-humoured speech to both Houses, and in pursuance of his pleasure they adjourned themselves for six months.—Thus this Case of Hale and Slingsby, and the whole of the first part of the session passed off without breach of any kind between the two Houses.”

237. Proceedings against Mr. FRANCIS JENKES,* for a Speech made by him on the Hustings, at Guildhall, in the City of London, on Midsummer-day, 28 CHARLES II. A. D. 1676. [Published by his Friends.]

MR. JENKES having been a trader for many years, and observing the daily Decay of Trade in the City, occasioned by such mischiefs, as lay not in the industry of its inhabitants, but only in the power of the government to redress; and that did require a more speedy redress than a Parliament prorogued for fifteen months could afford; after having in vain solicited the Lord-Mayor for a Common-Council, that might consider of a Petition about Trade, out of a hearty zeal for the good of the city, as well as encouraged by the consent and desire of many sober citizens, the liberty reserved to the lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, by the statute of the 13th of this king, concerning Petitions, the votes of a majority of temporal Lords in the last sessions, together with the unanswerable reasons given in their Protestation; did at the Folk-mote (or Common-hall) holden the 21th of June last past, in the Guildhall of London, thus deliver himself:

“Mr. Common Serjeant,

“It seems a vain thing for this Court to be serious about the choice of magistrates and officers for the well government of this city; except they first take care to remedy those many mischiefs and grievances, which this city now groans under; and which seem so to threaten the ruin and destruction of the whole, that if there be not some speedy redress, there will be little need of magistrates and officers, for there will be no city or people left here to be governed.

“London has once already been burned to ashes, and firing is now become such a trade, that not only London, the borough of Southwark, and the places adjoining, but all the cities, boroughs, towns corporate, and places of principal trade throughout the whole kingdom, are perpetually in danger; so that no rational or considerate man amongst us can promise himself, his wife, his children, or estate one night's security, but they may all be devoured in the consuming flames, except some speedy and effectual course be taken.

“But this is not all; for were our houses secure from fire, yet such is the general decay of trade, if not remedied, as must unavoidably bring the whole city to poverty and ruin: and it is conceived, that this is very much occasioned by the French, who have laid such great impositions upon our woollen cloth, stuffs and other manufactures, that we have almost lost our trade with France. They have spoiled our trade with Holland, Flanders, and Germany, by a destructive war. They have ruined our trade at home, and beggared many thousands of our honest and industrious weavers, and other English manufacturers and traders, by the vast quantity of their silks, and other unnecessary commodities imported hither. So that upon an exact balance of the trade between us and them taken, it has been demonstrated, that this city and kingdom doth lose 1,100,000*l.* every year. By means whereof they who in queen Elizabeth's time might not be suffered to build men of war, are now grown so powerful at sea, as to be able to beat both Dutch and Spaniard, and have made themselves in a manner sole masters of the Mediterranean sea. And they are grown so presumptuous, as daily to affront our English merchants, and sometimes in his majesty's own ports. The privateers daily take our merchantships, plunder others, strip, imprison and torment our seamen, to the great discouragement of our English navigation, and almost ruin of the merchant.

“I shall instance in but one thing more, but that is worse than all the rest; that is, the just apprehension that is upon the minds of good men, of danger to his majesty's person, and the protestant religion. I had not spoken this at this time and place, but having the honour to serve the City in Common-Council; I have endeavoured at several times to bring these things before the Court, but could not. In the end of the last Common-Council I did desire my Lord-Mayor, that a Common-Council might speedily be held, to hear and consider of a Petition about Trade, subscribed by a great number of citizens of good quality; and his lordship did then promise, that a Common-Council should speedily be held: but it is a good time since, and there have been many fires and losses, but no Common-Council.

“Wherefore, methinks, it does become the wisdom and gravity of this Court, not to admit of any longer delay in a matter wherein their all is concerned. And I do humbly move, (and I conceive it is not only my sense, but the sense of the far greater part of this Court) that some members of this Court may accompany the Sheriffs and Mr. Common-Serjeant, before we proceed to any other matter, to wait upon my Lord Mayor and the Court of Aldermen, to desire that a Common-Council might speedily be held, humbly to petition his majesty, that for the quieting and satisfying the minds of his liege people, and for remedy of the many mischiefs and grievances we now groan under, he would graciously be pleased (according to the statutes of the 4th and 36th of Ed. 3.) timely to call a New Parliament”—

* See the Trial of him and others for a Riot, A. D. 1683.

Scarcely were the words 'a New Parliament, pronounced, but the greatest part of the assembly cried out, 'Well moved, well moved!' And though none spake up formally to the sheriffs, yet several amongst them spake enough to shew a high approbation of what had been said, and not one word was spoken in contradiction: which when the Common-Serjeant saw, to prevent (as is conceived) others speaking to the same matter, he spake to this purpose:

"That what had been moved, seemed to be the general sense of the whole Court; and since the gentleman that made the motion was pleased to join him with the Sheriffs, and that he must offer his opinion in the matter, it was this, That it was not so proper to carry up that Message before they did proceed to their elections, as first to determine their elections, and then carry up an account of these and that together."

But many in the Court did insist upon the motion, and desired a Message might be sent up immediately; whereupon one of the Sheriffs spake, and did acknowledge, "That what had been said by the gentleman that spake first, was true; but that he was an old citizen, and had long known Common-Halls, and he did believe that the proper work of the day was the election of officers; and therefore he did desire that the Court would proceed, and not to carry up the Message till after that was done;" To which one replied, "That according to his utmost understanding, that Court was one of the ancientest, greatest, and most powerful Courts of this City; and although the customary business of this day were the choice of officers, yet that Court had cognizance of any thing whatever that did relate to the good of the city; and therefore it was conceived, that nothing was more proper at that time, than this which concerned the preservation of the city from utter ruin."

Upon which the other Sheriff directing his discourse to the Assembly, said, "That what the gentlemen had moved there, was true, and not unknown to most of the persons there present; but that he was of his brother's opinion, that it was fit first to go on to the work of the day, and not to carry up that Message till after the election."

Many persons being still dissatisfied, and calling for a present Message to be sent up, the gentleman who first moved the business, made it his request, "That since there seemed a difference touching the circumstance of time, that they would proceed to election, and carry up the Message with the persons elected, as the Sheriffs desired;" to which the Common Hall unanimously agreed. Upon which, silence being made, the Common Hall proceeded to election, and sent up an account thereof to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen by the Sheriffs and Common-Serjeant, as is usual in such cases.

The Lord Mayor and Aldermen presently came down, and took their seats in the court of Hustings, according to custom; upon which, the Common-Serjeant came forth to the front of the court, and declared the names of the persons elected, and immediately gave back. Whereupon the Common-Hall called out for an Answer to their Message; upon which, the Common-Serjeant stepping forward again in the presence of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs, said, "That he had acquainted his lordship and the aldermen with their request, and that his lordship had commanded him to declare unto them, That he would be ready to join with them in that or any other thing for the good of the city." And with that the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, &c. left the court of hustings, and dismissed the assembly.

After dinner, the Recorder, sir John Howel, out of a great pretence of loyalty, but indeed a personal grudge against Mr. Jenkes, conveyed the news to Whitehall; where, with his usual strain of rhetoric, he made such a dismal representation of the matter, and was so powerful in his eloquence, as to occasion both the sheriffs and some other of the city-officers to be sent for; who were examined by the Lord Chief Justice Rainsford, in the presence of the king, the lord chancellor*, lord treasurer†, duke Lauderdale, and other lords.

The Sheriffs and two others made affidavits; but a copy of them could never be obtained.

Upon the 27th of June, Mr. Jenkes was summoned by a mess-ner to appear at the council-board the next day; accompanied with many of his friends, he attended in the lobby, near the common-chamber, according to his summons, and after sometime was called in; but his friends pressing to follow him, (as is usual on such occasions) were kept out, and not one suffered to go in with him.

The king sitting in council, the lord chancellor, duke Lauderdale, and other lords about him, the clerk read an affidavit made by the two sheriffs, the common crier, and one John Green, an attorney; the substance whereof was,

'That Fr. Jenkes, at a Common-Hall, in London, the 24th of June last past, did complain of Grievances; and did desire, that before they went upon any other business, certain members of that Court might accompany the Sheriffs and the Common Serjeant to wait upon the Lord Mayor, then in the Chamber, to desire that a Common-Council might be called to petition his majesty, in the name of the city, to call a new parliament.'

The affidavit being read, the council-board proceeded to this effect:

Lord Chancellor. Sir, what say you to this matter?

Mr. Jenkes. I desire to know if this be all you have to charge against me?

A. Lord. Then you make little of this, you will find it to be enough.

* Henrice lord Finch, afterward earl of Nottingham.

† Lord Osborne, earl of Danby, afterwards marquis of Carmarthen, and duke of Leeds.

L. Chan. Sir, did you move for a Common-Council to petition for a new parliament?

Jenkes. Is it any crime to petition for a new parliament?

To which his lordship not thinking fit to give answer, proceeded,

L. Chan. Answer to the matter in charge.

Jenkes. With the liberty of his majesty and this board, I will.

The King. Go on.

Jenkes. May it please your majesty, of all the subjects you have—

A Lord. (interrupting him) Answer to the matter.

Jenkes. If his majesty will be pleased to hear me, I hope you will.

King. Let him go on.

Jenkes. May it please your majesty, of all the subjects you have, none are more loyal than your city of London, and in the city none more loyal than myself: and no man there did more desire, and, in my circumstances, act more, in order to your majesty's Restoration, than myself. And I do defy any citizen, or other whomsoever, to say I have forfeited my loyalty by any one individual act—

King. (Interrupting him) Sir, you are not Lord-Mayor, and I am very well satisfied with the loyalty of the city, and that it needs no such vouchers.

L. Chan. Speak to the matter.

Jenkes. May it please your majesty, being summoned to a Court of Common Hall in London, which is a Court that consists of the main body of the city—

L. Chan. (Interrupting him) Sir, you are under a double mistake; for first, it was not a Court; and next, it did not consist of the main body of the city of London.

Jenkes. With your lordship's leave, it was a Court which did consist of all the livery of the city of London; which, if I understand any thing, is the main body of the city of London. And every member of that Court hath freedom to propose and debate any such matter or thing as he believes is for the service of his majesty, and the good of the city; and no man can use more understanding than God hath given him. And I assure your lordship, what I then moved was according to the utmost of my understanding for his majesty's service, and the good of the city. And, my Lord, if I were under a mistake, I had the fortune to have good company; for what I moved was approved by the whole Court.

King. It was not so.

Secretary. We have a deposition to the contrary.—Jenkes. It was so.

Other Lords. It was not so.

Jenkes. May it please your majesty, if you have a hundred depositions to the contrary, if the matter of fact were so, it was so; and I do affirm it was approved by the whole Court.

A Lord. How came you to be a privy-counsellor?

Jenkes. I never had any such ambitious thought in my head.

A Lord. How came you then to meddle with matters of state?

Jenkes. I thought any of his majesty's subjects, in an humble manner, might petition his majesty for a remedy of any grievance whatsoever.

A Lord. Do you think any one may petition for a parliament?

Jenkes. I believe they may.

The King. I know whose scholar you are, and I will take care that none such as you shall have to do with the government.

Several Lords. What was it you moved? What was it you moved?

Jenkes. My Lords, what I spake was not in a corner, but openly in the face of a multitude; and therefore cannot want a witness to attest it.

A Lord. Just now it was a Court, and now it is a multitude.

Jenkes. We citizens pretend not to place our words so exactly in form, but that there may be some mistake in them; but I think my expression was no great absurdity: For though it were a Court, yet the persons there were so numerous, that it may not be very improper to term them a multitude. Yet, if I have failed in due expression, I beg his majesty's pardon. I know somewhat of the customs of the city of London, and the powers and privileges of the Courts there; and somewhat also of the laws of England; but what the powers and customs of this Court are, I know not, and therefore shall desire to say little, lest I should unwillingly offend.

L. Chan. Sir, pray tell us, who advised you in this matter?

The King. Who advised you?

Jenkes. What I then proposed was consented to by the whole Court, and so became their act, as I said before.

L. Chan. and others. Answer directly to the question, or declare you will not.

Jenkes. Since I see your majesty and the Lords are angry, though I am not sensible that I have given you any just cause for it; I must not say I did it without advice, lest you should be more angry; and to name any particular person (if there were such) would be a mean and unworthy thing, therefore I desire to be excused all farther answer to such questions; since the law doth provide, that no man be put to answer to his own prejudice.

King. We will take that for an answer.

L. Chan. Since you name the law, by the law you shall be tried.

Jenkes. I thank you and this board.

L. Chan. You may withdraw.

He immediately withdrew, and the room being cleared of all his friends, and other company, Mr. Jenkes was kept there for the space of an hour and an half; and, after that, without being called in any more, was, by a warrant of the council, sent to the prison of the Gatehouse within the liberties of Westminster. Soon after his commitment, he demanded of the Keeper a copy of the Warrant by which he was committed; as he might, and by law ought to have. The Keeper gave him a promise of it, but delaying the performance for two days, Mr. Jenkes resolutely demanded it of him as his duty, but could not yet obtain it. Some time after, the Keeper sent him one voluntarily, by his man, with this excuse, That before he had positive order to deny him one, and now had to give it him.

The Copy of the Warrant.

‘Whereas it appears to his majesty in council, by the examination of sir Thomas Gold, sir John Shorter, knights, sheriffs of the city of London, John Wells, common-crier of the said City, and John Green, one of the attorneys of the Lord-Mayor’s Court, taken upon oath before the Lord-Chief-Justice Rainsford, That Francis Jenkes, of the said City, linen-draper, did, on the 24th of this instant June, at a Common-Hall, then assembled at the Guildhall of the said City, for chusing officers for the ensuing year, in a most seditious and mutinous manner, openly move and stir the persons then present, That before they did go on to the choice of new officers (which was the only occasion of that assembly) they should go to the Lord-Mayor, and desire him to call a Common-Council, that might make an address to his majesty in the name of the City, to call a new parliament. And whereas the said Francis Jenkes, being now called in, and heard before his majesty in council, was so far from denying or extenuating his offence, that he did in a presumptuous and arrogant manner endeavour to justify the same: These are therefore to command you, to take into your custody the body of the said Francis Jenkes, herewith sent you, and him to keep safely, until he shall be delivered by due course of law; for which this shall be your warrant. Dated at the Council-Chamber in Whitehall, this 28th day of June, 1676.’

Anglesey,

Next day, being the 29th of June, divers of Mr. Jenkes’s friends waited upon Mr. Secretary Williamson, and desired to become bail for him; but Mr. Secretary refused to take any bail; but told them, if they did mind him of it on Wednesday morning, he would move it at the council. But Mr. Jenkes believing that to be (as it proved) but a delay, ordered some of his friends to wait upon the Lord Chief-Justice Rainsford, and moved him for an Habeas Corpus ad subjiciend. et recipiend., &c. which accordingly was done, but his lordship denied to grant it, alledging no other reason but that it was vacation: though his lordship could not but know that writ to be the subject’s right at all times, as well out of term as in term; and Mr. Jenkes’s friends were ready to offer him multitudes of precedents when it had been granted out of term, both anciently, and since his majesty’s Restoration.

Mr. Jenkes resolving to leave no legal course to attain his liberty untried, upon Friday, the 30th of June, at a general seal, did by his counsel move the Lord-Chancellor for an Habeas Corpus. At first his lordship did seem much surprized, and did refuse to hear his counsel; but after a little pause, his lordship bid Mr. Jenkes’s counsel to move it again the next seal, and ordered the seal to be put off from Tuesday the 4th, until Thursday the 6th of July.

Upon Wednesday the 5th of July, Mr. Jenkes’s friends waited upon Mr. Secretary Williamson, and desired him, according to his promise, to move in council, that Mr. Jenkes might be bailed; but he said he had spoke with the king, and could do nothing without a petition. So upon Thursday the 6th of July, being a public Seal, Mr. Jenkes’s counsel did again move the Lord-Chancellor (according to his lordship’s order,) and asserted the authority of the lord Coke, who is most clear in the case. 2 part. Inst. fol. 53. speaking of the Writ of Habeas Corpus in the King’s-Bench, he saith, ‘The like writ is to be granted out of the Chancery, either in term (as in the King’s-Bench) or in the vacation; for the Court of Chancery is Officina Justitiæ, and is ever opened, and never adjourned: so as the subject being wrongfully imprisoned may have justice for the liberty of his person, as well in the vacation time as in term.’

And in the 4th Inst. fol. 88. speaking of the Court of Chancery, he saith, And this court is the rather always open, for that if a man be wrongfully imprisoned in the vacation, the Lord-Chancellor may grant an Habeas Corpus and do him justice according to law; vid. 4 Inst. fol. 182, 190. Thus the lord Coke.

Mr. Jenkes’s counsel did likewise offer a precedent or two; but the Lord Chancellor making light of the lord Coke’s opinion, saying, ‘The lord Coke was not intallible;’ and slighting all that Mr. Jenkes’s counsel offered, over-ruled the matter, denying to grant the writ.

On Tuesday morning, July 11, at the quarter-sessions, holden for the liberty of Westminster, Mr. Jenkes being still a prisoner in the Gatehouse, did move by his council to be bailed; where this was the substance of what passed, as it was taken by a person present.

Court. We have no such name in our calendar; and we sitting here by a limited commission, can take no notice of any person that is not in our calendar.

Counsel. Every keeper of a prison, either in county or franchise, ought by the Statute of 3 Hen. 7. c. 3. to certify the names of every prisoner in their custody, at the next general gaol-delivery there, to be calendaried before the justice of gaol-delivery, that the parties may be delivered according to law, upon pain of 100*l.* for every default there recorded. And I demand that this default of the gaoler may be recorded according to that statute; and that you would, as you may, command him to calendar him now.

The Statute was read.

Court. We are no general gaol-delivery, for we cannot try several felons, but they must be tried at the general gaol-delivery for the County.

Coun. You are a general gaol-delivery for all offences within the cognizance of your franchise; and therefore, unless the fact for which he is committed be such as is above your cognizance, he ought to be tried here; and if it be such a fact, he ought notwithstanding to be calendaried here, that you may send him to the County-gaol, where he may be tried.

Gaoler. I never did calendar any man that was committed by the council-table.

Coun. The neglect hath not taken away your duty; and as often as you have omitted so to do, so often have you deserved to be fined. And I do again demand of this court, that this default of yours may be recorded.

The court inclined to the gaoler, and would not record his fault; whereupon the counsel proceeded.

Coun. Since you exclude him from the benefit of your present commission, I apply myself to you, without respect to that, as you are justices of peace in general; and as such, you have power to bail any man bailable by law, except in some particular cases, where you are restrained by statute.

Court. By whom is he committed?

Coun. By the council-board.

Court. Do you believe the council-board can commit to prison?

Coun. I admit it.

Court. We don't know for what offence he is committed.

Coun. I have here a copy of the Commitment, and desire it may be read.

But the Gaoler refusing to own it for a true copy, though given by himself, and the court requiring a nicer proof that it was a true copy, than could at that time be made, they ordered the counsel to attend in the afternoon; and in the mean time the gaoler to give a true copy. In the afternoon the counsel appearing, the court called to him, and asked him what he had to say.

Coun. I have now a copy given and signed by the gaoler for a true copy, and desire it may be read.

The Gaoler, who was to prove it a true copy, upon the counsel coming into the court, took an occasion to slink away; and the court (as if it had been by design) were ready to take hold of that opportunity to evade the business; but Mr. Jenkes's friends fetched him back, and he swearing it to be a true copy it was read.

Court. What is it you demand?

Coun. What I did before: That there being nothing in this warrant, for which he is not bailable by law, I demand that he may be bailed.

Court. You have taken a wrong course in coming to us.

Coun. I presume he applies himself properly to you; for he being a prisoner within your liberty, you are the most proper persons to bail him. As justices of the peace, you have power to bail any man within your jurisdiction, bailable by law, and where you may bail by the law, you ought so to do: and I demand it for Mr. Jenkes.

Court. Where do you find such power given to justices of the peace?

Coun. By the same statute of Hen. 7. that I cited against the gaoler; the enacting part whereof saith, 'That the justices of the peace in every shire, city or town, or two of them at the least, whereof one to be of the quorum, have authority or power to let any such prisoner or persons, mainpernable by the law, that have been imprisoned within their several counties, city or town, to bail or mainprize, unto their next general sessions; or unto the next gaol-delivery of the same gaols, of every shire, city or town, as well within franchises as without, where any gaols be, or hereafter shall be, &c.'

The whole Statute was read, and the Court taking hold of the preamble, said, This Statute was made for the prevention of bailing felons not bailable by law, and enables us only to bail felons bailable by law.

Coun. The preamble of the act recites the mischief occasioned by the statute of 1 R. 3, but the enacting part repeals that act, and gives you a general power of letting any person, mainpernable by the law, to bail; and I am sure no statutes made for the liberty of the subject, ought to receive such a strait construction.

Court. Do you consider by whom he is committed? The privy council?

Coun. I do, and think that alters not the case.

Court. He is committed by a superior Court, and we, who are an inferior one, cannot bail him.

Coun. It is not the Court that commits, but the fact for which the party is committed, ought to direct you in bail. The statute of H. 7, hath no such exception in it; nor hath any other since put any such restraint upon you.

Court. Would you have us bail him, after the lord chancellor and the lord chief justice have refused to grant a Habeas Corpus?

Coun. They did not deny the Habeas Corpus because he was not bailable by law, but because the course of their Courts, in their opinions, would not admit it: but, however, if you ought to bail him, (as by the statute, I think, you ought) their refusal does not lessen your duty.

Court. We doubt very much that any inferior Court can bail a man committed by a superior one.

Coun. Scruples and fears do not alter the law: This doubt was once made in the King's-bench, in the great case of Selden, and others;* but the law was for the prisoner before that time, and was sufficiently settled then; and this case differs nothing from that in reason.

Court. It does, for that was upon a Habeas Corpus out of the King's-bench.

Coun. That is but a circumstantial difference. The Habeas Corpus from that Court is only to remove the prisoner, and the cause before them, that justice may be done to him: Mr. Jenkes is already within your jurisdiction, and the statute gives you authority to bail him; and your authority makes it your duty, and I rely upon that.

Court. We considered upon it at dinner, and do believe it a rare case, and fit to be advised upon; and we will advise. Why did you not move yesterday when my lord chief justice was in town? now there are no judges in town to advise with.

Coun. That we did not come yesterday was no design, for he is not so fond of a gaol; and if it be an indiscretion, yet that is no sufficient reason to detain a man in prison. However, if you have power (which you ought to know) you have it as well when they are not in town, as when they are. Is he bailable by law, or not?

Court. There is nothing in the warrant, for which he is not bailable by law.

Coun. For what reason then do you deny him?

Court. We do not deny him, but we will advise, because he is committed by a superior Court.

Coun. No man ought to be imprisoned for any misdemeanor before conviction, without bail; and it is against the Petition of Right, that any man bailable by law, should be detained in gaol without it. I do not know how, by such denials as this, the being committed by a superior Court may grow to be a reason; but at present I think the Petition of Right spoils it for being a good one.

Court. You can give us no precedent of any one being bailed by justices at the sessions, who was committed by the council board.

Coun. I believe it is a rare case that a man should be forced to apply himself to such, but I think I can furnish you with an instance; and that is of one Cannon, a quaker, who was committed by the privy council about Christmas last, and was bailed at the sessions of the Old Bailey.

A pert by-stander, no ways concerned, suggested to the Court, and the Court repeated after him, Court. He was committed to Newgate prison, and was calendered there.

Coun. If you stick to the reason of being committed by a superior Court, that is no answer; but if it must be an answer, Mr. Jenkes is committed to the prison of this liberty, and ought to have been calendered here; and then I do again demand that the gaoler be fined.

Court. We think it a rare case, and fit to be advised upon; and our commission we here sit by, directs us to do so in difficult cases.

Coun. I told you before, I had nothing to do with the commission you here sit by; and you yourselves excluded me from it: but I apply myself to you as justices of the peace merely, and as such you ought to take upon you the knowledge of your office.

Court. In the great case of Selden, that you cited, the judges took two terms to advise.

Coun. You very well know what opinion was had of their doing so. Will you advise upon it to-night with the king's counsel, and I will attend you to-morrow morning?

Court. We think fit to advise with the judges about it, till next sessions.

Coun. I can easily interpret what such advising means.

Court. You say you apply yourself to us as justices of the peace merely, then you may come to any two of us a fortnight hence, or more, and perhaps we may advise in the mean time.

Coun. I believe it will be a difficult matter to get any two of you together upon this occasion.

Mr. Jenkes finding all these common doors to liberty shut against him, did by advice betake himself to another method, not less legal than the former; though the power granted by the statutes to justices of peace, and the constant issuing of the writ of Habeas Corpus upon demand (both more easy courses) have occasioned it to be more seldom used.

Justice Fitzherbert, in his Natura Brevium (an author, and a book of justly venerable authority in our law), in his Chapter of Mainprize, declares, That if a man be taken by the king's commission, and kept in prison for felony or misdemeanors, he may by his friends put in sureties in the Chancery, that he will appear before the justices, &c. and be of good behaviour, &c. and that body for body; and thereupon he shall have a writ out of the Chancery, unto the sheriff, or unto the constable of the castle where he is imprisoned, to set him at liberty, if he be imprisoned for that cause and no other.

Which words seem plainly to declare the writ of Mainprize to be the subject's right, and not to leave a discretionary power to the officers of Chancery in granting it. But the scarcity of precedents being the great objection against the Habeas Corpus out of Chancery, Mr. Jenkes resolved to offend no more in that kind, and therefore caused a search to be made in the Rolls in the Tower, for the Writs of Mainprize, where a multitude of them was found, and many in the case of a commitment by the king's command. A copy of one, and a note of several others were taken out, to back the authority of Fitzherbert.

With this provision, on Monday, July four of Mr. Jenkes's friends, substantial merchants, attended by a counsel, went to the chancellor; and though upon tender of themselves as bail for him, they might have demanded their writ of Mainprize as the subject's right, without other formality, yet they addressed themselves to him in a more respectful manner, by way of Petition, thus:

To the Right Hon. Henry Lord Finch, Baron of Daventry, and Lord High-Chancellor of England; the humble Petition of A. B. C. D. of London, Merchants, friends to Francis Jenkes, now a Prisoner in the Gatehouse of Westminster, sheweth:

'That the said Francis Jenkes was committed to the said prison, by virtue of a warrant, a true copy whereof is hereunto annexed, for a fact bailable by law; for which, and no other cause, he yet remains there a prisoner; And that in this and all other cases of like nature, your Petitioners are advised, upon putting in bail in the court of chancery, according to the ancient course and usage thereof, a Writ of Main-prize ought to issue under the great-seal, to be directed to the sheriff or keeper of the prison where such prisoner stands committed, to deliver the prisoner so committed.

"That your Petitioners being men of good estates, (as shall, if your lordship require, be made out to your lordship) do desire, and are ready to become bail for the said Francis Jenkes; according to the course of the chancery, and according to the law.

"The Petitioners therefore pray, that your lordship would accept of bail accordingly; and that thereupon your lordship would order a writ to be made forthwith, to be directed to the keeper of the Gatehouse, for the discharge of the said Francis Jenkes. And your petitioners shall always pray, &c."

The Petition being sent in to, and read by his lordship, was returned by the Secretary with this answer; 'That his lordship did very well approve of the Petition; but since Mr. Jenkes was committed by the council-board, he thought fit that they should be petitioned, and should bail him.'

But Mr. Jenkes's friends not being satisfied with that answer, pressed to speak to his lordship, and were by his lordship's order called in, who coming towards them, spake to this effect:

Lord Chan. Who is it that puts you on these improper methods?

Coun. We presume this address to your lordship to be a proper course in our case, and is such as we have precedent for.

Lord Chan. Are you a lawyer?

Coun. Yes, my lord.

Lord Chan. Have you read Fitzherbert's Nat. Brevium? Look in his Writ de Homine replegiando.

VOL. VI.

Coun. We have nothing to do with that writ, but it is by Fitzherbert that we are directed to this course, in his chapter of Main-prize, where he saith (what is before cited); and we are confirmed in his opinion by a multitude of precedents out of the close rolls in the Tower; I have the copy of one here, and the number and roll of many more.

The Precedent shewn to his lordship was this:

'Ex Rot. claus. de Anno Regni Regis Ed. 3, 11, parte prima, membr. 28.

De Deliberand. Ric. Monyword, à prisona.

The note of the number and roll of several Writs of Main-prize, upon surety put into chancery, shewn to his lordship, was this;

Lord Chan. One precedent of discretion is worth a thousand of these precedents.

His lordship read the precedent, and observing it to bear Teste the 19th day of March, which could never be in term, asked, When it was returnable? and said, it must be returnable in some court at Westminster.

Coun. This precedent hath no return, neither doth the nature of the writ in this case require one; for it is only a mandate to the gaoler, to set him at liberty upon sureties first taken in chancery for his appearance before the justices; which justices, and the time of his appearance, I suppose, are to be named in the recognizance.

Lord Chan. Whether there ought to be a return, is the question; besides, this is a writ directed immediately to the marshal of the household, and is a different case.

Coun. With submission to your lordship, it makes no difference who is the gaoler; and those I have given your lordship the number and roll of, are to several gaolers.

Then Fitzherbert's Nat. Brevium was shewn to his lordship, and upon reading the words there, 'If a man be imprisoned by the king's commission,' &c. his lordship said, That it was intended of one imprisoned by virtue of a commission out of chancery.

Coun. I humbly presume, that is not the sense of the book; the precedents I have shewn your lordship seem to interpret it, and are upon other comments; and Fitzherbert, in his Abridgement, Tit. Main-prize, pl. 23, cites a Book-case, that shews this to have been a course in the Chancery; but we submit it to your lordship's judgment.

Lord Chan. A little submission in a proper place will do, but he hath a mind to come out with a high hand.

Coun. He has a mind to be discharged by law, as the warrant for his commitment directs.

Lord Chan. I am not to control any act of the privy council.

Coun. At the last motion for a Habeas Corpus, your lordship was pleased to say, That though that was not a proper method for Mr. Jenkes to obtain his liberty by, yet there was one; and upon that encouragement from your lordship, search has been made, and this course we have now taken, found to have been the ancient course; and we did presume, the same that your lordship meant.

Lord Chan. You have used a great deal of industry to miss the right way. Your precedents of Edw. 3. and Rich. 2 (300 years old) I will consider of till next term. Upon which answer, Mr. Jenkes's friends withdrew.

Now plenty of precedents proved as great a fault as want of them did before; and their age, which used to add to their authority, and give them a greater respect, made them condemned. Such always is the success, where 'stat pro ratione voluntas.' In the afternoon, the Secretary that first carried in the Petition, came to Mr. Jenkes in a dissembled confusion, and told him, That he had committed a mistake in returning the Petition;* That his lordship had asked him for it, and would be very angry with him if he had it not; That he had left his lordship looking over some papers, and had a that opportunity of coming for it; and that he might have it, to preserve him from his lordship's displeasure.

Though the morning's action gave Mr. Jenkes a great deal of reason to suspect the Secretary's tale to be a mere contrivance, and it was easy to surmise the truth; yet he took no notice of what had then passed, but sent the Petition (which was then in some of his friends hands) that evening to him. Upon the second thoughts which his lordship bestowed upon the matter of the Petition, he was better reconciled to it, and proved better than his word in considering the precedents, for instead of pausing upon them till the next term, he was pleased to carry them and the petition to the privy council, the next Wednesday; where, though all the particulars are not known, upon credible information, this was the substance of what passed.

His lordship acquainted the board with the Address that had been made to him; and moved, that the Petition might be there read. After it was read, his lordship told them, that it had some appearance of law, and desired that the Attorney-General (sir W. Jones) might give his opinion. Mr. Attorney told him, if it were law, his lordship ought to grant it; if it were not law, then to deny it; if it were of such difficulty as he could not satisfy himself, that then he should advise with the judges.

His lordship then moved for an order of council for his direction in the matter; to which some of the Lords replied, That they were a court of state, and not of law, and that it did belong to him, as Lord Chancellor, to inform them of matters of law: Thereupon his lordship clapping his hands to his breast, said, I thank God I have courage enough to serve his majesty.

About the latter end of July, some of Mr. Jenkes's friends attended his lordship again, and offered him bail; insisting upon the Writ of Main-prize as the subject's right; alledging to his lordship the hazards that his health, his family, and his trade were exposed to by his confinement. His lordship asked them, why they had not petitioned the king and council? and told them, if Mr. Jenkes thought it better to lie in prison and complain, than petition and be haled, he might do as he pleased.

They told him they had tendered bail to Mr. Secretary Williamson, who promised them to move the king in council in it. But when they reminded him of it upon the next council-day, he was pleased to excuse himself. His lordship told them he never heard they had tendered bail; but the Writ of Main-prize was forgotten in all his answer.

* Note, That he had returned it by his lordship's order.

They then told him, that the general report was, that the king and council had referred to his lordship; but his lordship would take notice of that likewise, but said, the king would advise with the judges when they came town. His lordship withdrew from them; and they left word with his secretary, That Mr. Jenkes looked upon himself to be his lordship's prisoner.

On the — of August, Mr. Jenkes's friends went again to my Lord Chancellor's, but his secretary told them, his lordship could not be spoke with.

They prevailed with his Secretary to go up to him, and remind his lordship of his last answer of advising with the judges; and tell him, that several of the judges had been in town, and they did now desire his lordship's resolution.

The Secretary at his return told them, that as soon as he began to mention the business, his lordship fell into a fit of the stone; but when that was over, he would mention it to him. About two hours after, they returned; and the Secretary being absent, another of his lordship's servants came to them, and told them that his lordship was not well, and could not be spoke with: but had ordered him to tell them, that Mr. Jenkes might advise with his counsel what was fit to be done, for he was none of his counsel; and if he would petition the king and council, he might; and that that was his answer.

On the 11th of August, being the last council day that was to be before the 3d of October, Mr. Jenkes thought fit again to tender bail to the council; and that the Lord Chancellor, who disowned all knowledge of his doing so before, and that the whole council might know of it, he sent this Letter by his bail to the Lord Privy Seal, then president of the council, which was publicly read.

“My Lord, I have been imprisoned since the 28th of June, to my great loss, charge, and prejudice of my health. I have hitherto been denied bail, Habeas Corpus and the Writ of Main-prize; which I am informed, were never before denied to any of his majesty's subjects in the like case: And this only for moving in a lawful court, and in a quiet and peaceable manner, that which I did believe to be for his majesty's service, and the good of the city and kingdom, and the preservation of the Protestant religion; and which I conceive I can make appear to be according to the laws and statutes of this realm, if I am publicly called thereto. Wherefore I do not beg a discharge, for I desire nothing more than to clear my innocence by a public trial: but since Mr. Marrel and others, committed to this prison for matters of a far other nature, are daily bailed out; my humble request to your lordship is, that you would be pleased to move his majesty, that I, as well as any other of his majesty's subjects, may enjoy the benefit of the laws; and that the Writ of Main-prize may be granted to me; or that my bail, which now attend, may be taken: Your lordship will very much oblige your lordship's humble servant, FRANCIS JENKES.”

This Letter was by some improved into a Petition; and when they had given it that name, (though that was the only thing wanting to please the Lord Chancellor) yet it could not procure the acceptance of bail; but the method proposed by his lordship, proved as ineffectual as those that were demanded of him. The Lord Chancellor's resolutions being sufficiently discovered, Mr. Jenkes's friends forbore all farther solicitation of his lordship, and made fresh application to the Lord Chief-Justice Rainsford, on August 18, then just returned from the circuit.

The time of sessions at the Old Bailey drawing on, they caused two Writs of Habeas Corpus to be made (the common course of removing prisoners from one gaol to another); one, ad deliherandum, directed to the Keeper at the Gate-house; and the other, ad recipiendum, directed to the sheriffs of London, and desired his lordship to sign them, that Mr. Jenkes might be removed and brought to trial; for that the keeper of the Gate-house not calendar any state-prisoner, (as he called him) at the sessions for Westminster, he might lie there all his life-time without trial, which no subject ought to do. His lordship excused himself upon his late return to town, which had not yet afforded him leisure to advise; and sent them to the Attorney-General, to know whether he were ready for a trial, before he would give them any answer.

Mr. Attorney, upon their coming to him, very worthily told them, That he had no order in it, but that he would not oppose the granting of those writs: adding, God forbid but that the law should have its due course.

They returned to the Lord Chief-Justice with this answer, and offered to make oath that it was Mr. Attorney's answer; but he would give credit to nothing, but a note under Mr. Attorney's own hand. They told him, it was hard that a man should lie in prison, who was willing to bring himself upon trial; that writs of this nature were every day granted, and did presume, could not reasonably be denied. His lordship answered, he would know whether Mr. Attorney were ready for a trial. They replied, That they did not know when Mr. Attorney would be ready, and Mr. Jenkes must stay for his trial till then.

They then moved his lordship, as they had done formerly, That he would grant a Habeas Corpus to bring him before his lordship, and that he would accept of substantial citizens for bail, who should render him whensoever Mr. Attorney should call for him; alledging, that such writs had been frequently granted by the Lord Chief-Justice Keeling, and one of the now justices of the King's-Bench.

His lordship returned, That he did not doubt the security they should offer him; but he had never granted such a writ, and he knew not upon what authority others had done it : and in short, refused to grant either that or the other writs.

After all these denials of right, Mr. Jenkes resolved to sit still, with the satisfaction, that his ill success was not imputable to the injustice of his cause ; but to the pleasure or fear of those that had the power of making it otherwise : and with patience to expect it till the term should set open the prison-doors ; which will not brook the denial of a Habeas Corpus, though a long vacation must.

No further address was therefore made to either of their lordships ; but themselves, after they had taken the pleasure of denying him, were pleased to condescend to intercede for him : for, as we heard by very credible information, the Lord Chief-Justice went to the Lord Chancellor and told him, " That the " writs demanded of him, were according to " law, and could not be denied ; and that he had only taken time till he had acquainted his lordship with it."

The Lord Chancellor directed him to the Treasurer for further advice ; who sent him to the king. As soon as his majesty understood, that what was demanded was the subject's Right, he immediately commanded that the laws should have their due course, which their lordships had stopped : and accordingly he was bailed."

He was afterwards, in 1683, tried with Thomas Pilkington, Henry Cornish, esqrs. and others, for a riot at Guildhall, and fined 500 marks.

* It has been said, and seems probable, that his case contributed to the passing of the Habeas Corpus Act stat. 31 Car. 2, c. 2.

238. The Trial of JAMES MITCHEL,* in Scotland, for attempting the Murder of Dr. James Sharp, Archbishop of St. Andrews, and wounding the Bishop of Orkney : 29 CHARLES II. A. D. 1677.

JAMES Mitchel being indicted for an attempt to murder the archbishop of St. Andrews, in July 1668, was committed 1674 prisoner to the Tolbooth at Edinburgh ; whereupon the Lord Commissioner and the Lords of the privy-council appointed a committee to examine him, viz. Lord Linlithgow, Preses (President) : Hatton, treasurer depute ; Dundonald, Ross,

* The attempt upon archbishop Sharp is thus related by Burnet :

" A strange accident happened to Sharp in July 1668, as he was going into his coach in full daylight, the bishop of Orkney being with him. A man came up to the coach, and discharged a pistol at him with a brace of bullets in it, as the bishop of Orkney was going up into the coach. He intended to shoot through his cloak at Sharp, as he was mounting up : but the bullet stuck in the bishop of Orkney's arm, and shattered it so, that, though he lived some years after that, they were forced to open it every year for an exfoliation. Sharp was so universally hated, that, though this was done in full daylight, and on the high street, yet nobody offered to seize the assassin. So he walked off, and went home, and shifted himself of an odd wig, which he was not accustomed to wear, and came out, and walked on the streets immediately. But Sharp had viewed him so narrowly, that he discovered him afterwards, as shall be mentioned in its proper place. I lived then much out of the world : yet I thought it decent to go and congratulate on this occasion. He was much touched with it, and put on a shew of devotion upon it. He said with a very serious look, My times are wholly in thy hand, O thou God of my life. This was the single expression savouring of piety, that ever fell from him in all the conversation that passed between him and me. Proclamations were issued out with great rewards for discovering the actor :

but nothing followed on them. On this occasion it was thought proper, that he should be called to court, and have some marks of the king's favour put on him. He promised to make many good motions : and he talked for a while like a changed man : and went out of his way, as he was going to court, to visit me at my parsonage house, and seemed resolved to turn to other methods."—Afterwards, relating the history of the year 1678, he says :

" Things being in great disorder, by reason of the numbers and desperate tempers of those who were intercommoned, [Letters of intercommuning, similar to the 'Aque et ignis interdictio' of the Roman law, concluded thus " We command and charge all our lieges and subjects, that none presume to reset, (receive) supply, or intercommune with any of the fore-said our rebels, nor furnish them with meat, drink, house, harbour, or victuals ; nor any other thing useful or comfortable to them ; nor have any intelligence with them by word, writing, message, or otherwise, under the pain of being repute and esteemed art and part with them in the crime foresaid, and to be pursued therefore with all rigour." 4 Laing's Hist. of Scotland, 74 Note.] Sharp pretended he was in great danger of his life ; and that the rather, because the person that had made the attempt on him was yet live still. Upon this I must tell what had past three years before this. Sharp had observed a man that kept shop at his door, who looked very narand Murray, justiciaries; Craigy, Collington, &c. When he was brought before the committee, he was persuaded to make acknowledgment of the fact; a relation whereof is th^t given by himself.

rowly at him always as he passed by: and he fancied, he was the man that had shot at him six years before. So he ordered him to be taken up, and examined. It was found, he had two pistols by him, that were deeply charged, which increased the suspicion. Yet the man denied all. But Sharp got a friend of his to go to him, and deal with him to make a full confession: and he made solemn promises, that he would procure his pardon. His friend answered, he hoped he did not intend to make use of him to trepan a man to his ruin. Upon that, with lifted up hands, Sharp promised by the living God, that no hurt should come to him, if he made a full discovery. The person came again to him, and said, if a promise was made in the king's name the prisoner would tell all. So it was brought before the council. Lord Rothes, Halton, and Primerose were ordered to examine him. Primerose said it would be a strange force of eloquence, to persuade a man to confess, and be hanged. So Duke Lauderdale, being the king's commissioner, gave them a power to promise him his life. And as soon as these Lords told him this, he immediately kneeled down, and confessed the fact, and told the whole manner of it. There was but one person privy to it, who was then dead. Sharp was troubled to see so small a discovery made: yet they could not draw more from him. So then it was considered, what should be done to him. Some moved the cutting off his right hand. Others said he might learn to practise with his left hand, and to take his revenge; therefore they thought both hands should be cut off.—This cruelty was spared by means of a coarse jest of Lord Rothes, "and" proceeds Burnet, "when the truth of the promise now given was afterwards called in question, this jest was called to mind, and made the whole matter to be remembered. But Primerose moved, that since life was promised, which the cutting off a limb might endanger, it was better to keep him prisoner during life in a castle they had in the Bass, a rock in the mouth of the Frith: and thither he was sent. But it was thought necessary to make him repeat his confession in a court of judicature: [Laing says the justiciary court was instructed secretly to pronounce a sentence for the amputation of his hand] so he was brought into the justiciary court, upon an indictment for the crime, to which it was expected he should plead guilty. But the judge, who hated Sharp, as he went up to the bench, passing by the prisoner said to him, Confess nothing, unless you are sure of your limbs as well as of your life. Upon this hint he, apprehending the danger, refused to confess: which being reported to the council, an act was past mentioning the promise and his confession, and

"My indictment I take up in these two particulars: first, as they term it, rebellion and treason, anent which I answered to my Lord Chancellor in committee, that it was no rebellion, but a duty which every one was bound adding, that since he had retracted his confession, they likewise recalled the promise of pardon: the meaning of which was this, that, if any other evidence was brought against him, the promise should not cover him: but it still was understood, that this promise secured him from any ill effect by his own confession. The thing was almost forgot after four years, the man being in all respects very inconsiderable. But now Sharp would have his life. So duke Lauderdale gave way to it: and he was brought to Edinburgh in order to his trial. Nisbit, who had been the king's advocate, and was one of the worthiest and learnedest men of the age, was turned out. And Mackenzie was put in his place, who was a man of much life and wit, but he was neither equal nor correct in it: he had published many books, some of law, but all full of faults; for he was a slight and superficial man. Lockhart was assigned counsel for the prisoner. And now that the matter came again into peoples memory, all were amazed at the proceeding. Primerose was turned out of the place of lord register, and was made justice general. He fancied orders had been given to raze the act that the council had made: so he turned the books, and he found the act still on record. He took a copy of it, and sent it to Mitchell's counsel: that was the prisoner's name. And, a day or two before the trial, he went to duke Lauderdale, who, together with Sharp, lord Rothes, and lord Halton, were summoned as the prisoner's witnesses. He told him, many thought there had been a promise of life given. Duke Lauderdale denied it stiffly. Primerose said, he heard there was an act of council made about it, and he wished that might be looked into. Duke Lauderdale said, he was sure it was not possible, and he would not give himself the trouble to turn over the books of council. Primerose, who told me this, said his conscience led him to give duke Lauderdale this warning of the matter, but that he was not sorry to see him thus reject it. The trial was very solemn. The confession was brought against him, as full evidence: to which Lockhart did plead, to the admiration of all, to shew that no extrajudicial confession could be allowed in a court. The hardships of a prison, the hopes of life, with other practices, might draw confessions from men, when they were perhaps drunk, or out of their senses. He brought upon this a measure of learning, that amazed the audience, out of the lawyers of all civilized nations. And, when it was opposed to this, that the council was a court of judicature, he shewed, that it was not the proper court for crimes of this nature, and that it had not proceeded in this as a court of judicature. And he brought out likewise a great deal of

to have performed in joining with that party, and 1st. in the year 1656, Mr. Robert Lighton being then Primar in the college of Edinburgh, before our laureation, tendered to us the National Covenant, and Solemn League and Covenant; upon mature deliberation, I found no-

learning upon those heads. But this was overruled by the court, and the confession was found to be judicial. The next thing pleaded for him was, that it was drawn from him upon hope and promise of life: and to this Sharp was examined. The person he had sent to Mitchell gave a full evidence of the promises he had made him: but Sharp denied them all. He also denied he heard any promise of life made him by the council: so did the lords Lauderdale, Rothes, and Halton, to the astonishment of all that were present. Lockhart upon that produced a copy of the act of council, that made express mention of the promise given, and of his having confessed upon that. And the prisoner prayed that the books of council, which lay in a room over that in which the court sat, might be sent for. Lockhart pleaded, that since the court had judged that the council was a judicature, all people had a right to search into their registers; and the prisoner, who was like to suffer by a confession made there, ought to have the benefit of those books. Duke Lauderdale, who was in the court only as a witness, and so had no right to speak, stood up, and said, he and those other noble persons were not brought thither to be accused of perjury; and added, that the books of council were the king's secrets, and that no court should have the perusing of them. The court was terrified with this, and the judges were divided in opinion. Primrose, and one other, was for calling for the books. But three were of opinion, that they were not to furnish the prisoner with evidence, but to judge of that which he brought. And here was only a bare copy, not attested upon oath, which ought not to have been read. So, this defence being rejected, he was cast and condemned.

"As soon as the court broke up, the lords went up stairs, and to their shame found the act recorded, and signed by lord Rothes, as president of the council. He pretended, he signed every thing that the clerk of council put in the book without reading it. And it was intended to throw it on him. But he, to clear himself, searched among his papers, and found a draught of the act in Nisbit's hand. So, he being rich, and one they had turned out, they resolved to put it upon him, and to fine him deeply. But he examined the Sederunt in the book, and spoke to all who were there at the board, of whom nine happened to be in town, who were ready to depose upon oath, that when the council had ordered this act to be drawn, the clerk of the council desired the help of the king's advocates in penning it, which he gave him; and his draught was approved by the council. And now lord Rothes's jest thing in them, but a short compend of the moral law, only binding us to our duty towards God and towards men in their several stations; and I finding, that our banished king's interest lay wholly included therein, and both coronation and allegiance oaths, &c. and they being was remembered. Yet duke Lauderdale still stood to it, that the promise could only be for interceding with the king for his pardon, since the council had not the power of pardoning in them. Lord Kincardin acted in this the part of a christian to an enemy. Duke Lauderdale had writ to him, he being then serving for him at Court, that he referred the account of Mitchell's business to his brother's letters; in which the matter was truly related, that upon promise of life he had confessed the fact; and he concluded, desiring him to ask the king, that he would be pleased to make good the promise. These Letters I saw in lord Kincardin's hand. Before the trial he sent a bishop to duke Lauderdale, desiring him to consider better of that matter, before he would upon oath deny it: for he was sure he had it under his, and his brother's hand, though he could not yet fall upon their letters. But duke Lauderdale despised this. Yet, before the execution he went to his house in the country, and there found the letters, and brought them in with him, and shewed them to that bishop. All this made some impression on duke Lauderdale: and he was willing to grant a reprieve, and to refer the matter to the king. So a petition was offered to the council. And he spoke for it. But Sharp said, that was upon the matter the exposing his person to any man that would attempt to murder him, since favour was to be shewed to such an assassin. Then said duke Lauderdale, in an impious jest, Let Mitchell glorify God in the grass market, which was the place where he was to be hanged. This action, and all concerned in it, were looked at by all people with horror. And it was such a complication of treachery, perjury, and cruelty as the like had not perhaps been known. Yet Duke Lauderdale had a chaplain, Hickes, afterwards Dean of Worcester, who published a false and partial relation of this matter, in order to the justifying of it. Primrose not only gave me an account of this matter, but sent me an authentic record of the trial, every page signed by the clerk of the court; of which I have here given an abstract. This I set down the more fully, to let my readers see to what a height in wickedness men may be carried, after they have once thrown off good principles. What Sharp did now to preserve himself from such practices was probably that which, both the just judgment of God and the enflamed fury of wicked men, brought him two years after to such a dismal end."

Of this dismal end his account is this: "When a party of furious men were riding through a moor near St. Andrews, they saw the arch-bishop's coach appear: he was coming from a council day, and was driving home: he the substance of all loyalty ; and, my Lord, it was well known, that then many were taking the tender, and forswearing Charles Stuart, Parliament and House of Lords, I then subscribed both, the doing of which my Lord Chancellor would have stood at no less rate, if as well known, than this my present adhering and prosecuting the ends thereof doth now ; and when I was questioned what then I called rebellion, I answered, it is in Ezra vii. 26. 'And whosoever will not do the law of God and of the king,' &c. But being questioned before had sent some of his servants home before him to let them know he was coming, and others he had sent off on compliments ; so that there was no horseman about the coach. They seeing this, concluded, according to their frantic enthusiastic notions, that God had now delivered up their greatest enemy into their hands : Seven of them made up to the coach, while the rest were as scouts riding all about the moor. One of them fired a pistol at him, which burnt his coat and gown, but did not go into his body : Upon this they fancied he had a magical secret to secure him against a shot ; and they drew him out of his coach, and murdered him barbarously, repeating their strokes till they were sure he was quite dead : And so they got clear off, no body happening to go cross the moor all the while. This was the dismal end of that unhappy man : it struck all people with horror, and softened his enemies into some tenderness. So that his memory was treated with decency by those who had very little respect for him during his life."

Of the catastrophe of Sharp, Mr. Laing's narrative and his reflections are as follows : "Under the primate's jurisdiction and influence, Carmichael, one of the commissioners appointed to exterminate conventicles, was peculiarly noted for his cruelties in Fife. If we may believe his enemies, he was accustomed among other enormities to beat and abuse the women and children, and to torture the servants with lighted matches, that they might be compelled to reveal where their husbands, or their fathers, or their masters were concealed. Nine of these unhappy fugitives, who wandered in small parties, intercommuned and interdicted from society, determined to intercept and to chastise his person, if not to avenge their wrongs on his life. When about to separate, after an ineffectual search, they were informed of the archbishop of St. Andrews' approach. As he was slightly attended, the opportunity was embraced as a divine call, and the temptation to perpetrate a detestable deed was interpreted a special dispensation from heaven. They pursued and overtook his coach upon Magus-Moor, within a few miles of St. Andrews ; dismounted his attendants, and as their shots proved ineffectual, they dragged the archbishop from his daughter's arms. His offers and entreaties for life were unavailing. They protested that they were actuated by no motives of personal revenge ; reproached him with his perjury in Mitchell's trial ; admonished him of the blood of the saints, in which his hands were embred, and, affixed the shrieks and struggles of his daughter to save him, left his dead body in the highway, transfixed, and covered with the most barbarous wounds.

"From the first beginning of the reformation in Scotland, Sharp was the third archbishop of St. Andrews who had suffered from popular or from private revenge. The assassination of Cardinal Beaton, was a crime congenial to the manners of the nation and the vices of the age. The execution of archbishop Hamilton was sanctioned by the forms of a legal attainer : but the murder of Sharp was regarded even by his enemies as an inhuman act, that redeemed his memory from some share of the detestation which he had incurred when alive. That he was decent, if not regular in his deportment, endued with the most industrious diligence, and not illiterate, was never disputed ; that he was vain, vindictive, perfidious, at once haughty and servile, rapacious and cruel, his friends have never attempted to disown. His apostacy was never forgiven by the presbyterians ; but instead of disarming their resentment by moderation, he became an unrelenting persecutor, like most apostates, actuated by a hatred to the sect which he had deserted and betrayed. Indifferent to the doctrines of his former party, and therefore the more feelingly alive to their reproaches, he appears, under the mask of religious zeal, to have uniformly consulted and gratified his private revenge. His death was acceptable to none but the wilder fanatics, who discovered, in a crime of which they durst not have previously approved, the execution of righteous judgment by private men."

The following passage is extracted from the Memoirs of captain John Creighton (Nichols's edition of Swift's Works, vol. xiv. p. 291) :

"Soon after this, the archbishop of St. Andrews was murdered by the laird of Hackston and Balfour, assisted by four poor weavers. Hackston, before this horrid action, was reputed an honest and gallant man ; but his friendship for his brother-in-law Balfour drew him in to commit this inhuman murder. Balfour, who had been the archbishop's chamberlain (for so in Scotland we call a great man's steward) whether by negligence or dishonesty, was short in his payments to his lord ; and the fear of being called to an account was a principal motive to assassinate his master : however, he pretended likewise a great zeal for the kirk, whereof he looked upon the archbishop as the greatest oppressor. It is certain, that the lower people mortally hated the archbishop, on pretence that his grace had deserted their communion ; and the weavers who were accomplices of Balfour, believed they did God service in destroying an enemy of the kirk ; and accordingly all the murderers were esteemed and styled saints, by that rebellious faction."

Reports, which were circulated at the time, respecting the circumstances of Sharp's death, the commissioner and the council thereanent, I answered as I said to my Lord Chancellor before : in the year 1656, Mr. Robert Lighton being then Primar in the college of Edinburgh, before our laurcation, he tendered to us the National and Solemn League and Covenant : he stopt me, saying, I le wad ye are come here to give a testimony : and then being demanded what I called rebellion, if it was not rebellion to oppose his majesty's forces in the face : to the which I answered, viz. My Lord Chancellor, if it please your grace, I humbly conceive they should have been with us : meaning, that it was the duty of these forces to have joined with us ; according to the National and Solemn League and Covenant ; at which answer I perceived him to storm : but, saith he, I heard ye have been over seas, with whom did ye converse there ? Answer, with my merchant. But, saith he, With whom in particular ? Answer, With one John Mitchel, a cousin of mine own. Saith he, I have heard of him, he is a factor in Rotterdam ; to which I conceded. But, saith he, did ye not converse with Mr. Levingston, and such as he ? To which I answered, I conversed with all our banished ministers. To which he replied, banished traitors ; ye will speak treason at the bar. Then he answered himself, saying, But they would call the shooting at the bishop an heroic act. To which I answered, That I never told them any such thing. But where did you see James Wallace last ? Answer, Towards the borders of Germany, some years ago. But what ailed you at my lord St. Andrews ? (pointing at him with his finger) Answer, My Lord Commissioner, the grievous oppression and horrid blood-shed of my brethren, and the eager pursue after my own, as it appeareth this day to your grace, and to all his majesty's honourable are mentioned in the letters of Algernon Sidney.

Mitchel's attempt on Sharp, Laing mentions thus :

"The apostacy of Sharp had excited such deep resentment, his rigors had inspired such implacable revenge, that it is not surprising if, among a persecuted sect, and a fanatical party, some attempted to perpetrate a deed of which few disapproved. While sitting in his coach by day, in the public streets, a pistol was discharged at his person, through Honyman, the bishop of Orkney's clock, while ascending the carriage ; but the bishop's arm intercepted the balls. Such was the hatred of the archbishop, that the assassin was permitted to cross the street and to escape through a lane. On disengaging himself from his disguise, he returned to the crowd ; and, notwithstanding the most vigilant search, remained undiscovered, till recognized six years afterwards by Sharp himself. For a time the primate affected a transient lenity, but as such an atrocious attempt must exasperate the mind, no real moderation was inspired by his escape." 4 Hist. of Scotland 52.

privy-council. After which he commanded to take me away, that they might see what to do next with me.

"The second is, the shooting of the shot intended against the bishop of St. Andrews, whereby the bishop of Orkney was hurt ; to which I answered my Lord Chancellor in private, viz. That I looked on him to be the main instigator of all the oppression and bloodshed of my brethren, that followed thereupon, and the continual pursuing after my own ; and my Lord, as it was creditably reported to us (the truth of which your lordship knows better than we) that he kept up his majesty's letter inhibiting any more blood upon that account, until the last six were execute : and I being a soldier, not having laid down arms, but being still upon my own defence, and having no other end nor quarrel at any man (but according to my apprehension of him) that as I hope in sincerity, with fixing either my sense or action upon the Covenant itself, as it may be understood by the many thousands of the faithful, besides the prosecution of the ends of the same Covenant, which was, and in that point the overthrow of prelates and prelacy, and I being a declared enemy to him on that account, and he to me in like manner : so I never found myself obliged, either by the Law of God, or nature, to set a centry at his door for his safety, but as he was always to take his advantage, as it appeareth, so I of him, to take any opportunity offered. Moreover we being in no terms of capitulation, but on the contrair, I, by his instigation, being excluded from all grace and favour, thought it my duty to pursue him at all occasions : also, my lord, sir William Sharp making his apology, anent his unhand-some and cheating way taken, he took me under the pretence to have spoken with me about some other matters. I not knowing him until five or six of his brothers, and his servants were laying fast hold on me, they being armed of purpose, desired I would excuse him, seeing what he had done was upon his brother's account, which excuse I easily admitted, seeing that he thought himself obliged to do what he did to me without law or order, in the behalf of his brother ; much more was I obliged to do what I did, in the behalf of many brethren, whose oppression was so great, and whose blood he caused to be shed in such abundance. Moreover, he persisting in his bloody murders, as witnesseth the wounding of Mr. Bruce at his taking, by his emissaries, some few days before that fell out concerning himself, I was desirous, if by any means in taking him away I could, to have put a stop to the then current persecution. Thus far I have truly resumed what passed. My confession was made upon oath and promise made to me upon life and safety, and indeed the promise made to me by my Lord Chancellor was in these words : 'Upon my great oath and reputation, if I be Chancellor, I shall save your life, and if ye will not confess, the council will take another way to make it out,' which I took for the Boots,* as I found afterwards.”

After two years imprisonment, upon the 18th of Jan. 1677, he was unawares, at six o'clock of the night (about the time of the inclosing of the Wards), called forth before the committee.

* “They put a pair of iron boots close on the leg, and drive wedges between these and the leg. The Common Torture was only to drive these in the calf of the leg: but I have been told they were sometimes driven upon the shin bone.” 1 Burnet's Own Times, 237.

Mr. Maclaurin, concerning Torture in Scotland (Introduction to Criminal Trials, sect. 9.) says:

“On the 24th of June 1596, John Stewart, master of Orkney, was indicted for consulting with Alison Balfour a witch, for the destruction of Patrick earl of Orkney, his brother, by poison. The confession of Alison Balfour was libelled upon. He gave in a written declaration by way of defence, bearing inter alia, as to the confession, ‘No regard can be had to it, in respect the said confession was extorted by force of torment; she having been kept 48 hours in the Caspie laws; her old husband, a man about ninety years of age, put in heavy irons; her son put in the buits, where he suffered fifty-seven strokes; and her little daughter about seven years old, put in the pilliwinks; all in the poor woman's presence, to make her confess.’ MS. Abst. i. 166.

“It was pleaded for Alister Grant, who was indicted for theft and robbery, 3d Aug. 1632, ‘That he cannot pass to the knowledge of an assize, in respect he was twice put to the torture, first in the boots and next in the pilliwinks or pinniewinks; in both which he constantly denied his guilt or accession to the crimes libelled, and so ought to be free from any further prosecution; as is clear by Clarus,’ &c. He was convicted and condemned to death. MS. Abst. i. 346.

“Lord Roystoun observes, ‘The instruments in use amongst us in later times were, the boots and a screw for squeezing the thumbs, thence called thummikins. The boot was put upon the leg, and wedges driven in; by which the leg was squeezed sometimes so severely, that the patient was not able to walk for a long time after: and even the thummikins did not only squeeze the thumbs, but frequently the whole arm was swelled by them. Sometimes they kept them from sleep for many days, as was done to one Spence, A. D. 1685. And frequently poor women accused of witchcraft, were so used. Anciently I find other torturing instruments were used, as pinniewinks or pilliwinks, and caspitaws or caspicaws, in the master of Orkney's case, June 24, 1596; and tosots, Aug. 1632.’ But what these instruments were I know not, unless they are other names for the boots and thummikins.”

“The boots and thummikins were (it is said)

At his appearance, the Lords Justiciaries obscuring themselves by putting their hands upon their faces, and leaning upon their elbows upon the table: my lord Preses said, Sir, Ye are brought here before the committee, to see if you will adhere to your former confession, or imported into this country from Russia by a Scotchman, who had been long an officer in the service of that power.

“No inferior judge could torture. It was employed by the privy council and justiciary only. By the last, never during trial before the jury, but by way of precognition. What the person who underwent it confessed, was proved at his trial.”

Algernon Sidney writes of the Boots as being brought into fashion by Lauderdale. See his Letters, edit. of London, 1742, p. 121.

The following passages concerning Torture are extracted from Fountainhall's Decisions. See under date August 16th, 1683; Nov. 23, of the same year:

“Gordon of Earlstone is brought to the bar of the criminal court, and the sentence of forfeiture and death formerly pronounced, is read to him, and the time of execution is prefixed, viz. 28th September next: But there came a letter from the king proroguing the time, and appointing him to be put in the boots anent his accomplices, he having been hitherto very disingenuous. The council wrote back to the king, that it was not very regular or usual to torture malefactors after they were condemned to die, but only before conviction. He attempted to escape, but was hindered. Vid. 3d Nov. 1683.

“Earlston (conform to his majesty's command) being brought to the council chamber to be tortured, he through fear or distraction roared out like a bull, and cried and struck about him, so that the hangman and his man durst scarce lay hands on him: At last he fell in a swoon, and then reviving, he told that general Dalziel and Drummond were to head that fanatic party, and duke Hamilton was on their side; which improbable things made some call it revery, and others, a politic design to invalidate all he should say; and the physicians were ordained upon soul and conscience to report his condition, if they judged him really mad, or only feigned, as David at Gath with Achish, as also to prescribe him a diet for curing him; and for more quietness, they sent him to the Castle. ‘De simulatâ dementia, aliorumque morborum simulatione,’ sec Zacc. quæstion. medico-legal.”

Afterwards on Dec. 13th following, it appears, that “This Earlston mentioned 3d Nov. last, is reprieved by the council till the last Friday of January next. They thought once to have given way to his execution; but being furious, others thought it cruel then to bereave a man of his life and endanger his soul, when he could not repent; and L. 14, D. de officio præsid. says, if it be not ‘simulata dementia, not. To which he answered, My Lord, it is not unknown to your lordship, and others here present, that by the council's order I was remitted to the Lords Justiciaries, before whom I received an indictment, at my Lord Advocate's instance, wherein I was indicted both of life and fortune, although, my Lord, fortune have I none. To which indictment I answered at three several dyets, being deserted by my Lord Advocate. I humbly conceive, that both by the law of the nation, and the practice of the House at that time, I ought to have been

'satis ipso furore punitur.' Though the king's advocate alledged that the end of the punishment of malefactors was not only their own good, but 'in emendationem et terrorem aliorum;' which end held even in decapitating a traitor, though from horror and fear turning mad: Yet see his own Criminals, where fury excuses.

"July 26, 1684. Mr. William Spence, late servant to the earl of Argyle, by order of the privy council, is tortured and put in the boots, to force him to reveal what he knows of the earl's and other persons accession to the late English fanatic plot, and the association and design of rising; and in regard he refused to depone upon oath, if he had the key whereby he could read some letters of the earl's, produced by major Holmes, written in cyphers; and seeing he would not say upon oath that he could not read them, and that they offered to secure him by a pardon for his life, it rendered him very obnoxious and suspect of prevarication; so that after the torture, he was put in general Dalziel's hands; and it was reported that by a hair-shirt and pricking (as the witches are used) he was five nights kept from sleep, till he was turned half distracted. He ate very little, of purpose that he might require the less sleep; yet all this while he discovered nothing, and though he had done it, yet little credit was to be given to what he should say at such a time.

"August 7, 1684. At privy council, Spence (mentioned 26 July) is again tortured, and his thumbs crushed with thumbikins: It is a new invention used among the colliers when transgressors; and discovered by general Dalziel and Drummond, they having seen them used in Muscovy. After this, when they were about to put him again in the boots, he being frightened, desired time, and he would declare what he knew; whereon they gave him some time, and sequestered him in the castle of Edinburgh, in a place where he would be free from any bad advice or impression, to be obstinate in not revealing.

"August 22. Mr. William Spence, mentioned 7th current, to avoid any farther torture reads these hieroglyphic letters; and agrees with Mr. Holmes's declaration, that Argyle, Loudon Campbell, the late President Stair, sir John Cochran and others, had formed a design to raise an army in Scotland, and to laud at such convenient places as they hoped the people would join with them, and hoped, if they once gave the king's forces a foil, they would get many to flock in to them; and had advanced money to this purpose; and that there were three keys, whereof he had one and Mr. Carstairs another (which caused him to be tor-ured) and Holmes a third; and they expected help from England; and also he approved of Jay of Crigie's reading them. On this, Campbell of Ardkinlas was apprehended by John M'Naughtan in Inverary; and Spence got the liberty of the Castle, and his remission was recommended to be past by the king; and Gordon of Earlston was sent for from the Bass, not to be execute as some said, but to be tortured and confronted with Spence. They resolved not to admit of his madness for an excuse, which they esteemed simulate; as the late Chancellor had done.

"September 5 and 6, 1684. Mr. Wm. Carstairs, son to Mr. John Carstairs, once minister at Glasgow, is brought before the secret committee of council, and is tortured with the thumbikins. He confessed there has been a current plot in Scotland these ten years past: some were for raising forces; others were only for associating with the English, for holding out the duke of York from succeeding, and to preserve the reformed religion: he named many that were upon the knowledge of it; as the earl of Tarras, Cesnocks elder and younger, with the other prisoners, Murray of Philiphaugh, Pringle of Torwoodlee, Home of Polwart, Home of Bassendean, Mr. Gilbert Elliot, Scot of Gallowshiels, Hay of Park, sir James Dalrymple, Mr. Robert Martine, Hamilton of Aikenhead, &c. and some gave out the duchess of Lauderdale as a resetter of Argyle since his forfeiture, and a furnisher of him with money; and who offered, in 1677, to procure the fanatics an indulgence from the king for a sum of money. Fame wrongously also named Ker of Cherrie-trees, Campbell of Caddel, Carnegie of Belnarmore, the lairds of Brodie and Grant, Crawfurd of Ardmillan, Elliot of Stobs, Murray of Spot, &c. Such of them as could be got are presently apprehended, and put in close prison; and then major Monro and Philiphaugh are first examined; and standing on their denial, they are threatened with the boots; which makes them ingenuous, and confess their accession. This did so discompose and confound Alexander Monro, to discover others, that he desperately offered money to the keeper of the tolbooth's man to run him through with his sword, and roared, that he knew he behoved to do some base thing before he died; and regretted that he should have denied it before the king, by lying so obstinately, and should have been so instrumental in drawing so many gentlemen upon that which would stand them both their lives and fortunes, and he behoved to be a drudge and witness against them. Philiphaugh cast himself upon the high treasurer's mercy and protection. Then Campbell of Ardkinlas is examined, and he freely set at liberty, yet notwithstanding I was, contrary both to law, justice, and equity, returned to prison. And upon what account I am brought this night before your lordship, I know not. To the which my Lord Preses answered, Ye are not accused here, neither upon life nor confesses he sent to Argyle since his escape, 100*l.* sterling; but, finding this draws to treason, he desires to correct his deposition, and avers it was only given by him to Argyle's children, and not to himself. Duke Hamilton opposed this torturing much; and alledged that, at this rate, they might, without accusers or witnesses, take any person off the street and torture him; 'et nemo in aliorum caput est torquendus;' and he retired, and refused to be present, on this ground, that if the party should die in the torture, the judges were liable for murder, at least were severely censurable.

"It was doubted, how far these testimonies extorted per torturam can be probative against third parties, seeing witnesses should be so far voluntary and spontaneous as to be under no impressions, or terrors of fear of life or limb; others judge them best to be credited then. Some thought our privy council would have been at some loss, and contracted some tash by this cruel torture, had they suffered it as they did the boots (which they regarded not, their legs being small) without discovering or revealing this conspiracy; but their confessing tends to justify the privy council's procedure.

"Nov. 13, 1681. Three fellows called Wat, Semple, and ———, who were suspected and apprehended as owners of the late apologetical declaration of war against the king, and threatening to murder all their persecutors, (which was affixed on the 8th of Nov. last, on Linlithgow market-cross and church-door and sundry other places), were brought in and examined, and they owned the contents of that scandalous paper, and did obstinately bide the torture of the thumbikins without shrinking, till they were taken out of them, and then they fell down. See more of them 24th Nov. current.

"August 2, 1687. James Muir, Prestongrange's servant, pursues sir John Ramsay of Whitehill, sheriff-depute of East Lothian, for oppression, in holding a pretended court at Cockeny without a clerk or fiscal, and fining him in 100 dollars far above his jurisdiction, and for detaining him in privato carcere in Seton, and putting him in the irons and thumbikins, though torture belongs only to the privy council. Answered, That sir John Ramsay had also a reconvention against him, for tearing papers and discharges he had given, and for beating, blooding and deforcing the sheriffs' officers, which were heinous crimes, and proven to him, not only as justice of peace, but also as sheriff; that he might hold a court pro re nata within any part of the sheriffdom, his territory, as well as in Haddington, and might chuse a clerk and fiscal for that particular act; and he was not tied to 50*l.* Scots of fine; and the sheriff might use any baron's prison, and fortune, but to see whether you will adhere to your former confession. To which it was answered, I am not convinced of any crime, therefore I know not any such confession as your lordship alledges. To which my Lord Treasurer Depute replied, He is one of the most arrogant rogues, much more the sheriff-principal's own prison; and that he was so furious, he behaved to he kept in irons like a madman, and having broke them, the thumbikins were put upon him, not to torture, but to secure him from flying.—Yet a guard of men could have done that. The privy council admitted both libels to probation; and at advising, were clear, that a sheriff-depute nor no inferior judge could use torture; and that sir John Ramsay had exceeded his power: Yet not to discourage the government, both were called in, and Muir was rebuked for his violence, and sir John was desired to exercise his power with greater moderation, and to restore the fine."

See also 1 Fountainhall, 325.

It therefore appears that the use of the torture was not confined to the object of precognition of the guilt of the party tortured.

Burnet (1 Own Times, 583) after mentioning that the unrelenting severity of the Duke of York had appeared very indecently in Scotland, says: "When any are to be struck in the boots it is done in the presence of the Council: And upon that occasion almost all offer to run away. The sight is so dreadful, that without an order restraining such a number to stay, the board would be forsaken. But the Duke, while he had been in Scotland, was so far from withdrawing, that he looked on, all the while, with an unmoved indifference and with an attention, as if he had been to look on some curious experiment. This gave a terrible idea of him to all that observed it, as of a man that had no bowels nor humanity in him. Lord Perth observing this, resolved to let him see how well qualified he was to be an Inquisitor General. The rule about the Boots in Scotland was, that upon one witness and presumptions both together, the question might be given; but it was never known to be twice given; or that any other species of torture besides the boots, might be used at pleasure. In the Court of Inquisition they do, upon suspicion, or if a man refuses to answer upon oath as he is required, give him the torture; and repeat it, or vary it, as often as they think fit; and do not give over, till they have got out of their mangled prisoners all that they have a mind to know from them. He then proceeds to relate the application of the Torture to Spence and Carstairs. Sir John Dalrymple (1 Memoirs p. 94 to Ed. 1771,) professes to exculpate the duke of York from the imputation of personally attending the application of torture, but Laing (4 Hist. of Scot. 111, and Note 4 at the end of the the book, 2d Ed.) exposes the futility of Dalrymple's exculpation. cheats, liars, and what not. To which he replied, My Lord, if there were fewer of such persons of whom your lordship have been speaking, in this nation, I would not be standing the night at your bar: but my Lord Advocate knows, that what hath been alledged against me, is not my confession. To which he replied, Do you not remember that before the Lord Commissioner and the council ye said such and such thing? To which it was replied, That my Lord Commissioner never enquired about any such thing; only he said, he heard

Vol. 1, p. 505, Note (c). Vol. 2, p. 773, and note (a). Vol. 3, p. 367, Felton's Case.

There was in France an instrument of torture called the brodequin (Buskin) which corresponded to the boots. It is thus described in a printed Account of the Trial of Ravallac:

"The brodequin is a strong wooden box, made in the form of a boot, just big enough to contain both the legs of the criminal, which being put therein, a wooden wedge is then driven with a mallet between his knees, and after that is forced quite through; a second wedge, of a larger size, is applied in the same manner."

The barbarous circumstances of the sentence and execution of that bloody bigot are thus related in the same account:

"May 27th, 1610, the Court sat in the afternoon in the Chambre de La-Beuvette.

"We the presidents, and several of the counsellors being present, the prisoner, Francis Ravallac, was brought into Court, who having been accused and convicted of parricide committed on the person of the late king, he was ordered to kneel, and the clerk of the court pronounced the sentence of death given against him; as likewise that he should be put to the torture to force him to declare his accomplices.

"His oath being taken, he was exhorted to redeem himself from the torments preparing for him, by acknowledging the truth, and declaring who those persons were that had persuaded, prompted, and abetted him, in that most wicked action, and to whom he had disclosed his intention of committing it.

"He said, by the salvation I hope for, no one but myself was concerned in this action.

"He was then ordered to be put to the torture of the brodequin, and the first wedge being driven, he cried out, 'God have mercy upon my soul, and pardon the crime I have committed; I never disclosed my intention to any one.' This he repeated as he had done in his interrogation.

"When the second wedge was driven, he said with loud cries and shrieks, 'I am a sinner, I know no more than I have declared, by the oath I have taken, and by the truth which I owe to God and the court; all I have said was to the little Franciscan, which I have already declared: I never mentioned my design in confession, or in any other way: I never spoke of it to the visitor of Angoulême nor revealed it in confession in this city. I beseech the court not to drive my soul to despair.'

"The executioner continuing to drive the second wedge, he cried out, 'My God receive this penance as an expiation for the great crimes I have committed in this world; Oh God! accept these torments in satisfaction for my sins. By the faith I owe to God, I know no more than what I have declared. Oh! do not drive my soul to despair.'

"The third wedge was then driven lower near his feet, at which a universal sweat covered his body, and he fainted away. The executioner forced some wine into his mouth, but he could not swallow it; and, being quite speechless, he was released from the torture, and water thrown upon his face and hands. Some wine being forced down his throat, his speech returned, and he was laid upon a mattress in the same place, where he continued till noon. When he had recovered his strength he was conducted to chapel by the executioner; and two doctors of the Sorbonne being sent for, his dinner was given him; but before the divines entered into a conference with him, the clerk admonished him to think of his salvation, and confess by whom he had been prompted, persuaded, and abetted in the wicked action he had committed, and so long designed to commit; it not being probable, that he should of himself have conceived and executed it without communicating it to any other.

"He said, that if he had known more than what he had declared to the court, he would not have concealed it, well knowing, that in this case he could not have the mercy of God, which he hoped for and expected; and that he would not have endured the torments he had done, if he had any further confession to make. He said, he acknowledged that he had committed a great crime, to which he had been incited by the temptation of the devil; that he intreated the king, the queen, the court, and the whole kingdom, to pardon him, and to cause prayers to be put up to God for him, that his body might bear the punishment for his soul. And being many times admonished to reveal the truth, he only repeated what he had said before. He was then left with the doctors, that they might perform the duties of their office with him.

"A little after two o'clock the clerk of the court was sent for by the divines, who told him, that the condemned had charged them to send for him, that he might hear and sign his confession, which he desired might be revealed and even printed, to the end, that it might be known to the whole world; which confession the said doctors declared to have been, That no one had been concerned with him in the act he had committed; that he had not been solicited, prompted, or abetted, by any other person whatever, nor had discovered his design to any one; That he acknowledged he had committed a great crime, for which he hoped to have the

that I had been abroad, and over seas, and enquired with whom I did converse there; to which it was replied, with my merchant, my Lord; But with whom in particular? To which I answered, With one John Mitchel, a cousin of mine own; so that there was no such dis-mercy of God, which was still greater than his sins, but which he could not hope to obtain if he concealed any thing.

"Hereupon the clerk asked the condemned, If he was willing that his confession should be known and revealed? and, as above, admonished him to acknowledge the truth for the salvation of his soul. He then declared upon his oath, that he had said all he knew, and that no one had incited him to commit the murder.

"At three o'clock he came from the chapel; and as he was carrying out of the Conciergerie, the prisoners, in great numbers, thronged about him, with loud cries and exclamations, calling him Traitor, Wicked Wretch, Detestable Monster, Damned Villain, and the like; they would have struck him, had they not been hindered by the bailiffs, and the other officers of justice, who kept them off by force.

"When he was put into the tumbril, the crowd was so great, that it was with the utmost difficulty the bailiffs and officers of justice could force themselves a passage; and as soon as the prisoner appeared, that vast multitude began to cry out as above, Wicked Wretch, Traitor, &c.

"The enraged populace continued their cries and exclamations till he arrived at the Greve, where, before he was taken out of the tumbril to mount the scaffold, he was again exhorted to reveal his accomplices; but he persisted in his former declaration, that he had none; again imploring pardon of the young king, the queen, and the whole kingdom for the crime he had committed.

"When he had ascended the scaffold, the two doctors comforted him, and exhorted him to acknowledge the truth; and after performing the duties of their function, the clerk approached him, and urged him to think of his salvation now at the close of his life, and to confess all he knew; to which he only answered as he had done before.

"The fire being put to his right hand, holding the knife with which he had stabbed the king: he cried out, Oh God? and often repeated Jesu Marie! While his breast, &c. were tearing with red-hot pincers, he renewed his cries and prayers; during which, being often admonished to acknowledge the truth, he persisted in denying that he had any accomplices. The furious crowd continued to load him with execrations, crying, that he ought not to have a moment's respite. Afterwards by intervals, melted lead and scalding oil, were poured upon his wounds; during which he shrieked aloud, and continued his cries and exclamations.

"The doctors again admonished him, as likewise the clerk, to confess, and were preparing to offer up publicly the usual prayers for the course before the council. But, says my Lord Preses, we will make a sharper thing make you to confess. To which it was replied by the pannel, I hope your lordships are Christians, and not Pagans. To which the Treasurer Depute added, saying, That the pannel was no condemned; but immediately the people, with great tumult and disorder, cried out against it, saying that no prayers ought to be made for that wicked wretch, that damned monster. So that the doctors were obliged to give over. Then the clerk remonstrating to him, that the indignation of the people was a judgment upon him, which ought to induce him to declare the truth, he persisted to answer as formerly, saying, I only was concerned in the murder.

"He was then drawn by four horses, for half an hour, by intervals.

"Being again questioned and admonished, he persisted in denying that he had any accomplices; while the people of all ranks and degrees, both near and at a distance, continued their exclamations, in token of their great grief for the loss of their king. Several persons set themselves to pull the ropes with the utmost eagerness; and one of the noblesse, who was near the criminal, alighted off his horse, that it might be put in the place of one which was tired with drawing him. At length, when he had been drawn for a full hour by the horses, without being dismembered, the people, rushing on in crowds, threw themselves upon him, and with swords, knives, sticks, and other weapons they struck, tore, and mangled his limbs; and violently forcing them from the executioner, they dragged them through the streets with the utmost eagerness and rage, and burnt them in different parts of the city."

"Sentence of Death against FRANCIS RAVAILLAC, May 28, 1670.

Extracted from the Registers of the Parliament.

"The court, consisting of the great chambers of the Tournelle and the Edict, being assembled, and having seen the criminal proceedings, formed by the presidents and counsellors in that behalf, appointed by commission, at the requisition of the king's attorney general, against Francis Ravallac, a practitioner of the law, of the city of Angoulême, prisoner in the Conciergerie of the palace; as also the information made against him, the interrogatories, confessions, answers, and cross examinations of witnesses, and the state of the case by the king's attorney-general; and the said Ravallac having been heard and examined by the said court, touching the matters laid to his charge; and touching the verbal process of the interrogatories administrated to him on the rack; which, by order of the said court, he underwent on the 25th of this month, for discovery of his accomplices: On consideration of the whole,

"The said court hath declared, and doth

Christian. To which the pannel replied, My Lord, you know the old Proverb, Turpe est Doctori, &c. And so he was returned to prison for that night.

Upon the 22d day, he being called before the said committee, who sate in the town's council-house, at which time my lord Preses said to declare, the said Ravailiac duly attainted of the crime of high-treason, divine and human, in the highest degree, for the most wicked, most abominable, and most detestable parricide, committed on the person of the late king, Henry 4. of good and laudable memory; for reparation whereof, the court hath condemned, and doth condemn him, to make the amende honorable, before the principal gate of the church of Paris, whither he shall be carried and drawn in a tumbril in his shirt, bearing a lighted torch of two pound weight, and that he shall there say and declare, that wickedly and traitorously he hath committed the aforesaid most wicked, most abominable, and most detestable parricide, and murdered the said lord the king, by stabbing him twice in the body with a knife; that he repents of the same, and begs pardon of God, the king, and the laws: from thence he shall be carried to the Greve, and, on a scaffold to be there erected, the flesh shall be torn with red hot pincers from his breasts, his arms, and thighs, and the calves of his legs; his right hand, holding the knife wherewith he committed the aforesaid parricide, shall be scorched and burned with flaming brimstone; and on the places where the flesh has been torn with pincers, melted lead, boiling oil, scalding pitch with wax and brimstone melted together, shall be poured: after all this, he shall be torn in pieces by four horses, his limbs and body burnt to ashes, and dispersed in the air. His goods and chattels are also declared to be forfeited and confiscated to the king. And it is further ordained, that the house in which he was born shall be pulled down to the ground (the owner thereof being previously indemnified) and that no other building shall ever hereafter be erected on the foundation thereof: and that within fifteen days after the publication of this present sentence, his father and mother shall, by sound of trumpet and public proclamation in the city of Angoulême, be banished out of the kingdom, and forbid ever to return, under the penalty of being hanged and strangled, without any farther form or process at law. The court has also forbidden, and doth forbid, his brothers, sisters, uncles, and others, from henceforth to bear the said name of Ravailiac, enjoining them to change it to some other, under the like penalties; and ordering the substitute of the king's attorney-general to cause this present sentence to be published and carried into execution, under pain of being answerable for the same; and before the execution thereof, the court doth order, that the said Ravailiac shall again undergo the torture, for the discovery of his accomplices."

him: Sir, ye are called here again to see if ye will adhere to your former confession (opening a paper to the pannel, and alledged it to be subscribed by him.) To which it was answered, My lord, I acknowledge no such thing. Then he replied, Sir, ye see what is upon the table before you: I shall see if that can cause you do it. To which it was answered, By that torture you may cause me blaspheme God, as Saul did compel the saints; you may by that torture cause me to speak amiss of your lordship;* to call myself a thief, a murtherer, or warlock, and what not, and then pannel me upon it: but, if ye shall, my lords, put me to it, I here protest before God and your lordship, that nothing extorted from me by torture shall be made use of against me in judgment, nor have any force against me in law, or any other person whosoever; but to be plain with your lordship, I am so much a christian, that whatever your lordship shall legally prove against me, if it be a truth I will not deny it. But, my lord, on the contrary, I am so much a man, yea, and a Scots man, that I never held myself obliged, either by the law of God or nature, or by the law of nations, to become my own accuser. Then said my lord depute treasurer to the Preses, he hath the devil's logic, and sophisticates like him. Ask at him whether or not that be his subscription? to which he answered, he acknowledged no such thing. To which Hatton answered, bid him say, yea, or not. Then my lord Preses said, (pointing his hand to the Boot) you see what is before you, say either yea or not. He answered, I say not; and so he was returned to close prison as before.

Upon the 24th day they solemnly assembled, to wit, with their robes, in the parliament house, where the lords of the session sit, at which time the executioner was present with the boots, and the pannel being brought as before to the bar, the lord preses said, you are now brought here to see if you will yet confess before you be put to torture. But the pannel knowing, according to the rate of the Spanish Inquisition, that always the more he confessed, the more severely the torture would be made use of, to make him confess more; therefore he answered after this manner: My lord, I shall study brevity by speaking a few words what I have to say, to wit, that I have been now these two full years in prison, and more than one of them in bolts and fetters, and upwards of thirty weeks in close prison, so that my imprisonment hath been more intolerable to me than the pains of many deaths, if I had been capable thereof: yea, and it is well known, that within a shorter time in regard of my imprisonment, several have made away themselves rather than endured the affliction of a prison; but, my Lord, an obedience to the express commandment of God hath made me to undergo all hardships I have hitherto met with, and to undergo this present torture; to wit, the preservation of my life, and the lives of others, as far as it is in my power, and to keep off innocent blood from your lordship, and your families and relations, which by shedding of mine, doubtless you would bring upon yourselves, posterity, and relations, wrath from the Lord, to the consuming thereof, until there should be no remnant nor escaping. And now my Lords, I do again protest before God and your lordships, that whatever may be extorted from me by torture, may not be made use of against me, nor any other person in judgment nor have any force in law. And so, my Lords, I have done: you may call the men whom you have appointed to your work. After which they caused the mncer to call upon the executioner, and two officers appointed for that effect, who tied him in an armed chair, and brought the boots, and enquired which of his legs they should take; but they, after speaking amongst themselves, commanded the executioner to take any of them, upon which he laid the left leg upon the boot, but the pannel lifted it out again, saying, Seeing ye judges have not determined it, take the best of the two, for I freely bestow it in the cause; and laid his right leg into the torture; after which the king's advocate said, I shall speak but one word or two, but notwithstanding continued his discourse for a considerable time; so when he had made an end, the pannel answered thus; My Lord Preses, the advocate's one word or two hath multiplied to so many, that my memory cannot serve me, in the condition wherein I am, to resume them so as to answer them in particular: but I shall answer to the scope of his discourse. First, Whereas he hath been speaking to the sovereignty of the magistrate, I shall say somewhat more than he hath said; to wit, that the magistrate whom God hath appointed, is God's Deputy, and that both the throne and the judgment is the Lord's while he judgeth for God, and according to the law of God, and that a great part of his office is to deliver the oppressed out of the hand of the oppressor, and to shed no innocent blood, according to the commandment of God to Zedekiah by the prophet Jeremiah, chap. xxii. 3. And, my lords, disobedience to his commandment brought the wrath of God upon him, his princes, and the whole nation of the Jews, chap. xxxvii. Secondly, my lord advocate hath been hinting at the sinfulness of lying upon any account: It is answered, my lords, that not only lying is sinful but also a pernicious speaking of the truth is a horrid sin before God, while it tendeth to the shedding of innocent blood, as witnesseth that of Doeg, Ps. lii, compared with 1 Sam. xxii. 29. But what my lord advocate hath forged against me is false, so that I am standing upon my former ground, viz. the preservation of my life, and the lives of others, as far as it lies in my power, the which I am expressly commanded to do by the Lord of Hosts. After which, the clerk's servant being called by the advocate, they interrogate him of many questions, upward to the number of thirty, only to see if they could catch him in a contradiction, or to see if they could find out any person to witness against him; but he understanding their drift, answered as followeth: My lords (not knowing that I shall escape this torture with my life) therefore I beseech you to remember what Solomon says, 'He who sheweth no mercy shall have judgment without mercy.' And if there be any here present, as I hope there are few or none, yet if there be any such here, whose disposition is so eager in pursuing after innocent blood, that nothing less than a full draught will satisfy them, I say, let such remember what is spoken, Rev. xix. 5, 6. 'Thou art righteous, O Lord, which wast, and art, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus, for they have shed the blood of the Saints and Prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink, for they are worthy, &c.' And now, my Lords, I do freely from my heart forgive you who are judges sitting upon the Bench, and the men who are appointed to be about this piece of horrid work, and also these who are vitiating their eyes beholding the same. And I do intreat that God may never lay it to the charge of any of you, as I beg that God may be pleased for his Son Christ's sake to blot out my sins and iniquities, and never lay them to my charge here nor hereafter.

Quest. Are you that Mr. James Mitchel who was excepted out of the king's act of grace and favour, or not? Ans. I never committed any such crime deserving me to be excluded, but rather to be included, protected and defended. Q. Know you any more of that name? A. Yes, there are two within Midlothian; and what know I, but there may be more elsewhere? Q. When knew you of the rising in arms, Anno 1666? A. My Lords, I knew of it when the rest of the citizens knew of it. Q. When was that? A. When there was a messenger to the council for that effect, and when Dalziel and his soldiers marched out at the West Port in order thereto. Q. Went not you out of the town with captain Arnot? A. No. Q. Where did you meet with James Wallace? A. I did not know him at that time. Q. Was you at Air? or, did you join with the rebels there, or any where else? A. I never joined with any such. To which my lord, Hattoun, treasurer depute, replied, saying, My Lord, he never acknowledges these men to be rebels. To which the pannel answered, My Lord, I shall in answer to what is spoken follow Solomon's advice, in that he says, at some times even a fool by holding his peace, will be reputed wise. Whether or not Hattoun took it to be spoken of him, I cannot tell, but there was nothing replied thereto by any of them. Q. Where was you at the time of Pentland? A. In Edinburgh. Q. Where was you before it? A. In Edinburgh. Q. Where was you after it? A. In Edinburgh. Q. Where did you lodge before that time? A. In one Girseil Whiteford's. Q. Where did you stay at that time, and was you still in the town, or not? A. My Lord Advocate, I do not know what you mean by being still in the town, for you may call it out of the town, if I was at the Wind-mill, or at Leith. Q. What, was you no where further abroad, than at such places? A. My memory cannot serve me now, after ten years space, to determine where I was; neither do I keep a diurnal of times past, nor is it my duty so to do; neither do I think any man's memory here present can serve him for so long a time: But this I judge, that it is my duty every day to be about my lawful employment and calling, according as God hath commaunded, and therewith to rest satisfied. Q. What took you out of the town at that time? A. I was making myself ready to go over to Flanders. Q. With whom went you? A. With one John Forrester, an Ostender. Q. How long was it after Pentland before you went? A. I cannot tell. Q. Can you not give it a guess? A. About a month or six weeks. Q. What was you doing all that time? A. I was making myself ready, and thereafter there came a contrary wind. Q. Who was merchant in the ship? A. I enquired not. Q. But went not the merchant along with you? A. No. Q. What was the reason of that? A. It was the time of the Dutch War against the English, and at such times merchants of ships do not hazard their persons with their goods, but commit their affairs to factors abroad. Q. How long stayed you there? A. About three quarters of a year. Q. Why stayed you so long there? A. It was a space before I was ready to return, and thereafter the report of peace came, which thereafter followed, and I thought it better to wait a little time than hazard in war. Q. With whom came you home again? A. With Dutchmen, who were Amsterdammers. Q. Was there no Scotsman with you? A. I have told you, my Lords, I came home with Dutchmen. Q. Who was the skipper of the ship? A. I cannot remember, but he came to Lime Kells for a loading of coals from sir James Hacket. Q. What goods fetcht you home? A. I cannot remember the particulars. Q. Where did you enter them? A. I made the best shift I could to shun the customers. At which sir William Parvas riseth to cause call the excise-men; to which the pannel replied, O sir William, it was out of your time and theirs. Q. Did you know Peniry? A. Yes. Q. Is he living? A. No. Q. Did you know sir James Stirling, and Mr. Robert Ferguson? Are they alive? A. They are both dead; the one in this town, and the other in the Indies, being called by the Indian merchants to be a minister in one of their plantations. Q. Knew you William Young, and whose tenant he was? A. Yes; I both knew him, and that he was a tenant of sir John Gibson's. Q. Bought you a horse from him at that time? A. I never bought a horse from him. Q. From whom had you a horse, when you went out of the town? A. There was none in the city who had a horse to lend for hire, who would have refused me for my money. Q. But of whom had you a horse? A. Where I could have none, I took me to my feet.

Which Examination being ended, the executioner being commanded thereto, took down his leg from off a chest upon which it had been lying the whole time in the Boot, and it being set upon the ground, he began to thrust in the shafts, and drive the wedge. And at every stroke they enquired, if I had any more to say. To which it was answered, No more, my lords; and thus it continued to the number of nine strokes, upon the head of the wedge, at the end of which he fell by into a little swarfe through the extremity of pain, at which the executioner cried out, Alas! my Lords, he is gone, he is gone. Then they commanded to leave off the torture, and rising from their seats went away. After which he was returned to the Tolbooth, being carried by his friends in the chair in which he was tied during the time of his torture.

He still continued prisoner in the Tolbooth, till the 7th of Jan. 1678, when they proceeded against him before the justices, as follows:

D. N. Regis.

Curia legitime affirmata.

Intran' Mr. James Mitchel, Prisoner.

Indicted and accused, forasmuch as by the common law and law of nations, and the law of this kingdom, murder and the assaulting and attempting upon any person or persons, by way of forethought felony 'et per insidias et industriam,' of purpose and design to kill, are most atrocious and detestable crimes, destructive to and against the being of human society, and are severely punishable, but especially when the same are committed upon the persons of counsellors and other officers who do represent authority, and are liable to the mistakes and malice of wicked persons for doing their duty, or when the same are committed upon the persons of churchmen, bishops or ministers, who are of the sacred function; who by the laws of all nations are privileged and secured, so much as can be, from the malice and sacrilegious attempts of wicked persons. And particularly, it is statute by the fourth act of the sixteenth parliament of king James the 6th, that whatsoever person invades or pursues any of the lords of session, secret council, or any of his majesty's officers, for doing of his majesty's service, shall be punished with death. And by the seventh act of the first parliament of his majesty's royal father in A. D.

1633, intitulat, anent the invading of ministers, it is statute that the same shall be extended to all archbishops, bishops, and ministers whatsoever. And be the fourth act of his majesty's second parliament, and second session of the same, it is statute, That whatsoever persons shall be guilty of the assaulting the lives of ministers, that they shall be punished with the pain of death and confiscation of their moveables. And be the laws and acts of parliament of this kingdom, the mutilation and dismemberment of any of his majesty's subjects, by way of forethought felony, is ane high and capital crime, and punishable with the pain of death. Nevertheless, it is of verity, that ye having shaken off all fear of God and conscience, respect and regard to his majesty's authority and laws, and conceiving a deadly hatred and malice against a reverend father in God, James archbishop of St. Andrews (a person who had never known or seen you, so as to take notice of you, and much less had given you any offence), without any ground or quarrel, and upon account only that he was advanced and promoted to be archbishop, and to be of his majesty's privy council, and did serve God and his majesty faithfully in the saids stations and offices; you did daily contrive, resolve and design the murder and assassination of the said archbishop: and in order thereto, having provided yourself with a pair of long Scots iron pistols near musket bore, you did upon the 9th day of July, 1668, or ane or other of the days of the said month, proceed and take the opportunity to execute and go about your horrid and cruel design, when the said archbishop in the afternoon of the said day did come down his own stair, and was going to his coach, being to go abroad upon his occasions with a reverend father in God, Andrew bishop of Orkney. And you having a charged pistol with powder and ball, did most cruelly and feloniously assault the saids bishops, and did fire, discharge, and shot the said pistol upon them, being within the said coach; and God of his goodness having preserved the archbishop whom you intended to murder, you did by the said shot grievously wound the bishop of Orkney, to the great hazard and danger of his life; so that having, for a long time, and with great pain, torture, and expence of blood, languished of the said wound, being in a most dangerous place in the joining of the hand and arm, where there is a confluence of nerves and fibres, he never did recover his health to that measure and vigour that he had, or might have had, if he had not gotten the said wound. And he was mutilat and dismembered as to his arm and hand, so that he could make no use of the same, but languished thereof until he died. And after you had attempted and committed the said assassination and villany 'tanquam insidiator et per idus-triam,' and by way of forethought felony, ye did go away and escape through the multitude and throng that had gathered upon the noise of the said shot, having another charged and bended pistol in your hands, of purpose and design to have killed any person who should have offered to take and apprehend you. The foresaid attempt and villany being without any parallel, the circumstances being considered, viz. That it was committed by one who professed to be of the reformed religion, and who did pretend to be and serve as a chaplain in several families; that it was committed to the great scandal and disadvantage of Christian religion, and especially of the Protestant reformed religion, the professors and preachers of the same having so much declared against, and be their preaching and writing having expressed their detestation of such attempts and practices committed by persons, and owned by writers of the Roman profession: and that it cannot be instanced that any of the Protestant religion was guilty of any attempt upon the account of religion: and that the worst of men being ashamed to commit such villainies; for covering of the same, and for their security, doth take the opportunity of darkness and solitude, in corners and solitary places; your malice was so implacable, that you was prodigal of your own life to be master of the life of the said archbishop; and in the high street of Edinburgh, and in the day-light, and in the face of the sun, and before many witnesses, near or at a little distance from the said coach, where you could not but expect to be presently seized upon, you did devote yourself and did adventure to commit the said most villainous and wicked attempt. Yet notwithstanding of all the saids aggravations and circumstances of horror and remorse, you did continue in your implacable malice, and did converse and keep correspondence with Robert Cannon of Moudrogatt, and with — Welsh, of Cornlie, and — Mac-Clelland of Bariscop, declared and excepted rebels and traitors; had divers meetings with them, and upon discourse concerning the said attempt, every one of the saids persons putting it upon one another, when it was put to you, you said and uttered these or the like speeches, 'Shame fall the misse,' and that 'ye should make the fire hotter.' And after the time and attempt foresaid in the year 1668, and subsequent years, months, and days of the saids respective years, and in ane or other of them, your guilty conscience disquieting and pursuing you, you did rove and go abroad several times to Holland, England, and Ireland, until divine justice did drive and bring you back to this kingdom, that justice might be satisfied and vindicat, in some measure, where you had committed so great villainies. After your return you did proceed to that height of boldness and confidence, or rather impudence, that you did repair to and live in Edinburgh, and was married there with your wife, who is yet living, by Mr. John Welsh, who is a declared and excepted traitor, and forefault for his accession to the rebellion, 1666. And your boldness was so great in out-daring both God and authority, that for a long time ye have been lodged and has kept a shop near that place where the archbishop doth and is in use to lodge when he is in Edinburgh, until at length ye was discovered and apprehended, having upon you when you was taken the same pistol which ye shot when ye committed the said attempt, which was found under your coat charged with powder and three ball, of purpose to attempt again and execute your bloody design against the said archbishop, at least against any person who should offer to take you. From all which premises, it is evident that you are guilty of the saids atrocious crimes of murder and assassination by way of forethought felony, and is a Percussor et Siccarins, and of mutilation, and of the other crimes above-mentioned: and therefore the saids pains ought to be inflicted upon you as a murderer and assassin, and as guilty of the crimes foresaid, in an exemplary manner to the terror of others.

Persner, Sir George Mac Kenzie of Rosehaugh, our sovereign lord's Advocate.

Proctors in Defence, Sir George Lockhart. Mr. John Eleis.

His majesty's advocate produced ane Warrant from his majesty's privy council for persuing the said Mr. James Mitchel, whereof the tenor follows; Edinburgh, the sixth day of December, 1677, the Lords of his majesty's privy council do hereby grant, order, and warrant to sir George Mac Kenzie of Rosehaugh, his majesty's advocate, to raise and pursue a criminal process before the Lords commissioners of justiciary against Mr. James Mitchel for the assassination attempted by him upon the archbishop of Saint Andrews and the bishop of Orkney. Extract be me, (Sic Subscribitur.) AL. GIBSON.

Master John Eleis advocate produced ane act of his majesty's privy council empowering sir George Lockhart and him to appear for the pannel's defence, whereof the tenor follows; Edinburgh, the third day of January, 1678, the Lords of his majesty's privy council, having considered a petition presented in behalf of Mr. James Mitchel prisoner, representing, that he is upon Monday next to undergo a trial before the justices at the instance of his majesty's advocate, as the alledged person who shot a pistol at the archbishop of St. Andrews: Yet no advocate will undertake to appear for him, without they be specially commanded so to do. And therefore supplicating, that sir George Lockhart and Mr. John Eleis, advocates, may be ordered to that effect, the saids Lords do hereby order and recommend the said sir George Lockhart and Mr. John Eleis to appear and plead for the supplicant before the justices, in the cause above mentioned, upon Monday next, and other diets of that process, and appoints intimation to be made hereof to the said sir George Lockhart and Mr. John Eleis, and to the petitioner. Extract by me,

(Sic Subscribitur.) AL. GIBSON.

His majesty's advocate declares he passes from my Lord Justice General as a witness in this cause.

Mr. John Eleis advocate, as proctor for the pannel, declares, that they sustain my Lord Justice General to be a judge in this cause notwithstanding of his being cited as a witness both by pursuer and defender.

Mr. James Mitchel pannel denies the dittay, and any pretended confession alledged emitted by him.

Mr. John Eleis for the pannel alledges, that he cannot pass to the knowledge of any assise: And the conclusion that the pannel has committed murder, cannot be inferred from the subsumption of the libel, because by the laws of this kingdom, the civil law, the common opinion of doctors, the law and general custom of all nations, 'Nudus conatus et affectus sine effectu,' even in the most atrocious crimes, except treason, parricide, and other excepted crimes, is not punishable by death. And it were against all reason, seeing punishments ought to be proportional to the crimes, that a naked and simple design of murder should be punished as murder that had taken effect. 'Et in criminibus gravioribus et gravissimis,' viz. 'Adulterium, Furtum, Sodomie, &c.' the naked design is not punished 'pœna ordinaria,' even by the civil law. And though 'Lex Cornelia de sicariis' by an extraordinary stretch does declare 'si quis cum telo ambulaverit,' yet it is but a statutory law, and derogated to by the law of nations, and the special laws of our nation, in so far as murder in our law is defined to be, and has only place in 'interfectis per feloniam,' and these who were killed upon forethought felony. (2do.) In so far as the libel concludes him guilty of assassination, the same is no ways relevant, it being both a term and a crime unknown in our law. And be the laws and acts of parliament of this nation, the subjects of Scotland are to be governed by the laws of Scotland. And though the crime of assassination were a point of dittay by our law, as it is not; yet it is not, nor cannot be pretended he was hired for that effect, nor is it libelled. (3tio.) In sua far as the libel concludes the pain of death for mutilation of the bishop of Orkney; it is answered, that the same is no ways relevant. And the said conclusion cannot be inferred from the subsumption, because the act of parliament does only declare dismemberment to be punished as slaughter. (2do.) The said act declares dismemberment to be only punished as slaughter when it proceeds upon forethought felony. (3tio.) The said act requires another qualification, viz. That it be pursued by the party: None of which can be subsumed upon in this case, because it is not libelled that the bishop was dismembered, or had his hand cut off, but only had a wound in the hand. And the libel does expressly hear, that the bishop of Orkney got the shot in his hand accidentally, when the design was against the bishop of Saint Andrews, and so was not upon forethought felony as to him. And lastly, the bishop's nearest of kin does not concur nor pursue, which is a special requisite in the said act of parliament. Likeas the said act is exolet, and in no register can it be made appear that any person was capitally punished for dismemberment; But upon the contrary, many accused and condemned in arbitrary punishments. So that the libel is no ways relevant as to that article, for the reasons foresaids; specially seeing dismembration is not so much here as libelled or pretended. And whereas it is insinuat, that the bishop did languish and die of the said wound; It is answered, that the libel is no ways relevant, he conceived, because it is not libelled that the wound was 'ex sua natura' lethal or mortal. And it is offered to be proven, that the bishop did live several years thereafter, and go about his ordinary function as a bishop, by preaching, &c. which is a sufficient ground of exculpation and defence.

4to. In sua far as the libel is founded upon the act of parliament anent invading of counsellors, it is answered, that this present case does not fall under the compass of the said act of parliament, because it is not libelled that the cause of the pretended invasion of the archbishop was upon the account he was in the prosecution of his majesty's service; but upon the contrar it may appear strange to any rational man 'Quorsum et cui bono he' could have done it.

5to. As to the acts anent invading of ministers, they import no capital punishment, but only confiscation of moveables, and as to which the said acts are opposed, and as to the act 1670, it is posterior to the fact libelled.

In sua far as the libel seems to be founded on a confession; and in sua far as the confession may be made use of as a sole or conjunct probation, the pannel does object against the samen upon the grounds and reasons following. Primo, if any such confession was emitted by the pannel, which he has absolutely denied in presence of your lordship (no ways acknowledging the libel) no respect can be had thereto: and it is not probatorie, because the samen is extrajudicial and extra Bancam, in regard it is not made in presence of the assise, who are judges to the probation, which is expressly contrar to the 90 Act 7. parliament, king James 6. which requires the hail probation to be led in presence of the assise and party. And which act of parliament was not only made for security of pannels, as to a just and legal procedure against them; but also that the assisers to whom the truth of the lives of the subjects of this kingdom is committed, as to the point of probation, might not proceed upon fame and report, but upon a clear probation before them. For if that were not, the assise would be altogether deprived to know how the confession was emitted, if spontaneously or 'ex constantia vel trepidatione, or spe venie.' And the most that ever was sustained in this case, was, that the assise did find a party guilty upon a confession emitted before a quorum of the justices in a fenced court. Esto the said pretended confession should be sustained probative, as for the reasons above-represented (the pannel with all submission to your lordships humbly conceives) it cannot: yet, if any such confession was, it is null because it was 'elicete spe venie et immunitatis.' And for proving thereof, the pannel does repeat his exculpation, which he conceives is relievant in law; and craves the witnesses therein to be examined upon the contents thereof. 2do. The said confession being emitted 'extra judicium' 'et spe venie,' as said is, 'est in se nulla,' and cannot be confirmed or validat by the testimony of any witnesses whatsoever. And to evidence that the pannel's life was never intended to be taken upon the said pretended confession: The same (if any was) is opposed; by which it evidently appears that he was examined upon oath, as to the most material part of the crime, viz. his complices, which makes it more than evident, that it being 'in materia' 'criminale et capitale,' in which oaths cannot be taken by law, renders the confession null and invalidat, at least makes it evident that the libel has been restricted 'ad civiles effectus.'

My lord advocat insists in the first place upon the fourth act of the 16th parliament, James 6. By which undus conatus attempting and invading though nothing follow, is found relevant to infer the pain of death. But so it is that the said Mr. James Mitchel did attempt the killing the Archbishop of St. Andrews, a privy counsellor; which attempt 'devenit ad actum proximum,' the said Mr. James having done all that was in his power. And as to the quality adjected in the act, insinuating the defence, that it must be proven, that it was for doing of his majesty's service; it is replied, That this quality is inferred, and cannot, nor requires not to be otherways proven, than by a presumed inference. For the design of the attempter being ane act of the mind and the secret of the heart, it cannot be otherways proven, but simply by the attempting a secret counsellor, or any of his majesty's officers, against whom the pannel could have no quarrel, but for doing of his duty, and therefore the law still concludes the same, except the pannel will offer to condescend upon another relevant reason, viz. any private fead; for if it were otherwise, the act would be absolutely useless, since any person might attempt or kill a privy counsellor, it being impossible to prove what was the design. And this act was designed merely to make all attempts against privy counsellors, punishable by death; for otherwise it could be no fence nor protection for privy counsellors if it were only granted to them under a quality which were impossible to be proven. Nor can this seem hard, since the subjects have only themselves to blame, who attempt against the lives of privy counsellors. And it were very ridiculous to think, that if the brother of a pannel should attempt to kill the judge or king's advocate immediately after a process, that it were necessar to prove the design otherwise than by the natural contingency which obviously arises from the quality and circumstances of the perpetration: but in this case, as Mr. James Mitchel is a person who can condescend upon no private offence betwixt the archbishop and him, they being absolute strangers to one another; so besides the presumption of law above specified, it is offered in fortification of the act, That, Primo, the said Mr. James owns himself to be of a profession, who hates and execrates that hierarchy, and of which sect the unhallowed penman of Nephthali declares it lawful to kill those of that character. 2do. It is notour and offered to be proven, that Mr. James himself defended that it was lawful to kill such, and endeavoured by wrested places of scripture to defend himself, and gain proselytes thereby. And if need were, as there is none, it is specifically and distinctly offered to be proven, that he acknowledged that the reason why he shot at the archbishop, was, because he thought him a persecutor of the nefarious and execrable rebels who appeared on Pentland-hills: nor can designs nor acts of the mind be otherwise proven than by such emitted declarations, arguments and acknowledgments. Like as in the whole course of our law, the invading or attempting any of that sacred function is still declared equivalent to killing: And though the last act be posterior, yet it is sufficient to demonstrate and clear. And, 3tio, By the Common Law conatus and endeavour is in criminibus atrocissimis punishable by death, 'ubi reus devenit ad actum proximum et omne quod in se erat fecit,' which is in itself most reasonable, since the atrocity of the crime should put the same even beyond an attempt. And there can be nothing more just than, that the extraordinariness of a crime should have an extraordinary allowance. And guilt attempted in atrocious crimes, such as sacrilegious assassination, is in the eye of the law as great and greater than the stealing a horse or cow, especially where security from the effect proceeded from no innocency in the committer, who did all he could; but from the special providence of God disappointing the effect of a cause he so much hated. And Carpovius requires only three qualifications to make endeavour punishable by death: Primo, 'Quid eventum erat ad actum mortis proximum.' (2do.) Quod nonsterit per assassinium quin consummaretur delictum. (3tio.) Quod occidendus fortuito casu tantum evaserit; all which concur but too well here. And that in 'omnibus criminibus atrocissimis Conatus' is punishable, is clear from 'Gothofred. tit. de Conatu' from Covarivius in Clementina, si furiosus, num. 6. And particularly in the crime of assassination totidem verbis, by Matheus de Sicariis, num. 3. 'Assassinus tamen nihil prodesse debet solusque conatus capite puniendus,' a great instance whereof is given in a decision by Gothofred in the Senate of Savoy, where death was inflicted on a person who but struck with a baton. And whereas it is pretended that assassination is no crime in our law, and that it is only inferred where the design of murdering proceeds from the commuters taking money: It is answered, that this part of the defence is most groundless: And our nation would be more barbarous than those of Lapland or the Tartars, if the lying in wait with a constant design to kill clandestinely et per insidias any person who had never offended us, should not be raised to a higher degree of detestation than ordinar murder. For, though the law does not always punish a meer endeavour when designed against such as have offended us, when nature pleads some excuse from the greatness of passion and resentment, or where the party killed gave some occasion by doing the wrong, or where the suddenness of the design allowed no time to consider or repent; yet where a person after mature deliberation ripens his own villany, and resists the motions of reason and the inspirations of God Almighty, by lying in wait to kill a person who never offended, the law thinks the commonwealth can never be secured as long as such a viper is alive, who wants nothing but opportunity to kill mankind one by one. And the speciality of taking money is only demonstrative, and not restrictive, since the guilt in this, and such like cases, is greater and more dangerous than that of taking money. For, he who takes money will not kill but in darkness, and where he may escape; but the Sun, and the cross, and the confluence of all the world, cannot secure against murderers, where the party imagines that the crime deserves Heaven, or at least where he thinks that these of his persuasion will rise in a tumult upon the streets for his defence. Like as since the law has inferred death ob conatum in the crimes of raptus, robrie, &c. much more should it infer death in this unparalleled and execrable crime.

As to what is alledged against the acts of invading ministers; it is answered, That the first act appoints that it shall be punished with all rigour. And the 7th act, king Charles 1. and the last act is sufficient, though posterior to the crime, to declare what was the meaning of that general of punished with all rigour. And since our law makes the attempting of such as are doing his majesty's service capital, that general ought to be extended to death, since lesser crimes and other crimes are for the same reasons which are applicable to this, punishable by death: Nor can there be any hazard in this, since there is a law for the future. And no man shall ever die for so great a crime in our nation.

Whereas it is alledged, that here the pannel did only confess upon hopes of life: It is replied, that primo, the promise of life from a judge, who could not grant the same, cannot defend, especially where no threatening preceded; and where it is clear that what was confessed was founded on other presumptions et indicia. Nor is this relevant, except the pannel could offer to prove, First, Threatening, to the fear whereof he yielded; 2do. That he expressly pactioned that this confession should not operate against him, which is very clear from Bossius, tit. 'De confessis per torturam,' num. 12. where he states the case, and concludes, that a spontaneous confession, though life were promised, does not defend: Nor is the guilt less, nor the truth less, that a judge promise. And if this were sufficient, every judge might make himself king, and grant remissions at his pleasure. And though this might weigh with the judge who promised; yet the law considers the party confessing still guilty, and so does never secure him. 'et quod potest condemnari tenent, cuius cod. de iis qui ad ecclesiam effugiant, Alcivad. lege de verborum significatione;' and Clarus himself says, That 'Ego suspicor opinionem cui esse majus commune;' but giving his own opinion rather as a private man than as a lawyer, he says, 'Ego tamen non condemnarum ad mortem nisi aliis iudiciis fuerit graviorus.' 'Ergo reus iudiciis gravior, est morte peccandus,' which is most just and reasonable. For, though the law be jealous where a merry silly innocent confesses to a judge, who may terrify him, or have an interest in causing him to confess to lay the blame off his friends, yet where the confession proceeded from a person suspect by all the world, by a person who publicly in all places since has owned the deed; who fled upon that account; who was taken with unlawful weapons, unfit for his profession, and the specific weapons which committed the attempt; who consdescended upon all the circumstances, and declared that he gloried in being a martyr upon that account: In being seen run away immediately upon doing of the deed with a pistol in his hand; in being found out in a thousand lies and prevarications when he was examined; in having renewed his confession publicly; It were but to scorn the law and massacre mankind, to think that a confession so adminiculated should not bind the confessor, who can alledge nothing of any threatning used against him by the judge to whom he confessed. And lawyers do in that case consider the quality of the judge as severe, unjust, rigid, or partial: but the confession is alledged to be made here upon promise of life given by my Lord Chancellor, whose benign, gentle temper frees him from all suspicion. And the proponing of exculpation acknowledges the deed to be done by Mr. James Mitchel the pannel, against which the protestation denying the libel cannot be sustained, being contrariu facto, as is evident to any rational man; and that the pannel cannot either pretend alibi, nor any other pretence of error, for excusing his retraction: so his majesty's advocate opposes his confession, bearing no qualification. And though he is very secure that the exculpation cannot be proven, yet since it is notoriously known that he is the committer, and that this may be a preparative to other pannels, against whom no probation is ordinarily had, but confessions elicit by judges with fair and gentle promises, he mordicus adheres to the relevancy. For, as Bossius says, 'Et si iudex dixerit nihil mali evenire tibi vel etiam promittat ut liberabitur majus tamen communis est opinio confessionem valere quia iudex etiam poterat ita fingere ad veritatem inveniendam.' And as this is most advantageous to the commonwealth and mankind, so there can be no hazard to a private pannel, since if he can but abstract his own innocency, or the reason of his error, by his alledging that he was alibi, or that there were severe threatenings or torture used, the same will still be allowed to qualify his confession. But the general presumption lies, that a judge will not damn his own soul, stain his function, ruin his fame, expose himself to the terrors of God Almighty, by alluring a confession from a poor innocent.

As to what is objected against the confession as extrajudicial and before an incompetent judge: it is replied, that confessions are of all professions the most valuable, since witnesses may, but it cannot be presumed a man will wrong himself; and the rise of that maxime, that extrajudicial confessions are not relevant, was only to exclude probation upon confessions enmitted where there was no judge nor no design of inquiry. But the confessor being loose and inconsiderate, and under no reason of advancement, did at random own a deed of which they were most innocent, either for ostentation or to please the company, or in raillerie: but to say that a man should not be judged by what he deliberately confesses, where he knows the design is to inquire into the crime, and that the event must be a criminal trial, is without all foundation or probability of reason: nor can judges or assisers be so much convinced by what is taken witness will say, who may have malice, or be bribed, or mistaken; as what proceeds from a man's own breast deliberately and in cold blood, which in effect is often times the inspiration and influence of Almighty God, who to show his love to justice and kindness to mankind, draws even from the greatest of malefactors the clearest confessions. And since men do not use to bring witnesses when they commit crimes, nor can the nature of the thing allow probation by writ, to cut off confessions, in these cases, were to make crimes for ever pass unpunished, and to make law, which is founded upon principles of reason, and the good of the common wealth, vanish in meer terms of art and hard words, contrar to the design of lawyers and the solid principles of sincere truth.

That this confession is then judicial is clear, being taken by authority of the privy council, the supreme judicatory of the nation, and where the design was to expiscate this truth. And the pannel knew that he was upon a trial for his life: nor can the incompetency of that judicatory be here alledged, since as the session is a judicatory merely civil, so the council is a judicatory above both, comprehending the power of both. And being so far competent in the cognition of crimes, that they take recognitions in criminal causes; they modify and qualify the sentences of the Criminal Court; they determine intricate cases remitted to them by the justices in point of law. And the king and the greatest part of the Criminal Court being there; it were absurd to think, that a confession emitted before them should not prove.

And if in a precognition a party should confess and so the trial there cease, what could be more absurd than to think that this confession should not bind, especially seeing confessions emitted before the lords of session in cases of improbation, and decreets following thereupon, are a sole, a final, and plenary probation before the justice court? Likens that principle in law, that 'Confessio coram Iudice incompetente' does not hold, is where, 'Judex est incompetentis tam ad inquisitionem quam ad accusatorem, as, 'in forum penitentiam,' such as Kirk sessions, or 'forum mere civile.' Neither of which can be said in this case where the judge before whom the confession was emitted is the ordinary judge of inquisition, and trial in criminal causes, 'et Judex non solum jurisdictionis prerogabilis;' but a judge who originally and generally examines all the pannels of Scotland. Like as this confession was made in presence of his majesty's privy council and the king's commissioner, in whom all the judicatories of the kingdom do eminently reside. And who might have sent the pannel to the scaffold without any assise, seeing 'in confitentem nulla sunt partes judicis.'

Whatever favour may be allowed to retraction of confessions 'facta ex incontinenti, ubi potest docere de errore:' yet what reason can there be where a pannel denies without shewing of proofs of his innocency; And therefore Bossius, tit. de confessis, Num. 61. concludes, 'Est etiam necessarium allegare errorem ceterum si simpliciter revoverit confessus non est audiendus.' And Num. 70. he adds, 'Quia fateor quod quis non auditur simpliciter dicendo post confessionem: non est verum quod confessus fui, tamen si per testes constare potest de innocentia majus attenditur veritas quam confessio.' And since Minors in law are obliged docere de errore, when they revoke, it were absurd to think that the law would be so ridiculous, that a man confessing before a grave judicatory should have liberty to retract without shewing any reason of his retraction: and the guilt rather grows per inficiationem, and by that impudent lye, than is lessened by the retraction.

In the case likewise where debates are concerning the validity of a confession, lawyers consider whether what was confest was or can be adminiculated by other collateral probation, argumenta et indicia, and whether the probation be veri similis; whereas here this confession is adminiculated by many other circumstances, such as persons who saw him run away, by his owning of the principle since, by his fleeing, &c. So that here neither can he instruct why he retracts, and the thing confest is adminiculate et circumstantiis et indicis. As to the objection founded upon the act of parliament, that the probation must be in presence of the assise, it is replied, that the whole frame of that act is grossly mistaken; for the design of that act was to correct a barbarous custom, whereby accusers were allowed to solist and to produce to them such writ and witnesses as they pleased for probation of the crime, to preclude the pannel of what he could say against the same, since false papers might be thrown in as confessions and proofs: but that cannot reach in this case, where a confession is produced before a pannel and his proctors, and they heard to object against the same. Nor can it be urged from this act that no paper can be relevant but what is owned by the pannel in presence of the assise; for we daily see that letters produced under the pannel's hand, though he should deny his subscription, will be sustained: and it will be sufficient to prove by witnesses, that he did subscribe, or by comparison of letters. Likens this act of parliament does not exclude that confessions before the lords of session in matters of falsehood, and decrees following thereupon, may not probative before the justices. Like as confessions taken before the justices though no assise be present, do without all controversy and debate prove the crime: yet neither can the justices condemn without an assise, nor does that act of parliament militate more against that case than against this. And in the case of Finlay Mac Gibbon, a confession taken in the Tolbooth without a fenced court, and before one judge, was found sufficient to infer the pain of death both by the council and justices. And it is admired how it can be thought that presumptions can be sustained as the foundation of a criminal sentence: as we daily see; and that witnesses which in effect are but presumptive, and a man's own confession emitted seriously and in cold blood, should not be sufficient. And as there could be nothing more dangerous to the common-wealth than that crimes should be thus rendered unsearchable; so what hazard can there be to the people on the other hand, or the pannel, when they are made their own judges? and to take off all possibility of danger, it shall be allowed to them to prove error, force, innocence or mistake. And this probation has been in all ages and nations sustained as uncontraverted, as, David ordained the person who said he had killed Saul immediately to be execute without further inquiry, giving as the undoubted reason, that he had condemned himself out of his own mouth; and which is registrate in Scripture, to secure the image of God against those who would deface it. And if such confessions should be sustained in any case, much more in this, where the nature of the crime is atrocious, and the manner of the discovery extraordinarily difficult. And if either atrocity or difficulty prevails with lawyers to remitt something of its ordinary rigour in exacting clear probation, as we see 'in criminibus exceptis et criminibus domesticis,' much more where both these concur, ought a man's own confession to be adminiculated. And whereas ordinarily pannels are penitent first when examined, the horror of the crimes softning their hearts; that their confessions then should not prove is very strange: and it were impossible and fruitless to expect, that after they are imprisoned amongst a company of other malefactors, and after they have a kind of men towards the law to teach them the art of retractation, and that their conscience turns callus, and acquainted with the idea of their own crime, a sincere confession may be then expected from them.

My Lord Advocat declares, he does not insist against the pannel for conversing with rebels at this time, and upon the shooting at a Bishop or Minister, before the late act of parliament, anno 1670, to infer ane arbitrary punishment: and insists upon mutilation as capital upon the act of parliament anent demembrement, which is 'reddere membrum inutile.' And a man is as much dismembered when he has ane useless hand, as if he had no hand; and insists upon the 28th act parl. 3 James 4. wherein slaughter and mutilation upon forethought felony are equiparate, and the pannel declared to be punished by death in both these cases, but refers the punishment of mutilation to be qualified by the justices, according to what shall be found here proven, and to what has been in custom of the justice court formerly in such Cases.

Sir George Lockhart duplycs, That the libel is no ways relevant, as founded upon the fourth Act 16. Parl. king Ja. 6. And the defence is no ways eleided by the alleadgances, contained in the reply. For, Primo, The Lords of justiciary would be pleased to take notice, that there is no speciality in the case of this act of parliament, as to privy counsellors; but that it extends to all his majesty's officers, and consequently the meanest officer being invaded in the terms and under the qualification contained in the act of parliament, might plead the benefit thereof. And if the Libel should be sustained in general terms without the express qualification in the act of parliament, the simple act of invasion of a Lion Herald, though neither death nor wound followed on it, would infer the pain of death; but that no such thing is in the meaning, nor can subsist with the act of parliament, is so clear and evident, as it was impossible for the wit of man to express the qualification to be libelled and positively proven in more plain and direct terms than is set down in the said act. In sua far as the act of parliament requires be way of provision and condition in the statutory part thereof in thir termes; it being verified and proven, that any of the said counsellors, sessioners, and officers, was pursued and invaded for doing of his highness service, shall be punished to the death. And there is great reason and necessity for this qualification, because the act of parliament intending contrary to the general customs of nations, and of this kingdom, in all other crimes that Conatus et attentatum, which is only relevant in the crime of treason, should be reputed Crimen consummatum in case of invasion of any of his majesty's officers. Therefore the law requires this qualification in matter of fact, that it be verified that the person invaded was doing his majesty's service; in which case the crime had a respect in the construction of law, as done against his majesty's authority, which he was then executing. And this qualification in matter of fact, that it was for doing of his majesty's service, is not here so much as libelled. And in the common opinion of all lawyers, as may appear by Julius Clarus, §. Assasinum, Num. 2. 'Ubi agitur de imponenda poena alicujus constitutionis specialis requiritur quod concurrant omnes qualificationis de quibus in ipsa constitutione.' And quest. 85. Num. 9. he has the same words, 'Ubi agitur ad imponenda poena alicujus specialis constitutionis oportet quod in eo casu verificentur omnes qualitates in ipsa constitutione expressas, alias poena non committatur, et hæc (says he) est doctrina communitur ab omnibus recepta,' and most especially when it is not ane intrinsic quality and aggravation, but where it is a qualification [required by law itself as 'intrigans delicti,' and as Gomes says, it is 'alterativum prene,' and therefore it must be totidem verbis libelled and positively proven.

And as to that pretence that it is presumed and inferred from the circumstances, and the way and manner of the committing of the fact itself, and that propositum and design cannot be otherwise proven nisi per indicia et conjecturas: It is duplycd, That the qualification required by the act of parliament is toto calo different from the design: For, if a person did invade any of his majesty's officers in doing of his majesty's service, and would pretend that he had no design to invade, certainly the pretence were absurd. And in that case the design 'presumitur ex natura attentati.' But the discharging of his majesty's service is not a design, but a matter of fact, which consists in ane extrinsic action, and must be proven, and may and does often occur. As for instance, if a magistrate should be invaded in the actual execution of his majesty's authority, or if the invader should be so transported with rage, as when he invades a judge, to tell him, that it was because he has unjustly decerned: These and the like cases are indeed the terms of the act of parliament. And there simple invasion, though no wounds followed, being directly levelled against his majesty's authority, 'nudus conatus et effectus delinquendi reputatur pro effectu.' And as this is clear from the express words of the act of parliament, and which being 'in materia correctoria et criminale,' is strictly to be interpret; so it is unanswerable evidenced from the act of parl. king Ch. 1. of blessed memory, by which it is provided, that the invasion and violence done to ministers is punishable, conform to the act of parliament 1587, to which it relates, which is confiscation of moveables, and declares that the said act is to be extended to archbishops and bishops, from which the pannel's proctors argue thus, if by the posterior act of parliament in anno 1633, the invasion and violence done to archbishops and bishops is not punishable with the pain of death, but only ane arbitrary punishment, how is it possible that the 4 Act

Parl. 16 Ja. 6. should infer the pain of death upon the invasion, as it is circumstantiat and libelled, wherein nothing is libelled but that the archbishop was invaded, who was a privy counsellor, and not the qualification that is required by the act of parliament, that it was for doing of his majesty's service?

As to that alladgance, That the pannel cannot condescend upon any private ground of quarrel or other reason why he did invade the archbishop: It is answered, if this alladgance were sustained, it were contrar to the act of parliament libelled upon, which does not require the pannel to prove, but says that it must be tried and verified, that the invasion was for doing of his majesty's service; and so his majesty's advocate must prove the samen by a clear and positive probation, as a point in matter of fact.

As to that pretence that the pannel did glory that he had committed the fact and invasion libelled, and endeavoured to justify the same, and persuade others that it was lawful: It is duplied, That as the saids qualifications are altogether disowned, so they are no ways the qualifications in matter of fact required by the act of parliament, viz. That the invasion and violence was for doing of his majesty's service, which is indispensibly required upon the reasons above mentioned, otherways the act of parliament should have said no more, but that all invasions of his majesty's privy counsellors, or other officers, should be punished with the pain of death; whereas the act of parliament thought it fit, necessar and just for all mens security, that a single act of invasion of any of his majesty's officers, however it might be punished pœna arbitraria, yet should not import or infer the pain of death.

In sua far as the Dittay is founded upon the common law, and that it is Assassinum, in which 'Conatus et attentatum habentur pro crimine consummato.' It is answered, the Dittay is no ways relevant, because it is not founded upon any law or act of parliament of this kingdom. And the common Roman law cannot be the foundation of criminal Dittays, whereby to draw in hazard the lives of any of his majesty's subjects. Like as there is clear, express and positive acts of parliament to the contrar, as the 48 act of parl. 3 Ja. act 79 parl. 9 Ja. 4. Declaring that the laws of no other realm are to be regarded, especially whereupon to found criminal indictments. And albeit by the common law Conatus in homicidio especially where it was homicidium dolosum, and designed to be committed 'proditorie et per insidias' was punished as Crimen consummatum; yet all lawyers agree, as may appear by Julius Clarus, Quest. 102, Farm. Quest. 80, and by the authorities by them cited, That by the general custom of all nations, 'in omni genere homicidii affectus conatus et attentatum' is not punishable 'pœna ordinaria delicti,' and so cannot infer a capital punishment or pain of death, as is concluded in this indictment. As to that pretence that the crime libelled is the crime of assassination, in which 'nudus conatus' is sufficient, especially 'si devenerit ad actum proximum.' It is answered, primo, That all lawyers agree in this, that 'crimen assassini' is only where a person does hire or conduce another to commit the same 'interveniante pretio.' And for which Julius Clarus, § Assassinium, where he so describes the crime. And Matheus de Criminibus does so describe the same, and does expressly assert that unless money or reward intervene, the crime of assassination cannot be committed, where the words are, 'Credideram tamen nisi merce certa et sceleri proposita et constituta fuerit sive in specie seu corpore sive in pecunia numerata non posse enim videri assassinium.' And there is no lawyer extant did ever otherways describe the crime; and there is great reason why money or reward should be considered in the constitution of this crime, because the law did consider the crime with respect to the hazard; and the hazard lay where persons were hired or conducted by infidels giving money or other reward to kill Christians. And albeit even in the proper crime of assassination itself in some particular nations, where the said crime was too frequent, as in Italy, Conatus is punishable: Yet Julius Clarus in the same § and others does maintain, that by the general custom of most nations, in the precise crime of assassination, 'Conatus seu attentatum' is not punishable with the pain of death. But the pannel has no reason to insist upon this; the matter of fact libelled being no ways the crime of assassination, but only that which lawyers call a design to commit murder, proditorie et per insidias. In which all agree, that by the custom of all nations 'Conatus facienda non reputatur pro facto.'

As to that point of the Dittay founded upon the mutilation of the deceast bishop of Orkney, conform to the 28 act parl. 3 James 4. It is answered, that denying that the deceast bishop of Orkney was mutilate so, albeit it could be proven, it cannot infer the pain of death; First, because it is clear by the said act of parliament, that it is not in the case of mutilation, but demembration. And it were a strange imagination to think that if a party were mutilate, or lost a finger, that the pain of death could be inferred. And there is a great difference betwixt mutilation and demembration: Mutilation being only an inability or privation of the use; whereas demembration is the intire loss of the member. And it is a principle in law, that acts of parliament, especially 'in casu criminale et capitale,' cannot be extended 'de casu in casum etiam ex veritate vel paritate rationis;' and that 'Cortici verborum adherendum est et Casus omissus habetur pro omissa.' And here there is no parity of reason, both the prejudice and deformity being far greater in demembration than mutilation.

And whereas it is pretended, That though the pannel's confession had been 'elicit sub spe impunitatis,' that yet it is not sufficient whereupon to liberate from capital punishment, because a judge cannot remit a crime: And that Bossius and others are clear, That notwithstanding of any such confession upon promise of impunity, yet a judge might and ought to condemn 'ad pœnam ordinariam delicti;' it is answered, The pretence does not cleid the defence, because, supposing it should be proven that the confession was 'elicitæ sub spe veniæ,' and upon assurance of life: Such a confession so elicitæ, cannot be a ground whereupon to violate the faith and impunity given; and far less can such a confession (though any could be proven) being retracted be considered as a confession: And as to which law and lawyers are very clear and positive. The law is, 'Lex. 3. Cod. de custode reorum,' and lawyers, as may appear by Matheus de Criminibus, Quest. 16, where his express words are, 'Querunt an Confessio promissa impunitate et spe veniæ elicitæ sufficiet ad condemnandum? Respondendum, Non sufficere, tametsi enim in Judicis potestate non sit promittere impunitatem adeoque ex promissione non obligatur, tamen dolo extorta est, et per hanc fraudem etiam innocentis illaqueari possunt.' And Bossius in that title De Confessione, after he has stated the case, resolves it thus, 'Tutius tamen est ut dicamus requirere perseverantiam et est ex mente Doctorum et cum ratione quin negari non potest quin talis Confessio sit obumbrata,' and says, it were against humanity itself to condemn 'ad pœnam ordinariam delicti' in such a case. And Julius Clarus, cited be his majesty's advocate, says, 'Ego non condemnare ad mortem,' and which is indeed the constant and irrefragable opinion of all lawyers, and practice of all criminal tribunals. And whereas it is pretended, that Julius Clarus subjoins these words, 'Nisi aliis indicibus sit gravatus,' and his majesty's advocate condescends upon several presumptions: It is answered, that if his majesty's advocate will lay aside the confession, and adduce such a presumptive probation, whereupon the pannel may be condemned, then he may plead the benefit of that qualification: But the presumptions condescended upon any remote conjectures, and no ways concluding; and the pannel after the alledged committing of the fact, did return and live peaceably for several years, and denies the fact, and cannot otherways be convict thereof. And if any pretended confession should be made use of, either per se, or in modum adminiculi, it cannot be divided from the quality under which it was granted, which the pannel offers to prove, was upon express assurance. And whereas it is pretended, that the granting of an assurance and impunity is upon the matter a remission which no inferior judge can grant, but that notwithstanding he may and ought to condemn; it is answered, primo, it will appear by the probation of what character and quality the granter of the assurance was.

2do. Lawyers do not consider whether a judge potest veniam concedere, or remit a crime: But a confession being elicitæ sub spe veniæ, is not a full and absolute confession, but a qualified, and cannot be made use of, and the quality not performed and made good. And it were a prejudice to public interest, and a way to preclude the ingenuity of all confessors, if notwithstanding of the interposition of public faith and the granting of assurances, and the eliciting of confessions sub spe veniæ, these confessions might be made use of, and the quality and condition upon which it was omitted altogether neglected, which is downright inconsistent with the opinion of lawyers and the practices and customs of criminal judicatories.

As to what is pretended, that though this confession be not emitted before the lords of justiciary, yet it was not extrajudicial or revocable, because it was deliberately given, and before a committee, who had authority from the lords of his majesty's privy council: It is answered, this point is of extraordinary importance and consequence, as to the lives and fortunes of his majesty's subjects, and as to the lords of justiciary and the procedure of the inquest, who are judges to the probation; and therefore it is represented in behalf of the pannel, That admitting any pretended confession should be produced, yet if it was not emitted before the lords of justiciary it is not a judicial but an extrajudicial confession, et fidem non facit, as to the probation of the crime. As to which, primo, There is an universal concord in the opinion of all lawyers, and in the practice and customs of criminal judicatories, and as to which the lords of justiciary are desired to cast their eye upon all who have written upon this point. And as Clarus says, 'Non invenies dissentientem in mundo;' and it is strange that all lawyers and the custom of all nations should have hallucinat in this point. For which the pannel's proctors cites Julius Clarus, Quest. 55 Farin. Quest. 81, and many others.

2do. Lawyers are likewise clear, that confessions emitted 'coram judice competente sed non sedente pro tribunali,' is but an extrajudicial confession, and much more where it is 'confessio emissa coram judice incompetente.' And when the question is, who is to be reputed judex incompetens; it is positively resolved, That omnes judes is incompetens who could not proceed ad condemnandum, as to the crime anent which the confession is emitted. And certainly though any confession were produced emitted before a committee of the lords of privy council, they have no criminal jurisdiction so as to proceed 'ad condemnandum in crimine capitale;' that being clear by Craig. dieg. 8, that 'ex eorum Statutis nec periculum vitæ, hereditatis aut omnium fortunarum subire posse.' And whereas it is urged that the lords of Privy Council have a mixed jurisdiction, and may proceed by way of precognition 'et per modum inquisitionis,' and may resolve doubtful cases and qualify sentences: It is answered, That it is not denied but the lords of privy council have and do very well deserve that jurisdiction; but as to criminal jurisdiction in capital crimes, it is only competent to the lords of justiciary: And the recognitions, or previous inquisitions, tend not ad condemnationem, but only as to this, whether to stop or remit to the lords of justiciary. And nothing is considered as a judicial confession, but where there is formatus processus, and where a party is called 'coram iudice competente,' and is 'sub instante periculo vite,' and knows that the infallible import of his confession is to that very effect for his condemnation, none of which can be pretended where the confession is emitted, 'coram iudice incompetente ad condemnandum.'

And whereas it is alledged, That, a confession in the opinion of lawyers cannot be retracted, unless the party could docere de errore, and purge his innocence, and did it ex incontinenti; It is answered, the alledgance is groundless; for though confession were emitted 'coram iudice competente pro tribunali,' it might be retracted ex incontinenti if he were able docere de errore: And there is no lawyer ever required it in other terms. But where the confession is emitted 'coram iudice incompetente,' fidem non facit quoad probationem indicti, and may be retracted either ex incontinenti or ex intervallo, and without shewing of any error or purging of innocence, such confessions in law amount not to any probation, no more than as lawyers argue if the depositions of witnesses taken in uno iudicio would fidem facere either in 'casu civile aut criminale in alio iudicio.' And certainly there is less reason for confessions where parties disown the same, and retracts them if emitted; and much more here where the pretended confession was elicite sub spe venie, so far was the pannel from thinking that the emitting of this confession was in order to condemnation, specially seeing it neither is, nor can be proven, that the said pretended confession was so much as judicially given in face of privy-council, where his grace the duke of Lauderdale, being then his majesty's commissioner, was present: And though it were, the pannel's proctors will not debate the import of his grace's commission, but remits the same to the commission itself, in case it be offered to be proven, that the confession was emitted before him, and the lords of privy-council.

And whereas it is alledged that the act, 9 parl. king James 6, ordaining all probation to be led in presence of the assize, does not concern the case, and is misunderstood, seeing here the confession will be produced in presence of the assize: It is answered, The act of parliament is clear to the contrar, and can admit of such interpretation. For albeit the narrative of the act of parliament was only cousa in pectore, and the statutory part of the act of parliament is clear and positive, that all probation should be adduced in presence of the assize, who are judges of the probation. And of all other probation there is the greatest reason, that the very act of confession should be in presence of the assize, who are judges to the probation, and who are to 'proceed upon oath, and whose consciences are to be satisfied and instructed as to the way, manner, conditions and terms whereupon such confessions were elicite; all which are concealed where there is nothing produced to them but a confession taken without their presence, especially seeing the pannel alledges and offers to prove that several points of fact and other particulars, were condescended upon and declared, none of which are mentioned in this pretended confession; all which should have been insert, and could not be divided as being in articulo conexo.

And whereas it is pretended that decreets pronounced before Lords of session, is Probatio probata; whereupon assizers may and ought to condemn: It is answered, the argument is in materia disparata, and does not concern the matter of confession, and is only in the special case of falsehood, and that upon a special reason, because the investigation of falsehood depended upon a trial and concurrence of many and violent presumptions, which may require a long tract of time and examination of parties and witnesses. It were impossible that such trials could be adduced before one inquest; these depending several years many times before the session before they can be brought to a close: and therefore law and custom in that case has sustained a decret of the Lords of session as a probation in Judicio criminale; but it is absolutely denied that it would in any other crime. And certainly if the crime of theft were pursued civilly before the Lords of session ad damnum et interesse, though the theft should be proven or confest before the Lords of session, it would not 'fidem facere in Judicio criminale,' as is evident by the authority of lawyers who agree, that 'acta probatoria in uno processu fidem non facit in alio;' Nay, which is more, 'acta probatoria in uno processu fidem non facit in alio processu coram eodem iudice.' And as to the instance of the Practique of Mac Nabh, the Pannel opposes the same, wherein there were depositions of witnesses; and though many times in the adjournal books, the cases of confessions emitted has been obtruded, yet it cannot be instanced that ever the Lords of justiciary did by interlocutor sustain the same as probation; but on the contrar it does appear in the case of Fraser, in the year 1641, that sir Thomas Hope being then his majesty's advocate declared, that a confession emitted before a sheriff depute who has a criminal jurisdiction in some cases in the terms allowed by law, and who beyond all doubt is judge competent per modum inquisitionis; yet so convinced was he, that it was an extrajudicial confession, that he only insisted therein in modum adminiculi, and joined it with the other probation mentioned in that Practique which was per se convincing and sufficient; As also since his majesty's happy restoration in the case of one Robertson, although the confession was emitted before one of the Lords of justiciary and his majesty's advocate for the time; yet he was so convinced of the insufficiency of the same, that after it was produced per modum probationis, he took up the samen, even in that state of the process when the assize was sworn. And as to the instance of divinity in David's practice, it does not concern the point of law, and cannot be made appear that the party retracted his confession; and it is a Practique; that either nimum or nihil probat. In respect whereof, &c.

The Lords commissioners of justiciarie continue the advising of this debate till the ninth day of this instant, at two o'clock in the afternoon; and ordains assizers and witnesses to attend ilk person under the pain of ane hundredth merks.

The said day John Graham post-master, Patrick Graham his brother,—Keith of Ludgurne, Mathew Colvil writer in Edinburgh, Alexander Levingstone ensign to captain Wyrhame, Walter Kennoway merchant in Edinburgh, James Fletcher of New Cranstoun, John Achmoutie ensign to the Castle of Edinburgh, being oftentimes called to have compeared before the Lords commissioners of justiciary this day and place in the hour of cause to have past upon Mr. James Mitchel's assize, as they who were lawfully cited to have made their appearance for the effect foresaid, lawful time of day bidden, and they nor none of them enterand nor appearand; the Lords commissioners and justiciarie therefore, be the mouth of Gilbert Mair, macer of court, decerned and adjudged, the forenamed persons and ilk ane of them to be in ane unlaw and amercement of ane hundredth merks Scots, which was pronounced for doom.

Intran' Mr. JAMES MITCHEL, Prisoner.

Indicted and accused for the crimes of assassination, invading of privy counsellors, ministers and others, ut in die precedente.

Pursuer, Sir George Mac Kenzie of Rosehaugh, our sovereign Lord's advocate, Proctors in defence.—Sir George Lockhart, Mr. John Eleis, Mr. John Stewart.

The Lords Commissioners of justiciary having considered the Dittay and debate relating thereto, find that article of the Dittay founded upon the 4th act, 16 Parl. king James 6 bearing up the pannel's invading by shooting and firing of a pistol at his grace the archbishop of St. Andrews, a privy counsellor, for doing of his majesty's service, relevantly libelled, his majesty's advocate proving the presumption in his reply, viz. That the pannel said that he did make the same attempt and invasion because of the archbishop his persecuting those that were in the rebellion at Pontland, or some words to that purpose, relevant to incur the pain contained in the foresaid act of parliament, and remit the samen to the knowledge of ane assize.

And likewise find that part of the Dittay anent the invading of bishops and ministers, relevant to infer ane arbitrary punishment, and remit the samen to the knowledge of an assize.

And siclike that article of the Dittay anent the invading, wounding and mutilating of the bishop of Orkney, relevant to infer ane arbitrary punishment, and remit the samen to the knowledge of an assize.

And also having considered that part of the debate anent the pannel's confession made and emitted before ane committee appointed by authority of council to receive it, and thereafter adhered to and renewed in presence of his majesty's high commissioner and lords of privy council convened in council, find it is judicial and cannot be retracted.

And also having considered the debate and Defence against the said confession, viz. That the same was emitted upon promise or assurance of impunity of life and limb, find the samen relevant to secure the pannel as to life and limb, reserving to the Commissioners of justiciary to inflict such arbitrary punishment as they shall think fit, in case the defence shall be proven, and remits the samen to the knowledge of ane assize.

Assisa.—Gordon of Cairneborrowe, David Burnet, merchant in Edinburgh, James Wood at the College Port, Chan., David Forsyth, taylor, Robert Campbel, apothecary, captain Andrew Dick, David Bruce, gent., John Hay of Baro. Thomas Comlie, vintner, Mr. Alexander Achmoutie, ensigne, capt. John Binning, vintner, Alexander Levingstone, ensigne, William Steinson younger, merchant, Charles Scot of Bonniotoun, Peter Wishart, lieutenant. The assize lawfully sworn, no objection in the contrar:

His majesty's advocate for probation adduced the pannel's own Confession, with the witnesses after deponing; of the whilk Confession, the tenor follows:

'Edinburgh, 10 Feb. 1674. In presence of the lord chancellor, lord register, lord advocate, and thesaurer depute, Mr. James Mitchel, prisoner, being called, did freely confess he was the person who shot the pistol at the archbishop of St. Andrews, when the bishop of Orkney was hurt thereby, in the year 1668, and depones upon oath, that no living creature did persuade him to it, or was upon the knowledge of it. Sic subscritur, James Mitchel, Rothes, A. Primrose, John Nisbet, Ch. Maitland.'

Master William Paterson, advocate, purged of partial counsel, and solemnly sworn, depones, he met a man with a pistol in his hand in Black-frier Wynd, immediately after the pistol was shot at the archbishop, but knows not the pannel, nor if he was the person that shot. And this is the truth as he shall answer to God.

Patrick Vause, keeper of the Tolbuith of Edinburgh, purged of partial counsel, and solemnly sworn, depones, That a day or two before or after the pannel was examined he the council, he confessed to the deponent, that he shot a pistol at the archbishop of saint Andrews, and escaped down Black-frier Wynd, and went up the Cowe-gate and into Mr. Robert Ferguson's house, and put on a periwig, and then came to the street and searched for the man that shot the pistol. Being demanded if he heard Mr. James Mitchel justify the deed : he depones he remembers it not.

Mr. John Vause, son to the keeper of the Tolbuith, purged and sworn : being interrogate, if he heard the pannel acknowledge the deed of shooting at the bishop, or defend it, depones, That being in conference with the pannel in the prison-house, he inquired at him how he or any man could be accessory to so impious an act, as to kill a man in cold blood who had not wronged him ; he said it was not in cold blood ; for the blood of the saints was reiking at the cross of Edinburgh.

John bishop of Galloway, being purged of partial counsel, sworn and examined, depones, That the first time he saw the pannel was in sir William Sharp's outer room, where he saw a pistol, which was said to be taken from him, out of which (as he supposes) there were three balls taken ; and that the pistol was like to the pistol produced. Depones that at that time the pannel did not confess any guilt, but seemed to be in a great consternation, and fell a trembling. And that the deponent hearing that he had made a confession, went to prison to speak to him about it, who acknowledged to the deponent, that he had made confession of that attempt against the archbishop before the chancellor, and some others of the council ; and that he had hopes of life, and desired the deponent to intercede for him. And the deponent having asked him how he could do such a deed against an innocent man : he answered, that he thought him an enemy to the godlie, and that they could not be in security so long as he was alive. And the deponent having inquired of him if he was sorry for it ; he did not say he was sorry for it, but if it were to do again he would not do it. And this is the truth as he shall answer to God.

Dr. Christopher Irvin, purged of partial counsel, and solemnly sworn, depones, that he was the first surgeon that came to the bishop of Orkney after he had received the shot, and that he did see a ball fall out of his sleeve, so that he knew that it was with a shot, and that the bones were fractured, and that they cured him so as he was able to lift his hand towards his head ; but there was still scales coming out of the orifice of the wound.

Depones, the bishop said he got the wound when he was laying his hand upon the archbishop's coach.

John Jossie, surgeon, purged sworn and examined, depones, That he was called to the bishop of Orkney's cure, and that he had a wound betwixt the wrist and the elbow, which did cast out several small bones at the two small orifices ; and that the bishop was not able to lift his hand towards his head.

William Borthwich, surgeon, purged of partial counsel, solemnly sworn and examined, depones, conforms to John Jossie in all things.

John earl of Rothes, lord high chancellor of Scotland, being sworn, and the confession under master James Mitchel's hand being shewn to him, depones he was present and saw Mr. James Mitchel subscribe that paper ; and depones that he heard him make the confession contained therein, and that he thereafter heard him ratify the same at the council-bar, in presence of the king's commissioner and lords of privy council sitting in council, and that his lordship subscribed the said confession. Depones, that his lordship the advocate, and the Treasurer Depute, were appointed by the privy council to examine Mr. James Mitchel. And being interrogate, if after they had removed the pannel to the council-chamber, whether or not his lordship did offer to the pannel upon his confession to secure his life in these words, upon his lordship's life, honour and reputation : depones, that he did not at all give any assurance to the pannel for his life ; and that the pannel never sought any such assurance from him : and his lordship does not remember that there was any warrant given by the council to his lordship for that effect ; and if there be any expressions in any paper which may seem to infer any thing to the contrary, his lordship conceives it has been insert upon some mistake.

*Charles Maitland of Hatton, lord treasurer depute, being sworn, and the confession under Mr. James Mitchel's hand being shewn unto his lordship, depones he was present when Mr. James Mitchel made that confession, and his lordship first heard him make it verbally, and then he saw him subscribe it ; and that his lordship subscribed it also, and at that time there was nothing spoken of any assurance : but when the pannel was asked by some of the committee, upon what account he committed that fact ; at first he seemed unwilling to answer, but thereafter said, it was because the archbishop is an enemy to the good people or godly people in the west. Depones, that within few days thereafter, at a meeting of the council, where the duke Lauderdale then his majesty's commissioner was present, the pannel being brought to the bar, and the confession produced being shewn to him, he acknowledged the same to be his hand writing ; adhered unto and renewed the same in presence of his majesty's commissioner and council: and depones that he did not hear the pannel either seek assurance of his life, or any other person offer the same to him.

John duke of Lauderdale, being sworn, depon's, That his grace was present as the king's commissioner in council, when Mr. James Mitchel was brought to the bar. Depon's his grace saw the pannel's former confession made at the committee of council shewn to him, and he acknowledged it to be his confession, and that he did adhere thereto and renew the same in presence of his grace and the council. His grace heard no assurance given to him, and that his grace did not give him any assurance, nor gave commission to any others to give him any assurance, and could not do it, having no particular warrant from his majesty for that effect.

James, archbishop of Saint Andrews, being sworn, depon's, That that day that the pannel did fire a pistol at his grace, he had a view of him passing from the coach and crossing the street, which had such impression upon his grace, that upon the first sight he saw of him after he was taken, he knew him to be the person who shot the shot. Depon's, his grace saw him at the council-bar in presence of his majesty's commissioner and the council acknowledge his confession made before the committee, and heard him adhere thereto and renew the same; and there was no assurance of life given him, nor any sought by him there. Depon's, that his grace himself did never give him any assurance, nor give warrant to any others to do it: only he promised at his first taking, that if he would freely confess the fault, and express his repentance for the same at that time, without further troubling judicatories therein, his grace would use his best endeavour to favour him, or else leave him to justice: But that he either gave him assurance, or gave warrant to any to give it, it is a false and malicious calumny; and that his grace made no promise to Nicholl Somervell other than that it was best to make a free confession. And this is the truth, as he shall answer to God.

The pannel, Mr. James Mitchel, after swearing of the assize, produced one copy of one pretended act of council, and craved that the register of council containing the said act might be produced. And after the examination and depositions of the witnesses upon the Dittay and exculpation, the pannel and his proctors farther urged, that the register of council might be produced. Seeing the pannel produced one instrument against Mr. Thomas Hay, one of the clerks of council, for giving one extract thereof; and the pannel and his proctors alledged, that the register of council containing the said act was produced in court the day before, and that the said act was read by several members of court; and being once produced, and one instrument taken against one of the clerks of council, who with the other clerk were cited as witnesses by his majesty's advocate, the clerks ought to be ordained either to give one extract or produce the register containing the aforesaid act; and the pannel and his proctors desire to be heard in writ upon the said act of council.

His majesty's Advocate answers, That he was not obliged to produce a register for the Pannel; and if any such pretended act was, he should have used a diligence and cited the clerks of council for producing of the registers, or giving any extract; which the Pannel not having done he cannot be allowed a diligence in this state of the process. And if any such act of council was, it was unwarrantable and could not be made use of, after the lord Chancellor, the duke of Lauderdale, the lord Treasurer Depute, and other lords of council had deponed that there was no such assurance given, as is either pretended by the exculpation, or insinuate by the pretended act of council. And he the copy produced it is evident, that the design thereof is to take from the pannel any pretended favour he pleads; and if the act be founded one, it cannot be divided; so that one meer narrative must prove, and the statutorie words should not prove: especially seeing there is nothing more notour and ordinar, than for the council not to consider a narrative if the statutorie words be right. And as the pannel pretends that his confession cannot be divided from the assurance given, but that it must taken with the quality; so much less must this act be divided. And the pretended act is long posterior to the pannel's confession, and even posterior to a former dyet in the justice court appointed for the pannel's trial for the said crime. And farther, no such assurance could have been granted, seeing none but his majesty can grant remissions.

The Pannel and his Proctors desired the copy produced to be read.

His majesty's Advocate consents to the reading of the pretended copy of the Act of Council, and which being publicly read, is of the tenor following.

Edinburgh, March 12, 1674.

"The Lord Commissioner his grace, and the lords of his majesty's privy council having appointed a committee of council to examine Mr. James Mitchel, prisoner in the Tolbuith of Edinburgh; the said Mr. James being brought before the said committee, did make a free and voluntary confession of his accession to the rebellion, and rising in arms in the west; and that after he had notice of the same he went from Edinburgh with colonel Wallace and others, and joined with the rebels there, and from thence came along, and was with them until the night before the fight at Pentland-hills; and that at the desire of Captain Arnot he came then to Edinburgh to speak to some persons there concerning them. And being examined upon the attempt made upon the person of the archbishop of St. Andrews, and who shot the pistol at the said archbishop, when the bishop of Orkney was hurt in the month of July 1668, he did declare that at that time, and the day that the said attempt was made he was in the town of Edinburgh; and that he had bought the pistol, which was about him charged with three balls when he was apprehended, about that time when the bishop was shot, from Alexander Logan, dagger-maker in Leithwynd: but refused that he was the person that made the said attempt until having retired a pace with one of the said committee, he did confess upon his knees that he was the person, upon assurance given him by one of the committee, as to his life, who had warrant from the lord commissioner and the council to grant the same. And did thereafter confess freely, before all the lords that was upon the said committee, that he shot the foresaid pistol at the said archbishop, and did subscribe his confession in presence of the said committee, which is also subscribed by them. And thereafter the said Mr. James in presence of the commissioner his grace and council, did renew and adhere to the said confession, both as to the accession to the rebellion and the attempt foresaid; and acknowledged he made the said attempt because he thought that the said archbishop had an hand in troubling and persecuting those that were in the rebellion. And nevertheless, being brought before the lords commissioners of the justiciary, and asked if he did own the confession foresaid, he did altogether refuse to answer and adhere to his saids confessions, notwithstanding he was told by the lords commissioners of justiciary and his majesty's advocate that if he would adhere to his saids confessions, he should have the benefit of the said assurance and if otherways, that he should lose the same. Therefore the lord commissioner his grace, and the Lords of his majesty's privy council, do declare, that they are free, and that the said Mr. James ought not to have the benefit of any such promise or assurance, and that the same is altogether void; and that the Lords of the justiciary and the assize ought to proceed without any respect to the same. And farther do declare, that the said Mr. James Mitchel is the person intended and meant in the proclamation in the years 1665 and 1667(discharging any intercomoning with the rebels therein mentioned, and excepting the said Mr. James, and the other persons therein, from his majesty's favour and indemnity, and no other under the name of Mr. James Mitchel, though there had been any other of that name involved in the said rebellion.

"The Pannel and his Proctors renew their desire, and crave to be heard to debate upon the act of council in writ.

The lords commissioners of justiciary considering that the copy of the pretended Act of Council produced was never urged, nor made use of, nor any diligence craved for producing the registers of council, until this afternoon that the assize was sworn, after which no diligence can be allowed nor granted in this state of the process be the law of the kingdom, and practice of this court; especially seeing it appears be the said copy, that the design was to take away any assurance that the pannel could have pleaded; and that the truth of the narrative of the copy founded upon insinuating that there was an assurance, is cancelled be the depositions of the duke of Lauderdale, then his majesty's commissioner, the lord chancellor, and other members of the committee and council: The said lords therefore ordain the assize to inclose and return their verdict to-morrow at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The said day the persons who past upon the assize of master James Mitchel, returned their Verdict in presence of the said lords: whereof the tenor follows:

"As to the first part of the libel, founded upon the 4 act, 16 parl. king James 6. the chancellor and whole assize, with one voice, find it proven conform to the lords interloquitor.

"As to the invading of bishops and ministers, and wounding the bishop of Orkney, siclike proven with one voice.

"As to the third part of the lords interloquitor concerning his confession, first before a committee, and thereafter before his majesty's high commissioner and council, the whole assize with one voice find it proven conform to the lords interloquitor.

"As to the fourth and last part of the interloquitor concerning the exculpation, the whole assize with one voice find it no ways proven. And further concerning the exculpation, when the pannel was pressing it strongly upon my lord chancellor the whole assize heard his own confession and acknowledgment of the fact.

(Sic Subscribitur,) Jo. HAY, Chancellor."

After opening and reading of the whilk Verdict of Assize, the lords commissioners of justiciary, by the mouth of Adam Auld, dempster of court, decerned and adjudged the said Mr. James Mitchel to be taken to the Grass Market of Edinburgh, upon Friday the 18th day of January instant, betwixt two and four o'clock in the afternoon, and there to be hanged on a gibbet till he dead, and all his moveable goods and gear to be sequestered and inbrought to his majesty's use; which was pronounced for doom. Upon which day he was executed according to the sentence.*

He had prepared a Speech, which he intended to have delivered, but being interrupted by the beating of drums he threw it over the scaffold; it was as follows:

“Christian People,

“It being rumoured abroad immediately after I had received my Sentence, that I would not get liberty to speak in this place, therefore I have not prepared a formal discourse and account of these pretended crimes, for which I was accused and sentenced, neither did I think it very necessary, the fame of your process having gone so much abroad, what by a former indictment given me near four years since, the dyet whereof was suffered to desert in respect the late advocate could not find a just way to reach me, with that extrajudicial confession they opposed unto me. All know he was zealous in it, yet my charity is such unto him, that he would not suffer unwarrantable zeal so far to blind him, as to overstretch all laws of the land beyond their due limits, in prejudice of the life of any natural subject, and next by an extreme enquiry of torture, and then by exiling me to the Bass, and after all, giving me a new indictment at the instance of the new advocate, who before was one of mine, when I received the first indictment, to which new indictment and debate in that process I remit you, and particularly to these two defences of extrajudicial confession, and to the promise of life given to me thereupon by my lord chancellor, upon his own, and the public faith of the kingdom, upon the verity whereof I am ready to die, and consent to lay down my life. And I hope, your charity will be such to me (a dying man) as not to misconstrue me therein, especially when it is so notoriously adminiculated by an act of the secret council, and yet denied upon oath by the principal officers of state, present in council at the making of the said act, and which the act bears to have been present thereat; the duke of Lauderdale being then his Majesty's commissioner, and which act of council was by the lords of judiciary their interloquitor most illegally repelled; but I shall have charity to some of these lords, whom I knew would have given law and justice place, even as to my just absolution, if they had not been overpowered by the plurality of votes of those who were over-awed and dared by the lords of the secret council. But that will not absolve their consciences at the last day. As to my advocates and lawyers, I ingenuously acknowledge their care, fidelity and zeal in my defence, and which, I hope, shall be some standing fame to them for this, and all future generations. So thus much as a short account of that affair, for which I am brought unjustly to this place. But I acknowledge my particular and private sins have been such, as have merited a worse death unto me; but I die in the hope of the merits of Jesus Christ to be freed from those eternal punishments due to me for sin; yet I am confident, God doth not plead with me in this for my private and particular sins; but I am brought here, that the work of God may be made manifest, and for the trial of faith, Joh. ix. ver. 5. and 1 Pet. i. ver. 7, and that I may be a witness for his despised truth and interest in this land, who am called to seal the same with my blood. And I wish heartily that this my poor life may put an end to the persecution of the true members of Christ in this kingdom, so much cheated by these perfidious prelates, and in opposition to whom, and in testimony of the cause of Christ, I at this time willingly lay down my life. And I thank God, that he hath thought me so worthy as to do the same for his glory and interest. Finally, conceiving it a Christian duty in a singular and extraordinary case anent my particular judgment concerning both church and state, it is evidently declared and manifested more fully elsewhere. So farewell all earthly enjoyments, and welcome Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, into whose hands I commit my spirit.

JAMES MITCHEL.”

See the following Case.

* “Doubtless the fanaticism of Mitchel was of the most daring and atrocious nature; but the guilt of that fanatic is lost in the complicated perfidy, cruelty, perjury and revenge which accomplished his death. It was the ardent desire of ministers to involve the whole body of presbyterians in his guilt; but in the prosecution of this object they incurred the just-imputation of more detestable crimes. Horror and universal execration were excited by the treachery and almost unexampled perjuries of the first ministers in the church and in the state; and the precautions employed by Sharp for his safety and revenge, contributed two years afterwards to his disastrous fate.” 4 Laing, 80.

239. Proceedings before the Lords of the Articles, &c. against CHARLES MAITLAND, of Halton, Treasurer Depute, for Perjury, in having given a false Testimony, at the Trial of JAMES MITCHEL: 33 CHARLES II. A. D. 1681.*

A PARLIAMENT being summoned and

* This case is inserted in this place, out of chronological order, on account of its connection with the preceding Article.

holden at Edinburgh the 28th day of July, 1681, by his Royal Highness, the king's High-Commissioner, on the — day of —, William Noble, of Denotter, did deliver the following Petition, or accusation, into the hands

[the Lord Register, to be by his lordship presented to his Royal Highness, and the Lords of Articles:]

To his Royal Highness, his Majesty's High-Commissioner, and the Right Honourable the Lords of the Articles.

"It is humbly represented,

"That, whereas the deceased Mr. James Mitchel being convened before the justices, for attempting to assassinate the late archbishop of St. Andrews, and his confession before the duke of Lauderdale, his majesty's commissioner for the time, and the Lords of the privy-council, being adduced in modum probationis, against him, the said Mr. James proponed this defence, that his confession was omitted upon promise and assurance of life made to him; for proving whereof, he did adduce Charles Maitland, Lord Treasurer-Depute, as a witness, who deponed negative, notwithstanding that by letters under his hand, directed to the late earl of Kincardin, he expressly writes, 'That the said Mr. James had confessed upon assurance made to him of his life.' And 'that he now thought that his punishment would be the loss of his right hand,' which perjury will be clearly proven by production of the said Letters and Deposition; for which is humbly craved, a warrant may be granted against the Havers for exhibition of the same, and that the Lord Treasurer-Depute may be declared infamous, and suffer the other pains appointed by law in such cases.

(Sic Subscritur) "W. NOBLE."

The Letters which the Petition refers to, and upon which the whole Accusation is founded, are these two that follow, both sent to my lord of Kincardin:

"Holyrood-house, Feb. 10, 1674.

"This afternoon yours came, which should have come this morning, so that the post is now more regular. I read it all, and it is a full account of all passages: I hope shortly we may find matters grow better, and indeed there is great need of it here, for at present we are out of joint. Saturday last, in the morning, information was given, That one Mr. James Mitchel, who was alledged to have shot at the archbishop of St. Andrewes, was discovered by — and sir William Sharp, and being seen to come down sir William's own close, by sir William, and two of his brother's footmen, he called to Mitchel, and carried him back to his house (the signet-office). He had a long iron pistol, and a short sword about him, in shoes and stockings; and though he was so armed, yet he did not resist, though none came up to him, but sir William alone, till he came up his stair. Being asked his name, he denied it, and varied in several others of his answers; and by warrant of the Chancellor, was committed close prisoner. This day he was examined by Order of Council, by the Chancellor, Register, Advocate, and me: the Commissioner had ordered us to charge him with his being in the Rebellion, and that he was excepted by name out of the act of indemnity, and so let him see his condition, and to be led to execution: this was done very soon, and against his next examination he confessed his being with the rebels, but denied this assassination of the archbishop, yet acknowledged his being in town at that time; and that the pistol he was taken with he had bought at that time; so it was moved by one, That the Chancellor might take him apart, to see what he would then say: this being done, upon assurance of life, he fell upon his knees, and confessed it was he that shot the bishop of Orkney, and which he aimed at the archbishop; and here is his confession, the double of it signed by him, the Chancellor, and us. His punishment, it is thought, will be the loss of his right hand, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the Bass. I think I told you before, that his grace had retrenched his allowance to ten pounds sterling a day, since the 20th; though his charge be little retrenched, for his table holds yet 24 persons. I hope, when matters are over, you will give us some account of his majesty's pleasure about the Miners affairs, wherewith ye know their friends have been sufficiently reproached, without any shadow of reason. And so, my good Lord, Adieu."

"Holyrood-House, 12 Feb. 1674.

"This day, Mr. Mitchel, who assassinated the Archbishop of St. Andrews, was again examined in face of the council, and said nothing but what he said to us of the committee: he is remitted to the justice court, to receive his Indictments, and Sentence, to have his right hand cut off at the cross of Edinburgh, and the forfeiture of his whole goods and posterity. This last part is not to be put in execution till his majesty be acquainted, because assurance of his life was given him upon his confession. The cutting off his hand is to be executed by the hand of the hangman."

The Deposition which is pretended to be contradictory to what is delivered here in these two Letters, from whence perjury is inferred, will be found at p. 1256).

This Petition being read, the Lord Treasurer Depute desired that he might have it delivered to him in common form, and might have liberty to put in his Answer to it; and became farther an humble and earnest suitor to their lordships, that he might be put to a speedy trial, whereby he might make his innocence appear to the parliament, and the whole world, which his royal highness, and the Lords of the Articles, were pleased to grant; not because they found any thing in the accusation relevant against him, but that they might gratify his lordship's earnest desire, of being put upon his trial. Afterwards, William Noble was called in, who owned his accusation, and did again sign it in presence of his royal highness, and Lords of the Articles; and being asked by the president of parliament, the marquis of Atholl, if he knew the Lord Treasurer-Depute, or was acquainted with him? He answered, No; Being then interrogated how he came to accuse his lordship upon the head of perjury? Or whether it did fall within his proper knowledge? Or whether he did ever see the Lord Treasurer Depute's letters, or deposition? He replied, No; but that he was so informed, and that he was induced to do it as a member of parliament: and being thereupon asked, Who he received his information from? He refused to make any reply to that question.

Presently after this, the Lord Halton put in his Answer to the Information exhibited against him, which is as followeth:

"Whereas it is represented, That Mr. James Mitchel, in his trial, having alledged that his confession was emitted upon assurance of life, and having adduced the Treasurer-Depute as a witness in his exculpation for proving the same, he deponed negative, notwithstanding, by a letter under his hand to the earl of Kincardin, he asserts, that he had confessed upon assurance of life; which he offers to prove by the missive letter now produced, and therefore concludes, that the Treasurer-Depute is guilty of perjury, and ought to be declared infamous, and subjected to other legal penalties thereon.

"It is answered, that this accusation is neither relevant nor proven, for as to the relevancy, perjury being a high crime, is not to be presumed against any man, much less a person of so high quality and office, except the deeds inferring the perjury were of knowledge, and directly contradictory; and to infer perjury must not only be deposition, contradicting another deposition which is upon the matter false, because a man may depone an error, bona fide, through forgetfulness; but perjury must be a false deposition against one's knowledge; and so he must be sciens et volens. So that two oaths, after the interval of four years (which is the distance between the letter and deposition), suppose they had contradicted, yet, in charity, a person of entire fame might be excused from perjury; but where the contradiction is only alledged, betwixt a transient missive letter of news, and an oath emitted four years after the date of the letter, no rational man can think, that albeit these did contradict, it could infer perjury, but only an error or mistake in the missive letter, and the writing of a missive upon mistake or design, though it were produced to a party, when he is called to depone; if he was convinced that he had been mistaken in his missive, he behoved to depone according to his knowledge, and the truth, though that contradicted his letter, which can never infer the least insinuation of perjury, suppose the letter had been obligatory and serious; whereas this letter was only an overly indigested account of news, and unsubscribed.

"2. As the accusation is no ways relevant, so it is not at all proven; because both the letter and the oath are consistent, in so far as Mitchel being examined before a committee of the council, in the Treasury-Chamber, he did deny the attempt of assassinating the prince; but thereafter, the Chancellor having retired with him to the council-chamber, after a little time, they did return, and Mitchel did confess the attempt before the committee, and some days after, reiterated that confession before the council; and it was generally reported, and until the Chancellor deponed the contrary, it was universally believed, that the Chancellor had given him assurance of life privately: but it neither is probable that assurance was promised by the committee or council, nor did Mr. James Mitchel assert it in his trial, and therefore the universal report, that assurance was given privately, was a sufficient foundation for the Treasurer-Depute's letter; but when he came to be examined in the exculpation, whether he heard assurance given him, suppose he had all the grounds of credibility, yet he could not depone that he heard assurance given, except he had been ear-witness to the promise; and by this letter that appears impossible; for it bears, That it was moved, that the Chancellor and Mitchel should retire, and this being done, upon assurance he confessed; so that the assurance related in the Letter, was not given in the committee, or where the Treasurer-Depute was present, but where the Chancellor had retired with Mitchel in the council-chamber: and the Treasurer-Depute is so cautious in his deposition, that he restricts it to two precise times, viz. When Mitchel confessed in the committee, and when he renewed his confession before the council; and he depones, That being present at these two times, he heard neither assurance asked nor offered; so that albeit, at any other time, assurance had been given him, it doth not at all contradict the oath; and it had been perjury, if the Treasurer-Depute had deponed affirmative, though he had heard the general surmise, or though this letter, written upon the faith of that report or rumour, had been in his hand. And in this case, the Treasurer-Depute's deposition being a concurring testimony with several other persons of the greatest eminency, trust, and integrity, in this kingdom, some whereof deponed in relation to their proper fact, and who were only pretended to have given the assurance, his oath can never be suspected, without the greatest reflection upon the considerablest part of the king's principal ministers.

"From all which, it is evident that this accusation is a most unjust, calumnious, and scandalous libel, to which the accuser hath been hounded out, tending to diminish the confidences of the lieges and subjects to his majesty's officers of state, and thereby wounding his majesty's authority, and weakening his government by such presumptuous attempts against his ministers: and it is humbly hoped and expected from his royal highness, and the Lords of the Articles, that since the letter founded upon doth not, in the least, instruct the irrelevant and illegal accusation, which is only probable by writ, according to our law; that therefore the Treasurer-Depute may be vindicated and absolved from this false and infamous libel; and that the calumniator may be punished, by being declared infamous, and otherwise in his person and goods, according to the demerit of his crime, and to the terror of others."

This answer being given in by my lord Halton, it was so full and clear, that unless some other trick were found out, the Lords of the Articles could not but immediately proceed to give their Judgment in favour of his lordship; Mr. Noble, therefore, who had before restrained his proof of the accusation to those two letters written to my Lord of Kincardin, and to which the Answer referred, that he might buoy up his sinking cause as long as he could, was pleased (by a second Petition) to desire that witnesses might be summoned in, and the registers of the council and justice court produced to prove the contents of his accusation; and the Treasurer-Depute still pressing for a fair trial, the Articles, before they would give answer, allowed him to condescend upon all the sederunts of council, and all the members of council at that time, when Mitchel was examined at several diets, and craving further, several other witnesses to be examined, and the said registers to be produced. This being again considered by the Articles, the Treasurer-Depute begged leave to answer for himself, and for his Defence said;

"1. That in law, no man's letter can invalidate his oath, even though it contradict his oath, but that his letters are consistent with his oath, being diversely related, and to divers times and circumstances.

"2. That Noble's accusation having restricted the manner of proof to Halton's letters only, he could not now resile from that, without giving in a new formal accusation against him: and though the sense of his own innocence had induced him to press a legal trial, yet he could not consent to suffer his accuser to shift himself off, by proposing new and illegal methods of probation, to procure delay.

"3. That the crime of perjury could not be inferred but by contradictory oaths, which could not be alledged against him in this case.

"4. That the crime of perjury, by the law of Scotland, was not probable, nor could be proven by witnesses, but by writ only, and that especially by oaths contradicting one another.

"5. That in this case, his oath did conclude that he did not hear Mitchel ask assurance of life, or any person give it him, and that therefore no witness could swear, that Halton heard the assurance given to Mitchel, unless his ears had been fixed in that witness's brain, which is impossible; and unless they swore so, it would not prove this, or any crime against him; and though it were possible to prove he heard assurance given, yet, after so long time, he might have forgot.

"6. The Treasurer-Depute was a concurring witness with the late Chancellor, the late murdered archbishop of St. Andrews, the duke of Lauderdale, and the now bishop of Edinburgh; and though witnesses were allowable in this case, as they were not, yet they cannot be led against these persons deponing with him in Mitchel's trial, who are either dead or absent: besides that, what they might be presumed to swear, be what it will, would rather rake into the graves and ashes of those noble persons, now dead, than militate any thing against the Treasurer-Depute.

"7. As to any register craved to be produced, that can operate nothing, unless they contain papers signed by the Treasurer-Depute, and must be oaths contradictory, and which ought particularly to be condescended upon, and are not so much as alledged; and if they were, Mr. Noble may get extracts, as other subjects do. But however, he submitted himself to his royal highness, and their lordships determination."

Upon this his Royal Highness, and the Lords of the Articles, having fully considered the Accusation, and the Letter, upon which it is founded, and also the Lord Treasurer-Depute's Answers, and his Deposition, concurring with the Depositions of the Lord Chancellor, Archbishop of St. Andrews, and duke of Lauderdale, his royal highness was pleased to say in the Articles, that he did not see how he, being the king's Commissioner, could give way to any such accusation against one of his majesty's servants and officers of state, or that any such matter should come to a trial, unless it had been the Treasurer-Depute's own earnest desire; and that now their lordships having seen and considered the whole matter, it was fit for them to consider what was to be done. Whereupon, the Lords of the Articles declared their sense of the Treasurer-Depute's innocence in this crime of which he was accused; and they did humbly offer to his royal highness, that he would be pleased to transmit the whole affair to his majesty, and submit the same to his royal consideration; to the end his majesty might declare his royal pleasure, both for the Treasurer-Depute's vindication, and punishing the accuser according to the pains usually by law inflicted in such cases.

What follows is the copy of Mitchel's two Confessions.

Edinburgh, Feb. 10, 1674.

In the presence of the Lord Chancellor, the Lords Register, Advocate, and Treasurer-Depute.

Mr. James Mitchel being called before the committee, and examined as to his accession to the rebellion in the year 1666, acknowledges he was in that rebellion, and joined with them at the Burgh of Air, and stayed with them until the night before Pentland, at which time, at the desire of captain Arnot, he came into Edinburgh, to speak with one Mr. James Sterline, and Mr. Robert Ferguson, and the laird of Pen-zerie, who were then in Edinburgh, anent an address to be given in to the council, in behalf of those in the rebellion, declares he was in Edinburgh, and stayed in the house of Grissel Whytford, in the Cannon-Gate, before he went out; and having notice from col. James Wallace, capt. Arnot, John Lindsay, and one William Young, from whom he brought a horse, went out of Edinburgh, about eight o'clock at night, and immediately rode towards Air, and joined with those that were there in the rebellion. Declares that it was in the house of one widow Robison in Currie's close, that he spoke with Penzerie.

In presence of the Lord Chancellor, Lords Register, Advocate, and Treasurer-Depute, Mr. James Mitchel, prisoner, being called, did freely confess he was the person who shot the pistol at the Archbishop of St. Andrews, when the bishop of Orkney was hurt thereby, in the year 1668. And depones upon oath, That no living creature did persuade him to it, or was upon the knowledge of it.

It is certain, that Mr. Noble had, by the advice of his own friends, without the knowledge of my lord Halton, subscribed a Paper wherein he renounced and retracted his accusation, and that he had shewn the same to John Campbell, of Succoch, Commissioner for Argyle-shire, after it was subscribed by him before witnesses. He, at first, was pleased to think fit to deny it, but being immediately confronted with the said Mr. Campbell before the Articles, he then confessed he had shewn that paper subscribed by him to that gentleman; by which a man may easily conjecture at the nature of both his accusation and accuser.

Lord Fountainhall's Account of the proceeding against Halton, is as follows:

"A complaint was exhibited by William Noble of Dunnottar, or Kipperminisoch, one of the Commissioners for Dumbartonshire, against my Lord Halton for perjury, in so far as he had deponed in Mr. James Mitchel's criminal trial in 1678 that he knew no promise of life given him, and yet by a letter produced all written with his own hand, in 1674, directed to the earl of Kincarden, he wrote that Mitchel had confessed (on a promise of life given him by some of the committee of council, meaning the Chancellor,) that it was he that shot the pistol at the late Archbishop of St. Andrews, in July 1668, which contradicted his oath. But some thought albeit he had not deponed so cautiously, yet it was not precisely perjury; seeing his letter proceeded on a rumour and misinformation that promise of life had been given him, which the Chancellor having denied upon oath before Halton deponed, it clears him that he and others had been in a mistake, and so he needed not in his oath take any notice of that alledged promise of life, though there was an act of privy council that seemed to mention it. See Mitchel's trial at the 7th and 8th of February 1678. The parliament's adjourning stopp'd the decision; but it had the effect of Machiavel's advice, 'calumniare audacter, aliquid semper adhaerere.' Some made a mock allusion to the old history de Hattone quodam A. Episcopo Moguntino perjuro, who by a false oath beguiled Albert earl of Bamberus, and betrayed him to the emperor Lewis the fourth: the ridiculous allusion lies in the vicinity of the names."

ON the 27th of June, 1677, the earl of Shaftesbury was brought to the bar upon the Return of an Alias Habeas Corpus directed to the constable of the Tower of London; the effect of the Return was, That Anthony earl of Shaftesbury, in the writ mentioned, was committed to the Tower of London, Feb. 16, A. D. 1677, by virtue of an Order from the Lords Spiritual

† "The parliament of England," says Burnet, "had been prorogued for about a year and some months, by two different prorogations. One of these was for more than a year. So upon that it was made a question, Whether by that the parliament was not dissolved. The argument for it was laid thus: By the ancient laws a parliament was to be held 'once a year, and oftener if need be.' It was said, the words, 'if need be,' in one act, which were not in another that enacted an annual parliament without that addition, did not belong to the whole period, by which a session was only to be held once a year if it was needful; but belonged only to the word 'oftener. So that the law was positive for a parliament once a year; and if so, then any act contrary to that law was an unlawful act; by consequence, it could have no operation. From whence it was inferred, that the prorogation which did run beyond a year, and by consequence made that the parliament could not sit that year, was il-and Temporal then in parliament assembled: the tenor of which Order followeth in hæc verba:

‘Ordered, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled, That the constable of his majesty’s Tower of London, his deputy, or deputies, shall receive the bodies of James earl of Salisbury, Anthony earl of Shaftsbury, and Philip lord Wharton, members of this House, and keep them in safe custody, within the said Tower, during his legal; and that therefore the parliament could not sit by virtue of such an illegal act. Lord Shaftsbury laid hold on this with great joy, and he thought to work his point by it. The duke of Buckingham was for every thing that would embroil matters. The earl of Salisbury was brought into it, who was a high spirited man, and had a very ill opinion of the court. Lord Wharton went also into it. And lord Hollis writ a book for it; but a fit of the gout kept him out of the way. All the rest of the party was against it. They said, it was a subtily; and it was very dangerous to hang so much weight upon such weak grounds. The words, ‘if need be,’ had been understood to belong to the whole act; and the long Parliament did not pretend to make annual parliaments necessary, but insisted only on a triennial parliament: if there had been need of a parliament during that long prorogation, the king by proclamation might have dissolved it, and called a new one. All that knew the temper of the House of Commons were much troubled at this dispute, that was like to rise on such a point. It was very certain the majority of both Houses, who only could judge it, would be against it. And they thought such an attempt to force a dissolution, would make the Commons do every thing that the court desired. Lord Halifax set himself much against this; and did it not without expressing great sharpness against lord Shaftsbury, who could not be managed in this matter. So, upon the first opening the session, the debate was brought on; and these lords stood against the whole House. That matter was soon decided by a question.

“But then a second debate rose, which held for two days, whether these lords were not liable to censure, for offering a debate, that might create great distractions in the subjects’ minds, concerning the legality of parliament. Lord Halifax with the rest of the party argued against it strongly. They said, if an idle motion was made, and checked at first, he that made it might be censured for it, though it was seldom, if ever, to be practised in a free council, where every man was not bound to be wise, nor to make no impertinent motion: but when the motion was entertained, and a debate followed, and a question was put upon it, it was destructive to the freedom of public councils, to call any one to an account for it: they might with the same justice call them to an account for their debates and votes; so that no man was safe, unless he could know where the majority would be. Here would be a precedent to tip down so many lords at a time, and to garboil the House, as often as any party should have a great majority. It was said on the other hand, here was a design to put the nation into great disorder, and to bring the legality of a parliament into dispute. So it was carried to oblige them to ask pardon as delinquents; otherwise it was resolved to send them to the Tower. They refused to ask pardon; and so were sent thither. The earl of Salisbury was the first that was called on: for the duke of Buckingham went out of the House. He desired, he might have his servants to wait on him: and the first he named was his cook; which the king resented highly, as carrying in it an insinuation of the worst sort. The earl of Shaftsbury made the same demand. But the lord Wharton did not ask for his cook. The duke of Buckingham came in next day; and was sent after them to the Tower. And they were ordered to continue prisoners during the pleasure of the House, or during the king’s pleasure. They were much visited. So to check that, though no complaint was made of their behaviour, they were made close prisoners, not to be visited without leave from the king, or the House; and particular observations were made of all those that asked leave. This was much cried out on; and the earl of Danby’s long imprisonment afterwards, was thought a just retaliation for the violence with which he drove this on. Three of the lords lay in the Tower for some months; but they were set at liberty upon their petitioning the king. Lord Shaftsbury would not petition; but he moved in the King’s bench that he might be discharged. The king’s justice, he said, was to be dispensed in that court. The court said, he was committed by an order from the House of Lords, which was a court superior to them. So they could take no cognizance of the matter. Lord Danby censured this motion highly, as done in contempt of the House of Lords; and said, he would make use of it against him next session of parliament. Yet he was often forced to make the same motion at that bar; and he complained of the injustice of the court for refusing to bail or discharge him, though in that they followed the precedent, which at this time was directed by himself.” Burnet.

“That which most interrupted the proceedings in both Houses, was an important question, ‘Whether they were any longer a legal body? and, Whether their long prorogation were not, in its true effect, a dissolution of them?’ This contest was highest in the House of Lords, where the duke of Buckingham stood up first, and argued with great appearance of reason, and with greater wit, That according to the law and constitution of parliaments, an unprecedented prorogation was null, and consequently the parliament was in truth dissolved; offering to maintain it to the face of all the judges, and desiring (as is usual in such cases)

'majesty's pleasure, and the pleasure of this House, for high contempts committed against this House; and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf. J. Browne Cl. Parl.' 'To the Constable of the Tower,' &c.

that they might give their opinion in it: But this motion relished so ill with the Lords that were in the ministry, that one of them moved that the duke, for that Speech, might be called to the bar. The earl of Shaftsbury opposed this motion, as improper and extravagant; and did with courage, and sharpness of application, second and enforce the duke of Buckingham's argument: and the earl of Salisbury and the lord Wharton fell in boldly on the same side: But the majority were so warm upon them, that they were all sent prisoners to the Tower for contempt of the authority and being of the present parliament, and were to remain there during his majesty's and the House's pleasure. The same matter was debated in the House of Commons, and there too the majority resolved not to be dissolved; yet they committed none of their members for arguing the contrary. It was indeed no wonder that both Houses should agree in their own preservation and continuance: for the great Lords in the ministry could not bear to think of parting with a parliament which they had been at a prodigious expence to keep in a giving humour; and they had indeed managed them so well, that they had given the king more money than ever had been granted in a parliamentary way to all the kings of England from William the Norman to the Union of the two kingdoms: And the major part of the Commons had as good reason to desire to keep their places in the House, that by offices or pensions were so beneficial to them, and which indeed had cost them a dear purchase; for upon the death of any of the old members, few or none had been chosen to succeed them without a prodigious expence; which must have been as great a folly in them as it was a shame to the nation, if they had not known how by their votes and engagements to reimburse themselves. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Salisbury, and the lord Wharton, petitioned the king, and were discharged; but the lord Shaftsbury was kept 13 months in prison; and for not complying with a formal recantation of his speech, all his petitions were rejected: when finding it in vain to apply longer to his majesty, he had recourse to the King's Bench, whither he was brought by a Habeas Corpus on the 27th of January next ensuing, where Mr. Williams, Mr. Wallop, and Mr. Smith, his council, argued that the Court ought to relieve him; and the earl spoke himself with great reason and eloquence for the liberty of the subject and his own discharge: yet the judges denied him redress, one of them declaring before the cause was heard, 'That the Court could not help him;' and being absent when it came to a hearing, deputed judge Jones to speak for him, that the Bench might be unanimous. So the Earl was remanded to

The earl of Shaftsbury's counsel prayed that the Return might be fiat, and it was so, and Friday following appointed for debating the sufficiency of the Return, and in the meantime directions were given to his counsel to attend prison, and staid there till another session of parliament, when his application to an inferior Court was voted a breach of privilege by the Lords, for which the Earl was to answer his contempt at the bar of the House. On the 22d of February he was accordingly brought to the bar, where he offered to acknowledge his asserting the dissolution of the parliament to be an unadvised action, and to beg their lordship's pardon for his offence in bringing his Habeas Corpus. The Lord Treasurer produced a paper which one Blaney had delivered him, pretending to give information of some words spoken by the lord Shaftsbury in the Court of King's Bench: yet Blaney being called into the House, could not affirm that what was written in that paper was really spoken by the Earl: Upon which the Lord Treasurer dropped the matter, and the House proceeded to a resolution, That the lord Shaftsbury should make his submission and acknowledgment in a form prescribed by that House. And accordingly a declaration was prepared much to the same effect with what the Earl himself had before offered. The Lord Chancellor read the words to him, and the lord Shaftsbury kneeling repeated them at the bar, and then withdrew. So the House ordered the Lords with white staffs to acquaint his majesty, that they had received satisfaction from the earl of Shaftsbury in the matter of the Habeas Corpus, and the other contempt, and prayed him to discharge the Earl from his confinement; which was done." Kennet.

Roger North gives what he calls "The Point stated on the Faction's side, and the same answered."

"As to the question, raised upon the essence of the parliament, with the Tricium in lege, the Faction had found out, to shew that it was legally dissolved; it stood thus: By the statute of 4 Edw. 3, cap. 14, it is enacted, 'That a parliament shall be holden every year, and more often, if need be.' Then follows the statute of 36 Edw. 3, cap. 10, for maintenance of the said Articles and statutes, and redress of diverse mischiefs and grievances, which daily happen, 'That a parliament should be holden every year, as another time was ordained by statute.' It fell out that the prorogation, last mentioned, was for a longer time than a year, viz. fifteen months. Now, said they, if the king be obliged to hold a parliament every year, a parliament ought to sit, at least (or rather to be new summoned) every year, which being made impossible by that prorogation, the prorogation itself is against those laws, and, consequently, void. Then the parliament seems without day, which is a discontinuance, and the Judges and Attorney-General, with their exceptions to the return, and my Lord was remanded until that day; and it was said, that though the return was filed, the Court could remand or commit him to the Marshalsea at their election.

amounts to a legal dissolution. So stood the point, such as it was, on that side.

"The Answers were, that those acts have not been so understood, nor hath the usage been to regulate the holding of parliaments, upon that foot, ever since the laws were made; and it is a rule of law, that ancient Statutes are to be construed by the general usage. That the words, 'if need be,' go as well to the holding every year, as to the more often; and, repeated them accordingly, it runs thus: 'A parliament shall be holden every year, if need be, or more often, if need be;' and the king is judge of the need. That it is ridiculous to say the parliament is sine Die, when a day stands appointed by the prorogation. And, if the king were by law obliged to hold a parliament every year, and doth it not, but seldomer; it may be construed a misgovernment, or grievance, to be redressed in the ordinary way, by petition, but not to vacate future parliaments, and their acts. And, farther, (what is not argumentative, but express) the time of parliamentary vacation is altered by latter laws; as that called the Triennial Act, Temp. Car. 1, and 16 Car. 2, which repeals the other. It is thereby enacted, 'That, hereafter, the sitting and holding of parliaments shall not be intermitted, or deferred, above three years;' which amounts to an allowance of a vacation not exceeding three years. That parliament had then been continued above four years: And this question, if it should turn upon the reasoning on the other side, would avoid all the acts of parliament made after the year expired; which would make strange work with the laws of this and other parliaments. Therefore the exception shews more of impudence in moving it, than reason for any scruple." Examen, p. 65.

He then proceeds as usual to rail against Kennet, of whose account he says:

"There needs only a perusal of this choice passage, out of a Compleat History, to frame an idea of the whole work. It is all he says observable in this whole business; touching which, he brazenly sides with a rabble-backed faction, against the whole legislative power; saying all the evil he can imagine, without any authority or warrant. One would think he had the accounts of the secret service by him, or that he wrote in a saint-like age, when no officer or pensioner appeared within St. Stephen's walls, or when no persons sold themselves to their shirts in competitions to be chosen. All he says here, in a libellous sense, may, in some measure, fit every parliament; so that whoso will cast a stone at the best of them may use it accordingly. But it is his

On Friday the Earl was brought into Court again, and his counsel argued the insufficiency of the return.

Williams said, That the cause was of great consequence, in regard that the king was way, to take all occasions to improve calumny. If his relation, here given, be attentively considered, it will appear, that, as in matters of greater moment, so here, one cannot gather from him any thing of the merits of the cause, or what shape it had, whereby to form a judgment; but, instead of the matter of fact (as one would expect) he glances forth his false colours. What fact he is pleased to deal out, is only in scraps, just enough to stick his slanders upon, and if those would subsist, (any more than form) without matter, we should have none at all.

"As here again: 'The duke of Bucks argued with great appearance of reason, and greater wit,—desiring (as in such cases is usual) that the judges might give their opinions, and offered to maintain it against them.' His grace had a great mind to banter the twelve judges. But, in earnest should we not conclude the duke in the right, when they would not accept his challenge? The case must needs be obviously clear in law; and there is the cause now, why the author mentions this provocation to the judges, saying, it is usual, &c. Now he doth not know or knavishly conceals, that the judges in parliament have a standing declinatory upon record, which serves to screen them from interposing their opinions in matters of government, such as is the being of the parliament. In old time, upon the like question put to them, it was answered, that such matters were above their knowledge. And ever since it hath not been usual (though the author ignorantly, as I take it, affirms the contrary) to put questions of state to the judges. So what becomes of his grace's improper defy to them?

"But the author says, 'The motion relished so ill with the ministry, that one of them moved—to the bar.' I do not remember that the lord Fretchville, that my other libellous author says moved to the bar, or Tower, was a minister of state at that time. But, to shew an instance of the author's tacking the terms, used of late, to the affairs of that time, one of his libelling arts, I must tell him, that the word ministry was not then in use, but counsellors, or courtiers. For the king himself then took so much upon him, that the ministers had not that aggregate title, as if the government had been but a party, and the ministers swayed it as they were disposed to favour, or to frown. But, to go on: 'The earl of Shaftesbury opposed this, and did, with courage, and sharpness of application, second and enforce the duke of Bucks's motion, and the earl of Salisbury, and lord Wharton fell in boldly on the same side, but the majority'—Alack! to be oppressed with numbers, such champions, in touched in his prerogative; the subject was touched in his liberty, and this Court in its jurisdiction.

1st. The cause of commitment which is returned, is not sufficient, for the general allegation of high contempts is too uncertain, for such a cause, notwithstanding these shining colours given us here of—courage—sharp application,—fall in boldly! O, for a Tasso or Ariosto, to describe the battle, which ended in an Order of the House of Lords for the sending these four noble peers, advocates for the dissolution, to the Tower.

“Must not any one, that reads this, knowing no better, conclude, as if it were plainly expressed, that these noble patriot Lords moved a point of law, clear as the sun, on the side of the people, against this assembly, called a parliament; but that they were borne down by a majority, swayed by a corrupt ministry; and thereby a beggarly, bribed, and what is worse, dissolved parliament was kept on foot, to do the work of popery, and to enslave the nation? All which is both false and wicked libel. For, in truth, the parliament were as fierce, in all points of fears and jealousies, as the most suspicious would desire; and far enough from complying with the court, even in, what was about that time most pressed upon them, money; much less popery and slavery, which lie concealed under the author's handling of this mob-dissolution; for which he might have had more colour, if all the addresses, messages, and votes, were not, as they are, extant in print. But the true cause of this insult was, as I hinted, that the parliament, though averse enough to the court, could not be drawn to extremities, tending to pull the crown and monarchy piecemeal; but hitherto maintained its foundations with resolution. Methinks, a compleat historian might have found this, so apparent and demonstrated by what came after, and have alledged it, though couched, as only the insinuation of some people (forsooth) that he might be able, so far, to purge himself, as not concealing what all knowing people then were, and now are satisfied was the truth of the matter.

“But it is most remarkable, even to the degree of a jest, that, if any credit may be given to the letters of Mr. Coleman (of which afterwards) the whole popish interest was engaged, together with these patriots and their long train, in the good work of getting this parliament dissolved. The French were solicited to lend money on that account: and Coleman was so forward, as to have framed an instrument, in the nature of a declaration to be published for making known the king's reasons for so doing. And this was found among his papers, and published with his letters; a perusal of which will shew much of the factious exception to the parliament at that time. So strangely did papist and fanatic, or (as it stood then) the anti-court party, p—s in a quill; agreeing in all things that tended to create trouble and disturbances, and so to endanger the legal establishment of church and state in England. I do but touch the instances of this wonderful union, as they fell in my way, desiring they may be remembered when I come to that matter express; but here they sufficiently confute the author's invention of the papists hating this noble Earl. A new edition of his book would sell admirably, if, instead of Compleat History, it were titled, Lies wrote in Water Colours.

“After this commitment, the three Lords, Bucks, Salisbury, and Wharton, petitioned the king, with a recantation of this opinion touching the parliament's being dissolved, and were by his majesty discharged. But Shaftsbury, being a peer of more constancy, did petition indeed and more than once, but still without such a recantation of this opinion as was satisfactory, so he lay by it. Then, the parliament being adjourned (not prorogued) his lordship thought he had a fair opportunity to trouble the waters, and, perhaps, get his liberty, with a Salvo to his Dogma, which he laboured hard to preserve entire. He brought his Habeas Corpus returnable at the king's-bench, whereupon he was brought up, and the return was read, which was of the Order of the House of Lords for his commitment, viz. February 6, 1678.—“To be kept in safe custody during his majesty's pleasure, and the pleasure of the House, for high contempts and misdemeanors against the House.” There was a deal of arguing by the lawyers of factious practice one after another, to shew that his lordship ought to be discharged or bailed; and they were answered by Mr. attorney general, and others of the king's council, and at length the court gave their sentence, that his lordship ought to be remanded, and not bailed nor discharged. This was done seriatim with reasons, which, being shortly expressed by the Lord Chief Justice Rainsford, I will give them in his words, taken out of print, viz. “The court hath no jurisdiction of this cause: And therefore the form of the return is not considerable. We ought not to extend our jurisdiction beyond the due limits; And the actions of our predecessors will not warrant us in such an attempt. The consequence would be very mischievous, if this court should deliver a member of the House of Peers and Commons who is committed, for thereby the business of the parliament may be retarded. For, it may be, the commitment was for evil behaviour, or indecent reflections on other members, to the disturbance of the affairs of the parliament. The commitment, in this case, is not for safe custody, but he is in execution of the judgment given by the Lords for a contempt. Therefore, if he should be bailed, he would be delivered out of execution. For a contempt in Facie Curie, there is no other judgment or execution. Therefore he ought to be remanded. I give no opinion whether it would be otherwise in case of a prorogation.

"I need not stay to shew that difference, for it is a common notion in our law, that an adjournment is a continual session, and a prorogation a vacation of parliament. Now would it not be a jest, if Westminster-hall should, sitting the parliament, turn out their prisoners for breaches of privilege and contempts? Or to bail them under their noses? And then, to what trial? There is nothing so impudent and senseless, which that faction, and their learned counsel, would not urge to the courts of justice about that time, if it was set up by them, and was to serve any turn of theirs; of which among many, as may in course be produced, this is a clear instance. It was the case of a peer, head of a party ripe for clamour, else the pretence had been refuted upon the opening; but, for the cause afore hinted, the judges thought fit to give their judgments, seriatim, after solemn argument had. I guess the earl had more reach in this business than did appear, or any, out of his cabal, thought of. And that was to try the temper of the multitude that he was to work with, whether they would swallow nonsense or no. For if not, there was no good to be done with them at present; and the fire must be a little more exasperated, to work them up to a pitch. At present his lordship made the utmost of his point; I say his, because it was not doubted but he, with his council of party-legaleians, invented this question upon the parliament, and then, what was wanting, in law and common sense, was to be made good by party. But his lordship finding that few or none came over to his side, and he had no other expedient for his liberty, his great heart condescended to petition, and therein to recant in due form; and so, by the king's order, he was discharged. And there ended this Ignis fatuus, which made a great stir while it glared in our parliamentary horizon.

"But now right must be done to the author, who employs all his art, shuffling and cutting, to bring his peer off this business with honour, and to persuade his readers, that his lordship was all along in the right, and King, Lords, Commons, and Judges, all in the wrong, to oppress his lordship after this manner, as they did. We have not forgot what persecutions depended on the anger of the papists. This is a beginning, for he was kept prisoner, although by law he ought to have been bailed. And why? The author says 'the earl spoke himself with great reason and eloquence, for the liberty of the subject and his own discharge, yet'

It cannot be denied, but that the return of such a commitment, by any other Court, would be too general and uncertain, More. 803. Angl. wish was bailed on a return, 'quod commissus fuit per mandatum. N. Milit. Dni. Custod. Magn. Sigil. Angliam virtute ejuodem

—Note here the liberty of the subject is brought in neck and heels, as they say, that the earl might be popular, standing up for the rights of the people; although in all that which his lordship said at the hearing, there is nothing at all by him argued of the subject matter: so far from being an advocate at large for the liberty of the people, as here is counterfeited. But mark the emphasis of that 'yet—the judges denied him redress.' Duth not this say plainly the judges did him wrong; nay more, delivered up the liberty of the people, for which his lordship spoke so eloquently? Redress and wrong are relatives, and imply each other; the former is ever due because it supporteth the latter. Why could not the author have said what was true, viz. that the judges, upon full hearing, were of opinion that his lordship could not, in that case be bailed by law; with the short reason, that the cause was out of their jurisdiction? Or why did not he make use of the print to extract a short state from? He had it before him, or else he was poorly furnished with materials for a Compleat History. But with signal fraud, first he recommends the earl's speech, without a word of the matter, and then, 'yet, &c. Now, to shew he had the print by him, and that he has wilfully suppressed the truth here; observe the title page of the book, and you will find this expressed, viz. "—With a speech of the worthy earl, pleading his own cause, and the liberty of the subject." This very pathetic sentence the author has stole, and put in his book here, as I set them down before; which do vary only a little in the order of the words, but are the same conceit and sense exactly; that it might be moving in his History, as it was in the pamphlet's title page, coined for the selling design of the hawkers.

"But, after all, were not the judges corrupt? For the print, which the earl himself put out, says "justice Twisden was absent, but he desired justice Jones to declare, that his opinion was, that the party ought to be remanded." Now nothing is more usual than this course, in case of an absent judge, when the opinion is solemnly given; for the public satisfaction therein is greater. But says the author, 'one of them declaring, before the cause was heard, that the court could not help him.' If he had declared otherwise, he had been an Ignoramus. But observe the insinuation. I know not whether his mother wit helps him, or some extraordinary inspiration; but, it is certain, the scandal here is notably coached: For is it not strange a judge should give his sentence before he heard the cause? The papists had great power over him, to procure this preposterous judgment! Now, to solve the riddle of this, we must note a differ-

'contemptus in curia facti,' and in that Book, that divers other persons were bailed on such general returns, and the cases have been lately affirmed in Bushel's case,* reported by the late Lord Chief Justice Vaughan, where it is expressly said that such commitment and return being too general and uncertain, the Court cannot believe in an implicit manner, that in truth the commitment was for causes particular and sufficient.

Vaughan's Reports, 140, Accord. 2 Inst. 52, 53, and 55, and the 1 Rolls. 213, and though the commitment of the jurors was for acquitting Penn and Mead, 'contra plenam et manifestam evidentiā.' It was resolved to be too general, for the evidence ought to appear as certainly to the judge of the return, as it appears before the judge authorized to commit. Rush. case. 137.

Now, this commitment being by the House of Peers will make no difference; for in all cases where a matter comes in judgment before this Court, let the question be of what nature it will, the Court is obliged to declare the law, and that without distinction, whether once between a trial, and a case upon record. None can declare of the one antecedently, because none can say what may, or may not, be made the case, or fact, when proved. But the other is fixed, and cannot be diversified, and may be so plain (as it was here) that it shall be ridiculous to pretend to argue it. And, in matters so prefixed, it is common practice for judges to consult one another, or put the case at their hall table, and then declare in public, that their brothers, upon putting the case, were of that opinion. I am not sure the author thought right, but, it is plain, his malice lopes at a venture, and his ignorance is no check to it, and it is a sorry thing, for his sake, to make such trite distinctions as these. But I have no hopes he will walk steady, if any thing of law comes in his way: as here, he will have another fling at this judge Twisden.—

'And, being absent when it came to an hearing, he deputed judge Jones to speak for him, that the court should be unanimous.' And, so, the confederacy of the judges was fortified in giving a wrong judgment, or, as the author has it, Denial of Redress. How cleverly was it patched up by the seeming unanimity? Good lack, that the judge should be so concerned! If this be not popish hunting a peer to disgrace and ruin, what is so? But, I guess, the reputation of that excellent judge will remain candid in Westminster Hall; and the sentences of the law, as diverse will. I guess, be derived from under him, will illustrate his learning and justice, against the wicked endeavours, and slanderous pen, of this foul writer to the contrary." Examen, p. 69.

the question began in parliament or no. In the case of Geo. Binion in C. B. there was a long debate, Whether an original writ might be filed against a member of parliament, during the time of privilege: and it was urged, That it being during the session of parliament, the termination of the question did belong to the parliament: but it was resolved that an original might be filed; and Bridgman, then chief justice, said, that the Court was obliged to declare the law in all cases that came in judgment before them. II. 4, Ed. 4, Rut. 4, 7, 10, in Seacc. In debt by River v. Cousin, the defendant pleads that he was servant of a member of parliament, 'et ideo capi seu arrestari non debet,' and the Plaintiff prays judgment, and afterwards by advice of all the judges the judgment was entered. 'Videatur Baronibus, quod tale habetur Privilegium, quod Magnates,' &c. 'Et eorum familiares capi seu arrestari non debent, sed nullum habetur Privilegium, quod non debeat implicari, ideo respondeat outer.' So in Triviniard's case, a question of privilege was determined in this Court. Dyer 60 in 14 Ed. 3, in the case of sir John and sir Jeffry Stanton, which was cited in the case of the earl of Clarendon, and is entered in the Lords Journal.

An action for waste depended between them in the common-pleas, and the Court was divided, and the Record was certified into the House of Lords, and they gave direction that the judgment should be entered for the plaintiff; afterwards on a Writ of Error brought in this Court that judgment was reversed, notwithstanding the objection, that it was given by order of the House of Lords; for the Court was obliged to proceed according to the law in a matter that was before them in point of judgment. Not long since the earl of Bristol exhibited an Accusation against the earl of Clarendon to the House of Lords,* and it contained divers matters, whereof some did arise out of parliament, and it was referred to the judges to consider whether that procedure was parliamentary; and the 4th of July 1663, it was resolved by the judges, that the Lords ought not to proceed only upon an impeachment by the Commons, when the matters arise out of the House.

The construction of all acts of parliament are given to the courts of Westminster, and accordingly they are judges of the validity of acts of parliament, they have searched the rolls of parliament, Hub. 109. Lord Hunsdon's case, they have determined, whether the journal be a record, Hub. 110. When a point comes before them in judgment, they are not foreclosed by any act of the Lords, but ought to judge according to the law, by which the realm is governed, and not by the Lords: if it appears that an act of parliament be made by the king and Lords without the Commons, that act is Felo de se, and the Courts of Westminster ought to judge it void, 4 H. 7, 18 Hub.

111, and accordingly they ought to do, if this return contain in it that which is fatal to itself. It hath been a question often resolved in this Court when a Writ of Error in parliament shall be a Supersedeas, and this Court hath determined what shall be said to be a session of parliament, 1 H. 29, and if the law were otherwise there would be a failure of justice. If the parliament were dissolved, there would be no question but the prisoner should be discharged on a Habeas Corpus, and yet then the Court must examine the cause of commitment, and by consequence a matter parliamentary, and the Court may now have cognizance of the matter, as clearly as when the parliament is dissolved. The party would be without remedy for his liberty, if he could not find it here, for it is not sufficient for him to procure the Lords to determine their pleasure for his imprisonment, for before his enlargement he must have the pleasure of the king to be determined, and that ought to be in this Court, and therefore the prisoner ought first to resort hither.

Let us suppose (for it does not appear in the return, and the Court ought not to enquire of any matter out of it), that the supposed contempt was a thing done out of the House; it would be hard for this Court to remand him: suppose he were removed to a foreign prison, during the pleasure of the Lords: no doubt, but that would have been an illegal commitment against Magna Charta and the Petition: there the commitment would have been expressly illegal, and it may be this commitment may be no less; for if it had been expressly shewn, and if he be remanded, he is committed by this Court, who are to answer for his imprisonment.

But 2. The limitation of the imprisonment during the pleasures of the king and the house is illegal and uncertain; for since it ought to determine in two courts, it can have no certain period, a commitment until he shall be discharged by King's-Bench and Common Pleas is illegal; for the prisoner cannot apply himself in such a manner as to obtain his discharge. If a man be committed to further order, Coke saith, he is bailable presently, for that imports until he shall be delivered in good course of Law; and if this commitment have not that sense, it is illegal, for the pleasure of the king is that, which shall be determined according to law in his courts, as where the Stat. of Westminster, 1 chap. 15, declares that he is not replevisable, who is taken by command of the king; this does not extend to an extra-judicial command, but in his courts of justice, to which all matters of judicature are delegated and distributed. 2 Inst. 186 and 187.

Wallop, to the same purpose, cited Bushel's case, Vaughan, 137, that the return for high contempts was not sufficient, and the court that made the commitment in this case makes no difference in the case, for otherwise one may be imprisoned by the House of Peers unjustly; for a matter relievable here, and yet shall be without any manner of relief by such a return; for on supposition that this court ought not to meddle where the person is committed by the Peers, any person at any time and for any cause may be subject to a perpetual imprisonment at the pleasure of the Lords.

And the law is otherwise, for the House of Lords is the supreme court, yet their jurisdiction is limited by the common and statute-law, and their excises are examinable in this court; for there is a great difference between betwixt and excise in and of a court, between an erroneous proceeding with jurisdiction, which is void and a mere nullity, 4 H. 7. 18. 6. in the parliament the king would have one attainted of treason, and lose his lands, and the Lords assented, but nothing was said of the Commons; wherefore all the justices held clearly that it was no act, and he was restored to his land; and without doubt in the same case if the party had been imprisoned, the justices might have made the like resolution that he ought to have been discharged.

It is a solecism that a man shall be imprisoned by a limited jurisdiction, and it shall not be examinable, whether the cause were within the jurisdiction or not. If the Lords without the Commons should grant a tax, and one that refused to pay it should be imprisoned, the tax is void; but by a general commitment the party shall be remedyless, if so be the Lords should award a Capias for treason or felony.

By these instances it appears that their jurisdiction was restrained by the common-law, and it is also restrained by divers acts of parliament, 1 H. 4, c. 14, no appeals shall be made, or any ways pursued, or where a statute is made a power is implicitly given to this court, by the fundamental institution, which makes the judges expositors of act of parliament; and peradventure if all this case appeared upon the return, this might be a case in which they were restrained by the stat. 4 H. 8. c. 8. That all the suits, usements, and condemnations, &c. many time from henceforth, at any time to be put or had upon any members for any bill speaking or reasoning of any matters concerning the parliament to be commuted or treated of, shall be utterly void and of no effect; now it does not appear, but this is a correction and punishment imposed upon the earl, contrary to the statute. There is no question now made of the power of the Lords, but it is only urged that it is necessary for them to declare by virtue of what power they proceed, otherwise the liberty of every Englishman shall be subject to the Lords, whereof they may deprive any of them against an act of parliament, but no usage can justify such a proceeding. Elsemore's Case of the Post-Nati, 19.* The duke of Suffolk† was impeached by the Commons of high-treason, and misdemeanors, the Lords were in doubt whether they should proceed upon such a general impeachment to imprison the duke, and the advice of the judges being demanded, and their resolution given in the negative, the Lords were satisfied. This case is mentioned with design to shew the respect given to the judges, and that the judges have determined the highest matters in parliament. At a Conference held between the Lords and the Commons, 3d April, 4 Car. concerning the Right and Privilege of the Subject, it was declared and agreed, 'That no freeman ought to be committed or restrained by commitment of the king or privy-council, or any other (in which the House of Peers is included) unless some cause of commitment, restraint, or detainer be set forth, for which by law he ought to be committed, &c.'

Now if the king, who is the head of the parliament, nor the privy-council, which is a court of state, to which secrecy is so necessary, may not imprison without shewing cause, a fortiori, the Lords in parliament cannot, which are a court of law as well as a court of state, and therefore ought not to proceed in an illegal manner. It is true in 1 Rolls. 192. Rushworth's Case, Coke is of opinion that the privy-council may commit without shewing cause, but in his more mature age he was of another opinion, and accordingly the law is declared in the Petition of Right.

Smith argued to the same purpose, and said, A judge cannot make a judgment unless the fact appears to him, and on an Habeas Corpus, the judge can only take notice of the fact returned; it is lawful for any subject that finds himself aggrieved by any sentence or judgment to petition the king in an humble manner for redress, and where the subject is restrained of his liberty, the proper place for him to apply himself unto is this court, which hath the supreme power as to this purpose, over all courts, and an Habeas Corpus issuing hence, the king ought to have an account of his subject, Rolls. Hab. Corp. 64. Witherly's Case; and though the commitment be by the Lords, yet if it be illegal, this court is obliged to discharge the prisoner, as well as if he had been illegally imprisoned by any other court; the House of Peers is a high court, but the King's-bench hath ever been intrusted with the liberty of the subject, and if it were otherwise in case of imprisonment by the Peers, the power of the king was less absolute than the power of the Lords.

It does not appear but that this commitment was for breach of the privilege, but nevertheless if it were, this court might give relief, as appears in sir George Bigmore's case before cited, and Mich. 12 Ed. 4. Rut. 20. for the court which has power to judge what is privilege, has also power to judge what is contempt of privilege;* if the judges may judge of an act of parliament, a fortiori, they may judge of an Order of the Lords, 20 Edward Butcher's case, where he in reversion brought an action of waste and died before judgment, serve attention. After relating the transactions respecting the Five Members, and the answer of Charles the First, he proceeds:

"This gave them new offence and trouble, and if the king's counsel had had the courage to have insisted upon the matter of law, and the Lords would have given them reasonable countenance, they would have been much puzzled to have procured a resolution that would have served their purposes to all parts, and been content to have suspended their judgment, and so the king might have suspended his prosecution. For if the judges had been called to deliver their opinions in point of law, which they ought to have been, they could not have avoided the declaring, that by the known law which had been confessed in all times and ages, no privilege of parliament could extend in the case of treason; but that every parliament-man was then in the condition of every other subject, and to be proceeded against accordingly. In the next place, as they would never have ventured themselves upon the House of Peers under an impeachment, and thereby made them their judges, which indeed was incongruous, every subject being to be tried for his life per pares, vel per legem terræ, to both which the Lords and the impeachment were directly opposite; so they would less have trusted an indictment at law, and a well chosen sober jury, who had been bound to follow their evidence of fact, and were not judges of the law, which was severe in any conspiracy against the crown, or the persons of king or queen.

"But having shut the doors against any mention of law, they made no scruple of resolving and answering his majesty, 'that they were first to see the evidence he had to prove the guilt, before they could give any direction for the manner of the prosecution and proceeding,' which they grounded upon a maxim they had but lately established, though never till then heard of, 'that no member of parliament for what offence soever, could be arrested or proceeded against but by the consent of that House of which he was a member; and then they said they could not give or deny their consent by any other measure than the knowledge of the crime and proof, upon which such member stood accused.' Which conclusion had been reasonable had the premises been just; whereas the argument was to be inverted, that their consent was not to be asked, because they had no cognizance of the crime of which their members were accused, nor were judges whether their accusation were valid in law, or sufficiently proved in fact.

"It is not to be believed how many sober, well-minded men, who were real lovers of the peace of the kingdom, and had a full submission and reverence to the known laws, were

Lord Clarendon has in the 4th book of his History of the Rebellion, some observations upon this subject which may perhaps be found to deand his heirs brought an action for the same waste, and the king and the lords determined that it did lie, and commanded the judges to give judgment accordingly for the time to come; but by Ryley, 39, it appears that it is only an order of the king and the lords, and that was the cause the Judges conceived that they were not bound by it, but 39, 3, 13, and ever since have judged the contrary if it be admitted. For that for breach of privilege may commit, yet it ought to appear on the commitment that that was the cause, for otherwise they may be imposed upon and had their understandings confounded and so their wills perverted, by the mere mention of Privilege of Parliament; which instead of the plain and intelligible notion of it, was by the dexterity of those boute-fus and their under agents of the law, and the supine sottishness of the people, rendered such a mystery as could be only explained by themselves, and extended as far as they found necessary for their occasions, and was to be acknowledged a good reason for any thing that no other reason could be given for. 'We are,' say they, and have been always confessed, 'the only judges of our own privileges; and therefore whatsoever we declare to be our privilege, is such: otherwise whosoever determines that it is not so, makes himself judge of that whereof the cognisance only belongs to us.' And this sophistical riddle perplexed many, who, notwithstanding the desperate consequence they saw must result from such logic, taking the first proposition for true, which, being rightly understood, is so, have not been able to wind themselves out of the labyrinth of the conclusion: I say the proposition rightly understood: they are the only judges of their own privileges, that is, upon the breach of those privileges, which the law hath declared to be their own, and what punishment is to be inflicted upon such breach. But there can be no privilege, of which the law doth not take notice, and which is not pleadable by and at law.

'The truth and cleanness of this will best appear by instance: If I am arrested by process out of any court, I am to plead in the court, that I am a member of parliament, and that by the privilege of parliament my person ought to be free from arrests. Upon this plea the judge is bound to discharge me; and if he does not he is a criminal, as for any other trespass against the law: but the punishing the person who hath made this infringement is not within his power, but proper to that jurisdiction against which the contempt is; therefore that House of which I am a member, upon complaint made of such an arrest, usually sends for the persons culpable, the party at whose suit the arrest is made, and the officers which executed it, and commits them to prison till they make acknowledgment of their offence. But that House never sends, at least never did till this parliament, any order to the court out of which the process issued, to stay the proceed-called a breach, which is only a refusal to answer to a matter whereof the House of Lords is restrained to hold plea by the stat. of the 1st of Hen. 4, and for a contempt committed out of the House they cannot commit,* for the word appeal in the statute extends to all misdemeanors, as it was resolved by the judges in the earl of Clarendon's Case, July 1663. If the imprisonment be not lawful, the court cannot remand him to his wrongful imprisonment, for that would be an act of injustice, to imprison ings at law, because the privilege ought to be legally pleaded. So after the dissolution of parliament if I am arrested within the days of privilege, upon any plex of privilege the court discharges me, but then the party that arrests me escapes punishment till the next parliament, the judge having no more power to commit the man that sued or arrested me, than he hath to imprison a man for bringing an action at law, when he hath no good title; neither is he judge of the contempt.

'Again; If a man brings an information or an action of the case, for words spoken by me, and I plead that the words were spoken by me in parliament when I was a member there, and that it is against the privilege of parliament that I should be impleaded in any other place for the words I spoke there; I ought to be discharged from this action or information, because this privilege is known and pleaded at law, but that judge can neither punish nor examine the breach of privilege, nor censure the contempt. And this is the true and proper meaning of the old received axiom, that they are judges only of their own privileges.

'And indeed these two, of freedom from arrests for their persons (which originally hath not been of that latitude to make a parliament a sanctuary for bankrupts, where any person outlawed hath been declared incapable of being returned thither a member) and of liberty of speech, were accounted their chiefest privileges of parliament: For their other, of access to the king and correspondence by conference with the Lords, are rather of the essence of their councils, than privileges belonging to them. But that their being judges of their privileges should qualify them to make new privileges, or that their judgment should create them such, as it was a doctrine never before now heard of, so it could not but produce all those monstrous effects we have seen; when they have assumed to swallow all the rights and prerogatives of the crown, the liberties and lands of the church, the power and jurisdiction of the peers, in a word, the religion, laws and liberties of England, in the bottomless and insatiable gulph of their own privileges. And no doubt these invasions, on pretence of privilege, will hereafter be judged to have been the most unparalleled and capital breach of those privileges, that had ever yet been attempted.'

him, de novo Vaughan, 156. It does not appear whether the contempt was a voluntary act, or an opinion, or an inadvertency, and he has now suffered five months imprisonment already; false imprisonment is not only where the commitment is unjust, but where the imprisonment is too long, 2 Inst. 53. In this case if this court cannot give remedy, peradventure, the imprisonment shall be perpetual; for the king, as the law is now taken, may adjourn the parliament for 10 or 20 years.

But all this is said on supposition that this session has continuance. I conceive that by the king's giving his royal assent to several laws which have been enacted, the session is determined, and then their order for the imprisonment is also determined,* Brook parliament, 86. Every session in which the king signs bills is a day of itself, a session of itself, 1 Car. 1, 7 f. A special act is made, that the giving the royal assent to several bills, shall not determine the session. (It is true it is there said to be made for the avoiding all doubts.) In the stat. 16 Car. 1, there is a proviso to the same purpose, and also 12 Car. 1, 2; 22 and 23 Car. 2, 2, 1, 11, Ro. 2, No. 12.

By the opinion of Coke, 4 Inst. 27, the royal assent does not determine; but the authority on which he relies, does not warrant his opinion; for first in the parliament, Roll. 1 H. 7. it appears that the royal assent was given to the act, for the reversal of the attainder of the members of parliament, the same day it was given to the other bills; and the same year the same parliament assembled again, and then it is probable, that the members which had been attainted were present, and not before, 8 R. 2, No. 13, is only a judgment in case of Treason, by virtue of a power reserved to them on the statute, 25 Ed. 3, Rot. parl. 7 H. 4, No. 29, is not an act of parliament, 14 Ed. 3, N. 739. The act is first entered on the roll, but on condition the king will grant their other petitions; the inference my lord Coke makes, that the act for the attainder of queen Catherine, 33 H. 8, was passed before the determination of the session, yet it was on a judgment given against her by the commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, and the subsequent act is only an act of confirmation; but Coke ought to be excused, for all his notes and papers were taken from him, so that this book did not receive his last hand, but it is observable he was one of the members of parliament, 1 Car. 1, when the special act before-mentioned was made; and no instance can be given where an act was passed, and afterwards the parliament did proceed in that session, only where there was a precedent agreement between the king and the Houses; so I conclude that the order is determined with the session, and the earl of Shaftsbury ought to be discharged.

Eyres argued to the same effect; That the warrant is not sufficient, for it does not appear that it was made by the jurisdiction is desired in the House of Peers; for that is 'coram Rege in parlamento,' so that the king and the Commons are present in supposition of law, and the Writ of Error in parliament is 'Inspecto Recordo nos consilio et advisamento spiritualium et temporalium, et communitatum in parlamento predict existunt,' &c. it would not be difficult to prove that anciently the Commons did assist there, and now it shall be intended that they were present; for, there can be no averment against the record. The Lords do several acts as a distinct house, as the debating bills, the enquiring of breaches of privileges; and the warrant in this case being by the Lords spiritual and temporal, cannot be intended otherwise, but that it was done by them in their distinct capacity, and then the commitment being during the pleasure of the king and the House of Peers, it is manifest that the king is principal, and his pleasure ought to be determined in this Court.

If the lords should commit a great minister of state, whose advice is necessary for the king and the realm, it cannot be imagined that the king shall be without remedy for his subject, but that he may have him discharged by his writ out of this court.

This present recess is not ordinary adjournment; for it is entered in the journal that the parliament shall not be assembled at the day of adjournment, but adjourned or prorogued to another day, if the king do not signify his pleasure by proclamation.

Some other exceptions were made to the return.

1. That no commitment is returned, but only a warrant to the constable to receive him.

2. The Return does not answer the mandate of the writ; for that is to have the body of A. E. of S. and the return of the warrant is for the imprisonment of A. Ashley E. of S.

Serjeant Maynard argued to maintain the return; The House of Lords is the supreme court of the realm; it is true this court is superior to all courts of ordinary jurisdiction. If

* It might be worth while to endeavour to ascertain on what principle this doctrine and the correspondent practice rest. Note the diversity between proceedings of judicature and proceedings of legislation as to the effects wrought on them by determination of a session of parliament, which distinction is very well set forth by Mr. Percival in his able tract entitled 'A Review of the Arguments in favour of the continuance of Impeachments, notwithstanding a dissolution, &c.' mentioned in a note to vol. 2, p. 1416 of this Collection. On the point of the continuance of Impeachments, see in addition to the articles referred to in that Note, Mr. Selden's Speech cited in a Note to lord Clarendon's Case, ante, p. 351. See in Crosby's Case, A.D. 1771, the observations on sir Fletcher Norton's Paper Writing and on the omission of the addition of Speaker and on his Double Capacity.

† As to this matter, see Blackstone's Commentaries, Book 1, ch. 2, s. 7.

this commitment had been by any inferior court, it could not have been maintained: but the commitment is by a court that is not under the controul of this court; and that court is in law sitting at this time and therefore the expressing the contempt particularly, is a matter that continues in the deliberation of that court: it is true, this court ought to determine what the law is in every case that comes before them, and in this case the question is only whether this court can judge of a contempt committed in parliament during the same session of parliament, and discharge one committed for such contempt. When a question of privilege ariseth in an action depending in this court, the court may determine it; but now the question is, whether the Lords have capacity to determine their own privileges, and whether this court can controul their determination, and discharge during their session a Peer committed for contempt. The Judges have often demanded what the law is, and how a statute should be expounded of the lords in parliament, as on the statute of amendments, 40 Ed. 3. 34. 6. 8. Co. 157 158. a fortiori. The Court ought to demand their opinion, when a doubt ariseth on an order made by the House of Lords now sitting.

As to the determination of the imprisonment, doubtless the pleasure of the king is to be determined in the same court where the judgment was given.

As to the determination of the session, the opinion of Coke is good law, and the addition of provisoes in many acts is only in majorem cautelam.

Sir William Jones, (Att. Gen). To the same effect, as to the uncertainty of the commitment, it is to be considered that this case differs from all other cases in two circumstances. 1. The person which is committed is a member of the House by which he is committed (I do not take upon me to say that the case would be different if the person committed were not a peer). 2. The court that does commit is superior to this court, and therefore if the contempt had been particularly shewn, of what judgment soever this court should have been as to the contempt, yet they would not have discharged the earl, and thereby take upon them a jurisdiction over the House of Peers.

The judges in no age have taken upon them the judgment of what is 'Lex et consuetudo parliamenti;' but here the attempt is to engage the judges to give their opinion in a matter whereof they might have refused to have given it, if it had been demanded in parliament. It is true, if a writ be brought where privilege is pleaded, the court ought to judge of it as an incident to the suit whereof the court was possessed; but this will be no warrant for this court to assume a judgment of an original matter arising in parliament, and that which is said of the judges power to expound statutes, cannot be denied.

But it is not applicable to this case; by the same reason that this commitment is questioned every commitment of the House of Commons may be likewise questioned in this court. It is objected that there would be a failure of justice if the earl should not be discharged; but the contrary is true; for, if he be discharged; there would be a failure of justice for offences in parliament, and therefore the earl would be discharged from all manner of punishment for his offence, if he be discharged (for he must be discharged or remanded; for the court cannot bail but where they have jurisdiction of the matter), and so delivered out of the hands of the Lords, who only have power to punish him.

It is objected, that the contempt is not said to be committed in the House of Peers, but it may well be intended to be committed there; for it appears he is a member of that House, and that the contempt was against the House; and besides, there are contempts whereof they have cognizance, though they are committed out of the House. It is objected, that it is possible this contempt was committed before the general pardon; but surely such injustice shall not be supposed in the supreme court, and it may well be supposed to be committed during the session in which the commitment to prison was.

It would be great difficulty for the Lords to make their commitments so exact and particular, when they are employed in the arduous affairs of the realm; and it has been adjudged on a return out of Chancery of a commitment for a contempt against a decree, that it was good, and yet the decree was not shown.

The Limitation of the imprisonment is well, for if the king or the House determine their pleasure he shall be discharged, for then it is not the pleasure of both that he should be detained, and the addition of those words 'during the pleasure,' is no more than was before implied by the law; for if those words had been omitted, yet the king might have pardoned the contempt, if he had but expressed his pleasure under the broad seal. If a judgment be given in this court, that one shall be imprisoned during the king's pleasure; his pleasure ought to be determined by pardon, and not by any act of this court, so that the king would have no prejudice by the imprisonment of a great minister, because he could discharge him by a pardon. The double limitation is for the benefit of the prisoner, who ought not to complain of the duration of his imprisonment, since he has neglected to make application for his discharge in an orderly way.

I confess by the determination of the session, the orders made the same session are discharged, but I shall not affirm whether this present order will be discharged or no, because it is a judgment. But this is not the present case, for the session continues notwithstanding the royal assent given to several bills, according to the opinion of Coke, and all the judges. Hutton 61. 62. Every proviso in an act of parliament is not a determination of what was the law before: for they are often added for the satisfaction of those that are ignorant of the law.

Turner, (Solicitor Gen.) To the same effect, in the great case of Mr. Selden, 5 Car. 1. the warrant was for notable contempt committed against us and our government, and stirring up sedition: and although that be almost as general as that in our case, yet no objection was made to it for that clause in any of the arguments, Rushworth's Collections. 13, and 79, in the Appendix. But I agree that this return could not have been maintained if it were out of an inferior court, but during the session this court can take no cognizance of the matter, and the inconvenience would be great if the law were taken otherwise; for this court might judge one way, and the House of Peers another; which doubtless would not be for the advantage and benefit of the subject. For the avoiding of this mischief, it was agreed by the whole court in the case of Barnardiston and Soame, that the accord for the double return could not be brought in this court until the parliament had determined the right of election, lest there should be a difference between the judgments of the courts.

When a judgment of the Lords comes to this court, though it be of a reversal of a judgment of this court, the court is obliged to execute it; but their judgment was never examined or corrected here. In the case of the lord Hollis, it was resolved that this court had no jurisdiction of a misdemeanor committed in parliament; when the parliament is determined, the judges are the expositors of the acts, and are intrusted with the lives, liberties, and fortunes of the subject, and if the session were determined, the earl might apply himself to this court, for the subject shall not be without a place where he may resort for the recovery of his liberty, but this session is not determined: For the most part the royal assent is given the last day, as saith Plowden, Partridge's Case; yet the giving the royal assent does not make it the last day of parliament without a subsequent resolution or prerogative, and the court judicially takes notice of prorogation and adjournments of parliament. 'Cro. Jac. 111. Ford versus Huntten,' and by consequence no order is discontinued, but remains as if the parliament were actually assembled. Cro. Jac. 324. Sir Chr. Hauden's Case, so that the earl ought to apply himself to the Lords, who are his proper judges.

It ought to be observed, That this attempt is prime impressionis, and though imprisonment upon contempt hath been frequent by the one and the other House, till now no person ever sought enlargement here: The court was obliged in justice to grant the Habeas Corpus, but upon the whole matter being disclosed, it appears upon the return, that the cause belongs 'ad aliud examen;' they ought to remand the party.

As to the limitation of the imprisonment, the king may determine his pleasure by a pardon under the Great Seal of England, as in the case of Reinger and Flagossa, Plowden 20.

As to the exception that no commitment is returned, the constable can only shew what concerns himself, which is the warrant to him directed; and the writ does not require him to return any thing else.

As to your exception, that he is otherwise named in the commitment than in the writ: The writ requires to have the body of A. earl of 'S. quocunque nomine censeatur' in the commitment:

After this, my lord Shafisbury made a speech; the substance thereof followeth:

"My lords; I did not intend to have spoken one word in this business, but something hath been objected and laid to my charge by the king's counsel, Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor, that enforceth me to say something for your better satisfaction. They have told you that my counsel in their arguments said, that this court was greater than the House of Peers, which I dare to appeal to your lordships and the whole court, that it was never spoken by them, I am sure was not by any directions of mine. What is done by my counsel, and by me, is, that this is the most proper court to resort unto, where, the liberty of the subject is concerned. The Lords House is the supreme house of judicature in the kingdom; but yet there is a jurisdiction that the Lords House does not meddle with. The king's counsel hath mentioned, as a wonder, that a member of the Lords House should come hither to diminish the jurisdiction of the Lords. I acknowledge them to be superior to this, or any other court, to whom all appeals and writs of error are brought; and yet there are jurisdictions that they do not challenge, and which are not natural to them, or proper for them. They claim not to meddle in original causes, and so I might mention in other things; and I do not think it a kindness to any power or body of men, to give them such powers that are not natural or proper to their constitution. I do not think it a kindness to the Lords to make them absolute and above the law, for so I humbly conceive this must do, if it be adjudged that they by a general warrant, or without any particular cause assigned, do commit me, or any other man, to a perpetual and indefinite imprisonment: and, my lords, I am not so inconsiderable a person, but what you do in my case, must be law for every man in England.

"Mr. Attorney is pleased to say, I am a member of the Lords House, and to lay weight on the word member. It is very true, I am one of them, and no man hath a greater reverence or esteem for the Lords, than myself: but, my lords, I hope my being a peer, or a member of either House, shall not lose my being an Englishman, or make me to have less title to Magna Charta and the other laws of English liberty.

"My opinion is not with one of my counsel, who argued very learnedly, that the passing an act by the king's royal assent can make a sessions, because the usual proviso was not in it. It was without any instruction of mine to mention that point.

"The king's counsel tells your lordship of the laws and customs of parliament; and if this was so, I should submit: but this case of mine is prime impressionis, and is a new way, such as neither Mr. Attorney nor Mr. Solicitor can shew any precedent of, and I have no other remedy nor place to apply to than the way I take.

"Mr. Attorney confesseth that the king's pleasure may release me without the Lords. If so, this court is coram rege. This court is the proper place to determine the king's pleasure. This court will, and ought to judge of an act of parliament void, if it be against Magna Charta, much more may judge an order of the house, that is put in execution to deprive any subject of his liberty. And if this order of commitment be a judgment, as the king's counsel affirms, then it is out of the Lords hands, and properly before your Lordships, as much as the acts which were lately passed, which I presume you will not refuse to judge of, notwithstanding that the king's attorney general saith that this parliament is still in being. I take it something ill that Mr. Attorney tells me I might have applied elsewhere.

"My lords, I have not omitted what became my duty towards the king; for besides the oath of allegiance I took as a peer, or an Englishman, there is something in my breast that will never suffer me to depart from the duty and respect that I owe him; but I am here before him, he is always supposed to be here present, and he alloweth his subjects the law.

"My lords, they speak much of the custom of parliament; but I do affirm to you, there is no custom of parliament that ever their members were put out of their own power; and the inconveniences of it will be endless.

"Mr. Attorney was pleased easily to answer the objection of one of my counsel; if a great minister should be so committed, he hath the cure of a pardon, a prorogation, or a dissolution; but if the case should be put, why forty members, or a greater number, may not as well be taken away without remedy in any of the king's courts, he will not so easily answer; and if in this case there can be no relief, no man can foresee what will be hereafter.

"I desire your lordships well to consider what rule you make in my case, for it will be a precedent that in future ages may concern every man in England.

"My lords, Mr. Attorney saith you must either release or remand me; I differ from him in that opinion. I do not insist upon a release: I have been a prisoner above five months already, and come hither of necessity, having no other way to get my liberty, and therefore am very willing to tender your lordships bail, which are in or near the court, good as any are in England, either for their quality or estate, and I am ready to give any sum or number.

"My lords, this court being possessed of this business, I am now your prisoner."

The court delivered their Opinion seriatim.*

Sir Tho. Jones, Justice. Such a commitment by an ordinary Court of Justice, would have been ill and uncertain; but the cause is different when it comes before this High Court, to which so much respect has been paid by our predecessors, that they have deferred the determination of doubts conceived on an act of parliament, until they have received the advice of the Lords: and now, instead thereof, it is demanded of us to control the judgment of all the Peers, given on a member of their own House, and during the continuance of the same session. The cases where the Courts of Westminster have taken cognizance of privilege, differ from this case: for in those it was only an incident to the case before them, which was of their cognizance; but the direct point of the matter is now the judgment of the Lords.

The course of all Courts ought to be considered, for that is the law of the Court, Lane's Case, 2 Rest. and it has not been affirmed, That the usage of the House of Lords has used to express the matter more particularly on commitments for contempts, and therefore I shall take it to be according to the course of parliament. 4 Inst. 50. It is said that the judges are assistants to the Lords, to inform them of common law; but they ought not to judge of any law, custom, or usage of parliament.

The objection as to the continuance of the imprisonment, has received a plain answer, for it shall be determined by the pleasure of the king, or of the Lords: and if it were otherwise, yet the king could pardon the contempt under the great seal, or discharge the imprisonment under the privy seal.

I shall not say what would be the consequence (as to this imprisonment) if the session were determined†, for that is not the present case: but as the case is, the Court can neither bail nor discharge the Earl.

Wild, Justice. The return, no doubt, is illegal; but the question is a point of jurisdiction, Whether it may be examined here? This Court cannot meddle with the transactions of the most High Court of Peers in parliament during the session, which is not determined; and therefore the certainty or uncertainty of the return is not material, for it is not examinable here: but if the session had been determined, my opinion would be, that he ought to be discharged.

Rainsford, Chief Justice. This Court has no jurisdiction of the cause, and therefore the form of the return is not considerable. We ought not to extend our jurisdiction beyond its due limits, and the actions of our ancestors will not warrant us in such an attempt.

The consequence would be very mischievous if this Court should deliver a member of the House of Peers and Commons who are committed, for thereby the business of parliament may be retarded; for it may be the commitment was for evil behaviour, or indecent reflections on other members, to the disturbance of the affairs of parliament.

The commitment in this case is not for safe custody, but he is in execution of the judgment given by the Lords for the contempt; and therefore if he should be hailed, he would be delivered out of execution; for a contempt in facie curiæ there is no other judgment or execution.

This Court has no jurisdiction, and therefore he ought to be remanded. I deliver no opinion whether it would be otherwise in case of a prerogative.

Twisdén, Justice, was absent, but he desired justice Jones to declare that his opinion was, That the party ought to be remanded.

So the Earl was remanded to prison, and staid there 'till another session of parliament; when his application to an inferior Court was voted a breach of privilege by the Lords, for which the Earl was to answer his contempt at the bar of the House.

On the 22d of February he was accordingly brought to the bar, where he offered to acknowledge his asserting the dissolution of the parliament to be an unadvised action, and to beg their lordships pardon for his offence in bringing an Habeas Corpus.*

Upon which the House proceeded to a resolution, That the lord Shaftsbury should make his submission and acknowledgment in a form prescribed by that House; and accordingly a declaration was prepared for that purpose. The Lord Chancellor read the words to him, and the lord Shaftsbury, kneeling, repeated them at the bar, and then withdrew. So the House ordered the Lords with white staves to acquaint his majesty, That they had received satisfaction from the earl of Shaftsbury, in the matter of the Habeas Corpus, and the other contempt, and prayed him to discharge the Earl from his confinement, which was done.

Mr. Hatsell has, in his valuable Work, vol. 2, Appendix, No. 5, collected the Entries concerning this business to be found in the written Journal of the Lords. Notwithstanding the Order of November 13th 1680, they are still legible, and are as follow :

February 15, 1677.

It was moved, That this House would consider, Whether this parliament be not dissolved.

solved, because the propagation of this parliament for 15 months is contrary to the statute of 4 Ed. 3, and 36 Ed. 3. And after debate thereof, the question being put, Whether this debate shall be laid aside, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The duke of Bucks, the earl of Sarum, the earl of Shaftsbury, and the lord Wharton were charged, for proposing, asserting, and maintaining that this parliament is dissolved.

It was moved, That the question might be put, for adjourning the debate of this business till to-morrow morning, at ten of the clock.

The question being put, Whether this question shall be put, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Then the question being put for adjourning the debate of this business till to-morrow morning, at ten a clock, it was resolved in the affirmative.

February 16, 1677.

The House, according to the resolution yesterday, resumed the debate, touching the charge of the duke of Bucks, earl of Sarum, earl of Shaftsbury, and the lord Wharton, for proposing, asserting, and maintaining that this parliament is dissolved. And for the method of proceeding in the business, it was moved that the said four Lords should withdraw. And after the said Lords had spoken in their defence, the earl of Sarum, earl of Shaftsbury, and the lord Wharton denied the charge; after debate the question being put, Whether the duke of Bucks, earl of Sarum, earl of Shaftsbury, and the lord Wharton shall withdraw, it was resolved in the affirmative. Upon this the aforesaid Lords withdrew; and the House took into consideration the nature of the offence of these Lords; and first concerning the duke of Bucks, upon debate, the House was of opinion, that he was guilty of proposing, asserting, and maintaining that this parliament is dissolved, and gave this Judgment upon him, that he should be brought to the bar of this House, and, upon his knees, should make his acknowledgment in these words, viz.

"I do acknowledge, that my endeavouring to maintain that this Parliament is dissolved, was an ill-advised action, for which I humbly beg the pardon of the King's Majesty, and of this most honourable House."

After this, the House commanding the gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to bring in the duke of Bucks to the bar, to receive this judgment, the gentleman Usher gave the House an account that he had sought for the duke of Bucks in all the rooms belonging to this House, but could not find him. And the House being informed that one Edward Cranfield did see the duke of Bucks go towards the water side, the House called the said Mr. Cranfield in, and upon his oath he declared he did see the duke of Bucks, about half an hour before, go towards the water side, but did not see him take water. The House took this as a great contempt, that he should thus absent himself without leave of the House, when he was to expect the pleasure of this House; and made this ensuing Order, viz.

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual, and temporal in parliament assembled, That the gentleman Usher of the Black Rod attending this House, shall forthwith attach the person of George duke of Bucks, and bring him in safe custody to the bar of this House, to-morrow, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf:

To the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod attending this House, his Deputy and Deputies; and to all Mayors, Justices, and other his Majesty's officers, to be aiding and assisting in the execution hereof.

Next the House took into consideration the offence of the earl of Sarum; and considering that his lordship before his withdrawing had denied, upon his honour, his asserting and maintaining that this parliament is dissolved, did order that the earl of Sarum shall be called to his place, and that the Lord Chancellor shall say to him as followeth:

"My Lord of Salisbury;

"Since your withdrawing, the House hath considered of your lordship's demeanor in this place; and, though they do not find that your lordship hath positively asserted, and maintained, that the parliament is dissolved, and therein give credit to your lordship's disclaimer upon your honour, yet they do observe your lordship did assert and maintain that this prorogation is illegal; at which the House have taken very great offence, and commanded me to reprehend your lordship for it; and to let you know they look upon it not only as an offence to the House, but a great offence against the king; and therefore they require your lordship to ask pardon of the king's majesty, and pardon of this House."

His lordship being in his place, the Lord Chancellor read the paper unto him, but his lordship refusing to make the said submission, he was commanded to withdraw; and then the House taking this as a contempt to his majesty and this House, ordered that he should be brought to the bar as a delinquent, and committed to the Tower of London during the pleasure of the king and this House; and accordingly his lordship was brought to the bar, and kneeled and received the said sentence.

After this the House took into consideration the offence of the earl of Shaftsbury; and upon debate, the House was of opinion that he was guilty of asserting and maintaining that this parliament is dissolved, and gave this judgment upon him: That he should be brought to the bar of this House, and upon his knees, should make his acknowledgment in these words, viz.

"I do acknowledge, that my endeavouring to maintain that this parliament is dissolved, was an ill-advised action, for which I humbly beg the pardon of the king's majesty, and of this most honourable House."

His lordship being accordingly brought to the bar, the Lord Chancellor having read the said acknowledgment to him, and required him to make it at the bar, which his lordship refused to do, thereupon he was commanded to withdraw; and then the House taking this as a contempt to his majesty and this House, ordered that he shall be brought to the bar as a delinquent, and committed to the Tower of London during the pleasure of the king and this House; and accordingly his lordship was brought to the bar, and kneeled, and received the said sentence.

Then the House took into consideration the offence of the lord Wharton; and considering that his lordship, before his withdrawing, had denied upon his honour his asserting and maintaining that this parliament is dissolved, did order that the lord Wharton shall be called to his place, and that the Lord Chancellor shall say to him as followeth:

"My lord Wharton,

"Since your withdrawing, the House hath considered of your lordship's demeanor in this place; and though they do not find that your lordship hath positively asserted and maintained, that this parliament is dissolved, and therein give credit to your lordship's disclaimer upon your honour, yet they do observe your lordship did assert and maintain that this prorogation is illegal; at which the House hath taken very great offence, and commanded me to reprehend your lordship for it, and to let you know they look upon it not only as an offence to the House, but a very great offence against the king; and therefore they require your lordship to ask pardon of the king's majesty, and pardon of this House."

His lordship being in his place, the Lord Chancellor read the said paper unto him; which submission his lordship not making, but saying that before his withdrawing he had begged pardon both of the king and the House, the Lord Chancellor said to his lordship, that he was required by the House to make that submission now; but the lord Wharton making still no answer but that he had already done it, was commanded to withdraw. And then the House, taking this as a contempt to his majesty and this House, ordered that he shall be brought to the bar as a delinquent, and committed to the Tower of London during the pleasure of the king and this House. And accordingly his lordship was brought to the bar, and kneeled and received the said sentence.

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the gentleman usher of the black rod attending this House, shall take into his custody the bodies of James earl of Salisbury, Anthony Ashley earl of Shaftsbury, and Philip lord Wharton, members of this House, and them in safety convey to the Tower of London, for their high contempts committed against this House, there to remain in safe custody during his majesty's pleasure, and the pleasure of this House.

To the gentleman usher of the black rod attending this House, his deputy and deputies.

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the constable of his majesty's Tower of London, his deputy or deputies, shall receive the bodies of James earl of Salisbury, Anthony Ashley earl of Shaftesbury, and Philip lord Wharton, members of this House, and keep them in safe custody within the said Tower, during his majesty's pleasure and the pleasure of this House, for their high contempts committed against this House; and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

To the constable of the Tower, his deputy and deputies, &c.

February. 1676.

The gentleman usher of the black rod gave the House this account, That, in pursuance of the Order of this House yesterday, he had, both last night and this morning, been at the house of the duke of Bucks, but he cannot find him; he came not home last night, and his servants know not where he is. Whereupon the House made this ensuing Order:

Whereas it was ordered yesterday, that the gentleman usher of the black rod should bring George duke of Bucks to the bar of this House in custody, who departed hence yesterday, in contempt of this high court: And whereas the said duke doth still abscond himself; and that the said gentleman usher informs this House, that the said duke is not to be found at his own house, nor came thither all the last night; and that he cannot learn where to find the said duke; it is therefore ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, That unless the said duke of Bucks shall render himself this morning (sitting the House of Peers) that his majesty be humbly desired by this House to issue out his royal proclamation for stopping all the ports, and for seizing and apprehending the person of the said duke wherever he shall be found, and him to bring before the House of Peers, if this session of parliament shall then be continuing; or otherwise to carry the said duke directly to the Tower of London, there to remain a prisoner, until he be from thence delivered by due course of law.

This day as the House was in business, the duke of Bucks came in, and went to his place; at which divers Lords called upon him to withdraw, which he did: Then the House commanded the gentleman usher of the black rod to bring the duke of Bucks to the bar, as a delinquent; which being done, the Lord Chancellor told him: My lord, I am to tell you in what condition your affairs stand here. My Lords find you highly guilty, in asserting that this parliament is dissolved, and very active in maintaining it; and have therefore ordered that you make this acknowledgment at the bar which I shall read unto you:

"I do acknowledge, that my endeavouring to maintain that this parliament is dissolved, was an ill-advised action; for which I humbly beg the pardon of the king's majesty, and of this most honourable House."

The duke of Bucks refusing to make the said acknowledgment, was commanded to withdraw; and then the House, taking this as a contempt to his majesty, and this House, ordered that he should be brought to the bar, as a delinquent, and committed to the Tower of London, during the pleasure of the king, and this House; and accordingly his lordship was brought to the bar, and kneeled, and received the said sentence.

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, that the gentleman usher of the black rod, attending this House, shall take into his custody the body of George duke of Bucks, a member of this House, and him in safe custody convey to the Tower of London, for his high contempt committed against this House, there to remain in safe custody during his majesty's pleasure, and the pleasure of this House.

To the gentleman usher of the black rod attending this House, his deputy and deputies.

Ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, that the constable of his majesty's Tower of London, his deputy and deputies, shall receive the body of George duke of Bucks, a member of this House, and keep him in safe custody, within the said Tower, during his majesty's pleasure, and the pleasure of this House, for his high contempt committed against this House, and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

To the Constable of the Tower his deputy and deputies, &c.

Whereas George duke of Bucks, James earl of Salisbury, Anthony Ashley earl of Shaftesbury, and Philip lord Wharton, stand committed prisoners to the Tower of London, by order of this House; it is this day further ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the constable of the said Tower, his deputy and deputies, do take care that the said Lords remaining prisoners, be kept severally and apart; and that they be not suffered to meet together (unless it be at church); and that no persons be suffered to visit them without the leave of this House, except their necessary servants and attendants: for which this shall be a sufficient warrant.

To the Constable of the Tower of London his deputy and deputies.

April 16, 1677

Upon reading the petition of Philip lord Wharton (now a prisoner in the Tower by order of this House) shewing that he is deeply sensible of the displeasure he is under; and prayeth, that, in regard of his bodily infirmities, and the affairs of his family, which suffer much by his imprisonment, he may have his writ granted him in such manner as this shall think fit; it is ordered, That this refers the petitioner to apply himself to his majesty, and humbly submit to what his majesty, in his good pleasure, shall think fit to do thereupon.

January 28, 1677.

The Lord Chancellor further acquainted the House, That three of those Lords, who stand committed to the Tower of London by this House, viz. the duke of Bucks, the earl of Salisbury, and the lord Wharton, have presented their humble petitions to his majesty, and therein have made their humble submission to his majesty, who thereupon hath been graciously pleased to release them, but conditionally that they make their submission to this House, when they shall be required.

Then a Petition was humbly presented to this House from the duke of Buckingham, which was read, as followeth :

To the right honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled.

The humble Petition of George duke of Buckingham, sheweth, That your Lordships having committed your petitioner prisoner to the Tower of London, because he did not obey your Lordships' order, and he hath suffered much by reason thereof.—In obedience therefore to your Lordships, he doth acknowledge, that his endeavouring to maintain that the parliament is dissolved, was an ill-advised action : for which he humbly begs the pardon of the king's majesty, and of this most honourable House; and prays, That your Lordships would be pleased to discharge him from the said commitment, and restore him to your Lordships' favour; and your petitioner shall pray, &c.

BUCKINGHAM.

The House being made acquainted that the duke of Bucks was not far off, if their Lordships would please to permit him to attend them presently; the House agreed to it.

The House being informed that the duke of Bucks attends without, to make what submission this House shall please to direct; the Lords ordered he should be brought in; and, being come to the bar, the lord chancellor told him, by directions of the House, as followeth,

"My Lord; My Lords have received your petition, and are well pleased to find your lordship disposed to give them the satisfaction they expected; the submission the House expect you should make, I shall read to you, as it is entered in the journal; which you are to declare at the bar: viz.

"I do acknowledge that my endeavouring to maintain that this parliament is dissolved, was an ill-advised action; for which I humbly beg the pardon of the king's majesty, and of this most honourable House."

The duke of Bucks having read the above said declaration at the bar, he came in, and was admitted to his place.

February 4, 1677.

It being signified to the House, that the earl of Salisbury was without to receive their Lordships' commands, and to do what their lordships shall direct for his submission; hereupon the House perusing the journal book, found that his lordship was required, the 16th of February, 1676, that he should ask pardon of his majesty, and this House, for asserting and maintaining that the prorogation of this parliament was illegal. The earl of Salisbury being directed to come to his place, the lord chancellor told him, that the House expected he should make the same submission as was formerly required of him. Whereupon the earl of Salisbury said, In obedience to your lordship's command, I do ask pardon of his majesty, and this House, for asserting and maintaining that the prorogation of this parliament was illegal.

The House being satisfied with this submission, his lordship sat in his place as a peer.

February 7, 1677.

It being signified to the House, that the lord Wharton was without, to receive their lordships commands, and to do what their lordships shall direct for submission; hereupon the House, perusing the Journal book, found that his lordship was required, the 16th of February, 1676, that he should ask pardon of his majesty, and this House, for asserting and maintaining that the prorogation was illegal. The lord Wharton being directed to come to his place, the Lord Chancellor told him, that the House expected he should make the same submission as was formerly required of him. Whereupon the lord Wharton said, In obedience to the commands of this House, I do ask the pardon of his majesty and this House for having offended them by what I unadvisedly said, concerning the illegality of the late prorogation.

February 20, 1677.

A Petition from the earl of Shaftesbury was presented to the House, and read, as followeth:

To the right honourable the Lords spiritual and temporal, in Parliament assembled :
The humble Petition of ANTHONY earl of SHAFTESBURY,

Sheweth; That your Petitioner, on the 16th of February, 1676, was committed prisoner to the Tower of London by your lordships, because he did not obey your lordships' order, where he hath continued under close confinement, to the great decay of his health; and danger of his life, as well as prejudice of his estate and family.—In all humble obedience, therefore, unto your lordships, he doth acknowledge, that his endeavouring to maintain that this Parliament is dissolved, was an ill-advised action, for which he humbly begs the pardon of the king's majesty, and of this most honourable House; and doth, in all humble duty and observance to your lordships, beseech you to believe, that he would not do any thing willingly to incur your displeasure.—Wherefore your petitioner, in all humble duty and obedience both unto his majesty and your lordships hath made his humble submission and acknowledgement, in his most humble petition unto the king's most sacred majesty, and is ready to make his farther submission and acknowledgement to his majesty, and to this honourable House, according to the directions thereof: and he doth most humbly implore your lordships, that you will be pleased to restore him into your favour, and discharge him from his imprisonment. And your petitioner, as in duty bound, shall, &c. SHAFTESBURY.

This being read, the Lord Chancellor did let the House know, that his majesty hath received a third petition from the earl of Shaftesbury, more submissive in form than the two first; but his majesty, understanding that the earl of Shaftesbury hath endeavoured to free himself from the censure of this House, by appealing to the King's-bench, to have their judgment thereupon during the late adjournment, doth not think fit as yet to signify his pleasure as to his discharge, till this House hath taken that matter into consideration.

After a long debate hereof, the question was proposed, Whether an Address shall be now made to his majesty to discharge the earl of Shaftesbury from his imprisonment upon his petitions to his majesty, and to this House.

Then the question being put, Whether this question shall be put, it was resolved in the negative.

After this the House considered the matter of the earl of Shaftesbury's appealing from this House to the King's-bench, to be released by Habeas Corpus; and after debate, it is ordered, that the further debate of this business is adjourned till to-morrow morning; at which time the records of the court of King's-bench, touching the earl of Shaftesbury's business there, shall be brought into this House; and the judges are also to attend this House.

February 21, 1677.

This day the House resumed the debate concerning the earl of Shaftesbury's endeavouring to free himself from his commitment by this House, by a Habeas Corpus in the court of King's-bench; and for the better knowledge of the matter of fact, the records of the King's-bench were produced, by which it did appear, that two rules of that court were obtained upon the motion of the earl of Shaftesbury's counsel, in Trinity term, 1677; and the returns thereupon were read, by which it did appear that the earl of Shaftesbury was committed the 16th of February, 1676, by this House, for a contempt; and then the remittitur of the earl of Shaftesbury to the Tower was also read.

After this a petition of the earl of Shaftesbury was presented to this House, and read; wherein his lordship took notice of an order of this house of the 20th instant, for bringing the records of the court of King's-bench into this House, concerning the matter of the Habeas Corpus brought by him; that he takes himself to be greatly concerned, and to have a right to be present, and heard, when any debate of any new matter against him be entered upon; that he cannot pretend, but he may have erred for want of a precedent to guide him; and being deprived of the benefit of counsel, by reason of his close confinement, and being resolved not to do any thing willingly which might in the least offend his majesty, or their lordships, he humbly takes this opportunity to give further evidence thereof, by casting himself at their lordships' feet; and as he hath humbly begged the pardon of his majesty, so he begs also the pardon of this House, for having offended them in any thing whatsoever.

After a long debate hereof, the House made these resolutions following:

Resolved and declared, That it is a breach of the privilege of this House, for any Lord committed by this House to bring a Habeas Corpus in any inferior Court, to free himself from that imprisonment during the session of parliament.

Resolved, That the earl of Shaftesbury shall have liberty to make his full defence, notwithstanding the resolution and declaration aforesaid.

February 22, 1677.

The House taking into consideration, when the earl of Shaftesbury shall come to this House, and in what manner, and what shall be said unto him; it is ordered, That he shall be brought to the bar on Monday next, by the constable of the Tower, or his deputy; and then the Lord Chancellor shall say unto him to the same effect as his lordship was directed this day by the House.

Ordered, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled, That the constable of his majesty's Tower of London, or his deputy, be, and is hereby required to bring Anthony earl of Shaftesbury (now a prisoner in the said Tower, for his high contempt committed against this House) to the bar, on Monday the 23th day of this instant February, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, and there shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

To the constable of his majesty's Tower of London, his deputy and deputies, and every of them.

February 23, 1677.

The earl of Northton, constable of the Tower of London, acquainted the House, that in obedience to their lordship's order, he hath brought the earl of Shaftesbury, who is without, ready to receive their lordships' commands.

Upon this the Lord Chancellor desired to know the pleasure of the House, what he shall say to the earl of Shaftsbury, when he comes to the bar; which words were written down, and being read, were approved of.

Then it was moved, that the earl of Shaftsbury might answer (as an aggravation of his offence) for some words which he spake in the Court of King's Bench, when he appeared upon his Habeas Corpus, which was conceived to be contrary to the privilege of this House; and that witnesses might be heard to prove the same, before the earl of Shaftsbury be called to the bar: but this was left to be as it is, until the earl of Shaftsbury had been called to the bar, and his answer received to what he stands already charged with.

The earl of Shaftsbury being brought to the bar, and having kneeled, the Lord Chancellor said to him as was afore directed by the House; viz.

“My Lord of Shaftsbury;

“The Lords have received a petition from your lordship, taking notice of the contempt for which you are committed by this House together with your submission to the judgment of this House: and while the Lords were taking into consideration that petition, there were brought before this House some records of the King's Bench, whereby it appears that your lordship endeavoured, by Habeas Corpus, to free yourself by the judgment of that inferior Court, from the censure of this. I am to acquaint your lordship, that this House has resolved and declared, that for any Lord committed by this House, to bring a Habeas Corpus in any inferior Court, to free himself from that commitment during the session of parliament, is a breach of the privilege of this House: but withal, their lordships have likewise resolved, that it shall be permitted to your lordship to make your full defence, notwithstanding the resolution and declaration aforesaid; and therefore I am commanded to ask your lordship, what you are pleased to say for yourself upon the whole matter.”

Whereupon the earl of Shaftsbury answered to this effect:

“My Lords;

“I have presumed to offer two petitions to this honourable House; the first your lordship mentions I do again here personally renew, humbly desiring that I may be admitted to make that submission and acknowledgment your lordships were pleased to order; and that after a twelvemonth's close imprisonment, to a man of my age and infirmities, your lordships would pardon the folly or inadvertence of any of my words or actions: and as to my second petition, I most humbly thank your lordships for acquainting me with your resolution and declaration in that point; and though liberty be in itself very desirable, and, as my physician (a very learned man) thought, absolutely necessary to the preservation of my life, yet I do profess to your lordships upon my honour, that I would have perished rather than have brought my Habeas Corpus, had I then apprehended, or been informed, that it had been a breach of the privilege of this honourable House. It is my duty, it is my interest, to support your privileges; I shall never oppose them. My lords, I do fully acquiesce in the resolution and declaration of this honourable House: I go not about to justify myself, but cast myself at your lordships' feet; acknowledge my error, and humbly beg your pardon, not only for having brought my Habeas Corpus, but for all other my words or actions, that were in pursuance thereof, and proceeding from the same error and mistake.”

Then his lordship withdrew; and after some debate the question proposed was, Whether witnesses shall be now called in.

The question being put, Whether this question shall be now put, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Then the question being put, Whether the witnesses shall be now called in, it was resolved in the affirmative.

There being a paper made mention of in the House, which was said to be a copy of what the earl of Shaftsbury said in the King's Bench, but not permitted to be read, Robert Blaney was called in, and sworn as a witness; who being asked, Whether he was present in the Court of King's Bench when the earl of Shaftsbury moved for his Habeas Corpus; and whether he heard all that the earl of Shaftsbury said there?

He answered to this effect, That he was present in the King's-bench when the earl of Shaftsbury was there, and he heard the most part what his lordship said, but he cannot tell now what he said, but he took some notes, and that afternoon compared notes with Mr. Rushworth, who also had taken notes; and thereupon they perfected a copy, which he gave to the lord treasurer. He also said, that he cannot for a thousand worlds say, that he heard all that is in the paper, nor he cannot now say what it was that he took, and what he had from Mr. Rushworth, it being so long since, by reason of the many interlineations made in the paper, by comparing notes with Mr. Rushworth.

Then the said Robert Blaney withdrew.

After this, the House agreed what acknowledgment the earl of Shaftsbury should make at the bar for his offences; which if his lordship should make, the House would then declare their satisfaction in his submission and acknowledgment; the Submission is as followeth:

“I do acknowledge that my endeavouring to maintain that the parliament is dissolved, was an ill-advised action, for which I humbly beg the pardon of the king's majesty, and of this most honourable House: And I do also acknowledge, that my bringing of an Habeas Corpus in the King's-bench, during this session, was a high violation of your lordships' privileges, and a great aggravation of my former offence. For all which I likewise most humbly beg the pardon of this most honourable House.*

The earl of Shaftesbury was brought again to the bar; and the lord chancellor told him, the Lords had prepared a particular acknowledgment, which the House expected he should make; and read the same to him: And then the earl of Shaftesbury made the said acknowledgment in these words; viz.

"I do acknowledge, that my endeavouring to maintain that the parliament is dissolved, was an ill-advised action, for which I humbly beg the pardon of the king's majesty, and of this most honourable House: And I do also acknowledge that my bringing of an Habeas Corpus, in the King's-bench, during this session, was a high violation of your lordships' privileges, and a great aggravation of my former offence. For all which I likewise most humbly beg the pardon of this most honourable House."

His lordship being again withdrawn;

It is ordered, that the Lords with the white staves now present, wait on his majesty, to give his majesty an account, that this House hath received satisfaction from the earl of Shaftesbury, in the matter of the Habeas Corpus, and the other contempt for which he stood imprisoned; and are humble suitors to his majesty, that he would be pleased to discharge him from his imprisonment: and that their lordships do acquaint the House to-morrow what they have done in this matter.

Ordered, That the earl of Shaftesbury be in the mean time remitted to the Tower.

February 26, 1677.

The lord treasurer reported to the House, that the Lords with white staves, according to the order of this House, have attended his majesty, to give his majesty an account, that this House hath received satisfaction from the earl of Shaftesbury in the matter of the Habeas Corpus, and the other contempt, for which he stood imprisoned; and are humble suitors to his majesty, that he will be pleased to discharge him from his imprisonment: to which his majesty was pleased to give this answer, That he will give order for the earl of Shaftesbury's discharge.

November 13, 1680.

Whereas the duke of Buckingham, earls of Salisbury and Shaftesbury, and the lord Wharton, were, contrary to the freedom of parliament, committed to prison, by order of the Lords' House, of the 15th of February, 1676; whereupon followed a series of many unprecedented proceedings, derogatory to the authority of parliament, and of evil example and precedent to posterity.

For vacating, making void, and destroying such precedents for ever, and in vindication of the authority and freedom of parliament, upon complaint hereof made, and due consideration and debate thereof by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled; it is ordered, decreed, and adjudged, That the said order and proceedings concerning the said Lords were unparliamentary, from the beginning, and in the whole progress thereof; and therefore are all ordered to be vacated (by virtue of this judgment) in the Journal books of this House, that the same, or any of them, may never be drawn into precedent for the future.

241. The Trial of PHILIP Earl of PEMBROKE and MONTGOMERY,* at Westminster, for the Murder of Nathanael Cony: 30 CHARLES II. A. D. 1678.

March 1, 1678.

A PETITION was presented to the House of Lords from the earl of Pembroke; which was read, as follows:

"To the right honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled: The humble Petition of Philip earl of Pembroke;

Sheweth: That an inquisition being lately taken, viz. the 11th day of this instant February, 1678, before the coroner of the county of Midd. upon view of the body of Nathaniel Cony, gentleman, deceased; your Petitioner is thereby charged with his death; and although he is well assured of his own innocency, yet he is grievously afflicted to lie and continue under so heinous an accusation, without help by such relief as appertains to the peers of this realm in time of parliament. Wherefore

* The following Entries respecting this lord Pembroke occur in the Lords' Journals of this year:

January 28, 1678. The Lord Chancellor told the House, "That as he had given them an account of the enlargement of some members of this House, he should now give them an account of the commitment of one of their members, which his majesty thought fit this House should be made acquainted with, because it was done in time of privilege; viz. the commitment of the earl of Pembroke to the Tower of London, for uttering such horrid and blasphemous words, and other actions proved upon oath, as are not fit to be repeated in any christian assembly."

January 29. A Petition was presented to the House, from the earl of Pembroke; which was read, as follows:

"To the right honourable the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled: The humble Petition of PHILIP earl of PEMBROKE and MONTGOMERY;

your Petitioner humbly beseecheth your lordships, that the said matter may be put into such a speedy way of Examination and Trial, as your lordships great wisdom shall think fit. And your Petitioner shall pray, &c.

PEMBROKE."

"Humbly sheweth; That your petitioner is a prisoner in the Tower of London, committed thither by warrant under the king's majesty's royal signature, expressing the cause to be for blasphemous words, which your petitioner doth from his soul detest and abhor; and since he hath been accused but by one person (to whom he intended no injury, nor was at that time in a condition of imposing on him), he hopes your lordships will not believe the accusation, or your petitioner to be capable of so horrid a crime; However, he is heartily sorry to have been thought in any sort to have offended: and his health being much impaired by his long restraint, he humbly implores pardon of God, of the king, and of this House: and that he may be released from his imprisonment, and attend his duty in parliament. And your petitioner shall pray, &c.

PEMBROKE."

The House, in the first place, to shew their great sense and abhorrency against Blasphemy, which is now grown so common, ordered, That a bill be brought into this House, for the severe punishment of all blasphemies for the time to come.

Then the House took consideration of the earl of Pembroke's Petition. And, after a serious debate thereof, it was moved, "That an humble Address should be made to his majesty;" a draught or form of which Address was offered to the House and read, viz.

"Upon hearing of the causes of the earl of Pembroke's imprisonment, which, by his majesty's direction, have been delivered to this House by the Lord Chancellor, and due consideration had of the proof against him by a single witness, together with the Petition of the earl of Pembroke, detesting the fact, whereof he stands charged by one witness only: It is resolved, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That an humble Address be made to his majesty, in the name of this House, to beseech his majesty, that the earl of Pembroke may be released from his imprisonment, and have leave to come to his place in parliament; and that, at the same time, his majesty may be also informed, That this House, in detestation of all crimes of this nature, have ordered a bill to be brought into their House, for the due and severe punishment of all blasphemies for the time to come."

The question being put, "Whether this Address, now read, shall be made to his majesty in behalf of the earl of Pembroke?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

The same day "An act for punishing of Atheism and Blasphemy," was read the first time.

Feb. 5. Upon reading the Petition of Philip Ricaut, esq. complaining, "That he being to visit a friend in the Strand last Saturday

Hereupon the House made the ensuing Order: viz.

"Upon reading the Petition of Philip earl of Pembroke; shewing, That, by an inquisition taken before the coroner of the county of Middlesex on the 11th of February last, the said in the evening, whilst he was at the door taking his leave, the earl of Pembroke coming by, came up to the door, and with his fist, without any provocation, struck the said Philip Ricaut such a blow upon the eye, as almost knocked it out; and afterwards knocked him down, and then fell upon him with such violence, that he almost stifled him with his gripes in the dirt; and likewise his lordship drew his sword, and was in danger of killing him, had he not slept into the house, and the door been shut upon him: The said Ricaut humbly begs that this House will be an asylum to him, and give him leave to proceed against the said earl of Pembroke as the law shall direct, that thereby he may have that security and satisfaction the law allows."

The Petitioner upon oath at the bar, averred the Petition to be true; and made a narrative of the whole business.

The House upon consideration thereof, ordered, That the said Philip earl of Pembroke shall give security by recognizance of 2,000*l.* to keep the peace towards the said Philip Ricaut, and all other his majesty's subjects.

The earl of Pembroke declared in the House, That he would waive his privilege, and answer any proceedings at law as the said Philip Ricaut shall bring in this case.

Then the earl of Pembroke entered into a recognizance before the Lords in parliament; viz.

Philippus comes de Pembroke recognovit
'se debere domino regi duo millia lib. lo-
'vari ex bonis, terris et catallis suis, ad
'usum domini regis.'

The condition of the abovesaid recognizance is, That if the said Philip earl of Pembroke shall keep the peace, towards the said Philip Ricaut and all others of his majesty's subjects, during the space of one year, then this recognizance to be void; otherwise to stand in full force and virtue.

This being done, the House caused the Petitioner to be called in; and the Lord Chancellor told him, That the earl of Pembroke had declared, that he will waive his privilege in this case; so he is at liberty to proceed at law if he think fit: As to the other part of his Petition, this House hath taken a course for the securing of his person during the time of his proceeding at law against his lordship; his lordship having entered into a recognizance to the king, of 2,000*l.* for the keeping of the peace towards him and all other of his majesty's subjects.

November 27. The House being informed of a quarrel which happened lately, between the earl of Pembroke and the earl of Dorset: It is ordered, That the gentleman usher of the black rod do give notice to the earl of Pemearl of Pembroke is charged with the death of Nathaniel Cony, gentleman, and praying that the said matter may be put into a speedy way of examination and trial: It is ordered, That it be, and is hereby, referred to the Lords committees appointed to consider of the privileges of the Peers of this realm, &c. to examine and consider what hath been done in the like cases, and what is fit to be done in this case; their lordships having power to send for the record of the coroner, and are to make report upon the whole matter."

March 2.

Ordered, That all the assistants now present, viz. the Lord Chief Justice of the court of Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron, baron Thurland, and his majesty's Attorney-General, do assist the Lords committees for privileges, in the consideration of the manner of the trial of the earl of Pembroke.

March 6.

The Lord Privy Seal reported, That the broke, that he attend this House presently; and that Mr. Lloyd and the footman be summoned to appear presently, to give this House an account hereof.

In the mean time, the earl of Dorset gave the House an account, That on Wednesday last, late at night, the earl of Pembroke sent one Mr. Lloyd who told him, That the earl of Pembroke desired him to speak with him, at Mr. Locket's house. The earl of Dorset asked, Whether the earl of Pembroke was sober? and was answered, Yes. And when his lordship came, he found the earl of Pembroke in a low room; who told him, That he had done him an injury; therefore he would fight him. The earl of Dorset asked him, Where, and when? The earl of Pembroke told him, Now, in this room; and then laid violent hands upon him. And the earl of Pembroke's footman took away his sword from his side; but Mr. Lloyd closed in, and parted them: And so his lordship got loose from him.

The earl of Pembroke being come, standing in his place; the Lord Chancellor told him what an account the earl of Dorset had given to the house.

The earl of Pembroke said, He remembered no such thing; but confessed he desired to speak with the earl of Dorset about business, but had no intent of fighting; and that the earl of Dorset had two men with him, and that his own servant took his sword away.

The House directed the earl of Dorset to relate again, in the presence of the earl of Pembroke, what passed between them. Then both these lords withdrew themselves. The House, taking this business into consideration, and how much the honour of this House was concerned therein, made these Orders follow—

—the better preservation of the peace, and preventing any mischief which may happen between the earl of Pembroke and the earl of Dorset: It is ordered, by the Lords spiritual Lords committees for privileges have debated and considered the case of the earl of Pembroke, to them referred; and, upon view of precedents, they are humbly of opinion, That the way for the said earl's trial ought to be by commission of Oyer and Terminer first issuing under the Great Seal to commissioners, before whom the said earl may be indicted, and the said indictment committed to a grand jury to be empannelled for that purpose; and if the indictment shall be found, that the whole record be returned into parliament in due form, and his majesty be desired to name a lord-high-steward for this time to be assigned, that the said earl may receive his trial in full parliament by all the peers; and that in order thereunto his majesty be forthwith desired by the House to issue such a commission of Oyer and Terminer.

Ordered, That this House agrees with the committee in this Report.

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and tempo-and temporal in parliament assembled, That the earl of Pembroke and the earl of Dorset be and are hereby confined to their respective houses or lodgings, till further order; and that they, or either of them, send not any message or write to the other during their confinement.

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That Mr. Lloyd an officer in sir Charles Wheeler's regiment, and the footman who waited on the earl of Pembroke, and the two footmen who waited on the earl of Dorset to Lockett's ordinary on Monday night last, and Robin the waiter at the said ordinary, be and are hereby required to appear at the bar of this House to-morrow, at o'clock in the forenoon.

Then the earl of Pembroke and the earl of Dorset were called again to their places. And the Lord Chancellor declared to them what the House had ordered; and laid on them the commands of the House, not to resent any thing further concerning this business.

November 28. This House being moved by the duke of Bucks on behalf of the earl of Pembroke and the earl of Dorset, now under confinement by order of this House, by reason of some difference between them, occasioned by the earl of Pembroke, who remembereth not what he did say or do to the earl of Dorset on Monday night last, but is very sorry for the provocation then offered, and prays that he may be discharged from the confinement he lies under, and have leave to retire to his house at Wilton:

The earl of Dorset also declaring that he is satisfied concerning this matter; and prays, that he may be no longer under confinement: It is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the confinement the earl of Dorset is under be taken off; and also the confinement under which the earl of Pembroke is, who hath hereby leave given him to retire himself to his house at Wilton.

in parliament assembled, That the Lords with white staves now present do attend his majesty, from this House, to present to his majesty the resolution this day passed in the case of the earl of Pembroke; and humbly to desire his majesty in the behalf of this House, That a commission of Oyer and Terminer be issued out accordingly.

The Lord Treasurer reported, "That himself and the other Lords with white staves according to the command of this House, attended his majesty yesterday, and presented to him the resolution passed in the case of the earl of Pembroke; and humbly desired his majesty, from this House, That a commission of Oyer and Terminer may be issued out. And his majesty was pleased to give order presently to his Attorney-General, to issue a commission of Oyer and Terminer accordingly."

March 19.

The Lord Chancellor acquainted the House, "That his majesty having issued out a commission of Oyer and Terminer, under the Great Seal, to commissioners before whom the earl of Pembroke might be tried, his lordship hath been indicted, and the said indictment committed to a grand jury, empannelled for that purpose, who hath found the said earl of Pembroke guilty of felony and murder. The record and whole proceedings thereupon is returned and brought into this House, by Writ of Certiorari, that so his lordship may receive his trial in full parliament by all his Peers. To that end, his majesty hath appointed a Lord High Steward for this time."

The House caused the Indictment and the Proceedings thereupon to be read; and made these Orders following:

"Whereas, by virtue of his majesty's Writ of Certiorari, the proceedings against Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, upon an indictment for the death of Nathaniel Cony, laid before the commissioners of Oyer and Terminer at Hiekes' Hall, in the county of Middlesex, upon which his lordship is found Guilty of felony and murder, are brought into this House, in order to the trial of the said Earl by all the Peers in full parliament: It is thereupon ordered, That the trial of the said Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery shall be had before the Peers in parliament on Thursday the 4th day of April next; and that, in order thereunto, it be, and is hereby, referred to the Committee for privileges, to consider of the several circumstances, ceremonies, and methods of proceedings, and summons of witnesses necessary to be thought on, in order to the said trial; and make report thereof to the House."

"Whereas, upon an indictment brought against Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, before the Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, his lordship is, by the grand jury before them empannelled, found guilty of felony and murder: the which proceedings being by his majesty's Writ of Certiorari brought into this High Court in due form: It appearing that the said earl of Pembroke and Montgomery is notwithstanding at large, and not under any restraint; it is thereupon ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the said Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery shall be, and is hereby, committed to the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod attending this Court, by him to be kept in safe custody till further order of this Court: And this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

"To Sir Edward Carteret Knight, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod attending this Court, his Deputy and Deputies, and every of them."

April 4.

The House, taking into consideration the formalities to be observed in the proceedings of the Trial of Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery in Westminster-Hall, agreed, that the Serjeant at Arms be continued in the House, to make proclamations. That, after proclamation is made for all persons to be uncovered, the Judges are not to be covered until the Lord High Steward ask leave of the House.

THE TRIAL.

ABOUT nine of the clock the Prisoner with his guard came from the Tower, with the ax before him, and went into the room appointed for him. Between the hours of eleven and twelve at noon, the Lords, Judges, and assistants of the House, came in order, two and two, from the House of Lords, to the Court erected in Westminster-Hall, with four maces before them, and before the Lord High-Steward four more, besides his own serjeant and purse-bearer, with Garter King at Arms, and the Deputy Black-rod bearing the white staff. After obeisance made to the throne, each Lord, and the others, took their places, the Serjeants, with their maces erect, kneeling, four on each side of the throne.

Then the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on the right hand, and the Clerk of the Crown in the King's-Bench on the left hand, making three reverences to the Lord High-Steward, came up to his seat, and there both kneeling, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery delivered the commission for the office of High-Steward, pro hac vice, to his grace, who delivered it to the Clerk of the Crown in the King's Bench to read, and then they both in the same manner went back to their seats at the table.

Then the Clerk of the Crown in the King's-Bench said as followeth:

Clerk of the Crown. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serjeant at Arms. O yes, O yes, O yes! My Lord High-Steward of England straitly chargeth and commandeth all manner of sons here assembled, to keep silence, and ear to his majesty's commission, unto my High-Steward his grace directed, upon pain of imprisonment.

Then all the Peers and Assistants standing up, and uncovered, he read the commission in hæc verba:

Clerk of the Crown. Carolus, &c.

Serjeant. God save the king.

Then Garter and the Usher that held the staff, making three reverences to his grace, Garter on his knees presented him the white staff, which his grace delivered to the Usher, who likewise kneeled to hold the same, during the rest of the ceremony.

Clerk of the Crown. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serjeant. My Lord High-Steward of England his grace straitly chargeth and commandeth all manner of persons here present, to be uncovered, upon pain and peril shall fall thereon.

Then the Clerk read the Certiorari to the Commissioners, before whom the Indictment was found, to return the same into the House of Lords with the return in hæc verba.

Clerk of the Crown. Carolus, &c. Virtute, &c. Serjeant at Arms, make proclamation.

Serjeant. O yes! Constable of the Tower of London, return thy precept and writ to thee directed, and bring forth thy prisoner Philip earl of Pembroke and Mountgomery, on pain and peril shall fall thereon.

The constable of the Tower of London being a peer, by sir John Robinson his Lieutenant returned his precept, and with the ax borne on his left hand, the edge from him, the earl of Pembroke was brought to the bar: the Lord High-Steward of England having then ordered the Judges to be covered, spake to the prisoner as followeth:

Lord High Steward. [Earl of Nottingham.] My lord of Pembroke, Your lordship is now brought before this great assembly in order to your trial, wherein you have to maintain all that can concern you in this world, your estate, your honour, and your life itself. There is no less a crime charged on you, than the murder of one of the king's subjects; and this is not charged on you by common voice and fame, nor by the growing rumour of the multitude, but by the grand inquest of this county, which was made up of gentlemen of good quality and consideration. Though all this amount to no more than a bare accusation, (for God forbid that they who neither did nor could hear the evidence on both sides, should any way prejudice your trial by their partial examination) yet hath produced the presentment of such a crime as is attended with extraordinary and unusual circumstances.

And now for this fact your lordship is to be tried in full parliament, and your arraignment is to be made as full and as solemnly as is possible. The king (who will have a strict account of the blood of the meanest of his subjects, by whomsoever it is shed) hath for this purpose appointed an high-steward: and now your lordship is to be tried not by a select number of Lords, but by the whole House of Peers, who are met together to make inquisition for this blood.

Doubtless the shame of being made a spectacle to such an assembly as this, and the having a man's faults and weaknesses exposed to the notice and observation of such a presence as this is, to a generous mind must needs be a penance worse than death itself; for he that outlives his own honour can have very little joy in whatsoever else he lives to possess.

In such a state and condition as this is, it will be very fit for your lordship to recollect yourself with all the care and caution you can; it will be necessary for you to make use of the best temper, and the best thoughts you have, when you come to make your defence; let not the disgrace of standing as a felon at the bar, too much deject you; no man's credit can fall so low but that if he bear his shame as he should do, and profit by it as he ought to do, it is in his own power to redeem his reputation. Therefore let no man despair, that desires and endeavours to recover himself again, much less let the terrors of justice affright you, for though your lordship have great cause to fear, yet whatever may be lawfully hoped for, your lordship may expect from the peers.

It is indeed just cause of dreadful apprehensions, when you consider how strict and impartial the judicature is which you stand before, and how impossible it is that any consideration of your lordship's relation or family, shall have any kind of ingreience into their lordships judgment; nay, you have cause to fear all this will make against you, when you consider how the quality of the offender doth aggravate the crime.

You have reason to fear and be dismayed again, when you consider how severe, and how inexorable the rule of law is, in the case of blood; and how certain it is that the Lords will make that rule of law the measure of your life or death: But yet, my lord, there are other considerations that may support you.

Your lordship may be sure that they will receive no proof against you, but direct and positive evidence; it will not be left to any proof, but such proof as by the manifest plainness of it deserves to be called evidence. In the next place, your lordship shall suffer no prejudice for want of counsel, for where there are any advantages that the law can give you, this court takes itself obliged in honour to put you in mind of it; nor can your lordship suffer an inconvenience, by having counsel to plead against you, for no arguments nor skill can pervert their lordships' justice; you shall not fall by the charms of eloquence; nothing shall load or press you but your own crime; and even that burden may be alleviated, if there be any room for an abatement, so far as it doth not contradict what they owe to the king, to themselves, to the law, and to the justice of the kingdom.

Hearken therefore (my lord) to your indictment.

* See the Notes to the Cases of Don Pantaleon Sa, supra, vol. 5. p. 460, and of Twyn p. 513, of this volume.

ment with patience and attention, give no interruption to the counsel or witnesses that speak against you, and reserve what you have to say for yourself 'till the time come, when your witnesses shall be examined, and you make your defence, of which I will give you notice. And this you may rely upon, that when you do come to speak for yourself, you shall be heard with as much favour and candor as the matter will bear; and when my Lords have heard all that can be said on both sides, doubtless their lordships will give such a judgment in the case, as is fit for you to receive, such a judgment as becomes this great court, and such a judgment as is suitable to that known equity, which their lordships do always observe in all their proceedings.

Lord High Steward. Read the Indictment to my Lord.

Clerk of the Crown. Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, hold up your hand.

Which he obeyed by holding up his right hand.*

* In the case of lord Mohun, (A. D. 1693, infra, the Lord High Steward (marquis of Carmarthen) addressing the prisoner before his arraignment, said, 'My lord Mohun; I am to let your lordship know you are not to hold up your hand upon your arraignment.' And the subsequent practice seems to have been agreeable to that direction. Lord Delamere, previously to his arraignment, (A. D. 1686, infra) thought it worth while to make a special application on this point. He asked, "whether a peer of England be obliged by the laws of this land to hold up his hand as a commoner must do." Upon which Jefferies the Lord High Steward said, "My Lords, this being a matter of the privilege of the peerage it is not fit for me to determine it one way or the other," [the trial was in the court of the High Steward] "but I think I may acquaint your lordships, that in point of law, if you are satisfied this is the person indicted, the holding or not holding up of the hand is but a formality, which does not signify much either way." See the Trials. The duke of Norfolk, ante, vol. 1, p. 959, The earl of Arundel, vol. 1, p. 1259, The earls of Essex and Southampton, vol. 1, p. 1336, The countess of Somerset, vol. 2, p. 954, The earl of Somerset, vol. 2, p. 967, held up their hands. It does not seem that lord Audley did so. See vol. 3, p. 408.

Blackstone says, "When the prisoner is brought to the bar, he is called upon by name to hold up his hand: which though it may seem a trifling circumstance, yet is of this importance, that by the holding up of his hand constat de persona, and he owns himself to be of that name by which he is called. [2. Hal. P. C. 219.] However it is not an indispensable ceremony; for, being calculated merely for the purpose of identifying the person, any other acknowledgment will answer the purpose as well: therefore, if the prisoner obstinately and contemptuously refuses to hold up his hand, Cl. of Cr. You stand indicted by the name of Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, late of the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, for that you not having the fear of God before your eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the Devil, the 4th of February, in the 30th year of the reign of our sovereign lord Charles the second, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. with force and arms, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, in and upon one Nathaniel Cony, gent. in the peace of God, and of our said sovereign lord the king, then and there being, feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice forethought did make an assault; and that you the said Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, with the right fist of you the said Philip, &c. the said Nathaniel Cony, in and upon the left part of the head of the said Nathaniel Cony, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice aforethought, did strike and bruise him the said Nathaniel Cony, with your right fist aforesaid, did beat and throw down to the ground; and that you the said Philip, &c. the said Nathaniel Cony so lying upon the ground, in and upon the head, neck, breast, belly, sides and back, of him the said Nathaniel Cony, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice before-thought did strike and kick, by reason of which said kicking and bruising of the said Nathaniel Cony on the said left part of the head of the said Nathaniel Cony with the said fist of you the said Philip, &c. and of the beating and throwing him to the ground aforesaid; and also by reason of kicking of the said Nathaniel Cony, with the said feet of you the said Philip, &c. on the head, neck, breast, belly, sides and back of the said Nathaniel, he the said Nathaniel Cony, from the aforesaid 4th of Feb. in the aforesaid year, to the 10th of the same month of February, in the parish aforesaid, did languish and languishing did live; on which said 10th day of February in the year aforesaid, he the said Nathaniel Cony, of the striking and bruising, beating and kicking died; and so you the said Philip, &c. the said Nathaniel Cony, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice forethought, did kill and murder, against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. How say you, Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Are you guilty of this felony and murder whereof you stand indicted, or not?

of Pemb. Not guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culpit, How will you be tried?

E. of Pemb. By my peers.

but confesses he is the person named, it is fully sufficient." [Raym. 408.] See more of this in Lilburne's case, ante, vol. 4, pp. 1388, 1389. See also Hawk. Pl. Cr. Book 2. c. 98, s. 2, and the Case of Lord Stafford, A. D. 1680, infra.

- Cl. of Cr. God send you a good deliverance. Serjeant at Arms make proclamation. -

Serj. O yes, if any one will give evidence for our sovereign lord the king against Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth and they shall be heard, for the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance.

Then sir William Dolben, knt. the king's serjeant at law, recorder of the city of London, opened the Indictment thus:

Sir William Dolben. May it please your grace my Lord High-Steward of England, and the rest of my noble lords:

Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery stands indicted, for that he, the 4th day of February last, in the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, of his malice forethought did make an assault upon one Nathaniel Cony, in God and the king's peace there being; and that he the said Philip earl, &c. with his right fist, on the left part of the head of the said Nathaniel, then and there feloniously did strike and bruise, and with his right fist aforesaid him did cast and throw down to the ground, and being so on the ground, with his feet did kick and strike, of which said striking, bruising and kicking, the said Nathaniel Cony, from the said 4th of Feb. to the 10th of Feb. following, did languish and then died: and so the jurors do upon their oaths say, That the said Philip earl of Pembroke, &c. the said Nathaniel Cony, at the parish and county aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice forethought, did murder against the king's peace, his crown and dignity. To this indictment the earl of Pembroke hath pleaded Not Guilty, and put himself upon his peers for his trial: We who are of counsel for the king, shall produce our evidence to confirm this accusation: with what it is, and of what nature, his majesty's Attorney-General will acquaint your grace, and the rest of you my noble lords.

Then sir William Jones, Attorney General (who being called by writ, as assistant to the House, was within the bar), opened the evidence to this effect:

Att. Gen. May it please your grace my lord high steward of England, and the rest of my noble lords; Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery stands here indicted for the murder of Nathaniel Cony: That my lord of Pembroke was the cause of his death, I humbly conceive, will need very little question before your lordships, for we have such proof that it was his hand threw him down, and his feet that trod upon him and kicked him, which was the cause of his death, that it cannot be denied: but whether or no this killing amount to murder, may be a matter of further controversy; and I hold it my duty to acquaint your grace and my lords, what the proof is, and then what we have to offer to prove it to be an offence even of this nature.

My lords, I know to maintain an indictment of murder, there must be a proof of malice; but the law is plain (your lordships know, and my lords the judges will tell it you) that there are two sorts of malice; the one is malice expressed, and that is when a man can be proved to have borne before-hand an ill-will and hatred to the person he killed; this sort of malice we pretend not to be in this case: but there is another sort of malice, which also in law gives the denomination of murder to the killing of a man, which is malice implied, when any one shall without any provocation given by the party slain, bring another by violence to his death: for our law supposeth, and that upon good ground, that no man without a provocation would kill his brother, unless he had malice to him before-hand; and that is the malice that falls out to be the ingredient of this case, for the poor unfortunate gentleman that was killed, did not for ought that did appear to me (and I have had all the proof given at the coroner's inquest under my examination), give the least provocation to this noble lord. Some have thought that a person might be guilty of malicious murder, though the party killed had given the murderer a blow; but I shall not contend for so strict a construction of a provocation, for there was not in this case a blow struck, nor was an angry word given: all that I can find came from Mr. Cony was, to complain that a friend of his that came into the company with him, was turned out of doors; and sure such a thing will never be taken to be a provocation, at leastwise such a one as will take away malice implied. I shall now (my lord) give your lordships an account of the nature of our evidence, as to the fact, and that (my lords) in short; for as I shall not use any aggravation above what the cause requires, so I shall not tire your grace and my lords with any long speech, but barely open the evidence, and tell you in short what will come in proof before you.

It was on Sunday the 3rd of February, that my lord of Pembroke and his company were drinking at the house of one Long in the Haymarket, (I am sorry to hear the day was no better employed by them) and it was the misfortune of this poor gentleman, together with one Mr. Goring, to come into this house to drink a bottle of wine; my lord of Pembroke saw them coming in, and knowing Mr. Cony, was very importunate with him to join company: he at first refused, because of his friend, and told his lordship they had business together; but no denial he would take, and so at last they did go into my lord's room. After some distance of time, when it was near 12 of the clock at night, there fell out a difference between my lord and Mr. Goring (the gentleman that came in with Mr. Cony), who, it seems, gave my lord of Pembroke some words which provoked him to express his distaste of them, by throwing a glass of wine in his face; which injury Mr. Goring so far resented, as that he was about to draw his sword, but was prevented by some of the company, and put out of the room to avoid further mischief. This gentleman Mr. Cony that was killed, was not at all concerned in the matter of the difference, but only desired to go out of the room, that he might look after his friend, who was thrust out of doors, he knew not why (without any provocation, as you will hear by and by). My lord of Pembroke falls upon him, strikes him with one blow to the ground, and when he was there trod upon him on his back, on his belly, on his side, and kicked him so that the poor gentleman fell into a swoon, and was after some time with some difficulty brought to himself again: After they had perceived there was life in him, they lifted him up, and laid him down on some chairs that were in the room, and thinking too much had been done by them already, they take their leaves of him, and commit him to the care of the drawer. He was not (as it should seem) so carefully attended by the drawer, whose ignorance could not look after him as his condition required, and so fell down off the chairs again divers times. After some time, early in the morning he was carried away in a sedan to his own lodging, and being there put to bed, as he grew a little more and more recovered out of his stupefaction, so he grew more and more in pain, and sent for doctors and chirurgeons to consult with, by whom he had all the means used that was possible to have saved his life, but it proved there was so much blood forced out of his veins, and gathered into one place of his body, by those blows and bruises, that he could not be recovered, and so after a week's time passed in intolerable pain, died: but yet all the time of his dying, and even constantly to his death, he did complain that it was my lord's bruises brought him into that condition. It will also be proved, that after his death, upon view of the body by the coroner and his jury, there was the appearances of those blows and abuses, by broad bruises in several parts of the body, and this some of the jury will testify. This in short is the matter of the evidence, which we shall briefly prove, and then submit it all to your lordship's judgment.

L. H. St. Call the witnesses together, and speak out, Mr. Attorney.

Att. Gen. Those we shall call first are Mr. Henry Goring, Mr. Richard Savage, Mr. John Shelly, and capt. Fitz-Patrick.

Cl. of Cr. The evidence which you and every one of you shall give for our sovereign lord the king, against Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, the prisoner at the bar, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth: So help you God.

L. H. St. Mr. Attorney, whom do you begin with?

Att. Gen. Mr. Henry Goring.

L. H. St. Stand forward, Goring.

Att. Gen. Pray, sir, acquaint my lords of the manner of your coming with Mr. Cony to Mr. Long's, and what happened there.

L. H. St. Sir, you must speak so loud that I may hear.

Goring. May it please your grace, Mr. Cony and I did on Sunday, the 3rd of Feb. last, dine in the city, we staid very late there, and I must ingenuously confess, we had drank more than was fit for us to have done; after that, if it please your grace, I offered to set down Mr. Cony at his lodgings, but he was so very ceremonious, that he would see me at home; it seems Long's house, the tavern in the Hay-Market, was in the way, and Mr. Cony would needs have us drink another bottle of wine ere we parted: It was late, and the door shut, but we knocking pretty hard for admittance, did get it opened, and as soon as the door was opened, Mr. Cony went towards the bar, and made some noise, being in drink; my lord of Pembroke was then in a low room in the house, and knowing Mr. Cony (as I thought), came and asked him if he would come in and drink with him; he replied, My lord, I am with a friend, and we have some business together: At length my lord asked me very civilly to come in, and we did after some time come in; and when we were in, my lord drank to me as I remember, and we stood round the table awhile, and at last sat down in some chairs, for we were not so much ourselves as to be able to stand all the while; then there was, it seems, some dispute between my lord of Pembroke and me, wherein my lord did conceive I had done him some injury, and threw a glass of wine in my face.

Att. Gen. What kind of discourse was that, pray, Sir?

Goring. Truly, may it please your grace, I cannot remember all the discourse, because I was so much in drink at that time; they say, it was about families and play, I cannot positively say what it was; but after my lord of Pembroke rose up to draw his sword, and I laid my hand on mine.

Att. Gen. Well, Sir; and what followed then?

Goring. Captain Savage stept in between my lord and me, and the drawer came bustling about, and took me and shoved me out of the room; while I was thrusting out I heard a noise behind me, and I saw my Lord make somewhat towards Mr. Cony; but more I cannot say what was done, because Mr. Savage was between my lord and me. When I was out of the room I found my sword gone, and my hat and periwig; I then made a noise at the door, and would not go away untill I had recovered my things; the man of the house was in bed, it seems, (for he was then undrest and in his night gown) came and asked me what was the matter? I told him, I had been in the room with my lord of Pembroke, where I had received some ill usage, and had lost my hat and periwig; and they had broken a piece of my sword, and had taken it from me, which I desired to have again; and, said I, Mr. Cony, I doubt, is in danger, for there is quarrelling within, and I desired to come in to see what they did with him.

Att. Gen. Well, Sir, when you came in, what then?

Goring. Upon this, the master of the house did desire me to go into a room, and a gentlewoman, his sister, as I after understood, did also press me to go into another room, and promised they would bring Mr. Cony to me ; upon which I went into a room thereby, but it was long before I heard from them ; and being under some impatience, they at last came and told me, Now, Sir, you may go in, if you please ; When I came in, I found a gentleman lying along upon the chairs, and nobody else in the room ; I began to be suspicious, for I was then as I thought somewhat soberer, that he had some wound, and took the candle and walked about him, and would fain have awakened him, but could not by all my endeavours ; the drawer told me, he was only dead drunk, and would in a little time come to himself ; upon which I desired them to lay some blankets upon him, and some pillows under him, and set some more chairs, to make the place broader, that he might not fall down, and I ordered the drawer to be sure to watch with him till he awaked, and make a good fire, which he promised to do.—The next day Mr. Cony sent to my lodging to come and see him ; but I did not that day, because I did go out early, and did not return till late ; but the very next day after (being Tuesday), when I came to him, Harry, said he, I was very much abused the other night in my Lord's company ; I am sorry for that, said I, with all my heart ; and asked him how he came to be abused ; My lord of Pembroke, said he, threw me down, and there somebody trod upon me and kicked me, and he shall know that he has abused me, and that I expect satisfaction for it. I hope you will let him know so much, and carry him a challenge from me. Mr. Cony, said I, who did tread upon you ? I know not, said he, for I was in a swoon ; either my lord of Pembroke, or some of his creatures for him. I never had the honour to know my lord of Pembroke before, nor above one or two of the gentlemen that were with him then in the company.

Att. Gen. Sir, had you any discourse with him afterwards ?

Goring. Yes, every day till Thursday at night.

Att. Gen. Did he complain of much pain ?

Goring. Yes, constantly in his belly, his sides, and his shoulders.

Att. Gen. What did he tell you was the cause of his death ?

Goring. He said it was my lord of Pembroke that had done him the injury in throwing him down ; who trod on him, or kicked him, he could not tell, but said, my Lord should answer for it, to him.

Att. Gen. Do you remember what part he complained of most ?

Goring. His belly.

Att. Gen. And what else ?

Goring. I think his sides and shoulders.

Att. Gen. What distance of time was it between your being thrust out of the room, and your coming in, and finding him upon the chairs.—Goring. About half an hour.

L. H. St. Mr. Goring, you say you saw no stroke given by my lord of Pembroke to Mr. Cony ?

Goring. No, truly, may it please your grace ; I saw my Lord make towards him, but Mr. Savage was between my lord and me, and I was put out of the room.

L. H. St. You did not hear Mr. Cony charge my Lord with kicking him, or stamping on him ?

Goring. He did not in my hearing charge him with stamping on him, but that he threw him down, and that then some one did kick him.

Att. Gen. My Lords, we have done with this witness.

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, will your lordship please to ask that witness that spoke last any questions, for now is your time ?

E. of P. No, my Lord.

Att. Gen. Then we desire Mr. Savage may be examined : Mr. Savage, pray do you acquaint his grace and my lords what you know of this business.

Savage. May it please your grace, I was in company with my Lord of Pembroke, at Mr. Long's house in the Hay-market, when Mr. Cony came in, and making a great noise at the bar, my Lord of Pembroke being in a lower room, looked out at the door, and seeing who it was, my Lord saluted him very kindly, and told him he was glad to see him, and desired him to walk into his room. Mr. Cony told him he had a friend at the door, and desired his lordship to admit him, which my Lord embraced very kindly : and then Mr. Cony goes to the door and calls Mr. Goring, desiring him to come in, and they came together into the room ; my Lord desired him to sit down and drink a glass of wine, which they did, and after some time falling into discourse, Mr. Goring began to make use of some impertinent language to my Lord, and amongst the rest told him he was as good, or a better gentleman than he was.

Att. Gen. Goring did ?

Savage. Yes, Goring did ; upon which my Lord threw a glass of wine in his face and immediately stepped back and drew his sword : Mr. Goring was going to draw, but I came up to him, and took his sword from him, and broke a piece of it, and upon my persuasion my Lord put up his sword again ; but for fear there might be more words, I took Mr. Goring in my arms, and shoved him out of the room : and whilst I was thrusting him out of doors, I heard a noise of a bustle behind me, and leaving the drawer to keep Mr. Goring out, I saw my Lord of Pembroke strike Cony with his right hand, who immediately fell down, and then gave him a kick ; and so upon that, finding him not stir, I took Mr. Cony, being on the ground (I and my Lord together, for I was not strong enough to do it myself) and laid him on the chairs, and covered him up warm, and so left him.

Att. Gen. You say, my Lord struck him a blow ?

Savage. Yes, he did strike him.

Att. Gen. On what part ?

Savage. I suppose on the face.

Att. Gen. You say, Sir, my Lord of Pembroke did kick him when he was upon the ground?—Savage. Yes.

Att. Gen. Did he kick him once or oftener?

Savage. But once, that I saw.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, on what part was it?

Savage. Somewhere on the body, but I cannot tell what part.

Att. Gen. With what force did his leg move?

Savage. Not with a very great force.

Att. Gen. How high was his leg lifted up?

Savage. He pushed his leg with a quick motion forward.

Att. Gen. When you took him up he was senseless, you say? Pray, Sir, how long was it ere he was brought to life again?

Savage. Two or three minutes.

Att. Gen. What means did you use to bring him to himself?

Savage. We chafed him over the temples, and such things.

Att. Gen. When he came to life again, did he speak?

Savage. He did open his eyes, but did not speak.

Att. Gen. What followed then?

Savage. We laid him upon some chairs atly, for his pulse was almost gone, that we could feel.

Att. Gen. Did his eyes continue open after he was revived?

Savage. Not long; for I asked him if he knew me, he seemed to shake his head, as if he did, and then closed his eyes again.

Att. Gen. Before that accident, what condition was he in? Was he able to talk?

Savage. He was very drunk, but he did say something.

Att. Gen. What discourse had he before he was struck down?

Savage. I cannot well remember, but I think he proposed play to my Lord.

Att. Gen. Why did my Lord strike Cony?

Savage. I cannot tell, I was then putting Goring out of the room, and hearing the noise of my Lord's motion towards Cony, I looked back and saw my Lord strike him.

Att. Gen. What language did he use to my Lord, to provoke him to it?

Savage. I cannot tell any at all.

Att. Gen. Did you see Mr. Cony after that time, and what did he then say to you?

Savage. I went two days afterwards to see Mr. Cony, who told me he was then in a pretty good condition. He asked me whether my Lord had struck him? I told him, Yes. Truly, said he, I did not know that my Lord had struck me, but finding myself so much in pain, I thought I had fallen, partly through my drink, and partly through my fits I used to have.

Att. Gen. We (my Lord) have now done with this witness.

L. H. St. My Lord of Pembroke, will you ask Mr. Savage any questions?

E. of P. No, my Lord.

L. H. St. Mr. Savage, I think you say you saw my Lord of Pembroke kick him once; in your judgement, was that kick of such force as to give any great bruise?

Savage. I did, my Lord, see him kick him once, but not with any great force, as I conceive.

L. H. St. You did not hear Mr. Cony complain my Lord had kicked him?

Savage. No; for, as I told your lordship, when I was to see him two days after, he asked me the question, and he said he did not know it before.

L. H. St. Mr. Attorney, pray go on with your witnesses.

Att. Gen. We shall next call Mr. John Shelly: Mr. Shelly, pray tell his grace and my Lords your knowledge in this untoward accident.

Shelly. May it please your grace, I was in the room at Long's, when Mr. Cony and Mr. Goring came in; they were both very far in drink, insomuch that Goring could hardly stand, but desired he might have leave to sit down, which he had: Mr. Goring in a little time proposeth play to my Lord, and my Lord told him, he would throw with him for 500*l.* and was sending away for the money; but then Mr. Goring would not play: I believe (said my Lord to him) you are an idle fellow, that you will propose these things and not pursue them: upon that Mr. Goring tells my Lord, his name was a better name than his lordship's, and he a better gentleman than my Lord: then my Lord takes some wine, and threw in his face; hereupon Mr. Goring steps back, and drew his sword, and my Lord did the same: captain Savage steps in between them, and keeps my Lord, while Goring was put out of the room: my Lord then desired Mr. Cony to go out with his friend: Said he, I do not know upon what account my friend is sent out; whereupon my Lord hit Cony a box on the ear, and that threw him down.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, before my Lord struck him, did not Cony give my Lord some ill language?

Shelly. He only said, as I told you before, I know not upon what account my friend is turned out of doors.

Att. Gen. Did you see my Lord strike him?

Shelly. Yes.

Att. Gen. Whereabouts?

Shelly. On the head, with his fist, or his hand.

Att. Gen. Did he fall at the first blow?

Shelly. Yes.

Att. Gen. Did he afterward say any thing?

Shelly. No.

Att. Gen. Did you see my lord kick him?

Shelly. No.

Att. Gen. Did you see my lord hold up his foot to do it?—Shelly. Yes.

Att. Gen. How high?

Shelly. A pretty height.

Att. Gen. Pray what became of the gentleman afterwards?

Shelly. They took him up in their arms, and laid him upon some chairs.

Att. Gen. Did you see him laid there?

Shelly. Yes.

Att. Gen. Was he senseless when he was taken up?—Shelly. Yes.

Att. Gen. What was the reason, do you think, that he did not open his eyes, and keep them open?

Shelly. Truly, I believe his drink, as well as the blows.

Att. Gen. The one as well as the other?

Shelly. Yes.

Att. Gen. What then did they do with him?

Shelly. They laid blankets upon him, and pillows under him, and laid him upon the chairs.

Att. Gen. How many chairs?

Shelly. As many as reached his length.

Att. Gen. Who did you leave him in charge withal?

Shelly. With the drawer.

Att. Gen. Did he speak between the time of his first fall, and your going away?

Shelly. No.

Att. Gen. Did you see him after?

Shelly. Yes, three days after.

Att. Gen. What did he then say to you?

Shelly. That he had a fit, but was pretty well recovered.

Att. Gen. When was it you saw him after that?

Shelly. On the Saturday after, and then he told me the same again.

L. H. St. Did he impute any thing to my lord of Pembroke?

Shelly. He said nothing at all to me of the ground of his illness, but that which I have told your grace.

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, will your lordship ask this witness any questions?

E. of P. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then we for the king desire to examine Mr. Fitz-Patrick. Captain Fitz-Patrick, pray tell my lord high-steward, and my lords the peers, what you know.

Fitz-Pat. My lord, I was in the room at Long's with my lord of Pembroke, and my lord was walking about the room, and he hears a noise without, and steps to the door, where opening the door half, he saw Mr. Cony at the bar, who was just come in, and seeing my lord, comes to salute him; my lord returning into the room, said to him, will you come in and join company? Mr. Cony answered, I have my friend here, my lord; and brings Mr. Goring to my lord, who saluted him kindly, and desired them both to walk in: Upon which all we that were in the room stood up, and the drawer gave them chairs; after the drinking about of a glass or two, Mr. Goring (both being drunk) said, amongst other discourse, I will drink, I will play, I will fight with any man. Who is this gentleman, said my lord of Pembroke, that I should never hear of, or know him? how, said Goring, (sblood) not hear of me? my name is Goring, a name and family as good as any gentleman's in England. There is nobody doubts it, said my lord. Your betters, said Goring; and then my lord threw the wine in his face; and Goring going to draw, was put out of the room by Mr. Savage, and my lord, upon some words from Cony, struck him down with his hand.

Att. Gen. What words were those?

Fitz-Pat. When I asked my lord the reason why he struck Cony, he told me, it was because Cony had told him Goring should not go out of the room till he knew the reason of it.

L. H. St. Did you hear him say so?

Fitz-Pat. No, not I; but my lord, upon my asking, gave that for the reason.

L. H. St. What was the reason?

Fitz-Pat. Because Mr. Cony told him, Goring should not go out of the room, till he knew some reason for it: after my lord had struck him, I was on the other side of the table, and could not see whether my lord did stamp on him, or kick him: but I saw my lord's knee stir, and if he did kick him, he kicked him but once, for we ran in and took him up to lay him upon the chairs, and taking his handkerchief out of his pocket to wipe his face, we plucked out of his pocket with it some false dice, which we afterwards put into the hands of Mr. Long, to prove that they intended and proposed play; and after we had laid him on the chairs, and wrapt him up warm, we left him.

Att. Gen. How was he after he was taken up?

Fitz-Pat. He opened his eyes, but being very drunk before, could not keep them open, but shut them again; and we made a bed for him on the chairs; and having wrapped him up warm, we left him, and ordered the drawer to make him a fire.

L. H. St. Did you hear him speak after he was up?

Fitz-Pat. No, my lord: Mr. Savage spoke to him, and asked him, if he knew him; he only looked on him, and by a turn of his head seemed to answer him yes.

L. H. St. On the oath you have taken, did you hear him speak to my lord of Pembroke at any time before he was struck?

Fitz-Pat. Yes, my lord, he had spoken before, and I saw his lips make a motion towards my lord, but what he said, I know no otherwise than as I said before.

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, will your lordship ask this witness any questions?

E. of P. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. We have now, my lord, done with the witnesses that were by when the fact was committed; by all whom your lordships hear, the blows were all given by my lord of Pembroke, and in their company; they are all gentlemen of quality, and therefore, I believe, speak the truth: we will now call some witnesses that were with the unfortunate gentleman in his sickness, whereof one was his physician, another his nurse, and others, who were often with him, and after his death had a view of the body. These will give your grace and my lords an account, that he died of those wounds and bruises he then received ; they are these four, Dr. David Bruce, Mr. Thomas Hemes, Mr. Charles Jackson, and Alice Avery.

Cl. of Cr. Hearken to me, you four. The evidence that you and every of you shall give for our sovereign lord the king, against Philip, earl of Pembroke, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth ; so help you God.

L. H. St. Whom do you call first, Mr. Attorney ?

Att. Gen. Dr. Bruce, my lord : pray, sir, acquaint my lord high steward his grace, and my lords the peers, what your know of Mr. Cony's sickness, and the cause of his death, as you apprehend.

Dr. Bruce. May it please your grace, all that I can evidence in particular of Mr. Cony's sickness is this : on Monday morning after his being in company of the earl of Pembroke, I was sent for to come to Mr. Cony's lodgings, and about ten of the clock I came ; he was then in extremity of pain in both shoulders, so that he could not move, and his pains were so acute, that he could not admit of touching : upon the abating of those pains by my application the next day, he then began to complain of pains in his belly, but those not so extreme as those in his shoulders ; after some applications thereto, he complained of both, but in a little time was so eased, that he kept well all night, and till nine or ten the next morning. The next day, which was Wednesday, when I came to see him, I told him of the common report of his being kickt ; he seemed displeased that such a thing should be reported, and throwing down the bed-clothes, shewed me his belly, but I could not see any blenish upon it then, either by discolouring or bruising ; I found him indeed very backward in receiving remedies, but left him then in a hopeful way of recovery ; but I saw him not after, because being sick myself, I could not attend him.

Att. Gen. Did he complain of any hurt about him then ?

Bruce. Only in his belly.

Att. Gen. Did you then see his belly ?

Bruce. Yes, sir, for he threw away the clothes.

Att. Gen. Did you see upon his breast, or any where else ?

Bruce. He did not complain of any ail there, so I lookt not for any thing.

Att. Gen. What did he complain of when you came first to him ?

Bruce. Only his shoulders.

Att. Gen. And after his belly ?—Bruce. Yes.

L. H. St. Hark you, doctor, what day was that you came to look on his belly, whether he had any bruises or no ?

Bruce. Wednesday morning, my lord.

L. H. St. And then you say upon your oath, you saw there no swelling or discolouring ?

Bruce. None at all, my lord ; I gave it in upon my oath before the coroner, and the same I say now.

Att. Gen. We have done with the Doctor, my lord.

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, will your lordship examine him to any thing ?

E. of P. No, my lord.

Att. Gen. Then there is Mr. Hemes ; pray, sir, acquaint my lords what you know of this gentleman, Mr. Cony, and first pray you tell his grace when you came to him first.

Hemes. It was on Monday morning after this accident, about eight of the clock.

Att. Gen. Did he send for you ?

Hemes. Yes, sir.

Att. Gen. How did you find him when you came ?

Hemes. In great extremity of pain, and very sore, complaining of pains over all his body, especially on his shoulders and buttocks. Then the doctor, who came in soon after, did apply plaisters to him, and when he anointed him he was so sore, that he could not endure any one to touch him, nor could we tell how to turn him in his bed, or how to place him so as to apply the ointment, but were fain to get a sheep-skin to wrap him in, and by pillows, and a broad joint-stool, raise him up by degrees : I did then look upon his body, but saw no swelling or bruise there.

L. H. St. Did you see his belly ?

Hemes. No, my lord, but he did complain of an inward grief there.

Att. Gen. When did he first complain of that ?

Hemes. The first morning when I came.

Att. Gen. What words did he then use ? tell the very words he used, if you can remember them.

Hemes. No, sir, I cannot ; but he complained of a great soreness in his belly, and an inward soreness.

Att. Gen. Where, in what part of his body ?

Hemes. In his belly, I say.

Att. Gen. Well, now go on ; how long did you continue with him ? how many days did you come to him ?

Hemes. I came to him every day all along.

Att. Gen. Were you with him till the day he died ?

Hemes. Yes ; there was indeed a new physician sent for, but I saw him all along usually once a day.

Att. Gen. Did he complain more than once of his belly ?

Hemes. Yes, all along from the first morning.

L. H. St. Did you see him opened after he was dead ?

Hemes. Yes, my lord.

L. H. St. What can you say as to what you saw on him then ?

Hemes. When he was opened, in the lower part of his belly there was a great deal of blood gathered together on both the hypocondria's, which is not usual ; I cannot tell the meaning of it, the physician knows that best.

Att. Gen. Was it congealed black blood ?

Hemes. It was of an ugly colour.

Att. Gen. What colour ?

Hemes. Of a blackish livid colour.

Att. Gen. Have you observed it often so in others? have you used to see people opened at other times?

Hemes. No indeed, not I, but very seldom.

Att. Gen. Well, then, stand down you, for we have done with you.

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, have you any thing to say to him?

E. of P. No, my lord.

L. H. St. Then call your next witness.

Att. Gen. That is Mr. Jackson. Pray you, sir, tell my lords what you know of this business: when were you sent for to Mr. Cony?

Jackson. On Wednesday.

Att. Gen. What acquaintance had you with him?

Jackson. I had a very particular acquaintance with him, and I looked upon him as a person of a strong, healthy constitution, and not subject to any dangerous distemper; my acquaintance with him was of twelve years standing, and therefore I must needs know him pretty well. Upon the Wednesday, after this accident, hearing he was very weak, I went to visit him, and when I came, he told me, he had been troubled with very unusual swooning, and then fell into one of them, but with some cordials we revived him again, when we thought all of us he had been dead. The Friday and Saturday before he died, I was with him all day; he complained of great griefs in his belly; he said, he had great torment there, and believed he had received some ill usage lately, which occasioned these pains.

Att. Gen. From whom had he received it?

Jackson. He was very sparing in telling whom it came from.

Att. Gen. Who did he name?

Jackson. He said, he was a-drinking with my lord of Pembroke; but he was in such pains, that I could not ask him many questions which he would answer.

Att. Gen. Where were his pains?

Jackson. In his lower belly, and he had sometimes strange fainting fits.

Att. Gen. When did he first complain of his fits to you?

Jackson. On the Wednesday.

Att. Gen. When did he die?

Jackson. On Monday following.

Att. Gen. Did he complain on Saturday of his belly?—Jackson. Yes.

L. H. St. What discourse had you further with him?

Jackson. None but what I tell your lordship that I can remember.

L. H. St. My Lord of Pembroke, have you any thing to say to him?

E. of P. No, my Lord.

L. H. St. Who is next then, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. Alice Avery, my Lord, who was his nurse—Were you attending upon Mr. Cony in the time of his sickness?

Avery. Yes, I was.

Att. Gen. Pray tell my lord your whole knowledge.

Avery. When he came in on the Monday morning, I found he was very ill, and could not well stand: Sir, said I to him, sure you are very much in beer; no, said he, I am very sore, and full of pain: sir, said I, I believe you have been in some bad company: yes, said he, I have been in some company, where I have received a great deal of wrong, I am not able to go nor stand, I have been beaten and kicked more than ordinary, I was never so abused in all my life; and upon his dying bed he wished to God, he had never been in my Lord Pembroke's company, for he did think in his conscience my Lord had been the death of him.

Att. Gen. Speak that again.

Avery. He wished to God he had never been in my Lord Pembroke's company, for he did think in his conscience that he had been the death of him.

L. H. St. How long before he died was that?

Avery. About two or three hours before he died.

Att. Gen. Did he continue sensible to the time that he died?

Avery. Yes, to the last minute.

Att. Gen. How often did he complain of his pain?

Avery. All along from the time he came out of my Lord Pembroke's company.

Att. Gen. What time did he come home?

Avery. About 7 or 8 of the clock on Monday morning.

Att. Gen. Where and what part did he complain of then?

Avery. His sides and all parts about him.

Att. Gen. How often did you discourse with him about his pain?

Avery. Every day divers times, from the time he came home till he died.

Att. Gen. And he spoke those words a little before he died?

Avery. Yes, and often complained of his being abused.

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, will you ask this woman any questions?

E. of P. No, my Lord.

L. H. St. Have you any more witnesses, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. Now, my Lord, we shall call three more that had a view of the body after his death, upon the coroner's inquest, who will give your grace an account what appearances of murder were there visible; and they are, Richard Wheeler, William Brown, Thomas Roberts.

Cl. of Cr. Lay your hands on the book: the evidence, &c.

Att. Gen. Which is Mr. Brown? Did you see the body of Mr. Cony after he was dead?

Brown. Yes, my lord, I was one of the coroner's inquest, which after view of the body went into another house; but some of us seeing the body swelled at that rate as it was, and being unsatisfied of the cause, went back again to look upon it, and there I saw upon his right breast a great black bruise; and I looked upon the caul, which was all wasted away; and on his left side again a great black spot, and in the bottom of his belly a quantity of very ill-looking blood.

Att. Gen. When was this you saw it? what day? how long after his death?

Brown. The day after he died.

Att. Gen. Where did you observe any hurt and bruise upon him besides?

Brown. As he lay before he was opened, we saw him all over swelled at a prodigious rate, and black and blue in divers places; so that I was unsatisfied till I had seen the inward parts, and therefore went up and saw what I said before.

L. H. St. Did you know the gentleman before?—Brown. No, my Lord.

L. H. St. My Lord of Pembroke, do you desire to ask him any thing?

E. of P. No, my Lord.

L. H. St. Then go on, Sir.

Att. Gen. Richard Wheeler, pray tell my Lord what you know.

Wheeler. My Lord, I was summoned upon the Jury by the Coroner, and according to my duty I made such an inspection as I could into the body; I did observe upon his right breast a very black and great bruise, which was indeed of another-guise colour than that of settled blood, for I have of my own knowledge had a sad experience of that kind.

Att. Gen. Did you know the gentleman before?

Wheeler. Yes, I knew the gentleman very well, and I had not known him to be the same person then, but by their description that were about him, for all the parts of his body were most violently swelled.

Att. Gen. Did you see the settled blood at the bottom of his belly?

Wheeler. Yes; and as I was informed, that was occasioned by his being forced to lie on his back continually, because his pain would not suffer him to move: that on the side, and ribs, was a perfect bruise.

Att. Gen. Where is Mr. Roberts? Did you see this gentleman's body after his death?

Roberts. I saw the body after it was opened and viewed the inward lower parts of the belly, where there was a quantity of blood gathered together.

Att. Gen. Was it more black in that part than in others?

Roberts. It was black congealed blood.

Att. Gen. How broad were the spots?

Roberts. About the breadth of my hand.

L. H. St. Mr. Roberts, did you see the left side of the belly bruised?

Roberts. Yes, my Lord; and (as I said) in the lower inward parts black congealed blood.

L. H. St. Was there any swelling?

Roberts. Yes, my Lord, very much.

L. H. St. The Doctor that was examined before, said there was no swelling nor discolouring.

Att. Gen. He did so, my Lord; but this was several days after that.

L. H. St. My Lord of Pembroke, will you examine these men?

E. of P. No, my Lord.

Att. Gen. My Lord, we have but one witness more for the king, and that is Mr. Charles Cony, who is brother of the gentleman that died, who will give you an account what he said in his sickness; and the sayings of a dying man in such circumstances are remarkable.

Ch. of Cr. Charles Cony, hearken to your Oath. The evidence, &c.

Att. Gen. Now, Mr. Cony, tell his grace and my Lords the occasion of your brother's sickness and death.

Cony. May it please your Grace, on Monday the 4th of February I was sent for by my brother, about nine of the clock in the morning, to come to speak with him, but not believing his business to be urgent, deferred my going; the messenger immediately comes back again, and tells me my brother was exceeding ill: as soon as I came, I found him almost dying, his eyes set, and he extremely ill, but we recovered him in a little time: whilst he complained of great pain, I examined what might be the cause, and where he had been last night (for I understood he came not home till morning) and in what company. And when I was told of my Lord Pembroke's company, who had struck him down with a box of the ear, both he and I quickly concluded how his ill came: but to be satisfied, (he telling me he could not remember what he did) we sent for the drawer, to know the truth of the matter: but in the mean time to comfort him, I told him I hoped it was only a fainting fit, which would be over again in a while. The drawer came, and did assure me that my lord did never strike him; which upon assurance I did believe, especially when he came again in the afternoon, and told me the same story. All the while he was in the horrid pain that could be, and could not be touched, but was forced to lie upon his back. The Doctor told us, for application to ease his pain, the best thing to wrap him in was a whole wether's skin; which we did at two of the clock in the afternoon, by the help of a chirurgeon, raised him up, and put on him. On Tuesday morning I sent to know how he did, being necessitated to go another way; he sent word back, he was pretty well at ease, and had rested pretty well. On Wednesday he rose, and sat; on Thursday he was so well, that he would have some friends to dine with him in his chamber; on Friday he was a little ill again, but on Saturday he was so well, that he would have gone abroad, and truly we did never (I'm sure I did not) believe he would have died, till about two hours before he died. One day when Dr. Conquest came out of his chamber, he seemed to be in a buff, and said, he was only kept there to do the drudgery; and when I asked him what he thought of my brother? he answered me short, I cannot tell whether it be a Pembroke-kick or no. And when I, upon the report of my lord's having abused him, (which yet upon the drawer's answer I believed not) spoke to him about it, he would seem displeased any should mention it.

he once indeed told me, he had something else to reveal to the Doctor, but what it was I cannot tell.

Att. Gen. Did you apprehend him to be so ill as he was?

Cony. No, I never believed it, till an hour before he died; and this is all that I can say, my Lord.

L. H. St. Will you, my Lord Pembroke, ask Mr. Cony any question?

E. of P. I desire your Grace to ask him what chirurgeons they were that did view the body after dead.

L. H. St. Mr. Cony, come forward. My Lord of Pembroke desires to know what chirurgeons viewed the body?

Cony. Mr. Snell the chirurgeon, I think my Lord.

E. of P. I desire your Grace he may be examined.

L. H. St. If the king's counsel have done, then your lordship may examine who you please: what would your lordship examine into?

E. of P. To give your Grace an account what might be the cause of the blood found in Mr. Cony's body.

Att. Gen. Because we did omit to examine Jackson to that matter, we desire for the king we may call him to that point now.

L. H. St. You should have examined all your witnesses fully at first.

Att. Gen. We acknowledge it, my lord; but since we did forget it, we humbly crave leave to do it now.

L. H. St. Here is Mr. Jackson, what do you ask him?

Att. Gen. Mr. Jackson, were you present at the opening of Mr. Cony's body?

Jackson. Yes, sir.

Att. Gen. What did you see there?

Jackson. There was an extraordinary quantity of extravasated blood in the lower part of his belly.

L. H. St. Extravasated blood?

Jackson. Yes, my lord.

Att. Gen. How might that come? Might it not proceed from a natural cause?

Jackson. I believe it came from some bruises given him, and from some violences that were done to him.

Att. Gen. In the belly was it?

Jackson. Yes, in the belly.

Att. Gen. You saw then: Did you see any swelling there?

Jackson. Yes, and the diaphragma bruised, &c.

Att. Gen. Now, my lord, we have done with our evidence for the king.

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, if your lordship have any witness to call, or will say any thing for yourself, now is the time.

E. of P. I desire your grace that Dr. Lower, and Dr. Conquest, and one Mr. Raven, may be examined for me.

L. H. St. Call Dr. Lower, Dr. Conquest, and Mr. Raven.

Cl. of Cr. Here they are, make room for them.

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, who will your lordship begin with?

E. of P. Dr. Conquest, my lord.

L. H. St. Doctor, you are not upon your oath*, but you must have a strict care what you say, for there will be a good account to be taken of it at another place, and it being a testimony before a court of judicature, the obligation upon you to speak the truth is as great, as if you did swear.

Dr. Conquest. The account I now give, my lord, is that account which I gave upon my oath before the coroner.

L. H. St. You must give it again viva voce; we must not read your examination before the Court.

Conquest. The first occasion I had to see Mr. Cony as a physician, was about three months before this unhappy accident; he was then in a fainting fit at the Rose-Tavern, &c. where I was sent for to him: He had for half an hour lain quite dead, as they thought, but with their rubbing him, and giving him some mulled sack, he was come to himself just as I came, but he had no pulse, and was relapsing into his fit: I gave him some drops and cordials, and sent him home pretty well again. We went from thence, and the next morning his man came to call me, and told me his master was dying, which was (as I take it) the 6th of December last. When I came thither, I found his man sitting by the fire; and asking for his master he told me he was asleep; I was something vexed at the fellow for troubling of me so, and while I was speaking to him, Mr. Cony at last heard my voice, and calling me to him, desired me I would come again in the afternoon, for he had a mind to rest this morning: I came at one of the clock again, where I found him very ill, and very melancholy; he wept, and sent his man down stairs, and when the man was gone, I asked him what was the occasion? He told me, he found so great an oppression at his heart, that he could hardly speak: I desired he would take some advice, and send for another physician; but he would have none else, but would needs go abroad that afternoon; I desired him all I could; but not prevailing with him, I gave him some cordial drops, and desired him to return home betimes; but he did not, but, as I heard, drank very hard, and returned not till very late. In short, in the space of two months, I have been called out of my bed above twenty times, to give him advice, and to recover him out of his fits: but he would take no advice, do whatever I could. After this was his meeting with my lord of Pembroke, which he thus gave me relation of: He told me, he had been with Mr. Goring in the city that day drinking hard, and when he came to Long's he was so extremely drunk, that he could not remember any thing that was done there, but finding himself much in pain the next day; he was so ignorant of the transactions there, that he only thought he had had several falls off the chairs near the fire; he said indeed, he afterwards sent to enquire what had passed in his company that night, and he heard my lord of Pembroke should give him a box on the ear, but he remembered it not. Two or three days after he sent for me and told me, now he would take advice of me, and enter into a course of physic; but knowing his condition to be so bad, I would not venture upon it alone, and desired that he would join some one else with me in consultation: He asked me, what physician he should send for? I desired him to name any one whom he had a mind to; he said he knew none, and therefore would have me take whom I would, and then named Dr. Lower, and obtained his consent to have his advice, whom I brought with me to his lodgings. And the Saturday before he died, as we were coming in the coach, I told Dr. Lower what I had known of his distemper before, and what might be the occasion of it, which (when we came thither) I repeated again in Mr. Cony's presence, who did confess the whole to be as I said, that he had been a very hard drinker of wine, and strong waters upon it, which had (he believed) caused a stagnation of blood in his body, which might be the occasion of his fainting fits. We consulted the whole cause; he owned no blow or kick that he had received, neither did I believe his intrails had received any such prejudice, because I saw him myself take two or three glisters, as particularly that evening: Yet he would not be regular, but that night drank three whole tankards of cold small beer, which did put him into a very violent fit of the gripes. He sent for me, and having left him pretty well I wondered what alteration could cause so violent a distemper in him so suddenly; He fell a vomiting, and vomited all night; and when I came and found him in a dying fit, I gave him some drops I had about me, and fetched him to life again; but still he was very bad, and he had a glister for the gripes; he would fain have had some more small beer, which I dissuaded him from, and advised him rather to white-wine-possiet-drink, but he swore a great oath he would have small beer. Dr. Lower, I suppose, saw him that morning. An hour before he died I came again and thought fit to bleed, and so he was; he bled about eight ounces, and was a little better, so I left him: An hour after I came again, and found he was dead; but for his complaining of any bruise or hurt that way received, I remember not.

L. H. St. Did you see him after he was dead, and when he was opened?

Conquest. Yes, my lord, I did see him opened.

L. H. St. What was your judgment then?

Conquest. My lord, there was clotted blood among the bowels, that was extravasated. My lord, the breaking out of which, I did attribute to the great quantity of small beer he had drank, and the gripings that followed upon but the bowels were none of them touched, and he himself attributed his fits to that.

L. H. St. Mr. Attorney, will you ask him any cross question?

Att. Gen. No, my lord.

L. H. St. Then, Dr. Lower, pray speak your knowledge.

Lower. All the account, my lord, that I can give, is, that the day before Mr. Cony died, Dr. Conquest did come to me to desire to go with him, and by the way (as he related) told me the manner of his fits, and what he thought was the occasion of them; and in this discourse we continued till we came to his lodgings, where we found him in his bed; and when he was up Dr. Conquest repeated what he had told me before, and he acknowledged all that to be true: I myself asked him many questions how he found himself: he said, those fits came upon him suddenly by sickness upon his stomach; but there was not any discourse in my hearing, of any bruise or hurt that way, nor had I any reason to suspect any such thing should be the cause of his illness, for he had no symptom of a fever upon him, either in tongue, pulse, or urine, which would have been, had he owed his distemper to any thing of that kind. The next day I was sent for to him early, but my necessary attendance on other patients would not let me come quickly to him: when I came I found him dying, and seeing no hopes of his recovery, left him; I was desired to be present at the dissection, but because of the rumour of this business, I said it would be a troublesome matter, and therefore would purposely avoid it.

L. H. St. So you did not see him dissected?

Lower. No, my lord, I did fear being troubled, and would have avoided it, but could not, it seems, for I am here come to testify this.

L. H. St. Did he use any words to you whilst he was sick, complaining of any abuse or wrong offered him by beating or kicking?

Lower. No, my lord.

L. H. St. How long was it before he died that you saw him?

Lower. It was on Saturday at four of the clock in the afternoon, and he died on Sunday at noon.

L. H. St. And when you came to see him again, you found him dying?

Lower. Yes, my lord.

L. H. St. But you say, all the time you were with him, you saw no symptom of a fever on him?

Lower. No, none at all, my lord.

L. H. St. I then ask you this question, doctor, can any man be mortally hurt and bruised, whereof he may languish, and not have a fever?

Lower. According to my knowledge and experience, my lord, usually and most commonly upon a mortal bruise, an inflammation follows, and that inflammation causes a fever, which will be evident in the patient's pulse, or tongue, or water; but none of these I found so affected with Mr. Cony.

L. H. St. Have you any thing to say to this gentleman, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. No, my lord.

L. H. St. Where then are the rest of your witnesses? My lord of Pembroke, Will you call any more evidence?

E. of P. Yes, my lord, Mr. Raven.

L. H. St. Dr. Conquest, pray, before you go; you say you told Dr. Lower of Mr. Cony's fits before, were they the same with those he had in his last sickness?

Conquest. Yes, my lord, the same fainting fits.

L. H. St. And you imputed them to the same cause?

Conquest. Yes, my lord, to his hard drinking wine, and strong-waters, and then great quantities of small-beer; I told his landlady often it would kill him, but I could never get him to be regular, nor take any advice.

L. H. St. Hath your lordship any more witnesses?

E. of P. Mr. Raven, my lord.

L. H. St. Come forward, Mr. Raven, and speak out.

Raven. I viewed the body, my lord, before and when it was opened, and it was reported to me that there was a bruise in each side of the belly, of which thereupon I took a stricter view, and could find no blackness nor blueness, nor marks of bruises; upon which the body was opened, and there issued thence clotted blood; then I looked upon the caul, which was withered and consumed, and the heart was as loose as a rag, and his lungs stuck to each side of his ribs; and as to the matter of the blood, that was not an extraordinary thing, for it is known to physicians, that in all natural deaths there must be extravasated blood in the lower belly.

L. H. St. How did you think there came to be that quantity of blood there?

Raven. This blood, I think, my lord, must be extravasated by the violence of his gripes, for it is proved he drank a great quantity of claret, and afterwards of small-beer, which set the blood upon a fermentation, that set him a vomiting; by the violence thereby used to nature this blood was thrown down into the belly; but in all natural deaths, if there be not so great a consumption of the blood that there is none left, there must be some extravasated; it is a clear case.

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, hath your lordship any more witnesses?

E. of P. Yes, my lord, two more, Benjamin Long and William Viner.

L. H. St. Who does your lordship begin with?

E. of P. Long.

L. H. St. Do you hear, Long, you must have as great a care what you say, as if you were upon your oath.

Long. A little before this business happened, Mr. Cony comes into my house at Covent-Garden, and said he was very ill; he was just going to sit down and missed the chair, and had like to have fallen down, being almost in a swoon; whereupon he said, send for Dr. Conquest presently, or else I shall die: so I sent my servant to call him, who found him at the coffee-house: When he came in, said he, Sir, how do you? I am glad you are come, said Mr. Cony, for I am very ill; and there were two gentlemen came in with the Doctor, that were then going to the play-house: said Mr. Cony, I am taken with the fainting fits, and fear they will kill me; upon that Dr. Conquest bid him have a care of drinking, for it would ruin him.

L. H. St. When was this?

Long. A little before Christmas, my lord.

L. H. St. How long before he died?

Long. It was before he was hurt?

L. H. St. How long?

Long. Five or six weeks, my lord, as I remember; I cannot tell exactly.

L. H. St. Well, and what followed?

Long. Dr. Conquest would have him go home to his bed, which I know not whether he did or no, but he went away from our house, and the doctor said he would send him a glisten and some other things the next morning: And this is all I can say.

L. H. St. Is that all you can say?

Long. Yes, my Lord.

L. H. St. Why, was not this accident done at your house?

Long. No, my Lord, it was at my brother's in the Haymarket.

L. H. St. Then call next Viner; what say you?

Viner. May it please your grace, I am drawer at Mr. Long's in the Haymarket, I did see my lord strike him with his hand, and that is all; I came in just as he struck the blow, and captain Savage bid me keep out Mr. Goring; which while I was doing I knew not what was done more; but after they had laid him upon the chairs, they charged me to make a fire, and look after him, and left him: He fell down divers times off the chairs; and when he came to himself a little, I asked him how he did? He told me he was very sick, and I got him still up again upon the chairs: And then he had several fainting fits in the room; and about seven of the clock in the morning, we sent him home in a chair to his lodging. The same day at one of the clock he sent for me, to know what had happened, for his own memory would not serve him to tell: I did not think fit then to tell him my lord had struck him, but told him he had many falls in the room: 'Tis fits, said he, that I have had not long since, and it comes with my hard drinking, and not looking to myself.

L. H. St. He supposed it to be so.

Viner. Yes my lord, he himself did.

L. H. St. Did you see my lord Pembroke tread upon him?

Viner. No, my lord, I only saw the blow of his hand, for I was getting Mr. Goring out of the room.

L. H. St. Did he say my lord of Pembroke did tread upon him?

Vincer. No, he could not tell any thing that my lord had done to him; he was drunk that night, and therefore sent for me to know how it was.

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, hath your lordship any more witnesses?

E. of P. No, my lord.

L. H. St. Did not your lordship speak of one Snell, my lord, a surgeon, at first?

E. of P. I did expect, my lord, they should have brought the person your grace speaks of.

L. H. St. Why, my lord?

E. of P. Because he was their surgeon.

L. H. St. What say you now of the king's counsel to my Lord's defence?

Sol. Gen. If my lord hath done, we are ready to go on for the king.

L. H. St. Will your lordship say any thing more for yourself?

E. of P. I have nothing more to say, my lord.

Mr. Sol. Gen. [sir Francis Winnington.] May it please your grace my Lord-High-Steward of England and my noble Lords, that are now judges of this cause of blood; I shall with all faithfulness endeavour to discharge my duty in this great court, and confine myself solely to the evidence that hath been given, and I hope I shall not do this noble lord, the prisoner at the bar, any injury by misrepetition. * The

* In a Note to the Case of Don Pantaleon Sa [ante vol. 5, p. 496.] a quotation was made from a Note of Mr. Professor Christian upon the allowance of counsel. What sir Francis Winnington here says will justify the insertion of some matter there alluded to in the professor's Note which certainly deserves to be recorded:

"An honourable barrister will never mistake either law or facts within his own knowledge, but he is justified in urging any argument, whatever may be his own opinion of the solidity or justness of it, which he may think will promote the interests of his client; for reasoning in courts of justice and in the ordinary affairs of life seldom admits of geometrical demonstration; but it happens not unfrequently that the same argument, which appears sophistry to one, is sound logic in the mind of another, and every day's experience proves that the opinions of a judge and an advocate are often diametrically opposite. Many circumstances may occur, which will justify or compel an individual member of the profession to refuse the defence of a particular client, but a cause can hardly be conceived which ought to be rejected by all the bar; for such a conduct in the profession would excite so strong a prejudice against the party, as to render him in a great degree condemned before his trial. Let the circumstances against a prisoner be ever so atrocious, it is still the duty of the advocate to see that his client is convicted accord-evidence, my Lords, that hath been produced for the king to make it out, that the prisoner at the bar is guilty of murder, doth, may it please your grace, consist of three parts.

1. In the first are contained those matters of fact, which did arise at the time when the poor unfortunate gentleman came into my lord Pembroke's company, and what happened before my lord of Pembroke did depart from that place.

2. The second part of the evidence consists of matters that did arise by confession of the party, and his discoursing with persons who came to visit him, or were with him during the time of his sickness.

3. The third part doth consist of matters arising after his death, upon the view of the body. Under these three heads are comprehended all the king's evidence, and with humble submission, I humbly conceive, that the evidence doth reach the Indictment, which is for the crime of wilful murder. But when I have humbly stated the fact, I must submit it to the judgment of my noble lords and peers.

But to take a due method, I shall begin with ing to those rules and forms, which the wisdom of the legislature has established as the best protection of the liberty and the security of the subject. But the conduct of counsel in the prosecution of criminals, ought to be very different from that which is required from them in civil actions, or when they are engaged on the side of a prisoner; in the latter cases they are the advocates of their client only, and speak but by his instruction and permission; in the former they are the advocates of public justice, or to speak more professionally, they are the advocates of the king, who in all criminal prosecutions, is the representative of the people; and both the king and the country must be better satisfied with the acquittal of the innocent, than with the conviction of the guilty. Hence in all criminal prosecutions, especially where the prisoner can have no counsel to plead for him, a barrister is as much bound to disclose all those circumstances to the jury, and to reason upon them as fully, which are favourable to the prisoner, as those, which are likely to support the prosecution.

"When this note was written, the editor was not aware that the general observations contained in it were sanctioned by so great authorities as Cicero and Panætius. Cicero makes the distinction that it is the duty of the judge to pursue the truth; but it is permitted to an advocate to urge what has only the semblance of it. He says he would not have ventured himself to have advanced this (especially when he was writing upon philosophy,) if it had not also been the opinion of the gravest of the stoics, Panætius, 'Judicis est semper in causis verum sequi: patroni nonnunquam verisimile, etiam si minus sit verum, defendere: quod scribere (præsertim cum de philosophia scriberim) non auderem, nisi idem placeret gravissimo stoicorum Panætio.' Cic. de Off. lib. 2. c. 14."

a word or two of what Mr. Attorney-General was pleased to hint, when he opened the cause, that is, to shew what murder is, and wherein we conceive the evidence comes up to the Indictment. Murder in our law is, when one man kills another upon malice fore-thought; now that malice is comprehended under two particulars: The one is express a former grudge, discontent, and hatred to a man, to lye in wait to slay him: The other is malice implied, and that is when a person will come and fall upon another, and kill him with violence, without any provocation; and that I take to be the case now before your grace, and these noble lords; whether this noble lord, the prisoner at the bar, be guilty of murder, under the head of malice implied, having killed a man, without any provocation given; for if it should be made appear, as I humbly conceive it hath, with submission, that Mr. Cony did receive his wound, whereby his death came, from the earl of Pembroke, it is with our law murder.

That my lord of Pembroke did invite him into his company is sworn by four witnesses; for when they came into the house they did not so much as enquire whether my Lord was there or no; and when my lord asked him to come into the room, Mr. Cony did excuse it, in a manner, by having his friend with him; pray bring your friend in with you, said my Lord: After a little while it was said, there were several discourses passed between my Lord and Mr. Goring concerning play, and their families; but the third witness doth swear, that when they were speaking of playing for 500*l*. Mr. Goring declined; my lord of Pembroke first called him idle fellow, and that occasioned Mr. Goring to give that language, which was not so fit for him to give a noble lord of his quality. But, may it please your grace, let the discourse between Mr. Goring and my lord of Pembroke be what it will, the question will be, Whether or no the party that was killed gave my lord of Pembroke any provocation, or cause of discontent, which might make him give him that blow? or whether or no the striking or kicking was the cause of his death? That comes in the last place, for I am now under that head; there was no provocation given by Mr. Cony to my Lord to strike him, and four witnesses there were to that, the persons by at the time when it was given, who all, as to the substance, swear the same thing, only one or two circumstances come from some of them, that do not come from all. Mr. Savage, a man of quality, and an honourable family, swears, That at the time when Mr. Goring was put out of the room, he saw the earl of Pembroke (turning his face) give Cony a blow on the head, and one kick when he was down. The question was asked him, Whether he kicked him upon the belly; but that he could not answer to: He likewise doth particularly say, after the blow was given by the earl of Pembroke, that struck him down to the ground, he saw his knee lifted up to kick him, higher than the motion of usual walking, so that some violence was used as to that. Fitz-Patrick, though they all agree in substance, yet he hath one particular differing from the rest; he saith, That when my lord of Pembroke was asked why he struck Mr. Cony, he answered, Because he said Mr. Goring should not go out of the room, without his knowing some reason for it; this he swears the earl did say, but whether it was so or no is the question. Shelly says, No such word passed, nor doth Savage speak of it: But be that circumstance true or not (for all the witnesses agree in substance, and may not be able to agree in all circumstances) yet under submission, I must leave it to the judgment of my Lords the Peers, whether that be provocation sufficient to lay violent hands on a man. Shelly, indeed, says the words were, I know not why my friend is turned out of doors; now whether these are a provocation, such as in judgment of law can be deemed sufficient to lay violent hands on a man to kill him, is the question,* we suppose it is not, but such a stroke is given without a provocation, in which the law implies malice. This (may it please your grace) is the sum of that which I humbly take the boldness to remember your lordship of, as to the first part of the evidence.

2dly. The second part is upon what ariseth after the blow was given. My lord of Pembroke at that time was certainly apprehensive he had done the gentleman some wrong, and that is evident by his care of him after; for his own witness, Viner, doth say, that my Lord bid him make a fire and watch with him; surely if my Lord had not been conscious to himself, that he had done something extraordinary to the person of that gentleman, that caution had not been given to the man; But besides (my Lord) there are little circumstances, which are always allowed for evidence in such cases, where men receive any wounds to ask them questions while they are ill, about it, who hurt them. Now as to this there are four witnesses also, Dr. Bruce, Mr. Hemes, Mr. Jackson, and Alice Avery.

Dr. Bruce swears, That when he came on the Monday to enquire of Mr. Cony what his illness was, he did complain of soreness about his shoulders, but did not make mention of the lower part of his belly, or any discolouring there.

But Hemes the apothecary says, he not only complained of extreme pains in his shoulders, but also of extreme inward soreness in the lower part of his belly, and this person was frequently with him, and the same complaints came from him, till he expired his last breath.

Jackson, He did know him for a long time before; he said indeed, He had about two or three months before a fainting fit or two, but to this time he looked upon him as a healthy man, and he continued with him off and on till he died, and to him he did declare he had received injury from the earl of Pembroke, though he was very loth to say what: And he also tells your lordships, that he saw the blood in his belly after the dissection, which he imputed to some hurt he had received. Indeed, there is a chirurgeon that tells your lordships, that it is an ordinary thing, and that it is so in all natural deaths, and it might be occasioned by his drinking the beer, which made him vomit, and concluded with these words (I noted them), It is a clear case; but the man not being upon his oath, and giving it in as his single opinion, I hope will not bear so much weight with your lordships.

* As to the law concerning the sufficiency of a provocation as an excuse, see the seventh Resolution in lord Morley's case, ante, p. 171. and the Notes there alluded to.

The nurse that was continually with him to the last moment, swears, he did continually complain after he came into the house, of pains all over his body, and (as she saith) continued in his senses, and the right use of his understanding, till his last breath, but principally complained of soreness in his shoulder, his side, and his belly, and did likewise often mention my lord of Pembroke's unkindness to him, declaring about two hours before he died, that he thought in his conscience the earl of Pembroke was the cause of his death.

These four witnesses swear what I have truly repeated, for I would be very unwilling in a cause of blood, to misrepeat the evidence, either to the prejudice of a just cause for the dead, or to press for unjust vengeance upon the living, it being my duty only to recollect what is sworn, and leave it all to your lordship's judgment.

3rdly. We have that which is evidence in law, upon the view of the body after his death. It was viewed legally by a jury of indifferent persons, summoned by the coroner, three of them being produced to swear, that there were a great many visible bruises upon the body, and swellings all about: and for the discolouring of the parts bruised, Roberts swears, the patch was about the breadth of his hand: Brown likewise swears, that he was black and blue up and down the body in broad patches: these are jurymen, disinterested persons. It is true, Mr. Cony's brother, the last witness for the king, saith, He knew nothing of the business, for his brother would never acknowledge any thing to him; but something that he speaks is very material. That Dr. Conquest, my lord's witness, coming out of the chamber one day, seemed angry, and to have taken some distaste, as if he were neglected, and used an expression, which your lordship may remember, upon Mr. Cony's asking him what ailed his brother, he could not tell, he said, It might be a Pembroke-kick. And this is the sum of the evidence for the king.

For the evidence on the other side, I think the substance of it is only, That this gentleman was used to have fainting fits, and those occasioned, as they think, by his hard drinking, and that might bring his death upon him; but they offer no counter proof of the fact.

But the question is now, Whether or no this man came to his death by other means; for it is no argument to say, because a man is sick, it is lawful to kill him: but we are to enquire, whether he came to his death by those blows given him by the prisoner at the bar? if then it be admitted that the blow was the cause of his death, and the kicks withal, I humbly then submit to your lordships' consideration, whether the king's evidence hath not reached up to the indictment: Here is murder with malice implied by the law, for there is no colour of pleading a provocation of the blow, to be the cause of his death. Now whether or no it be so, I humbly offer these reasons for the affirmation; this man was not looked upon to be a man in that condition as to be a dying man, before the blow.

Obj. But he was a great drinker; that brought him to those fits, and that hastened his end.

Ans. Though he was so, yet from the instant that he did receive the blow, he never had any ease till he died, insomuch that Mr. Savage tells your lordships, he took him up immediately after my lord kicked him, and he was some minutes before he could get him to life again, and then he could not keep him from fainting again: so that upon the circumstances of what the witnesses for the prisoner have said, and the evidence offered in behalf of the king, if this were the cause of his death, we leave it to your lordships' consideration, whether it be not murder in this noble lord the prisoner at the bar: to that determination we submit the cause; and whatever opinion your lordships shall be of in the cause, I have no more to say, but that the king's justice, in this prosecution, was suitable to the law given by the Almighty in the infancy of the world, 'That whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.'

L. H. St. Will your lordships please to withdraw to consider of the evidence?

Then the Lords went back in the same order they came in, and went into the House of Lords; and from thence, after two hours debate, they returned into the Court, and Proclamation was made as followeth:

Cl. of Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make Proclamation.

Serj. O Yes! my lord high steward of England his grace straitly chargeth and commandeth all manner of persons here present, to keep silence upon pain of imprisonment.

Then his Grace spake to the Peers.

L. H. St. Your lordships have heard the evidence against the prisoner, and for him, on both sides; and the solemnity in this case is, that your opinions are to be delivered severally, in the absence of the prisoner, who is to hear all that is by the witness or counsel said against him, but is to have his judgment from the High-Steward.

Upon the whole matter the question is this; Whether my lord of Pembroke be Guilty of the felony wherof he stands indicted, for the murder of Mr. Cony, or Not Guilty? The order of your opinions being delivered, is to begin with the puiane baron, and so upwards. I desire time to take your lordships judgments distinctly, and I desire each of your lordships to speak out, that I may hear it.

L. H. St. My lord Butler, what is your opinion? Is Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

J. Butler. Not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter.

The same question to the rest.

The Lord High Steward counted their numbers.

L. H. St. Six of my lords find him guilty; Eighteen find him not guilty: Forty find him guilty of manslaughter. Call for the prisoner to the bar.

Cl. of Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make Proclamation.

Serj. O Yes! Constable of the Tower of London, bring forth the body of thy prisoner Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, on pain and peril shall fall thereon.

Then the Prisoner came in, with the edge of the ax still from him, and his grace spake to him as followeth:

L. H. St. My lord of Pembroke, You have been indicted for the murder of Nathanael Cony, and upon your arraignment you have pleaded Not Guilty, and have put yourself upon the judgment of your peers; and your peers have considered what hath been said for you, and against you, and the judgment of my lords is this, That you are guilty of manslaughter for killing of Nathanael Cony: What can you say for yourself, why judgment should not pass upon you to die according to the law?

J. of P. I claim the privilege of the statute made in that case, my lord.

L. H. St. You must have it, my lord, it cannot be denied you; for by the act of parliament, where clergy is allowed to a common person, by reading, and burning in the hand, a peer convicted of such felony is to be delivered without either,* therefore we cannot deny it you: But your lordship must give me leave to tell you, that no man can have the benefit of that statute but once, and so I would have your lordship take notice of it as a caution to you for the future.

Your lordship is now to be discharged, paying your fees.

Then the Prisoner went from the bar, and his Grace by Proclamation thus dissolved his Commission.

Cl. of Cr. Serjeant at Arms, make Proclamation.

Serj. O yes, O yes, O yes! My Lord High Steward of England willeth and commandeth all persons here assembled, to depart in God's peace and the king's from this place, for his grace doth now dissolve his Commission.

God save the King.

Then his grace concluded the ceremony by breaking his staff.

242. Case of the CONSTITUTION of the Island of JAMAICA: 30 CHARLES II. A. D. 1678.

THE conquest of the Island of Jamaica was effected by Cromwell's forces commanded by Penn and Venables in May 1655. And in the same year the Protector issued the following Proclamation relative to that island:

'Whereas, by the good Providence of God, our fleet, in their late expedition into America, have possessed themselves of a certain island called Jamaica, spacious in its extent, commodious in its harbours and rivers within itself, healthful by its situation, fertile in the nature of the soil, and well stored with horses and other cattle, and generally fit and worthy to be planted and improved, to the advantage, honour, and interest of this nation.

'And whereas divers persons, merchants and others, heretofore conversant in plantations and trade of the like nature, are desirous to undertake and proceed upon plantations and settlements upon that island; we, therefore, for the better encouragement of all such persons so inclined, have, by the advice of our council, taken care, not only for the strengthening and securing of that island from all enemies, but for the constituting and settling a civil government, by such good laws and customs as are and have been exercised in colonies and places of the like nature; and have appointed surveyors, and other public officers, for the more equal distribution of public right and justice in the said island.

'And, for the further encouragement to the industry and good affection of such persons, we have provided and given orders to the commissioners of our customs, that every planter, or adventurer to that island, shall be exempt and free from paying any excise or customs for any manufactures, provisions, or any other goods or necessaries, which he or they shall transport to the said island of Jamaica within the space of seven years to come from Michaelmas next; and also, that sufficient caution and security be given by the said commissioners, that such goods shall be delivered at Jamaica only. And we have also, out of our special consideration of the welfare and prosperity of that island, provided, that no customs or other tax or impost,

‘be sold or charged upon any commodity which shall be the produce and native growth of that island; and shall be imported into any of the dominions belonging to the commonwealth; which favour and exemption shall continue for the space of ten years, to begin and be accounted from Michaelmas next. We have also given our special orders and directions that no embargo, or other hindrance, upon any pretence whatsoever, be laid upon any ships, seamen, or other passengers, or adventurers, which shall appear to be engaged and bound for the said island. And we do hereby further declare, for ourselves and successors, that whatsoever other favour, or immunity, or protection, shall or may conduce to the welfare, strength, and improvement, of the said island, shall from time to time be continued and applied thereunto.
 ‘Given under our hand, &c.
 ‘OLIVER, Protector.’

Notwithstanding what is mentioned in this Instrument respecting a Civil Government, it appears that the country remained under military government from the conquest of it until the Restoration. Upon that event Colonel D'Oyley, who had then the chief command under a commission from the Lord Protector, and who it appears was much beloved in the Island, was confirmed in that command by a commission from king Charles, dated the 13th of February, 1661.

His commission, which recites the king's desire to give all protection and encouragement to the people of Jamaica, and to provide for its security and good government, empowers him to execute his trust according to such powers and authorities as are contained in his commission and the instructions annexed to it, and such as should from time to time be given to him by his majesty, and according to such good, just, and reasonable customs and constitutions as were exercised and settled in other colonies, or such other as should, upon mature advice and consideration, be held necessary and proper for the good government and security of the island, provided they were not repugnant to the laws of England.

It further empowers him to take unto him a Council of Twelve persons, to be elected by the people according to the manner prescribed in the instructions; and by the advice of any five or more of them, to constitute civil judicatories, with power to administer oaths; to command all the military forces in the island, and put in force and execute martial law; to grant commissions, with the advice of his council, for the finding out new trades; and to do and perform all other orders, which might conduce to the good of the island. The instructions consist of fifteen articles:

‘The first directs the commission to be published, and the king proclaimed.

‘The third regulates the manner of electing the council, eleven of which to be chosen indifferently, by as many of the officers of the army, planters, and inhabitants, as could be conveniently admitted to such election, either at one or more places; which said persons, with the secretary of the island, who was thereby appointed always to be one, were established a council, to advise and assist the governor in the execution of his trust; and five were to be a quorum.

The fourth and fifth articles direct the taking the oaths and settling judicatories for the civil affairs, and affairs of the admiralty, for the peace of the island, and determining controversy.

The sixth directs the governor to discountenance vice and debauchery, and to encourage ministers, that Christianity and the Protestant Religion according to the Church of England, might have due reverence and exercise among them.

The seventh directs the fortifications at Cagway to be completed, and empowers him to compel, not only soldiers, but planters, to work by turns.

The eighth directs him to encourage the planters, and to assure them of his majesty's protection: and by the ninth, he is to cause an accurate survey to be made of the island.

By the tenth it is directed, that the secretary shall keep a register of all plantations, and the bounds thereof; and that all persons shall be obliged to plant a proportionable part thereof within a limited time.

The eleventh and twelfth direct all encouragements to be given to such negroes and others as shall submit to the government, and to merchants, and such as shall bring any trade there; and forbid monopolizing.

The thirteenth directs, that any vessel which can be spared from the defence of the island, shall be employed in fetching settlers from any other colonies, and that no soldiers be allowed to depart without licence.

The fourteenth relates to the keeping of the stores and provisions sent to the island, and the fifteenth directs the governor to transmit, from time to time, a state of the island, and all his proceedings.

In 1662, Lord Windsor was appointed governor of Jamaica, by commission under the great seal; which, besides containing the same powers as those contained in col. D'Oyley's commission, directs that, in case of Lord Windsor's dying or leaving the island, the government shall devolve on the council or any seven of them, and appoints a salary of 2,000*l.* per ann. payable out of the exchequer.

His instructions consist of twenty-two articles. The first directs the publication of his commission: and the second, the appointment of the council according to his commission and the instructions. But it must be observed upon this article, that no directions whatever are given, either in the commission, which refers to the instructions, or the instructions themselves, as to the mode in which the council shall be appointed; but it appears that the governor named them himself.

The third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh articles relate to the administering oaths, establishing judicatures, and providing for the security of the adjacent isles.

The eighth directs encouragement to be given to the planters to remove to Jamaica from the other colonies.

The ninth directs 100,000 acres of land to be set apart in each of the four quarters of the island, as a royal demesne, a survey to be made, and a register kept of all grants, and a militia formed.

The tenth directs the planters to be encouraged, their lands confirmed unto them by grants under the great seal, and appoints 50,000 acres of land to the governor, for his own use.

The eleventh relates to the encouragement of an orthodox ministry, and the twelfth establishes a duty of five per cent. upon all exports after the expiration of seven years.

The thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth articles contain general directions as to the liberty and freedom of trade (except with the Spaniards), assistance to the neighbouring plantations and the security of the island, by obliging planters to reside in bodies together, and in contiguous buildings.

The seventeenth directs, that as an encouragement to men of ability to go to the island no offices shall be held by deputy; and gives a power to the governor, of suspension or removal, in case of bad behaviour.

The nineteenth empowers the governor to grant royalties and manors, or lordships, to contain less than five hundred acres.

The twentieth empowers the governor, with advice of the council, to call assemblies, to make laws, and upon imminent necessity, to levy money; such laws to be in force two years, and no longer, unless approved of by the crown.

He also carried out with him the following PROCLAMATION.

'We, being fully satisfied that our island of Jamaica, being a pleasant and most fertile soil, and situate commodiously for trade and commerce, is likely, through God's blessing, to be a great benefit and advantage to this and other our kingdoms and dominions; have thought fit, for the encouraging of our subjects, as well such as are already upon the said island, as all others that shall transport themselves thither, and reside and plant there, to declare and publish, and we do hereby declare and publish, that thirty acres of improvable lands shall be granted and allotted to every such person, male or female, being twelve years old or upwards, who now resides; or within two years next ensuing shall reside, upon the said island; and that the same shall be assigned and set out, by the Governor and Council, within six weeks next after notice shall be given in writing, subscribed by such planter or planters; or some of them in behalf of the rest, to the Governor, or such officer as he shall appoint in that behalf, signifying their resolutions to plant there, and when they intend to be on the place; and, in case they do not go thither within six months then next ensuing, the said allotment shall be void, and free to be assigned to any other planter; and that every other person and persons, to whom such assignment shall be made, shall hold and enjoy the said lands so to be assigned, and all houses, edifices, buildings, and inclosures thereupon to be built or made, to them and their heirs for ever, by and under such tenures as is usual in other plantations subject to us. Nevertheless, they are to be obliged to serve in arms upon any insurrection, mutiny, or foreign invasion. And that the said assignments and allotments shall be made and confirmed, under the public seal of the island, with power to create any manor or manors, and with such convenient and suitable privileges and immunities as the grantee shall reasonably desire and require; and a draught of such assignment shall be prepared by our counsel learned in the law, and delivered to the Governor to that purpose; and that all fishings and pischeries, and all copper, lead, tin, iron, coals and all other mines (except gold and silver) within such respective allotments, shall be enjoyed by the grantee thereof, reserving only a twentieth part of the product of the said mines to our use. And we do further publish and declare, that all children of our natural born subjects of England, to be born in Jamaica, shall, from their respective oaths, be reputed to be, and shall be, free denizens of England, and shall have the same privileges to all intents and purposes as our free born subjects of England; and that all free persons shall have liberty, without interruption, to transport themselves and their families, and any their goods (except only coin and bullion,) from any other dominions and territories to the said island of Jamaica. And we do strictly charge and command all planters, soldiers and others, upon the said island, to yield obedience to the lawful commands of our right trusty and well beloved Thomas lord Windsor, now our governor of our said island; and to every other governor thereof, for the time being: under pain of our displeasure, and such penalties as may be inflicted thereupon.

"Given at our Court at Whitehall, Dec. 14.
Per ipsum Regem."

This Proclamation was published by lord Windsor upon his arrival; but nothing else material arises out of his short administration worth notice: for he staid but two months; and left the island, and the execution of his commission, to sir Charles Lyttleton, who had been appointed lieutenant governor, and who governed with the advice of a council of twelve appointed by himself, and called an assembly

* Fee and common socage, paying a trifling quit-rent for every hundred acres yearly to the

that made a body of laws, amongst which was one for raising a revenue.

Nothing, however, which appears to be material, as to the form of the constitution, occurred during his administration, which continued about twenty months; when he was superseded by the arrival of sir Thomas Modyford, who was appointed governor in chief by a commission under the great seal, which empowered him either to constitute, by his own authority, a privy council of twelve persons, or to continue the old one, and to alter, change, or augment it as he thought proper; to create judicatories; and make laws, orders, and constitutions, provided they did not extend to take away any right of freehold, or the interest of any person in their rights or freeholds, goods or chattels, and that they were transmitted to his majesty for allowance or disapprobation.

He was further empowered to command and discipline all military forces, to use martial law upon persons in military service, and establish articles of war; to create courts of admiralty, according to such authority as he should receive from the lord high admiral; to erect forts and fortifications; to establish ports, cities, towns, boroughs, and villages; to create manors and lordships; to grant charters to hold fairs; to take surveys, and keep records of all grants of lands, under such moderate quit-rents, services, and acknowledgments as he should think fit; and to prescribe terms of cultivation; and grants so made under the seal, and enrolled, were to be good and valid against the crown; to grant commissions for finding out new trades; to pardon all offences except murder and treason, and in those cases to reprieve for twelve months.

He was also empowered, with the advice of the majority of council, to frame a method for establishing general assemblies, and from time to time to call such assemblies together, and with their consent, to pass all manner of laws, reserving to himself a negative voice; as also, upon imminent occasions, to levy money. These laws not to extend to taking away any one's freehold, or to the loss of a member, and to be in force only two years, unless approved and confirmed by the crown.

This commission appoints a salary to the governor, of one thousand pounds per annum, payable out of the exchequer.

The instructions, which consist of twenty articles, relate to the encouragement to be given to planters to come from the other colonies; to the allowance settled upon himself and the other officers; and extend to most of the points contained in lord Windsor's instructions: but direct, that the measure of setting out the 400,000 acres, as a royal demesne shall be suspended; that no duties shall be laid in the island upon the import or export of any goods, for 21 years, nor shall any duty be laid here upon the produce of Jamaica for five years.

By these instructions it appears, that the crown allowed £5000 per annum for the support of government; and what was wanted over and above, was to be made good by a duty on strong liquors, either made or imported, to be levied by the authority of the governor and council.

In July, 1664, sir Thomas Modyford issued writs for electing two assembly-men for each parish; which assembly met in October following.

It does not appear that this assembly sat above a month or two, before they were dissolved; but, during their sessions, they passed a body of laws, which was transmitted to the Lord Chancellor to be laid before the crown; but which were not confirmed.

In 1670 sir Thomas Modyford was recalled, and sir Thomas Lynch appointed lieutenant-governor and commander in chief, with the same powers as sir Thomas Modyford had.

On the 1st of December, 1671, he issued writs for calling an assembly to consist of two persons for each parish; which met on the 8th of January and sat till June following, when the governor dissolved them, after having passed a body of laws, which were transmitted to England but were not confirmed.

In May, 1673, sir Thomas Lynch called another assembly; but dissolved it after sitting only a few days; and in January following, a new assembly was called, which met the 18th February; and on the 14th of March a new body of laws was passed, which were transmitted to England, but not confirmed by the crown.

On the 3d of December, 1674, lord Vaughan was appointed governor of Jamaica. A council, consisting of twelve persons, was named in the commission, with power to him to expel or suspend any one of them, and in case of vacancies to fill up the council to nine. He was also empowered to call assemblies, according to the usage of the island; and with the council and assembly, to pass laws, which laws were to be in force for two years, unless the crown's pleasure was in the mean-time signified to the contrary, and no longer, except they were approved and confirmed within that time. In the passing of these laws, the governor was to have a negative voice, and to dissolve any assembly as he should think proper.

Upon lord Vaughan's arrival in his government, he called an assembly, which met on the 26th of April, 1675, and passed a new body of laws.

It does not appear when this assembly was dissolved; but in March, 1676-7, writs were issued for a new assembly, which met on the 26th of that month; and having passed several other laws, they were dissolved on the 26th of July: and the laws passed by both assemblies having been transmitted to England, the council took them into their consideration, and after frequent deliberations upon them, and many alterations proposed, they were referred with the council's observations upon them, to the Attorney General, to consider thereof, and to form a new body of laws for the good government of this island.

With these laws, the council took into consideration the state and constitution of Jamaica, and made two Reports upon it. [See the two first Articles in the Case below.]

These Reports having been confirmed, a commission passed the great seal, constituting lord Carlisle governor of Jamaica; by which and by the instructions annexed thereto, [See the third and fourth Articles in the Case below.] the form of government proposed in the council's report was adopted and established.*

Upon lord Carlisle's arrival in his government, he found the people very much dissatisfied with, and averse to this new form of government; as will better appear by his letters, [inserted in the Case below.]

The right honourable the Lords of the Committee for trade and plantations having this day presented to the Board the ensuing Report, viz.

May it please your majesty;

We having, according to the trust reposed in us in reference to your majesty's plantations, taken into consideration the present state and government of the island of Jamaica,† par-

* "In the beginning of 1678," says Edwards, "a new system of legislation was adopted for Jamaica. This system was nearly founded on the plan of the Irish constitution under Poyning's act: and in order to enforce it, the earl of Carlisle was appointed chief governor of the island. The privy council of England prepared a code of laws, and a bill for settling a perpetual revenue on the crown, which his lordship was to offer to the assembly; requiring them at the same time to adopt the whole code without any amendment or alteration. The heads of all bills, except those relating to money, were to be sent to his majesty after they had been suggested by the governor and council; if the king approved them, they were to be returned under the great seal, in the form of laws, and passed by the general assembly; which was to be convened for no other purpose than that, and voting the usual supplies, special orders from England being expected."

"The most probable opinion respecting the origin of this project seems to be this. In the year 1663, the assembly of Barbadoes were persuaded by very unlawful means, as will be shewn hereafter, to grant a perpetual revenue to the crown, of four and a half per cent. on the gross produce of that island. The Jamaica planters steadily refused to submit to a similar imposition; and this, it is likely, suggested in the mind of the king the idea of depriving them of their constitutional franchises, as a punishment for their non-compliance. Fortunately, however, neither secret intrigue nor open violence was attended with success."

† As to the operation of the laws of England within Colonies conquered by the arms of England, See the Case of Hall v. Campbell A. D. 1774, and the Notes to that Case, infra.

ticularly such matters as, from the nature of affairs as they now stand there, we have judged necessary to be recommended to the right honourable the earl of Carlisle, whom your majesty has been pleased to nominate and constitute governor of the said island; and having, after several meetings, agreed upon the following particulars, we most humbly crave leave to lay them before your majesty, for your royal determination.

The first point that did occur, most worthy to be considered by us, was the power and manner of enacting laws for the civil, military, and ecclesiastical government; and upon taking a view of what has been practised, since your majesty's happy restoration in the legislation, we find, that the methods and authorities, for the framing and ordaining the said laws, have been only such as were directed by your royal commission unto your majesty's several governors, or prescribed by the instructions given them from time to time; and that as the constitution and exigency of affairs have often changed, so your majesty has thought fit variously to adapt your royal orders thereunto; and by the last commission, given unto the lord Vaughan, your majesty was pleased to empower his lordship, with the advice of your majesty's council, from time to time to summon general assemblies of freeholders, who have authority, with the advice and consent of the governor and council, to make and ordain laws for the government of the island; which laws are to be in force for the space of two years, except in the mean time your majesty's pleasure be signified to the contrary; and no longer, unless they be confirmed by your majesty within that time. Having, therefore, directed our thoughts towards the consequences and effects, which have been produced or may arise from this authority derived unto the said freeholders and planters, which we observe to have received a daily increase by the resolutions they have taken, less agreeable to your majesty's intention, we do most humbly offer our opinions, that the laws transmitted by the lord Vaughan, which are now under consideration in order to be enacted by your majesty, may be entrusted in the hands of the earl of Carlisle, who, upon his arrival in the island, may offer them unto the next assembly, that they may be consented unto as laws originally coming from your majesty; and that, for the future, no legislative assembly be called without your majesty's special directions; but that upon emergencies, the governor do acquaint your majesty by letters, with the necessity of calling such an assembly, and pray your majesty's consent and directions for their meeting; and at the same time do present unto your majesty a scheme of such acts as he shall think fit and necessary, that your majesty may take the same into consideration, and return them in the form wherein your majesty shall think fit that they be enacted; that the governor, upon receipt of your majesty's commands, shall then summon an assembly, and propose the said laws for their consent, so that the same method, in legislative matters, be made use of in Jamaica, as in Ireland, according to the form prescribed by Poyning's law; and that therefore the present style of enacting laws, By the governor, council, and representatives of the Commons assembled, be converted into the style of, Be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the consent of the General Assembly.

We are further of opinion, that no escheats, fines, forfeitures, or penalties, be mentioned in the said laws, to be applied to the public use of the island; and that your majesty do instruct your governor to dispose thereof for the support of the government. It is also our opinion, that in all laws for levying of money, and raising a public revenue, the clauses whereby the said levies are appropriated unto the public use of the island, without any mention made of your majesty, or unto your majesty for the said public use, are so far derogatory to your majesty's right of sovereignty, that they ought to be, for the future, altered and made agreeable to the style of England.

We do likewise offer it unto your majesty as necessary, that no minister be received in Jamaica without licence from the right reverend the lord bishop of London; and that none having his lordship's licence be rejected, without sufficient cause alledged; as also, that in the direction of all church affairs, the minister be admitted into the respective vestries.

And whereas it has upon some occasions proved inconvenient, that the members of the council have been constituted by your majesty's commission; we are of opinion, that for the future, they be only named in the instructions of the governor; for the strengthening of whose authority under your majesty, we do offer, that he may have power to suspend any of the said members, if he see just cause, without receiving the advice and consent of the council; and also, that none of the said members so suspended, or by your majesty's order displaced, from that trust, may be permitted to be received into the General Assembly.

And whereas nothing can contribute more to the welfare of your majesty's island, than that all means be found out for the increase of trade; we do offer, for the encouragement thereof, that a mint be allowed in Jamaica, in such manner that no prejudice do arise unto your majesty's other dominions, or that what bullion is brought from thence may be coined here in England; provided that all such coins may bear your majesty's royal superscription, and not be imposed in payment elsewhere.—All which, &c.

His majesty, taking the same into consideration, was pleased to approve thereof; and did order, That the right honourable Mr. Secretary

Coventry do prepare a commission and instructions for his majesty's royal signature, for the earl of Carlisle, according to the tenor of the said report.

At the Court at Whitehall, Feb. 15, 1677-8.

Present, the KING's most excellent Majesty in Council. Upon reading this day at the Board, a Report from the Right Hon. the Lords of the Committee for Trade and Plantations, in the words following:

May it please your majesty; Having received, on the 12th of January last past, from the right honourable Mr. Secretary Coventry, a Draft of a Commission and Instructions for the earl of Carlisle, whom your majesty has appointed to be your governor of Jamaica, and having, after several additions and alterations, remitted the same unto Mr. Secretary Coventry on the 2d instant, we crave leave to offer to your majesty the most material points which did occur unto us upon perusal of the said draft; which are as followeth:

1. As we are of opinion that all members of council in Jamaica may, for the more easy passing of laws, be admitted into the assembly, if duly elected by the freeholders; so we cannot but advise your majesty, that as well the members of the said council suspended by your majesty's governor, as the members displaced by your majesty, may be rendered incapable, during such suspension, of being admitted into the assembly.

2. That although your majesty has, by an order of the 16th of November last past, thought fit that no assembly be called without your majesty's especial leave and directions; we think it very important, for your majesty's service, and safety of the island, that in case of invasion, rebellion, or some other very urgent necessity, your majesty's governor may have power, with the consent of the assembly, to pass acts for raising of money, to answer the occasions arising by such urgent necessities.

3. That whereas hitherto, within your majesty's island of Jamaica, the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy have not been imposed on persons that bear any part of the government, except the members and officers of the council, and all judges and justices; so, for the prevention of future inconveniencies, and greater assurance of loyalty towards your majesty, we are humbly of opinion, that all persons elected into the assembly shall, before their sitting, take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, which your majesty's governor shall commissionate fit persons, under the seal of the island, to administer unto them, and that, without taking the said oaths, none shall be capable of sitting, though elected.

We have likewise, pursuant to your majesty's orders, prepared a body of laws, such as the right honourable the earl of Carlisle may be empowered to carry with him, and to offer unto the assembly of Jamaica for their consent. Whereas we do not find, since your majesty's happy Restoration, that any laws transmitted from your majesty's plantations, have been confirmed by your majesty, either under the great seal of England, or any other signification of your majesty's pleasure (the act of four and a half per cent. in the Caribbee islands only excepted, which was confirmed by the order of council); and the intended method of enacting laws in Jamaica hath not as yet been put in practice; we humbly crave your majesty's royal determination, whether the said laws shall pass only by order of your majesty in council, or under the great seal of England, that we may accordingly be enabled fully to present them unto your royal view.—All which, &c.

His majesty was pleased to order, that Mr. Secretary Coventry do prepare lord Carlisle's commission and instructions concerning these matters accordingly: and as for the laws of the said island, his majesty by an order of the board, hath been pleased this day to declare his pleasure, that they shall pass under the great seal of England.

Extract of King Charles the Second's Commission to the Earl of Carlisle.

And we do hereby give and grant unto you, with the advice and consent of the said council, full power and authority from time to time as need shall require, to summon or call general assemblies of the freeholders and planters within the said island, and other the territories under your government, in such manner and form as hath been formerly practised and used in the said island of Jamaica.

And our will and pleasure is that the persons thereupon duly elected, and having before their sitting taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy (which you shall commissionate fit persons, under the seal of our island, to administer; and without taking which none shall be capable of sitting, though elected) shall be called and held the General Assembly of the said island of Jamaica, and other the territories thereon depending; and shall have full power and authority to agree and consent unto all such statutes and ordinances for the public peace, welfare and good government of the said island, and other the territories thereon depending, the people and inhabitants thereof, and such others as shall resort thereunto, and for the benefit of our heirs and successors, as having been by you with the advice and consent of the said council, framed and transmitted unto us, in order to be here enacted by our giving our consent thereunto, shall be by us approved and remitted unto you under our great seal of England; which said statutes, laws and ordinances, are to be by you framed as near as conveniently may be, to the laws and statutes of our kingdom of England.

And we do hereby nevertheless, authorize and empower you, in case of invasion, rebellion or some very great necessity, to pass an act or acts by and with the consent of the General Assembly, without transmitting the same first to us, to raise money within the said island and the territories within your government, to answer the occasions arising by such urgent necessities.

And we give you likewise full power from time to time, as you shall judge it necessary, to dissolve all General Assemblies as aforesaid.

Extract of King Charles the Second's Instructions to the Earl of Carlisle.

And whereas by our commission we have directed, that for the future no General Assembly be called without our special directions; but that upon occasion you do acquaint us by letter with the necessity of calling such an assembly, and pray our consent and directions for their meeting; you shall at the same time transmit unto us, with the advice and consent of the council, a draft of such acts as you shall think fit and necessary to be passed, that we may take the same into our consideration, and return them in the form we shall think fit to be enacted in: and upon the receipt of our commands, you shall then summon an assembly, and propose the said laws for their consent.

And accordingly we have ordered to be delivered unto you herewith, a certain body of laws for the use of our said island, framed in pursuance of other laws transmitted unto us by former governors, with such alterations and amendments as we have thought fit, with the advice of our privy-council here; which upon your arrival in our said island, you shall offer unto the next assembly, that they may be consented to and enacted as laws originally coming from us.

We are willing, nevertheless, that in case of invasion, rebellion or some very urgent necessity, you pass an act or acts with the consent of the general assembly, without transmitting the same first unto us, to raise money within the said island and the territories depending thereon, to answer the occasions arising by such urgent necessities.

And you shall take care that the present style of enacting laws, "By the governor, council and representatives of the Commons assembled," be converted into the style of, "Be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the consent of the General Assembly."

Extract of a Letter from the Earl of Carlisle to Mr. Secretary Coventry.

I have spoken with several of the council, and find some of them much dissatisfied at the alterations in the laws and manner of passing them, particularly at the latter part of the clause in the militia bill: 'but that in all things he may, upon all occasions or emergencies, act as captain-general and governor in chief, according to and in pursuance of all the powers and authorities given unto him by his majesty's commission; any thing in this case or any other to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding;' which they are jealous of, lest that thereby they shall make it legal to execute all instructions that either are or shall be sent to me, or any other succeeding governor; which scruple might easily be avoided, but that the great seal being affixed to the laws, I have no power to make alteration, which I might have done, both to their satisfaction and the preservation of the king's rights. The act for the revenue too, I fear, will not without difficulty pass; but I shall endeavour all I can to bring them to pass, for which I have greater inducements than my being here, without any hopes from the present state of the treasury, which is exhausted and in debt for their new fortifications.

Copy of a Letter to Mr. Secretary Coventry from the Earl of Carlisle.

St. Jago, Sept. 11, 1678.

Sir;—The assembly met on the 2nd instant, and, I find, are so dissatisfied with the alteration of the government, that I question whether they will pass any of these laws: they have objections against several of them; as the act for the revenue that is perpetual, and may be diverted: they are nettled at the expression in the preamble, that the revenue was raised by the governor and council: and though they cannot deny it to be truth, yet they say that council was elected by the people, and though continued under the name of a council, yet was in effect an assembly or representative of the people.

I have given into their hands a copy of that act and fourteen more, and gave them liberty to compare them with the original. The act of militia, and some others, I keep by me, till I see what they will do with those they have. All the acts are not yet transcribed; for but one man can write at a time, and they are bulky; but I have enough to keep them employed. The Speaker came to me on Saturday, to desire liberty to adjourn for a few days, which I consented to, and they adjourned till four-day morning. Lieut. col. Beeston is Speaker, whom I recommended to them upon sir H. Morgan's assurances that he would behave himself well. He hath the general repute of an honest and discreet gentleman, though he signed the order about the privateer, at which so much offence was taken; but I am satisfied he was no further faulty, than in complying with the directions of the assembly; and I the rather proposed him (whom they had a mind to chuse) to gain the point quietly of recommending; which my lord Vaughan, I am told, neglected to do.

The assembly appointed a committee to compare these laws with their former: It is said they differ in many things, especially from those laws last sent from lord Vaughan, which are most usefully framed for their present benefit.

Popular discourses prevail here as well as in England; and I find a few men's notions have taken such place with the leading men of the assembly, that they rather set themselves to frame arguments against the present constitution; than to accommodate things under it. I cannot yet tell you what course I shall take to remove this difficulty: but I will do the best I can. I find one of the council more faulty in this, than any man in the island, but am unwilling to name him, till I have tried the utmost to reclaim him.

Whilst we are here busy about small matters, I doubt your hands are full of greater and may therefore forget us. We hear the French and Dutch are agreed. I am, sir, &c.

CARLISLE.

Extract of a Letter from the Earl of Carlisle to the Committee.

My lords; I have met with the difficulties here I foresaw, but could neither avoid nor prevent in England. The general assembly meeting the 2d of September last, I recommended and sent to them the several bills I brought over under the great seal of England, for their consent to be enacted; but being much dissatisfied at the new frame of government, and their losing their deliberative part of power in altering and amending, they would not pass any one of them, but threw them all out; but prepared an address, with a bill of impost upon wines and other strong liquors for one year, without giving me notice thereof, in such terms and form as was not fit for me to pass it: but afterwards changing the style of enacting, as directed in my instructions, with some other amendments to this bill, the public necessities of the island, having contracted many debts from new fortifications, and salaries already due requiring it; I gave the royal assent; and then, on the 12th this instant October, I dissolved them. My earnest suit to all your lordships is, that you will please to have me in your thoughts, and the present state of this colony under your lordships' consideration, for some expedient which may be elucidatory to the power given me by my commission and instructions, which may quiet the minds of persons generally dissatisfied in this island, which is most certainly under the greatest hopes of all the islands in the West Indies, and therefore most fit for to be encouraged with the king's countenance and support, with good and acceptable laws.

What bills I shall send to Mr. Secretary Coventry, I pray may be speedily dispatched, when brought before your lordships, and received, and ordered to be passed through all offices without delay, being in part of what is so very much wanting towards the support of the good government of this island.

Copy of a Letter from the Earl of Carlisle to the Committee.

My lords; A fortnight ago I gave you an account upon what terms I had parted with the assembly. I have since thoroughly considered of what might in this place most conduce to his majesty's service, and could not think of any better expedient than to send the bearer, Mr.

Atkinson, to wait upon your lordships. He was secretary to sir Thomas Lyuch and my lord Vaughan, and has been enough acquainted with all my proceedings since my arrival, so is perfectly able to satisfy your lordships in any thing you may desire to know concerning the place, and to lay before you all the several interests of his majesty relating to it.

My lords, I find that the present form appointed for the making and passing of laws, considering the distance of the place, is very impracticable, besides very distasteful to the sense of the people here, as you may observe by the assembly's address to me; and if your lordships will please to move his majesty to send me a general instruction to call another assembly, and to re-enact and make what laws are fit for this place, I could then order the matter to conclude effectually to his majesty's service. I have, by Mr. Atkinson, sent you the drafts of such bills as are the most fundamental, and chiefly concern his majesty's interest; and I do assure you that I will not, in any material point, vary from them. He will, when your lordships order him to attend you, lay them all before you, and I believe, give your lordships such thorough satisfaction, that you will rest assured that what I desire is for his majesty's service, and that I shall be enough enabled by it to settle every thing upon so good a foundation, that neither his majesty nor your lordships will ever repent of having made any deference to my opinion. In it, my lords, much success depends upon the dispatch, and of the circumstances Mr. Atkinson will give you an account. His business is wholly to attend your lordships, and, I believe, he will always be in the way. He has prayed me to intercede with your lordships to excuse what errors he may commit as having been a West Indian for these eight years past; and do on his behalf beg that favour of your lordships; but hope that he will prove so discreet, as to give your lordships no manner of offence. I thought it the readiest and best way to have all things rightly understood, and do hope that issue will be produced from it.

I am your lordships' most humble

And obedient servant,

St. Jago de la Vega, Nov. 1678. CARLELE.

Extract of a Letter from the Earl of Carlisle to Mr. Secretary Coventry.

On the 2d of September last, the general assembly met; but under so much dissatisfaction, from the new frame of government, and their losing their deliberate part of power in framing, altering, and amending laws, that they spent near a fortnight very uneasily about some of the laws, and would have begun with the bill of revenue, to have thrown that out first, as a mark of their disallowing the new method of government, being so highly incensed that they were near questioning the king's power and authority to do it: insomuch, that I, taking the maintenance thereof to be in my charge, and finding some of the council equally disgusted at the change of government, and foreseeing that it was like to encourage discontent in the assembly to take them off and leave the assembly upon their humour by themselves, I thought it absolutely necessary to put this question to each of the counsellors, in these words: "Do you submit, and consent to this present form of government, which his majesty hath been pleased to order for this island of Jamaica?" to which the chief-justice, col. Long, refused to answer, with two more, col. Charles Whitfield and col. Thomas Freeman. The chief-justice being a man of very great influence upon the assembly, I presently suspended, and gave the other two (less dangerous) till morning to consider on it; and then the chief-justice sent to me his submission under his hand, and col. Freeman submitted; but col. Charles Whitfield, otherwise a very good man, went away into the country.

The assembly received and examined all the laws I brought over, and drew up their reasons against passing them; of each, many were very frivolous, and the best was, because they were not compared with and amended by the last laws of my lord Vaughan's, now with you, and received some two days before my coming away, the fleet then staying in the Downs, and my departure much pressed upon the expectation of war. These reasons against the revenue bill I answered individually; but no means or endeavours, either I myself, the council, or both could use, would prevail with them to pass any one of them; and I look upon this to be their chief reason, that by not passing them they might the better shew their dislike of that new way of government; though they urge this for their enjoying a power of altering and amending laws, the necessity of changing them as often as occasions do require; and the distance from this place is so great, that, before the king's approbation can be obtained to a law, and returned hither, it may be fit for the public good either to lay that law aside, or much to change and alter it: and indeed in this part of the objection I think they are in the right, for that they will want temporary laws till the colony be better grown; and upon thorough consideration of the whole matter in this part, I am of opinion, it is very adviseable and requisite that there should be leave and power from the king to make laws (not relating to his majesty's power or prerogative) to endure for some term, till his royal approbation may be had therein; and of this I do earnestly entreat your care.

Having used all methods possible with the several members apart, and jointly with the body of the assembly, for the passing the laws, I was, after many conferences and debates, and several adjournments, frustrated, and they threw them all out. Afterwards, in a full body, by the Speaker, they gave me the inclosed address, and presented to me a bill for — public impost, prepared, without giving me notice thereof, in such terms and forms, as was not fit for me to pass it in: but at last in some parts consented to such amendments as I and the council thought fit, changing the style of enacting, as directed in my instructions, but restraining it to one year, from a fear that, if they should have made it perpetual, they should be assembled no more, but be governed by governor and council, as they were in col. D'Oyley's time, when they enacted laws, not only for the revenue, but other occasions, by governor and council, and some part of sir Charles Lyttleton's time, as appears by our council-book upon the place; and sir Thomas Modyford had an instruction to continue this revenue by order of governor and council, the assembly in his life time passing it perpetual; and in sir Thomas Lynch's time the assembly made it perpetual; but for want of the king's consent, they both are fallen; but now, the assembly say, they are of a better understanding than to give the reins out their own hands.

To this bill, the island's affairs being under great pressures from public debts contracted for the new fortifications, and salaries already due, I gave the royal assent: and then, being the 12th instant, I dissolved them.

Which having done, and not being satisfied with the behaviour of the assembly in their proceedings in relation to the government I stood charged with, most of them being in military trusts, I put this question to each of them: "Do you submit to this form of government, which his majesty hath been pleased to order for this island of Jamaica?" to which several of them neither gave me a dutiful nor cheerful answer: some did, and at this some were much dissatisfied.

MAY it please your Excellency; We, the members chosen by his majesty's writ to be the general assembly for this his island of Jamaica, do, with a great deal of thankfulness, acknowledge the princely care which his majesty hath been ever pleased to have of this his colony, and of which your excellency hath likewise given to us very late and fresh assurances: and in obedience to his majesty's commands, we have perused the several bills which your excellency gave us; and, having duly examined the matters contained in them, there being divers fundamental errors, which we particularly observed, and did cause them to be entered in our Journal; and from the consideration of them we cannot but reflect, and do humbly beg your excellency to represent unto his most sacred majesty, the great inconveniencies which are like to redound unto this his island by this method and manner of passing of laws, which is absolutely impracticable, and will not only tend to the great discouragement of the present planters, but likewise put a very fatal stop to any further prosecution of the improvement of this place; there being nothing that invites people more to settle and remove their family and stocks into this remote part of the world, than the assurance they have always of being governed in such manner as that none of their rights should be lost, so long as they were within the dominions of the kingdom of England: nor can we believe that his majesty would have made this alteration, had he been truly informed of his own interests, and of that which is proper and natural for the constitution of this island.

My lord, you, that are now our governor, and are upon this place, cannot but distinguish both, and plainly see that which, at great distance, is impossible to be known, being always distinguished with the false colours of interest and design. It is to you therefore we address ourselves; and do humbly majesty, which we do from the bottom of our hearts unfeignedly declare, that we are his true, faithful, and loyal subjects. In the next place, sir, we humbly beg you to lay before his majesty the true condition of this island, and the several circumstances wherein it stands. The situation and natural advantages of the place will very probably, by God's blessing, make it very considerable. It were pity, therefore, that any stop in its infancy should be put to it, which may hinder its future growth, and disappoint those hopes which his majesty hath ever had, and which will no doubt come to pass, that, if this island be encouraged by good government and wholesome laws, it will effectually serve very many interests, both of his majesty's crown and the nation's trade.

Sir, the present form of the government, as it is now appointed, has these plain and manifest inconveniencies in it:

1st. That the distance of this place renders it impossible to be put in practice, and does not in any manner fall under the same consideration as Ireland does, from which, we conclude, the example is taken.

2d. The nature of all colonies is changeable, and consequently the laws must be adapted to the interest of the place, and must alter with it.

3d. It is no small satisfaction, that the people, by their representatives, have a deliberative power in the making of laws; the negative and barely resolving power being not according to the rights of Englishmen, and practised no where but in those commonwealths where aristocracy prevails.

4th. This manner of form of government brings all things absolute, and puts it into the power of a governor to do what he pleases; which is not his majesty's interest, and may be a temptation for even good men to commit great partialities and errors.

5th. The method which has been always used, both in this island and all other colonies, in the making of laws, was a greater security to his majesty's prerogative, than the present form; for a governor durst not consent to any thing against his interest; and if he did, the signification of the king's pleasure determined the laws, so that his majesty had thereby a double negative.

Thus, sir, we have truly laid before your excellency our real sense; and do hope that your excellency, being thoroughly satisfied of the mischiefs which will certainly arise to this place, from the reasons we have given, will in that manner represent our condition to his majesty; that he may be thereby induced to give an instruction to your excellency, to pass such laws as are municipal and fit for us, and in the same manner which has been ever practised in this island, and other his majesty's colonies; we having no other claim in it than to express our duty to our king, and our unfeigned service and gratitude to your excellency, for mediating that which is so much for his majesty's and the island's interest.

And we do here likewise present unto your excellency a bill for raising a public impost unto his majesty, his heirs and successors, for the support of this his government; and do hereby beg your excellency to accept of it as a real demonstration of our loyalty to our prince, and service to your excellency, with assurance that we shall, upon all occasions, be ready to express such further testimonies of the same as may be suitable to our duty and allegiance.

At the Court at Whitehall, April 4, 1679.

Present, the KING's most excellent majesty in Council.

Whereas the right honourable the Lords of the committee for trade and plantations did this day make report unto his majesty in council.

That having, in pursuance of his majesty's order considered the present state and constitution of Jamaica, and the government thereof, as it is settled by his majesty's command, their lordships see no reasons why any alterations should be made in the method of making laws according to the usage of Ireland, for which their lordships are preparing reasons to evince the necessity and legality of the same: and that whereas a ship is now lying in the Downs, bound for that island, their lordships advise, that the right honourable Mr. Secretary Coventry do, by this conveyance, inform the earl of Carlisle of his majesty's pleasure herein, with directions that all things be disposed to this end; and that, in the mean time, the present laws enacted by lord Vaughan be continued by proclamation or otherwise, until his majesty's pleasure be further known; as also that his lordship do, by the first conveyance, send over an authentic copy of the act for a public impost, lately enacted there, according to his lordship's instructions for matters of that nature.

His majesty, having thought fit to approve thereof, was pleased to order, as it is hereby ordered, That the right honourable Mr. Secretary Coventry do signify his majesty's pleasure unto the earl of Carlisle, according to the said report.

At the Court at Whitehall, May 28, 1679.

Present, the KING's most excellent majesty in Council.

Whereas there was this day read at the board, a Report from the right honourable the lords of the committee for trade and plantations, in the words following, viz.

May it please your majesty: We have, in obedience to your majesty's commands, entered into the present state of your majesty's island of Jamaica, in order to propose such means as may put an end to the great discouragement your majesty's good subjects there lie under by the unsettled condition thereof, occasioned by the refusal of the laws lately offered by the earl of Carlisle to the assembly for their consent; at which proceedings, dissatisfaction appears to have risen in the manner following:

By the commission granted by your majesty unto the lord Vaughan and several preceding governors, it was your royal pleasure to entrust the assembly of Jamaica with a power to frame and enact laws by the advice and consent of the governor and council; which laws were to continue in force for the space of two years, and no longer: but so it hath happened, that your majesty, finding the inconveniences which did attend that power and manner of making laws, by the irregular, violent, and unwarrantable proceedings of the assembly, was pleased, with advice of your privy council, to provide, by the earl of Carlisle's commission, that no laws should be enacted in Jamaica, but such as being framed by the governor and council, and transmitted unto your majesty for your royal approbation, were afterwards remitted to Jamaica, and consented unto by the assembly there; and in pursuance thereof, the earl of Carlisle carried over a body of laws under the great seal of England; which laws, upon his lordship's arrival there, have been rejected by the general assembly, upon grounds and reasons contained in an address to your majesty's governor, and in divers letters received from lordship in that behalf.

1st. In the first place, we find they are unsatisfied with the clause in the militia bill, whereby it is provided, that the governor may, upon all occasions or emergencies, act as governor in chief, according to and in pursuance of all the powers and authorities given unto him by your majesty's commission; fearing that thereby they shall make it legal to execute all instructions that either are or shall be sent your majesty's governor.

2dly. They have likewise rejected the bill for raising a public revenue, as being perpetual, and liable (as they say) to be diverted.

3dly. It is objected, that the said laws contain divers fundamental errors.

4thly. That they were not compared with, and amended by, the last laws sent over by lord Vaughan.

5thly. That the distance of the place renders the present method of passing laws wholly impracticable.

6thly. That the nature of all colonies is changeable, and consequently the laws must be adapted to the interest of the place, and alter with it.

7thly. That thereby they lose the satisfaction of a deliberative power in making laws.

8thly. That this form of government renders your governor absolute.

9thly. That by the former method of enacting laws, your majesty's prerogative was better secured.

These being the objections and pretences, upon which the assembly has, with so much animosity, proceeded to reject those bills transmitted by your majesty, we cannot but offer, for your majesty's information and satisfaction, such a short answer thereunto, as may not only give a testimony of the unreasonableness of their proceedings, but also furnish your governor, when occasion shall serve, with such arguments, as may be fit to be used in justification of your majesty's commission and powers granted unto him.

1st. It is not without the greatest presumption, that they go about to question your majesty's power of the militia in that island, since it has been allowed and declared, even by the laws of this your kingdom, that the sole supreme government, command and disposition of the militia, and of all forces by sea and land and of all forts and places of strength, is residing in your majesty, within all your majesty's dominions.

2d. The objection, made against the bill for the public revenue, hath as little ground, since its being perpetual is no more than what was formerly offered by them unto your majesty, during the government of sir Thomas Lynch, in the same measure and proportion as is now proposed; nor can it be diverted, since provision is thereby expressly made, that the same shall be for the better support of that government; besides, that it is not suitable to the duty and modesty of subjects, to suspect your majesty's justice or care for the government of that colony, whose settlement and preservation have been most particularly carried on by your majesty's tender regard, and by the great expence of your own treasure.

3d. It cannot with any truth be said, that these laws contain many and great errors, nothing having been done therein but in pursuance of former laws, at divers times enacted by the assembly, and with the advice of your majesty's privy council, as well as the opinion and approbation of your attorney-general, upon perusal of the same.

4th. To the fourth objection it may be answered, that if any thing had been found of moment or importance in the last parcel of laws transmitted by the lord Vaughan, your majesty's tender care of your subjects' welfare, would have been such, as not to have sent those bills imperfect, or defective in any necessary matter.

5th. As to the distance of the place, which renders (as they say) the present method of making laws altogether impracticable, your majesty having been pleased to regulate the same, by the advice of your privy council, according to the usage of Ireland, such care was taken, as that no law might be wanting which might conduce to the well-being of the plantation, and that nothing might be omitted which in all former governments had been thought necessary; nor is it likely that this colony is subject to greater accidents than your kingdom of Ireland, so as to require a more frequent and sudden change of laws, in other cases than such as are already provided for upon emergencies, or in other manner than is directed by your majesty's commission; whereby the inhabitants have free access to make complaints to your governor and council, of any defect in any old law, or to give reasons for any new one, which, being modelled by the governor and council into form of law, and transmitted unto your majesty, if by your majesty and council found reasonable, may be transmitted back thither, to be enacted accordingly.

6th. It was sufficiently apparent unto your majesty, that laws must alter with the interest of the place, when you were graciously pleased, to lodge such a power in that government as might not only from time to time, with your majesty's approbation, and by the advice both of your privy-council here, and of the governor and council there, enable the assembly to enact new laws answerable to their growing necessities, but even, upon urgent occasions, to provide, by raising money, for the security of the island, without attending your majesty's orders or consent.

7th. It is not to be doubted but the assembly have endeavoured to grasp all power, as well as that of a deliberative voice, in making laws; but how far they have thereby entrenched upon your majesty's prerogative, and exceeded the bounds of their duty and loyalty, upon this pretence, may appear by their late exorbitant and unwarrantable proceedings during the government of the lord Vaughan, in ordering and signing a warrant unto the marshal of the island, your majesty's officer of justice, for the stopping and preventing the execution of a sentence passed according to the ordinary forms of law, upon a notorious pirate, and disturber of your majesty's peace: and they have further taken upon them, by virtue of this deliberative power, to make laws contrary to those of England, and to imprison your majesty's subjects; nor have they forborne to raise money by public acts, and to dispose of the same according to their will and pleasure, without any mention made of your majesty, which has never in like case been practised in any of your majesty's kingdoms. How far, therefore, it is fit to intrust them with a power which they have thus abused, and to which they have no pretension of right, was the subject of your majesty's royal commission, when you were pleased to put a restraint upon those enormities and to take the reins of government into your own hands, which they in express words against their duty and allegiance, have challenged, and refused to part with.

8th. It cannot with any truth be supposed, that, by the present form of government, the governor is rendered absolute, since he is now, more than ever, become accountable unto your majesty, for all his most important deliberations and actions, and is not warranted to do any thing but according to law, and your majesty's commission and instructions, given by advice of your privy council.

9th. And whether your majesty's prerogative is prejudiced by the present instructions, is more the concernment of your majesty, and subject of your own care, than of their considerations.

Lastly, and in general, we humbly conceive, that it would be a great satisfaction to your subjects there inhabiting, and an invitation to strangers, when they shall know what laws they are to be governed by; and a great ease to the planters, not to be continually obliged to attend the assemblies, to re-enact old laws, which your majesty has now thought fit, in a proper form, to ascertain and establish; whereas the late power of making temporary laws could be understood to be of no longer continuance, than until such wholesome laws, founded upon so many years experience, should be agreed on by the people, and finally enacted by your majesty, in such manner as hath been practised in either of your majesty's dominions to which your English subjects have transplanted themselves. For as they cannot pretend to further privileges, than have been granted to them, either by charter, or some solemn act under your great seal; so, having from the first beginning of that plantation, been governed by such instructions as were given by your majesty unto your governors, according to the power your majesty had originally over them, and which you have by no one authentic act ever yet parted with, and having never had any other right to assemblies, than from the permission of the governors, and that only temporary, and for probation, it is to be wondered how they should presume to provoke your majesty, by pretending a right to that which hath been allowed them merely out of favour, and discourage your majesty from future favours of that kind, when what your majesty ordered for a temporary experiment, to see what form would best suit the safety and interest of the island, shall be construed to be a total resignation of the power inherent in your majesty, and a devolution of it to themselves and their wills, without which, neither law nor government, the essential ingredients of their subsistence and well-being, may take place among them.

Since, therefore, it is evident that the assembly of Jamaica have, without any just grounds, and with so much animosity and undutifulness, proceeded to reject the marks of your majesty's favour towards them, and that your majesty's resolutions in this case are like to be the measure of respect and obedience to your royal commands in other colonies; we can only offer, as a cure for irregularities past, and a remedy against all further inconveniences, that your majesty would please to authorize and empower your governor to call another assembly, and to represent unto them the great convenience and expediency of accepting and consenting unto such laws as your majesty has under your great seal transmitted unto them; and that, in case of refusal, his lordship be furnished with such powers as were formerly given unto col. D'Oyley, your first governor of Jamaica, and since unto other governors, whereby his lordship may be enabled to govern according to the laws of England, where the different nature and constitution of that colony may conveniently permit the same; and, in other cases, to act with the advice of the council, in such manner as shall be held necessary and proper for the good government of that plantation, until your majesty's further orders; and that, by all opportunities of conveyance, the governor do give your majesty a constant and particular account of all his proceedings, in pursuance of your instructions herein.

All which is most humbly submitted, &c.

Upon reading of which Report; and full debate thereupon, his majesty was pleased to approve the same; and the right honourable Mr. Secretary Coventry is hereby directed to prepare such suitable orders and instructions, as may answer the several parts and advices contained in the said Report.

ROBERT SOUTHWELL.

Extract of a Letter from the Committee to the Earl of Carlisle.

After our very hearty commendation unto your lordship, we have received two letters from you, the one of the 24th of October, the other of the 15th of November, 1678; both of which gave us an account, of the distaste the assembly had expressed at the new frame of government, and of their throwing out all the bills transmitted under the great seal; and your lordship having therein recommended unto us the speedy dispatch of the bills sent to Mr. Secretary Coventry, for passing them through the offices here, we did thereupon take the same into our consideration: but finding that they contained such clauses as we had formerly (your lordship being present) disallowed in the laws enacted by the lord Vaughan, as most prejudicial to his majesty's right and prerogative, one of them appropriating and disposing of the quit-rents in the same terms as was formerly done, so much to his majesty's dissatisfaction; another, declaring the laws of England to be in force, which clause (your lordship cannot but remember) was postponed here, upon very serious deliberation; besides divers other particulars, altogether unfit to be passed by his majesty: we have, withal, perused the several letters, which your lordship had written to Mr. Secretary Coventry, in relation to your government; and as for the laws, we could not advise his majesty to proceed in any other manner, than by giving assent to all another assembly, and to offer unto them the same laws your lordship carried over, as being the most usefully framed and settled, for the good of the island and his majesty's service: and that in case of refusal, you might be enabled to govern according to commissions and instructions given unto former governors, as your lordship will more fully understand by ~~our~~ Report unto his majesty, and the Order of Council thereupon, to which we refer your lordship, as setting forth at large the grounds and reasons inducing the resolutions his majesty has now taken.

Extract of a Letter from the Earl of Carlisle to Mr. Secretary Coventry.

St. Jago de la Vega, August 30, 1679.

Your packet by captain Buckingham, having inclosed his majesty's letter of the 31st of May last, and an order in council of the 28th of May, 1679, together with the animadversions of the council upon several points of the 23d of May last, and two letters from yourself, I received the 26th inst. at night. The next morning I read them in council. The assembly then having sat some seven days, to renew the bill for a revenue, the last being just expiring, I sent for the general assembly, and read the order of council, and the king's letter thereupon, to them, which I hope will have some good effect; but they came in as good time, so much contrary to their expectation. I herewith send you a copy of their address thereupon, which they presented to me, the 28th; and finding them nettled and warm, I thought it discretion to let them take time to digest their thoughts; and having continued the revenue bill for six months longer from the 1st of September next, I passed it, and then prorogued them till the 28th of October following.

Copy of a Vote of the Assembly, Aug. 22, 1679.

Die Veneris. The committee appointed to examine Mr. Martyn's accounts, reported that Mr. Martyn, appearing before them, said, that my lord had ordered him to come and tell them, that, both from the king and from my lord, he was not obliged to shew his accounts to the assembly; but that he had given them unto my lord, and his excellency had told him, that if any of the assembly had a mind to see them, they might see them there.

The house, considering the return of the committee ordered to inspect Mr. Martyn's accounts, re-assumed that debate, and thereupon did vote, That notwithstanding my lord's answer by Mr. Martyn to that committee, it was and is their undoubted and inherent right, that as all bills for money ought and do arise in their house, so they ought to appoint the disposal of it, and to receive and examine all the accounts concerning the same. Vera Copia.

ROWLAND POWELL.

Extract of a Letter from the Earl of Carlisle to the Committee.

St. Jago de la Vega, Sept. 15, 1679.

My Lords: Your lordships letters of the 25th of March, 4th of April, and 31st of May last, I received on the 26th of August, as also your lordships' orders, and reports to his majesty, touching the laws and government of Jamaica, which I communicated to the council (the assembly then sitting to continue the revenue bill, expiring the 2nd of September), on the 27th of August; and afterwards, the same day, I communicated, the council being present, his majesty's letter of the 31st of May last, and your lordships' order and report of the same date, to the assembly, which came to me as seasonably as they received them surprisedly, making me the next morning the inclosed address: upon which, having passed a bill of impost for six months, I prorogued them, by advice of the council, till the 28th of October next, hoping in that time they would fall off their heat, and, upon recollection, better bethink themselves of their duties and allegiance, and, upon my offering them again the laws, which I propose to do upon their first meeting, better demonstrate their obedience, by readily giving their consent that they might be enacted.

But, from what I can learn from the chief leaders among them, I find the same averness as formerly, averring that they will submit to wear, but never consent to make, chains, as they term this frame of government, for their posterities; so that I scarce expect better success, of which I have writ at large to Mr. Secretary Coventry.

Extract of a Letter from the Earl of Carlisle to Mr. Secretary Coventry.

St. Jago de la Vega, Nov. 23, 1679.

Sir: The assembly meeting on the 28th of October, I, with the council, went to them; commanded the council's report of the 28th of May, and his majesty's letter of the 31st of May last, to be read again to them; pressed them very much to consider how much it imported, at this juncture, for the interest of the island, that they should pass these laws I brought to them under the great seal of England, or at least part of them; desiring that any one or more of the assembly would there and then argue the reasonableness of their objection, which none of them would undertake; and so I left the body of laws with them. They having the last session passed a vote, that the raising money, and disposing of it, was the inherent right of the assembly (of which I had no account, either from the members or their Speaker, in fourteen days afterwards, they presuming it to be their privilege, that their proceedings should be kept secret from me), I then appointed and swore them a clerk, which before used to be of their own choice; and this they are very uneasy under.

They proceeded to read over the body of laws: notwithstanding the great care, pains and trouble, I had taken with them, both apart individually, as well as assembled together, they threw out and rejected all the laws, again adhering to their former reasons, rather than admitting or honouring those from their lordships, for rules of obedience.

I thereupon presently, with the council, framed a bill of revenue indefinite, and sent that to them : but that had no better success ; and they then attended me with the Address, to be presented to his majesty, which I herewith send you ; as also the humble desire of justification of his majesty's council thereupon, which I and they earnestly desire your favour in humbly presenting to his majesty, being unanimously agreed to by all the council. Colonel Samuel Long (chief justice of the island, whom I have found all along since my arrival here to be a most pertinacious abettor and cherisher of the assembly's stubbornness, in opposing this new frame of government, having had a hand, being their Speaker, in the leaving the king's name out of the revenue bill) refuses to join with the council in their genuine act, and has sufficiently possessed himself of the opinion of the Assembly, by advising and assisting them in the framing of their Address: thinking their resolutions to be unalterable as his own, he is withdrawn to his plantation, some thirty miles from this town, where, at this juncture, we have most need of council.

Upon serious and deliberate consideration of all which, I have sent him his quictus, and appointed Col. Robert Byndloss chief justice in his place, of whose fidelity to the king's interest I have many proofs, having formerly executed the place, and was now one of the judges of the supreme court.

I have also suspended col. Long from being one of the council, proposing, by the advice of the council, to bring or send him, with six more of the Assembly, to attend the king and council in England, to support their own opinions, reasons, and address, wherein they are not ordinarily positive ; and this I do from the council here unanimously agreeing, that there is no better expedient for the settlement of this government to a general consent.

Extract of a Letter from the Earl of Carlisle to the Committee.

St. Jago de la Vega, 23 Nov. 1679.

My Lords ; Mine of the 10th of September last to your lordships I hope you have received, and what I therein sent your lordships, as my conjecture in prospect since the general assembly's meeting on the 28th of October last, have found to be no vain prophecy.

Upon the assembly's meeting on that day, I with the council went to the place where they were met, and again, in the presence of the council and the assembly, commanded to be read your lordships' report of the 28th of May last past, made to his majesty, as also his majesty's commands to myself, of the 31st of the same ; and thereupon offered to the assembly the body of laws brought over under the great seal of England, for their consent ; at the same time declaring to them the great expediency it would be to all the officers of the island, and reason to persuade his majesty they were another people than represented at home ; that it would induce the king to gratify them in what was necessary ; and that, otherwise, they could not appear but in great contempt, to the lessening of the island's interest in his royal favour, and what I urged in general to them at their meeting, I had not been wanting to press to them apart individually before it ; then swore them a clerk of my appointing, which they took not well, alledging it was their right to choose their own clerk. I told them, no ; for that the king did grant by patent the clerk of the parliament, so that they were uneasily overruled. The reason of my doing this was from their having an opinion that the votes of the House should be kept a secret from me, and their passing a vote the former sessions that to raise money and dispose of the same, was a right inherent in the assembly, of which I had no notice in some fourteen days after, from any of them, or their Speaker.

I much urged the whole assembly freely to argue, in the presence of the council and their own members, for the reasonableness of the matter commanded by the king, that upon their discussing it openly and freely, they might be the better convinced of the necessity of their being dutiful therein : but none of them, in my presence and the council's would undertake it ; so we left them, and the body of laws with them.

Some days they spent in reading over again the body of laws under the great seal, left with them : but rejected the many arguments I had laboured them with, and threw out all the laws again, whereupon they appointed a committee to draw up an address, to be presented by me to his majesty on their behalfs : and in that time, with the council, I drew a bill of revenue indefinitely, and gave it myself to their Speaker ; but that bill had no better success, but was rejected also.

Upon this on the 13th instant, the Speaker and Assembly being sent for, to attend me in council, to show cause why they did reject the bill of revenue so framed by us in pursuance of his majesty's pleasure therein, they gave me no answer ; but by their Speaker, desired to present to me their Address, the Speaker contending to give it its due accent, by reading it himself ; a copy whereof is here sent inclosed.

This Address is founded greatly upon the advice of lieutenant colonel Samuel Long, chief justice of the island, and one of the king's council, who principally contends for the old frame of government, of whom the Assembly is highly opiated, and esteem him the patron of their rights and privileges as Englishmen, who had a hand in leaving the king's name out of the revenue bill, being their Speaker, and denies not his having a hand in framing and advising some parts of the Address, which in whole is not truth ; for,

1st, Whereas they allege, that the civil government commenced in my lord Windsor's time ; it is generally known and recorded in our council book, fifteen months before, in colonel D'Oyley's time ; and will be proved by sir Thomas Lynch, who then himself had an occasion of a trial by jury, the foreman of which was colonel Byndloss.

2dly, They alledge the readiness of governors to use martial law, particularly in sir Thomas Lyncl's time, which is here contradicted; for there was only an order in council for the putting it in force upon condition of any actual descent or invasion, and not otherwise; neither was it on foot really all this time here as I am credibly informed upon good enquiry.

3dly, As for its being in force in my time it was not from my affecting, but the council advising, and their desiring it; as also the putting off the courts till February, in favour generally of the planters. Then, for their alledging so much to be done during the martial law wholly at the charge of the country; that it is done, is true, but the charge thereof they would clog the revenue bill with, amounting to 1,238*l.* when, communibus annis, the bill of impost is but 1,500*l.* of which 1,238*l.* there is not yet made payment of one farthing, nor any prospect how it may, since the revenue is so much anticipated from the want of money in the treasury, occasioned by my lord Vaughan's letting fall the bill of revenue before his departure.

To his Excellency Charles Earl of Carlisle, Captain-General, Governor, and Commander in Chief of his majesty's Island of Jamaica, &c.—The humble Address of the Assembly of this his Majesty's Island in answer to the Report of the right honourable the Lords of the Committee of Trade and Plantations, made to his Majesty's Council, which we entreat his Excellency may be humbly presented to his most sacred Majesty and his Council.—

We, his majesty's most loyal and obedient subjects, the Assembly of this his island of Jamaica, cannot without infinite grief of mind read the Report made to his majesty by the right honourable the lords of the committee for trade and plantations; wherein by the relations made by their lordships unto his majesty, they have represented us as a people full of animosity, unreasonable, irregular, violent, undutiful, and transgressing both the bounds of duty and loyalty; the bitterness of which characters were we in the least part conscious to have deserved, we should, like Job, have said, "Behold, we are vile: what shall we answer; we will lay our hands upon our mouths."

But, lest our silence should argue our guilt, we shall, in all humility, endeavour to make appear we have always demeaned ourselves as becometh good and obedient subjects, and those who acknowledge and are truly sensible of the many favours received from his majesty; the truth of which resting only on matter of fact being related, and the false colours, which hitherto have been thrown on us, being washed off, we shall not doubt but his majesty will soon entertain a better opinion of his subjects of this island.

We must, therefore, humbly beg that his majesty will with patience be pleased to hear the account of our proceedings; which truly to manifest, we must be forced to look back so far as sir Charles Lyttleton's and sir Thomas Modyford's entrance upon their government.

At which time, we humbly conceive, the island began really to take up the form of a civil government, and wholly to lay aside that of an army, which until that time, was deemed the supreme authority; when after, upon their several arrivals, by order from his majesty, and according to the method of his majesty's most ancient plantations, they called Assemblies, and settled the government of the island in such good form, that until his excellency the earl of Carlisle's first arrival, his majesty thought not fit to alter it, though several governors in that time were changed, which must necessarily infer the goodness and reason of it, as well as the satisfaction of the people (since, from that time, they betook themselves to settle plantations) especially the merchants, by which means the estates here are wonderfully increased, as is evident by the great number of ships laden here by the industry of the planter; and the satisfaction they received by those wholesome laws, then begun, and until that time continued, the change of which laws we had no reason to expect, being done on such mature deliberation from home.

But to return to answer: the first thing their lordships are pleased to accuse us of, is presuming to question his majesty's power over the militia; which how much they are misinformed in it, will hereunder appear: but we must first repeat the clause, against which, we humbly conceive, we had just reasons to take exceptions, which clause is as followeth:

"Provided always, and it is hereby further enacted and declared by the authority aforesaid, that nothing, in this act contained, be expounded, construed, or understood, to diminish, alter, or abridge, the power of the governor or commander in chief for the time being; but that in all things he may, upon all occasions or exigencies, act as captain-general, and governor in chief, according to and in pursuance of all the powers and authorities given to him by his majesty's commission; any thing in this act or any other to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding."

In their lordships' observations, in which they take no notice that the power, given by that clause, extends as well to the governor as captain-general, nor of the words "any thing in this act or any other to the contrary notwithstanding," which words, being plain, need no references to expound them, being consented to, there is no occasion of making any other law, because that makes all the powers and authorities, given by his majesty's commission; and by that commission, the instructions, which shall be after given to him, shall be law, though it be to the nulling of any beneficial law, made either here or in England, by which we are secured both in life and estate; the like of which was never done in any of his majesty's dominions whatsoever, and is in effect to enact will to be a law, and will be construed (we fear)- to bind us by the old rule of law, that every man may renounce his own right; and if their lordships had been pleased to have as well remembered the other clauses of the act of the militia, we cannot think they would have said we had questioned his majesty's power over it; for no act of England gives his majesty the like power over the militia, as ours doth; for, on any apprehension of danger, the general with his council of officers have power to put the law martial on foot for what time they please, and to command us in our own persons, our servants, negroes, horses, even all that we have, to his majesty's service; which having been so often put in practice, will need the less proof; but how readily and willingly we have obeyed, and in that faith is best justified by works, it will not be amiss to instance some times, and what hath been done in those times, by the charge and labour of his majesty's subjects here, under the several governors: none of which have left unexperimented the strength of his majesty's commission, and the virtue or force of that act, upon the least seeming occasion.

In the government of sir Thomas Modyford, in the year 1665 and 1666, the whole island was put under law martial for many months together; in which time, by the inhabitants and their blacks, Fort-Charles was made close, which to that time wanted a whole line, and also the breast-work at Port-Royal was built, with a very small charge to his majesty.

In the time of sir Thomas Lynch, in the year 1673, the law martial was again set on foot; Fort-James built by the contributions of the gentlemen of his majesty's council and assembly, and several other of his majesty's subjects in this island, which amounted to a very considerable sum of money; a breast-work thrown up at Old-Harbour, and several other places; and guns mounted on a platform placed at Port-Morant.

In Lord Vaughan's time, though there was no probability of war, yet he wanted not the trial of his power also in the militia, and our obedience to it; for he commanded out a company of the inhabitants in search of a Spanish barqua longa, who was said to have robbed a sloop belonging to this island upon the coast of Cuba: he, likewise, in favour of the royal company commanded out to sea two vessels, with a company of the militia and their captain, from Port-Royal, to seize an interloper riding in one of his majesty's harbours, and there by force seized her.

In the time of sir Henry Morgan being commander in chief we were again put under martial law; in which time Fort-Rupert, Fort-Carlisle, and a new line at Fort-James, were built.

Lastly, in his excellency the earl of Carlisle's time (the present governor) the law martial was again put in force for about three months; in which time Fort-Morgan with its platform, and another line at Fort-James, and the breast-work reinforced very considerably in thickness and height, and new carriages were made for the guns, those that came out of England not being fit for land service; all which fortifications are substantially built with stone and brick, at the charge and labour of the country.

Neither have we ever been wanting in due respect to his majesty's governors; the militia having always waited on them to church, in their progresses, and on all public occasions; and we may safely affirm with truth, that no militia in his majesty's dominions undergo the like military duty as his subjects in Jamaica; as is evident to all men that ever set foot in Port-Royal, which cannot be distinguished from a garrison, either in time of peace or war, but by their not being paid for their service.

To answer their lordships' objections to the bill of revenue wherein his majesty's name was left out, there are several members of this assembly now sitting, who were members when that bill passed three times in form in the assembly; and, upon the best recollection of their memories, they are fully persuaded and do believe the bill was again sent down with that amendment from the governor and council, according as it passed at the last: but, should it have risen in the assembly, they are very unfortunate if they must bear the censure of all mistakes that may happen in presenting laws to be passed, when both the governor and his council have their negative voices, which had either of them made use of in this point, would have been readily consented to by the assembly, as they had formerly done, both under the government of sir Thomas Modyford and sir Thomas Lynch, before whose time it had been raised without mentioning his majesty's name, and that without check; and we always concluded the governor's name in the enacting part to be of the same effect as his majesty's is in England, whom, in this particular, he seems rather to personate than represent: for which reasons we hope, it ought not to have been imputed to the assembly as their crime altogether, being consented unto by his majesty's governor without any debate, and all applied, by the act whereby it was raised, to the very same public use his majesty directs; and we are certain no instance can be given of any money disposed of to any private use, but was always issued by the governor's warrant, for the payment of his own and other his general officers' salaries in this island, with some small contingent charges of the government.

Their lordships also affirm, that the assembly offered this bill, in the same measure and proportion as it is now proposed, to sir Thomas Lynch; in which their lordships are misinformed; for his majesty's instructions were, that the laws should be in force for two years and no longer, which their lordships also acknowledge in the prior part of the report; so that the assembly needed not to have expressed any time, and the particular uses therein appointed.

But had their lordships known how great sums of money have been raised here, and how small a part hath been applied to his majesty's service for the defence and strengthening the island, we humbly conceive their lordships would have been of opinion, that we have no reason to bar ourselves to perpetuity, and pass the said act without limitation of uses or time; nor can we be so presumptuous as to imagine the king can be hindered from making such use of his own money as he shall think fit, and apply it where he finds most necessary.

It is very true the laws contain many and great errors, as their lordships may see by the assembly's journal; so that were the assembly as much petitioners to his majesty for this new form, as they are to be restored to their old, above half the body of these laws, without amendment, would never be reasonable to pass.

As, to instance some few amongst many: in the act for preventing damages by fire, a single justice of the peace hath power of life and death; and the act of militia empowers the governor and council to levy a tax on the whole island; and in the act directing the marshal's proceedings, there is a clause, that makes it felony for any person to conceal his own goods, left in his own possession, after execution levied by that law, so that a man may be hanged for being poor, which, though inconvenient, was never till then accounted capital; with others too long to be repeated.

And whereas their lordships are pleased to say, that there is nothing imperfect or defective in these bills transmitted hither; yet we humbly conceive, that no notice being taken in this body of laws, how or in what nature we are to make use of the laws of England, either as they have reference to the preservation of his majesty's prerogative or the subjects' rights, we ought not in reason to consent to these bills: for, nothing appearing to the contrary, the governor is left, ad libitum, to use or refuse as few or as many as he pleases, and such as suit with his occasions; there being no directions in them how to proceed according to the laws of England, either in causes criminal or testamentary, and in many other cases which concern the quiet of the subject, both in life and estate.

We conceive also, that, whatsoever is said to the contrary by their lordships in answer to the distance of places, this very last experiment is sufficiently convincing of the truth of that allegation; since it is a year since this model came over and was debated, and before their lordship's report came back, notwithstanding one of the advices went home by an express.

And,

Whereas their lordships say, we cannot be subject to more accidents than his majesty's kingdom of Ireland; to that we object, that advice and answers thence may be had in ten or fourteen days, and that kingdom is already settled, our plantation but beginning. But further, we cannot imagine that Irish model of government was, in principio, ever intended for Englishmen: besides, their lordships cannot but know, that that model was introduced amongst them by a law made by themselves in Ireland, and so consequently bound them, which being now generally known to all those who remove thither, they have no cause to repine at, that being their choice to live under it or stay from it, and was made for the preservation of the English against the Irish faction. As there is not the same cause, so there is not the same reason for imposing the same on us, unless we did it ourselves, who are all his majesty's natural-born subjects of his kingdom of England; which is the reason the parliament give, in all their acts concerning the plantations, for obliging us by them to what, and with whom, and in what manner, we may trade, and impose a tax on us here, in case of trade from one colony to another; and it is but equity then, that the same law should have the same power of loosing as binding.

His majesty giving a power on urgent occasions to raise monies the old way, only secures the king's officers their salaries, of which else they had been disappointed; the act of the militia, which was heretofore consented to, ever providing that on alarm or invasion, the commander in chief should have unlimited power over all persons, estates and things, necessary on such urgencies.

As to the 7th, the assembly say, they never desired any power but what his majesty's governors assured them was their birth-rights, and what they supposed his majesty's most gracious proclamation allowed them: also his majesty was graciously pleased to write a letter to his governor sir Thomas Lynch, after the double trial of one Peter Johnson a pirate, signifying his dislike that any thing should be done that should cause any doubt in his subjects, in not enjoying all the privileges of subjects of the kingdom of England, or to that effect.

But as to the obstructing of justice against Brown the pirate, what they did, though not justifiable in the manner, was out of an assurance, that we had no law in force then to declare my lord chancellor of England's power and our chancellor's here equal, in granting commissions in pursuance of the statute of Henry the eighth; which also his majesty and council perceiving, have in the new body of laws, sent one to supply that want: and if they not meddling with the merits of the cause, endeavoured to preserve the form of justice, and justice itself; and after denial of several petitions, joined with the council, were led beyond their duty (for which they were sharply reprimanded by the then governor), they do hope for and humbly beg his majesty's pardon.

And as for the act upon which he came in, it arose not in the assembly, but was sent from the council to be consented to by them, which was accordingly done.

And as to the imprisonment of Mr. Thomas Martyn, one of their members, for taking out process in Chancery in his own private concern, against several other members, and of the council, the assembly then sitting, and for other misdemeanors and breach of the rules of the house; they hope it is justifiable, the king's governor having assured them, that they had the same power over their members which the House of Commons have, and all Speakers here praying and the governors granting, the usual petitions of Speakers in England.

Seeing the governor hath power to turn out a counsellor, and turning out incapacitates him from being an assembly-man, no counsellor dares give his opinion against the governor, under danger of less penalty than losing that which he thinks his birth-right: also a governor being chancellor, ordinary and admiral, joined with his military authority, lodges so great a power in him, that being united and executed in one person to turn it totum in qualibet parte, so that he may invalidate any thing done under his commission.

There is no doubt but by this new way, it is in the assembly's power to consent to and perpetuate such laws as are wholly of benefit to them, and leave unpassed all that may be thought most necessary for his majesty; which advantage they not laying hold on, hope it will be an evidence they are careful of his majesty's prerogative, as it is the duty of every good subject to be.

It is without controversy, that the old form of government, which was ordered so like his majesty's kingdom of England, must of consequence be of greater encouragement to all his majesty's subjects, as well as strangers, to remove themselves hither. Upon his majesty's proclamation in my lord Windsor's time, and by those gracious instructions given to sir Thomas Modyford, all or most part of the sugar plantations have been settled; and the major part of the said planters being such who arrived here and settled upon the general liking of the model first constituted, and in belief that they lost not any of the privileges of his majesty's subjects of the kingdom of England by their removal hither; and having by no act, as we believe, either provoked his majesty or forfeited our rights, or ever desiring or attempting to lessen or question his majesty's prerogative, the preservation whereof we ever deemed the best means of preserving our own privileges and estates, we shall presume to hope for the continuance of his majesty's favour, which is impossible for us ever to forget.

And whereas their lordships are pleased to offer their advice to his majesty, to furnish his governor with such powers as were formerly given to col. D'Oyley and others, in whose time the then accounted army was not disbanded, but so continued till lord Windsor's arrival, who brought over the king's royal donative, and order to settle the civil government: we hope their lordships intend not that we are to be governed by or as an army, or that the governor be empowered to levy any tax by himself and council; since his majesty having discharged himself and council by an act of parliament, of any such power over any of his majesty's subjects of his kingdom of England, as we undoubtedly are, it will be very hard to have any imposition laid on us but by our own consents; for their lordships well know that no derived power is greater than the primitive.

However, if his most gracious majesty shall not think fit to alter this model, but we are to be governed by the governor and council according to their lordships' advice, yet we humbly beseech his majesty to do us the grace to believe, that we are so sensible of our duty and allegiance, that our submission to and comportment under his majesty's authority shall be such, as that we hope he, in his due time, will be graciously pleased to restore unto us our ancient form of government, under which it hath hitherto pleased God to prosper us; ending with our hearty prayers for his majesty's long and happy reign over us, and most humbly begging his majesty's pardon of all our errors and mistakes, and a gracious interpretation of this our answer; protesting, from the bottom of our hearts, that we are and resolve to die his majesty's true, loyal and obedient subjects.

A True Copy.

ROWLAND POWELL, Cl. Conc.

The humble DESIRE and JUSTIFICATION of the Members of his Majesty's Council, to his Excellency the Governor in Jamaica.

The alterations of the frame of government in this his majesty's island of Jamaica, unto that of his kingdom of Ireland, which his majesty, the best and greatest of kings, hath graciously commanded us to submit unto and own, we, his majesty's truly loyal and dutiful subjects, hitherto have and yet do, by a willing readiness, and ready willingness, declare our entire obedience and hearty conformity thereto, because his majesty commands.

And although his majesty's great perspicuity and truly royal prudence is best able to determine what government is the fittest for his subjects in this island, yet, with all due submission, in all humility, we beg leave to represent to his majesty the great inconvenience attending the present frame, in transmitting our laws home.

The vast distance of place will of necessity require a great expence of time, between the first framing our laws here, and the transmitting and return of them hither again; so that, before they can be passed into laws by the assembly here, there will probably as great causes arise to alter, as there were at first to make them.

And, with all due submission, we judge it even impossible to adapt laws to the present constitution, so as not to admit of often and great alterations: for according to our experience hitherto, we have found urgent occasions to alter and amend the laws, that have more immediately concerned us here, at the least, every two years; and we cannot foresee, but we shall lie under the same necessity still; so that if his majesty graciously please to take it into his princely consideration, and either restore to us our former power and way or method of passing laws, or at least remit that part of the present method of making laws, which only concerns us here, as they may pass without transmitting the same, we hope, by our present submission and obedience to all his laws here, his majesty will be a glorious prince, and his subjects here an happy people.

And whereas the gentlemen of the assembly, in their address to his majesty, read here in council the 15th of November, 1679, do declare, that, as to the bill of revenue wherein his majesty's name was left out, that there are several of the members of their assembly now sitting, who were members when that bill passed three times in form in the assembly, and upon the best recollection of their memories, they are fully persuaded and do believe the bill was again sent down with that amendment from the governor and council, according as it passed at the last: we, the gentlemen of his majesty's council here present at the passing of the bill, do most humbly and with all seriousness aver and declare, That we were so far from consenting the said bill should pass without his majesty's name in it, that we do not remember it was ever debated or mentioned in council; and further, that, to the best of our respective knowledge, it was read three times, and passed the council board, with his majesty's name in it: and we are the rather induced to this our confidence, because we find the original act was razed, and, by the then Speaker's own hand, interlined: and moreover, the several amendments of the said bill, that were made in council, were all taken notice of in the minutes in our council-books, and no mention made of this; and the gentlemen of the assembly do produce nothing out of their journal to justify the reflections upon us; therefore it is to be presumed they cannot.

And we do further humbly and unanimously declare, we never did at any time, either jointly or severally, make any complaint to the assembly, or any of them, of the power given by his majesty to his excellency our present governor, to suspend any of his majesty's council here: for as we have hitherto yielded all due obedience and submission to his majesty's royal will and pleasure concerning us, so we hope we shall approve ourselves such, and, as in duty bound, ever pray for his majesty's long life, and that he may prosperously and triumphantly reign over us.

This was unanimously agreed to in council, by the respective members thereof, who were present at the passing the bill of revenue: colonel Thomas Ballard, colonel John Cope, colonel Robert Byndloss, colonel Thomas Freeman, colonel William Joy, colonel Thomas Fuller, John White, esq.;

And consented to by the whole council, excepting lieutenant colonel Samuel Long.

Received from the earl of Carlisle, 26th Feb. 1679-80.

Extract of an Order in Council.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, March 5, 1679-80. Present, Prince Rupert, Lord President, Lord Privy Seal, Marquis of Worcester, Earl of Bridgewater, Earl of Essex, Mr. Hyde, Mr. Sec. Coventry, Sir Leolin Jenkins.

A Letter from the earl of Carlisle to the Committee, dated the 23d of November last, is read, wherein his lordship acquaints the Committee, that having called the council and assembly together, he had caused their lordships report of the 28th of May to be publicly read; which their lordships think to be disagreeable to the directions of the report, which was only presented to his majesty for his information, and in order to furnish the earl of Carlisle, when occasion shall serve, with such arguments as might be fit to be used in justification of his majesty's commission and instructions; and their lordships particularly take notice, that it was neither necessary nor convenient for him to expose his instructions to the assembly: and as to the clerk of the assembly, which his lordship had appointed, the committee does very much approve his lordships proceedings therein, and will desire him to continue the same method for the future.

And whereas colonel Long is represented to have a hand in leaving out the king's name in the late bill of revenue, and in framing and advising the address of the assembly now transmitted to his majesty; their lordships will report, that the earl of Carlisle may be ordered to send him to England to answer what is laid to his charge.

The Address of the assembly at Jamaica to his majesty, in answer to a report of the Committee approved on the 28th of May last, being read, their lordships observe, that there are many falsities and mistakes contained therein.

First, it is alleged by the assembly, that the island took up the civil form of government in the time of sir Thomas Modyford and sir Charles Lyttleton; whereas it is certain that colonel D'Oyley had a commission, soon after his majesty's Restoration, to govern by the civil power.

As to their denial of having left out his majesty's name in the revenue bill, it is evident by the justification of the council, and assurance of the lord Vaughan, that the bill passed the governor and council with his majesty's name, which was afterwards left out or erased; as may be supposed by the interlineation that yet appears upon the original bill.

And whereas it is said, that their lordships are misinformed, in affirming that the assembly had before offered the bill of revenue in the same measure and proportion as is now proposed, since the laws were to be in force for two years, and no longer; the assembly have quite forgotten, or pretended to be ignorant of the powers settled by his majesty's commission to sir Thomas Lynch, whereby the laws were to be in force for two years, and no longer, unless confirmed by his majesty within that time; so that the bill, transmitted by sir Thomas Lynch, wanted only his majesty's approbation, to render it perpetual.

The assembly further mentions the great sums raised in Jamaica, which had not been employed to his majesty's service; but does not instance the misapplication of any part of the revenue by any of the governors.

It is also to be observed, that the law for preventing damages by fire, of which they complain, was first made by them; as also the act, directing the Marshal's proceedings, cannot but be very reasonable, and for the advantage of the planters, since it gives them the use of their goods after execution, and enables them the better to pay their debts.

And whereas the assembly complains, that there is no law transmitted to them for ascertaining the laws of England: it is thought reasonable that his majesty should retain within himself the power of appointing the laws of England to be in full force in that island, as he shall find necessary.

The delays and length of time, alledged by them in reference to the model prescribed by his majesty, were wholly occasioned by the refractoriness of the assembly, and not by the distance of places, or other reasons.

What they object concerning Ireland, in reference to Jamaica, is frivolous; since the English there have right to the same privileges as those of Jamaica, and are bound up by acts of parliament in England, as well as the inhabitants of Jamaica.

To the 7th objection it is replied, that nothing has been done to take away their enjoyment of all the privileges of English subjects; since they are governed by the laws and statutes of this realm.

Their unwarrantable proceeding, in obstructing of justice against Brown, the pirate, is confessed, and his majesty's pardon prayed by them.

Their lordships think the imprisonment of Martyn, and the articles preferred against him, altogether unjustifiable, not only as he was his majesty's collector, but as the assembly ought not, by the pretension of privilege, to shelter themselves from justice, there being no such usage in Barbadoes, and other plantations.

In the 9th place, it is altogether erroneous in the assembly, to think it is, by the present model, in their own power to accept such laws as are wholly of benefit to themselves, and to reject such as are most necessary for his majesty; since the governor yet retains a negative voice, after the consent of the assembly.

And whereas they very much insist upon his majesty's proclamation in my lord Windsor's time: his majesty has not in any instance withdrawn the effects of his promise to them, nor imposed rules and instructions that were prescribed in sir Thomas Modyford's council, to raise money on strong liquors: and the assembly can as little believe they have not provoked his majesty to keep a strict eye upon them, after their several unwarrantable proceedings during the government of the lord Vaughan, and, since, the earl of Carlisle, by their votes and otherwise.

In the last place, it is falsely insinuated by the assembly, that the government remained under an army in col. D'Oyley's time; since it appears plainly by his commission, that it was otherwise provided, and that the martial law was then laid aside; so that, upon the whole matter, they have reason to beg his majesty's pardon for all their errors and mistakes.

The Justification of the council of Jamaica, in answer to the imputation of the assembly, of their leaving out the king's name in the revenue-bill, is also read, and to be made use of by the governor, to disprove the allegations of the assembly in their own behalf.

Extract of an Order in Council.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, Monday the 8th of March, 1679-80. Present, Lord Privy Seal, Earl of Bridgewater, Sir Leolin Jenkins.

The lord Vaughan attends, concerning the charge against colonel Long, of Jamaica, for rasing out the king's name in the act of revenue; and declares, that he is very confident that the bill came up from the assembly to the council, with the king's name in it, and that it was not put out by the council, nor by his privy; and that when Mr. Martyn came to Jamaica, with the king's patent, to be collector, his lordship then sent for the act, and perceived the interlineation to be in colonel Long's hand; and that his lordship does absolutely agree with the council of Jamaica, in the matter of their Justification.

Extract of an Order in Council.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, Thursday March 11, 1679-80. Present, Lord President, Lord Privy Seal, Marquis of Worcester, Earl of Bridgewater, Sir Leolin Jenkins.

Their lordships take into consideration the state of the government in Jamaica, and agree to refer the queries following, to Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor General, for their opinions therein, viz.

1st. Whether from the past and present state of Jamaica, his majesty's subjects, inhabiting and trading there, have a right to the laws of England, as Englishmen, by virtue of the king's Proclamation, or otherwise?

2d. Whether his majesty's subjects of Jamaica, claiming to be governed by the laws of England, are not bound as well by such laws as are beneficial to the king, by appointing taxes and subsidies for the support of the government, as by other laws, which tend only to the benefit and ease of the subject?

3d. Whether the subsidies of tonnage and poundage upon goods that may by law, or shall be directly carried to Jamaica, be not payable, according to law, by his majesty's subjects inhabiting that island, or trading there, by virtue of the acts of tonnage and poundage, or other acts made in England?

4th. Whether wine or other goods, once brought into England, and transported from thence, upon which the respective abatements are allowed upon exportation, according to law, the same being afterwards carried to Jamaica, and landed there, shall not be liable to the payment of the full duty of tonnage and poundage, which it should have paid, if consumed in England, deducting only such part of the said duty as shall not be repaid in England upon exportation of the said goods from thence?

Which Queries were accordingly transmitted to Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor General, with a Paper containing the past and present state of Jamaica, in relation to the government.

Letter to Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor General.

Council Chamber, March 11, 1679-80.

Gentlemen; The right honourable the lords of the Committee for Trade and Plantations, upon consideration of the affairs of Jamaica, have stated the Questions following, viz.

[Here were recited the Queries stated in the preceding article.]

To which Questions their lordships desire your Answer in writing, with all convenient speed; and for your further information, I have inclosed a Paper containing a short account of the past and present state of the government of Jamaica; and in case you should require any further satisfaction therein, or touching the Queries referred unto you, I am ordered by the Lords of the Committee to attend you at any time and place you shall think fit to appoint.

I am, with all respect, gentlemen, &c.

Extract of an Order in Council.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, April 27, 1680. Present, Prince Rupert, Lord President, Earl of Sunderland, Earl of Essex, Viscount Fauconberg, Mr. Hyde, Mr. Secretary Jenkins.

Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor General having likewise acquainted the Committee, that, upon consideration of the four Questions concerning Jamaica, referred unto them the 11th of March, they did find them of such difficulty and moment, as to deserve the opinion of the Judges; upon whom Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor General are desired to attend with them; Mr. Attorney having first delivered his opinion, "That the people of Jamaica have no right to be governed by the laws of England, but by such laws as are made there, and established by his majesty's authority:" But whereas Mr. Solicitor General doth deliver his opinion that the word "dominion," in the act of parliament for tonnage and poundage, may seem rather to imply the dominion of Wales and Berwick-upon-Tweed only, than to extend to the plantations; and more especially, as Mr. Attorney alledges, since the islands of Guernsey and Jersey are not concerned in that act; their lordships order the two first Questions only to be sent unto the Judges, without any mention to be made of the two last, which particularize the act of tonnage and poundage.

References to the Judges about Jamaica.

Council-chamber, April 27, 1680.

Gentlemen; I am commanded by the right honourable the Lords of the privy-council appointed a Committee of Trade and Foreign Plantations, to signify their desires, that you attend his majesty's Judges with the questions following:

1st. Whether from the past and present state of Jamaica, his majesty's subjects inhabiting and trading there have a right to the laws of England, as Englishmen, or by virtue of the king's proclamation, or otherwise?

2d. Whether his majesty's subjects of Jamaica, claiming to be governed by the laws of England, are not bound by such laws as are beneficial to the king, by appointing taxes and subsidies for the support of the government, as by other laws which tend only to the benefit and ease of the subject?

Which Questions their lordships desire his majesty's Judges to consider and answer in writing and to return the opinions to the committee with convenient speed.

I am with respect, &c.

Order to the Judges about the Question of Jamaica.

At the Court of Whitehall, June 23, 1680.

Present, His Majesty, Prince Rupert, Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, Lord President, Lord Privy Seal, Duke of Albemarle, Marquis of Worcester, Earl of Ossory, Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Sunderland, Earl of Clarendon, Earl of Bath, Lord Bishop of London, Mr. Hyde, Mr. Finch, L. C. J. North, Mr. Coventry, Mr. Secretary Jenkins, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Godolphin.

It is this day ordered in council, that Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor General do attend his majesty's Judges, and desire them to assemble with all convenient speed, and bring assembled, to confer with them concerning this question; viz.

Whether by his majesty's letter, proclamation, or commissions, annexed, his majesty hath excluded himself from the power of establishing laws in Jamaica, it being a conquered country, and all laws settled by authority there being now expired?

And that, upon receiving the Opinions of his majesty's judges, under their hands in writings they do report the same to the lords of the privy-council appointed a committee for trade and foreign plantations.

Extract of an Order in Council.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, Sept. 7, 1680. Present. Lord President, Mr. Secretary Jenkins, Marquis of Worcester.

Mr. Secretary Jenkins acquaints the committee that col. Long, of Jamaica, had some days before surrendered himself to him, upon a bond of ten thousand pounds given to the earl of Carlisle to that purpose; and that he had taken his security for the like sum, that he would attend the first council, on Friday next, being the 10th instant.

Copy of an Order in Council.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall. Present. Prince Rupert, Lord President, Marquis of Worcester, Earl of Clarendon, Earl of Bath, Mr. Secretary Jenkins.

The earl of Carlisle is called in, and delivers a paper containing a charge against col. Long, which is read, consisting chiefly in three points; viz. That he had razed the king's name out of the act for raising a public revenue; that he had granted an Habeas Corpus, being judge, for a person condemned by law; and had opposed the settlement of the country pursuant to the king's orders.

And his lordship declaring, that he had nothing more to say against col. Long, than was contained in that paper, only reserving to himself the liberty of explaining what he had therein mentioned, col. Long is called in, and the paper read to him; whereupon he positively denies that he had done any thing to the bill without the directions of the assembly; and that he believes the rasure happened, inasmuch as the clerk of the assembly had transcribed the bill passed in sir Thomas Lynch's time, which was now blotted out by the agreement of the governor, council, and assembly, and the words written in his hand were only added to make up the sense, which otherwise would have been wanting, which he did as Speaker of that assembly from whom he had directions; which is confirmed by the letters of major Molesworth, Mr. Bernard, Mr. Ashurst, Mr. Burton, and of the clerk of the assembly.

As to the granting an Habeas Corpus, he declares he did not know the person was condemned; and that it is usual for the judges to sign blank Habeas Corpus's, which the clerk gives out in course.

And that he never opposed the king's orders, otherwise than by expressing his opinion, that they were not for his majesty's service, nor the good of his country.

Extract of an Order in Council.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in the Council-chamber at Whitehall, Tuesday 12 Oct. 1680. Present. Prince Rupert, Lord President, Lord Privy Seal, Marquis of Worcester, Earl of Sunderland, Earl of Clarendon, Earl of Halifax, Viscount Fauconberg, Mr. Hyde, Mr. Godolphin, Mr. Secretary Jenkins, Mr. Seymour.

The earl of Carlisle attending acquaints the committee, that the act for raising a public revenue will expire in March next, and that the government will be left under very great necessities, in case the king do not give sir Henry Morgan leave to pass a temporary bill, until the full settlement of affairs shall be agreed on, which is like to take up a considerable time; and therefore proposes, that the Order in Council, dated the 14th of January last (which is read) forbidding the governor to raise money by any other act or order whatsoever, than by the bill transmitted by his majesty, which the assembly will not be willing to pass until the government be entirely settled in such manner as may be more agreeable to them than the Irish model, be suspended. His lordship proceeds to give an account of his transactions with the assembly to persuade them to pass the revenue bill, and reads the objections of the assembly, and his answer to them; whereof, and of the council-books, his lordship is desired to give a transcript to the committee.

There having been two laws read, which were entered therein, the one made by col. D'Oyley and the council, for raising imposts on liquors, the other by sir Charles Lyttleton and his council, being a supplemental act to the former:

And his lordship acquainting the committee, that, as for licenses of taverns, he had set them on foot before he passed any bill of revenue:

It is thereupon thought fit, by some of their lordships, That the assembly of Jamaica be induced to pass a perpetual bill, by having leave to appropriate the revenue to the support of the government.

And the committee is appointed to meet again on this business on Thursday, at nine o'clock in the morning; when col. Long, and the other assembly-men lately come over, are to attend.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in the Council Chamber at Whitehall, Thursday Oct. 14, 1680. Present. Prince Rupert, Lord President, Lord Privy-seal, Marquis of Worcester, Earl of Clarendon, Earl of Essex, Earl of Halifax, Viscount Fauconberg, Lord Chief Justice North, Mr. Secretary Jenkins.

The earl of Carlisle attends, and produces an entry in the council-book of Jamaica, of a law passed by col. D'Oyley and the council, for raising a public revenue; and of another passed by sir Charles Lyttleton and the council, being a supplemental act to the former, both which are indefinite, and not determined by the commissions of col. D'Oyley or my lord Windsor, whose deputy sir Charles Lyttleton was.

After which, col. Long and Mr. Ashurst are called in (the other gentlemen of Jamaica being in the country) and being asked, why they were not willing that a perpetual bill of revenue should pass in Jamaica? they made answer, that they have no other way to make their aggrivances known to the king, to have them redressed, than by the dependance of the governor upon the assembly, which is preserved by passing temporary bills of revenue; and that a perpetual bill being passed, all the ends of government would be answered, and there would be no further need of calling assemblies. To which my lord of Carlisle replies, That, notwithstanding any act for raising an impost on liquors should be passed in that manner, yet the necessities and contingencies of the government are such as to require the frequent calling of assemblies, for raising money by other means, and doing public works; the present revenue coming far short of the expence of the government.

Their lordships tell col. Long, that in case they be willing to pass the act of revenue indefinitely, the king may be induced to settle other perpetual laws, which they shall propose as beneficial to them.

The gentlemen of Jamaica being withdrawn, their lordships enter upon a debate concerning a continuance of the two laws made by col. D'Oyley and sir Charles Lyttleton before mentioned, and how far the English laws and methods of government ought to take place in Jamaica; and it is there alledged, "that the laws of England cannot be in force in another country, where the constitution of the place is different from that of England."

Upon the whole matter, the committee desire my lord chief justice North to report his opinion in writing on Monday next, upon the questions following; viz.

1st. Whether the king by his proclamation published during my lord Windsor's government, his majesty's letter dated 13th of January, 1672-3, or any other act, appearing by the laws of England or any laws of Jamaica, or by his majesty's commissions or instructions to his governors, has divested himself of the power he formerly had to alter the forms of government in Jamaica?

2d. Whether any act of the assembly of Jamaica, or any other act of his majesty or his governors, have totally repealed the acts made by col. D'Oyley and sir Charles Lyttleton for raising a public revenue, or whether they are now in force?

Memorandum. His majesty being present, my lord chief justice North was added to the committee.

Memorandum. Col. Long having mentioned transactions of my lord Vaughan's during his government, his lordship is to be summoned for the next meeting.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in the Council Chamber at Whitehall on Monday the 18th of October 1680. Present, Lord President, Lord Privy-Seal, Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Essex, Earl of Clarendon, Earl of Halifax, Lord Visc. Fauconberg, Lord Chief Justice North, Mr. Secretary Jenkins, Mr. Seymour.

My lord chief justice North having acquainted the committee, that he had considered of the two questions proposed by their lordships; and that, although some further time would be requisite for him to give in his answer, yet, in respect of the haste that was necessary for settling the revenue, his lordship undertakes to return his answer at the next meeting upon the second question; wherein his lordship is desired to take to his assistance some other of his majesty's judges, viz.

Whether any act of the assembly of Jamaica, or any act of his majesty or his governors, have totally repealed the acts made by col. D'Oyley and sir Charles Lyttleton, for raising a public revenue, or whether they are now in force?

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in the Council Chamber at Whitehall, on Wednesday Oct. 20, 1680. Present Lord President, Earl of Sunderland, Earl of Bridgwater, Earl of Essex, Earl of Halifax, Lord Chief Justice North, Lord Bishop of London, Mr. Secretary Jenkins, Mr. Seymour.

My lord chief justice North having delivered his opinion in writing upon the question recommended to him at the last meeting, col. Long, Mr. Beeston, Mr. Ashurst, and other planters and merchants of Jamaica, together with the earl of Carlisle, are called in, and his lordship's opinion is read to them; whereby his lordship concludes, that the act of revenue made in 1663 by sir Charles Lyttleton is yet in force; as being not repealed by any subsequent acts which were limited to the term of two years by his majesty's commands. But col. Long objects, that there was a law made by sir Thomas Modyford, which declares all laws, passed at sir Charles Lyttleton's assemblies, void for want of due form in the writs and other particulars; whereupon they are bid to withdraw; and whereas my lord chief justice North was not present when this objection was made, their lordships think fit that he be acquainted therewith, and desired to renew his opinion; and the gentlemen of Jamaica are also desired to be ready with the objections they have to make to his lordship's report, at the next meeting, which is appointed for to-morrow at three in the afternoon.

JAMAICA. At the Committee of Trade and Plantations in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, Thursday, Oct. 21, 1680. Present, Prince Rupert, Lord President, Marquis of Worcester, Earl of Bridgewater, Earl of Clarendon, Vic. Fauconberg, Mr. Hyde, Ld. Ch. Just. North, Mr. Secretary Jenkins.

The lords being met to consider the business of Jamaica, order the proclamation, published in my lord Windsor's time, to be read: and thereupon their lordships express their opinion, that his majesty did thereby assure and settle the property of the inhabitants, but not the government and form: thence these questions did arise, viz.

1st. Whether, upon the consideration of the commission and instructions to col. D'Oyley, and sir Charles Lyttleton, and the constitution of the island thereupon, the acts of council made by colonel D'Oyley and sir Charles Lyttleton were perpetual laws, binding to the inhabitants of the island?

2d. Whether, supposing those laws good and perpetual, any of the subsequent laws, or the proclamation in my lord Windsor's time, have taken away the force of these laws?

And because the gentlemen of Jamaica made divers objections against the validity of those laws, as being made by the governors and council without an assembly, and against the perpetuity of them, as being repealed by subsequent laws; their lordships do therefore think it most conducing to his majesty's service, that colonel Long, major Beeston, and Mr. Ashurst, do attend my Lord Chief Justice North, in order to explain to his lordship what is chiefly expected by them, whereby they may be induced to settle the revenue for the support of the government, to the end matters may be brought to an accommodation.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, Wednesday, Oct. 27, 1680. Present, Lord Privy Seal, Earl of Bridgewater, Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Bath, Earl of Halifax, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

My Lord Chief Justice North reports, that he has been attended by the gentlemen of Jamaica, who have declared themselves willing to grant the king a perpetual bill for the payment of the governors, and another bill for the payment of contingencies, to continue for seven years, provided they may be restored to their ancient form of passing laws, and may be assured of such of the laws of England, as may concern their liberty and property.

Their lordships taking notice that the revenue of Jamaica will expire in March next, direct a letter to be prepared for the approbation of the council, empowering sir Henry Morgan to call an assembly, and to endeavour the passing a temporary bill with their consent, for the revenue; and, in case of their refusal, to raise the same in such manner as hath been done by former governors.

Memorandum. At a council on the inst. a draught of the aforementioned letter was read.

And upon reading the petition of the planters, merchants, and inhabitants of Jamaica, praying to be restored to their ancient method of making laws, the lords of the committee are ordered to meet de die in diem, until they shall have agreed on such a method for the making of laws, and the settlement of the government, as they shall find most convenient for his majesty's service.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, on Thursday the 28th of October, 1680. Present, Prince Rupert, Lord Privy Seal, Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Bridgewater, Earl of Sunderland, Earl of Clarendon, Earl of Essex, Earl of Halifax, Viscount Fauconberg, Bishop of London, Mr. Hyde, Lord Chief Justice North, Mr. Secretary Jenkins.

Their lordships having considered that part of the letter from the council of Jamaica, dated 20th of May last, that concerns the laws, and having read the petition of the merchants and planters of Jamaica, presented in council on the as also a paper prepared by Mr. Blackwast, concerning the manner of making laws in Jamaica, their lordships, upon full consideration, and debate, of what may best conduce to his majesty's service, agree, That the present method of making laws in Barbadoes, as settled by the commission of sir Richard Dalton, be proposed unto his majesty in council: and that powers be drawn up for the earl of Carlisle, with instructions suitable to that scheme, and with respect to the present circumstances of Jamaica; and that the assembly may be the more easily induced to grant a revenue for the support of the government, their lordships are of opinion, that his majesty's quit-rents, and the tax on the wine-licenses, as well as all other levies which now are or shall be made, be appropriated to the support of the government, and to no other use whatsoever.

JAMAICA.—At the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, on Saturday, the 30th of October, 1680. Present, Prince Rupert, Duke of Albemarle, Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Bridgewater, Earl of Sunderland, Earl of Clarendon, Earl of Essex, Viscount Fauconberg, Earl of Halifax, Mr. Secretary Jenkins.

Colonel Long, and the other gentlemen of Jamaica, attend, and are acquainted with the resolutions of the Committee, to report to his majesty, that they may enjoy the same method of making laws, as is now appointed for Barbadoes; with which the gentlemen express themselves very well satisfied.

Copy of Powers to the Earl of Carlisle, for making Laws.

CHARLES the Second, by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c.—To our right trusty and right well-beloved cousin Charles, Earl of Carlisle, our Captain-General, and Governor in Chief in and over our Island of Jamaica, and other the Territories depending thereon; and to our Deputy-Governor and Commander in Chief of our said Island: and, in case of their death or absence, to our Council of Jamaica.

Whereas, by our royal commission, bearing date the 1st of March, in the 30th year of our reign, we have thought fit to constitute and appoint you, Charles earl of Carlisle, Captain-General and Governor in Chief in and over our island of Jamaica, and the territories depending thereon, thereby commanding and requiring you, or, in your absence, our deputy-governor, or our council, to do and execute all things belonging to the said command, and the trust reposed in you, according to the several powers or directions granted or appointed you by the said commission, and the instructions therewith given you, or by further powers and instructions to be granted or appointed you under our signet and sign-manual, as by our said commission (reference being thereunto had) doth more at large appear: and whereas it is necessary that good and wholesome laws and ordinances be settled and established for the government and support of our island of Jamaica; we do hereby give and grant unto you full power and authority, with the advice and consent of the said council, from time to time, as need shall require, to summon or call general assemblies of the freeholders and planters within the said island, in manner and form as is now practised in Jamaica. And our will and pleasure is, that the persons thereupon duly elected by the major part of the freeholders of the respective parishes and places, and so returned (having, before their sitting, taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, which you shall commissionate fit persons, under the public seal of that island, to administer, and without taking which, none shall be capable of sitting, though elected) shall be called and held the General Assembly of our island of Jamaica; and that they, or the major part of them, shall have full power and authority, with the advice and consent of yourself, and of the council, to make, constitute, and ordain laws, statutes, and ordinances, for the public peace, welfare, and good government of the said island, and of the people and inhabitants thereof, and such other as shall resort thereto, and for the benefit of our heirs and successors; which said laws, statutes, and ordinances, are to be (as near as conveniently may be) agreeable to the laws and statutes of our kingdom of England: provided, that all such laws, statutes, and ordinances, of what nature or duration whatsoever, be, (within three months, or by the first conveyance after making the same) transmitted unto us under the public seal, for our allowance and approbation of them, as also duplicates thereof by the next conveyance; and in case all or any of them (being not before confirmed by us) shall, at any time, be disallowed and not approved, and so signified by us, our heirs, or successors, under our or their sign-manual or signet, or by order of our or their privy-council, unto you, the said earl of Carlisle, or to the commander in chief of our said island for the time being, then such or so many of them, as shall be so disallowed and not approved, shall from thenceforth cease, determine, and be utterly void, and of none effect, any thing to the contrary thereof notwithstanding. And to the end nothing may be passed or done in our said island by the said council or assembly, to the prejudice of us, our heirs, or successors, we will and ordain, that you the said Charles, earl of Carlisle, shall have and enjoy a negative voice in the making or passing of laws, statutes, and ordinances, as aforesaid; and that you shall and may likewise, from time to time, as you shall judge it necessary, dissolve all General Assemblies, as aforesaid; any thing in our commission, bearing date as aforesaid, to the contrary hereof notwithstanding. And our will and pleasure is, that, in case of your death, or absence from the said island, our deputy-governor, for the time being, exercise and enjoy all and singular the powers and authorities hereby granted unto you, the said Charles, earl of Carlisle; and in case he likewise happen to die, or be absent from our said island, we do hereby authorize and empower our Council of Jamaica to execute the powers hereby given you, until we shall declare our further pleasure therein.

Given at our Court at Whitehall, this 3rd day of November, in the thirty-second year of our reign.

INTRODUCTION

TO THE

TRIALS FOR THE POPISH PLOT.

WE are now arrived at the Trials respecting that cause of extensive, various and pertinacious contention; that source of copious bloodshed; that origin of tremendous and lasting national convulsions—the POPISH PLOT. A knowledge of the transactions relating to it, of the different impressions which they made upon the minds of different men who lived at the time they occurred, and of the representations of them which have been exhibited, may be collected from the reports of the Trials connected with the alleged Plot, and contained in this Collection (of which that of Staley or Stayley, Nov. 21, 1678, is the earliest, and that of Oates, May 9, 1685, is the latest), from the fourth Volume of Cobbett's Parliamentary History, and from the writings of bishop Burnet, Oldmixon, Echard, and Roger Coke. ["Your Burnets, Oldmixons, and Cokes," are by no means such despicable historians, as the sneer of Mr. Pope and the commentary of Warton would induce us to believe], from Algernon Sydney's Letters (published in London by Dodsley, A. D. 1712), from The Secret History of the reigns of king Charles 2, and king James 2; (a small volume printed in the year 1690), from Rauleigh Redivivus, or the Life and Death of the Right Hon. Anthony earl of Shaftsbury, by Philanax Misopappas, (a small book of which the second edition was published in 1683), from Kennett, and Roger North; from the Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome: (See Hen. Carr's Case, A. D. 1680, infra); from Harris's Historical and Critical Account of the Life of Charles the Second; from the published Memoirs of different persons who lived at the time, and from the compilations of subsequent historians.

Hume, in his eighth volume, enters much at large into the history of this Plot, deriving his materials principally from Burnet, and from Roger North. Burnet's narrative is, indeed, intitled to particular attention. It is very circumstantial, and seems to authenticate all that its author says of it. "I am," says he, "so well instructed in all the steps of the Plot, that I am more capable to give a full account of it than any man I know. And I will do it so impartially that no party shall have cause to censure me for concealing or altering the truth in any one instance." Hume, in another place, (vol. 5, Note N, of the later editions of his history) says, "There are three events in our history which may be regarded as touchstones of party-men: An English Whig, who asserts the reality of the Popish Plot; an Irish Catholic, who denies the massacre in 1641; and, a Scotch Jacobite, who maintains the innocence of queen Mary, must be considered as men beyond the reach of argument or reason, and must be left to their prejudices."

Sir John Dalrymple (Memoirs, vol. i. p. 43, Note) tells us, "that some papers which he had seen convinced him that Shaftsbury contrived the Popish Plot, though the persons he employed as informers, ran beyond their instructions."

In the piece which Macpherson chose to publish under the title of "The Life of James the Second, written by himself," (see the Note to lord Clarendon's Case, ante, p. 297), the Plot is styled "Oates's Plot."

The following are the reflections of Mr. Fox on these transactions:

"When the minds of men were in the disposition which such a state of things was naturally calculated to produce, it is not to be wondered at, that a ready, and perhaps a too facile, belief should have been accorded to the rumour of a Popish Plot. But with the largest possible allowance for the just apprehensions which were entertained, and the consequent irritation of the country, it is wholly inconceivable how such a Plot as that brought forward by Tongue and Oates could obtain any general belief. Nor can any stretch of candour make us admit it to be probable, that all who pretended a belief of it did seriously entertain it. On the other hand, it seems an absurdity, equal almost in degree to the belief of the Plot itself, to suppose that it was a story fabricated by the earl of Shaftsbury, and the other leaders of the Whig Party; and it would be highly unjust, as well as uncharitable, not to admit, that the generality of those who were engaged in the prosecution of it were probably sincere in their belief of it, since it is unquestionable that at the time very many persons, whose political prejudices were of a quite different complexion, were under the same delusion. The unanimous votes of the two Houses of Parliament, and the names, as well as the number, of those who pronounced Lord Stafford to be guilty, seem to put this beyond a doubt. Dryden, writing soon after the time, says, in his Abalom and Achitophel, that the Plot was "Bad in itself, but represented worse :"

 that

"Some truth there was, but dash'd and brew'd
 "with lies."

and that

"Succeeding times did equal folly call
 "Believing nothing, or believing all."

and Dryden will not, by those who are conversant in the history and works of that immortal writer, be suspected either of party prejudice in favour of Shaftsbury and the Whigs, or of any view to prejudice the country against the duke of York's succession to the crown. The king repeatedly declared his belief of it. These declarations, if sincere, would have some weight; but if insincere, as may be reasonably suspected, they afford a still stronger testimony to prove that such belief was not exclusively a party opinion, since it cannot be supposed, that even the crooked politics of Charles could have led him to countenance fictions of his enemies, which were not adopted by his own party. Wherefore, if this question were to be decided upon the ground of authority, the reality of the Plot would be admitted; and it must be confessed, that, with regard to facts remote, in respect either of time or place, wise men generally dislide in their own judgment, and defer to that of those who have had a nearer view of them. But there are cases where reason speaks so plainly as to make all argument drawn from authority of no avail, and this is surely one of them. Not to mention correspondence by post on the subject of regicide, detailed commissions from the Pope, silver bullets, &c. &c. and other circumstances equally ridiculous, we need only advert to the part attributed to the Spanish government in this conspiracy, and to the alledged intention of murdering the king, to satisfy ourselves that it was a forgery.

"Rapiu, who argues the whole of this affair with a degree of weakness as well as disingenuity very unusual to him, seems at last to offer us a kind of compromise, and to be satisfied if we will admit that there was a design or project to introduce popery and arbitrary power, at the head of which were the king and his brother. Of this I am as much convinced as he can be; but how does this justify the prosecution and execution of those who suffered, since few, if any of them, were in a situation to be trusted by the royal conspirators with their designs? When he says therefore, that, that is precisely what was understood by the conspiracy, he by no means justifies those who were the principal prosecutors of the plot. The design to murder the king, he calls the appendage of the plot; a strange expression this, to describe the projected murder of a king! though not more strange than the notion itself when applied to a plot, the object of which was to render that very king absolute, and to introduce the religion which he most favoured. But it is to be observed, that though in considering the Bill of Exclusion, the Militia Bill, and other legislative proceedings, the plot, as he defines it, that is to say, the design of introducing popery and arbitrary power, was the important point to be looked to; yet in courts of justice, and for juries and judges, that which he calls the appendage was, generally speaking, the sole consideration.

"Although therefore, upon a review of this truly shocking transaction, we may be fairly justified in adopting the milder alternative, and imputing to the greater part of those concerned in it, rather an extraordinary degree of blind credulity, than the deliberate wickedness of planning and assisting in the perpetration of legal murders: yet the proceedings on the Popish Plot must always be considered as an indelible disgrace upon the English nation, in which king, parliament, judges, juries, witnesses, prosecutors, have all their respective, though certainly not equal, shares. Witnesses of such a character as not to deserve credit in the most trifling cause, upon the most immaterial facts, gave evidence so incredible, or, to speak more properly, so impossible to be true, that it ought not to have been believed if it had come from the mouth of Cato; and upon such evidence, from such witnesses, were innocent men condemned to death and executed. Prosecutors, whether attorney and solicitors-general, or managers of impeachment, acted with the fury which in such circumstances might be expected; juries partook naturally enough of the national ferment; and judges, whose duty it was to guard them against such impressions, were scandalously active in confirming them in their prejudices, and inflaming their passions. The king, who is supposed to have disbelieved the whole of the plot, never once exercised his glorious prerogative of mercy. It is said he dared not. His throne, perhaps his life, was at stake; and history does not furnish us with the example of any monarch with whom the lives of innocent or even meritorious subjects ever appeared to be of much weight, when put in balance against such considerations."

The whole passage of his favourite Dryden, from which Fox has extracted four lines, is worth insertion. It follows an encomiastic representation of the government of Charles the Second. It is scarcely necessary to premise that 'Jerusalem' denotes 'London,' 'Jebusites' 'Papists,' 'David' 'Charles the Second,' 'Egypt' 'France.'

Th' inhabitants of old Jerusalem
 Were Jebusites; the town so call'd from them;
 And theirs the native right—
 But when the chosen people grew more strong,
 The rightful cause at length became the wrong;
 And ev'ry loss the men of Jebus bore
 They were still thought God's enemies the more.
 Thus worn or weaken'd, well or ill-content,
 Submit they must to David's government;

Impoverish'd, and depriv'd of all command,
Their taxes doubled as they lost their land; ^u
And what was harder yet to flesh and blood,
Their gods disgrac'd, and burnt like common wood.

This set the heathen priesthood in a flame;
For priests of all religion are the same.
Of whatso'er descent their godhead be,
Stöck, stone, or other homely pedigree,
In his defence his servants are as bold
As if he had been born of beaten gold.
The Jewish Rabbins, though their enemies,
In this conclude them honest men and wise:
For 't was their duty all the learned think,
T' espouse his cause by whom they eat and drink,
From whence began that Plot, the nation's curse,
Bad in itself, but represented worse;
Rais'd in extremes, and in extremes decry'd;
With oaths affirm'd, with dying vows deny'd;
Not weigh'd, nor winnow'd by the multitude;
But swallow'd, in the mass, unchew'd and crude.

Some truth there was, but dash'd and brew'd
with lies,

To please the fools, and puzzle all the wise.
Succeeding times did equal folly call,
Believing nothing, or believing all.
Th' Egyptian rites the Jebusites embrac'd,
Where gods were recommended by their taste.
Such sav'ry deities must needs be good,
As serv'd at once for worship and for food.
By force they could not introduce these gods;
For ten to one, in former days, was odds.
So fraud was us'd (the sacrificer's trade)
Fools are more hard to conquer than persuade.
Their busy teachers mingled with the Jews,
And rak'd, for converts, e'en the court and stew;
Which Hebrew priests the more unkindly took,
Because the fleece accompanies the flock.
Some thought they God's anointed meant to slay
By guns, invented since full many a day:
Our author swears it not: but who can know
How far the devil and Jebusites may go?
This Plot, which fail'd for want of common sense,
Had yet a deep and dangerous consequence:
For, as when raging fevers boil the blood,
The standing lake soon floats into a flood,
And ev'ry hostile humour, which before
Slept quiet in its channels, bubbles o'er;
So several factions, from this first ferment,
Work up to foam, and threat the government.
Some by their friends, more by themselves thought wise,

Oppos'd the pow'r to which they could not rise:

Some had in courts been great, and thrown from thence,

Like fiends were harden'd in impenitence:
Some, by their monarch's fatal mercy, grown
From pardon'd rebels kinsmen to the throne,
Were rais'd in pow'r and public office high,
Strong bands, if hands ungrateful men could tie.
Of these the false Achithophel was first,
A name to all succeeding ages curs'd;
For close designs and crooked councils fit,
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;
Restless, unfix'd in principles and place,
In pow'r unpleas'd, impatient of disgrace:
A fiery soul, which, working out its way,
Fretted the pigmy body to decay,
And o'er-inform'd the tenement of clay.
A daring pilot in extremity.

The Popish Plot deservingly occupies an extensive space in English story. Burnet's Account of it has been already mentioned. That Account bears so many marks of authenticity, and withal appears to throw light upon so many particulars, both of the men and of the things which were introduced into the following Trials, that it has been thought proper to insert it here. Several of the chief witnesses, as Oates, Bedloe, Praunce, Jennison, published Narratives of the matters which, as they alleged, had come within their respective knowledge. All these Narratives are curious. The only one, however, of them to which historians have much adverted, is that of Oates; which is here inserted, because it is intimately connected with the ensuing Trials, and also materially explanatory of the accounts given by Burnet and the other historians. It must, moreover, appear to be in itself an astonishing document, in whatever light it may be contemplated. In former editions of the State Trials, Atkins's account of his Examination before the Committee of the House of Lords, appointed to enquire after the murder of sir Edmondbury Godfrey, and also the Examinations of Bedloe taken before that Committee, and his subsequent Examination at Bristol in his last sickness by Lord Chief Justice North, were inserted in an Appendix to the eighth volume. But as these matters altogether relate to the Popish Plot, it seems preferable that they should be consolidated with the other introductory information which it has been thought proper to prefix to the Trials arising out of that Plot. Accordingly, they are here subjoined to Oates's Narrative.

BURNET'S ACCOUNT OF THE POPISH PLOT.

THREE days before Michaelmas Dr. Tonge came to me. I had known him at sir Robert Murray's. He was a gardener and a chymist, and was full of projects and notions. He had got some credit in Cromwell's time: and that kept him poor. He was a very mean divine, and seemed credulous and simple. But I had always looked on him as a sincere man. At this time he told me of strange designs against the king's person; and that Coniers, a Benedictin, had provided himself of a poniard, with which he undertook to kill him. I was amazed at all this; and did not know whether he was crazed, or had come to me on design to involve me in a concealing of treason. So I went to Dr. Lloyd, and sent him to the secretary's office with an account of that discourse of Tonge's, since I would not be guilty of misprision of treason. He found at the office, that Tonge was making discoveries there; of which they made no other account, but that he intended to get himself to be made a dean. I told this next morning to Littleton and Powel. And they looked on it as a design of lord Danby's, to be laid before the next session, thereby to dispose them to keep up a greater force, since the papists were plotting against the king's life: This would put an end to all jealousies of the king, now the papists were conspiring against his life. But lord Halifax, when I told him of it, had another apprehension of it. He said, considering the suspicions all people had of the duke's religion, he believed every discovery of that sort would raise a flame, which the court would not be able to manage.

Oates's Character.

The day after that Titus Oates was brought before the council. He was the son of an Anabaptist teacher, who afterwards conformed, and got into orders, and took a benefice, as this his son did. He was proud and ill-natured, haughty, but ignorant. He had been complained of for some very indecent expressions concerning the mysteries of the Christian religion. He was once presented for perjury. But he got to be a chaplain in one of the king's ships, from which he was dismissed upon complaint of some unnatural practices, not to be named. He got a qualification from the duke of Norfolk as one of his chaplains: and there he fell into much discourse with the priests that were about that family. He seemed inclined to be instructed in the Popish religion. One Hutchinson, a jesuit, had that work put on him. He was a weak and light-headed man, and afterwards came over to the church of England. Hutchinson was a curate about the city near a year, and came oft to me, and preached once for me. He seemed to be a sincere devout man, who did not at all love the order, for he found they were a deceitful and meddling sort of people. They never trusted him with any secrets, but employed him wholly in making converts. He went afterwards back to that church. So all this was thought a juggle only to cast an odium upon Oates. He told me, that Oates and they were always in ill terms. They did not allow Oates above ninepence a day, of which he complained much. And Hutchinson relieved him often. They wished they could be well rid of him; and sent him beyond sea, being in very ill terms with him. This made Hutchinson conclude, that they had not at that time trusted Oates with their secrets. Oates was kept for some time at St. Omers; and from thence sent through France, into Spain; and was now returned into England. He had been long acquainted with Tonge; and made his first discovery to him. And he, by the means of one Kirby, a chymist, that was sometimes in the king's laboratory, signified the thing to the king. So Tonge had an audience; and told the king long thread of many passages, all tending to take away his life; which the king, as he afterwards told me, knew not what to make of: yet among so many particulars he did not know what there might be some truth. So he sent him to lord Danby, who intended to make some use of it, but could not give much credit to it, and handled the matter too remissly: for, if at first he thing had been traced quick, either the truth or the imposture of the whole affair might have been made appear. The king ordered lord Danby to say nothing of it to the duke. In the meanwhile some letters of an odd strain, relating to plots and discoveries, were sent by the post to Windsor, directed to Beddingfield, the duke's confessor; who, when he had read them, carried them to the duke, and protested he did not know what they meant, nor from whom they came. The duke carried them to the king. And he fancied they were writ either by Tonge or Oates, and sent on design to have them intercepted, to give the more credit to the discovery. The duke's enemies on the other hand gave out, that he had got some hints of the discovery, and brought these as a blind to impose on the king. The matter lay in a secret and remiss management for six weeks.

Oates's Discovery.

At last, on Michaelmas-eve, Oates was brought before the council; and entertained them with a long relation of many discourses he had heard among the Jesuits, of their design to kill the king. He named persons, places, and times, almost without number. He said, many Jesuits had disguised themselves, and were gone to Scotland, and held field conventicles, on design to distract the government there. He said, he was sent first to St. Omers, thence to Paris, and from thence to Spain, to negotiate this design; and that upon his return, when he brought many letters and directions from beyond sea, there was a great meeting of the Jesuits held in London, in April last, in different rooms in a tavern near St. Clements; and that he was employed to convey the resolutions of those in one room to those in another, and so to hand them round. The issue of the consultation was, that they came to a resolution to kill the king by shooting, stabbing, or poisoning him, that several attempts were made, all which failed in the execution, as shall be told when the trials are related. While he was going on, waiting for some certain evidence to accompany his discovery, he perceived they were jealous of him: and so he durst not trust himself among them any more. In all this there was not a word of Coniers, of whom Tonge had spoke to me. So that was dropped. This was the substance of what Oates told the first day. Many Jesuits were upon this seized on that night, and the next day. And their papers were sealed up next day. He accused Coleman of a strict correspondence with P. de la Chaise; (whose name he had not right, for he called him Father Le Shee:) and he said in general, that Coleman was acquainted with all their designs.

Coleman and his Papers seized.

Coleman had a whole day free to make his escape, if he thought he was in any danger. And he had conveyed all his papers out of the way: Only he forgot a drawer under the table, in which the papers relating to 74, 75, and a part of 76 were left. And from these I drew the negotiations, that I have formerly mentioned as directed by him. If he had either left all his papers or withdrawn all, it had been happy for his party. Nothing had appeared, if all his papers had been put out of the way. But if all had been left, it might have been concluded that the whole secret lay in them. But he left enough to give great jealousy. And no more appearing, all was believed that the witnesses had deposed. Coleman went out of the way for a day, hearing that there was a warrant out against him. But he delivered himself the next day to the Secretary of State. When Oates and he were confronted, Oates did not know him at first: But he named him, when he heard him speak. Yet he only charged him upon hear-say. So he was put in a messenger's hands. Oates named Wake-man, the queen's physician; but did not know him at all. And being asked if he knew any thing against him, he answered he did not; adding, God forbid he should say any thing more than he knew, he would not do that for all the world. Nor did he name Langhorn the famous lawyer, that indeed managed all their concerns. The king found him out in one thing. He said, when he was in Spain he was carried to Don John, who promised great assistance in the execution of their designs. The king, who knew Don John well, asked him what sort of a man he was: He answered, he was a tall lean man: now Don John was a little fat man. At first he seemed to design to recommend himself to the duke and the ministers: For he said he heard the Jesuits oft say, that the duke was not sure enough to them: And they were in doubt, whether he would approve of their killing the king: but they were resolved, if they found him stiff in that matter, to dispatch him likewise. He said, they had oft made use of his name, and counterfeited his hand and seal without his knowledge. He said, the Jesuits cherished the faction in Scotland against duke Lauderdale; and intended to murder the duke of Ormond, as a great enemy to all their designs. And he affirmed he had seen many letters in which these things were mentioned, and had heard them oft spoke of. He gave a long account of the burning of London, at which they intended to have killed the king: But they relented when they saw him so active in quenching the fire, which, as he said, they had kindled.

The whole town was all over enflamed with this discovery. It consisted of so many particulars, that it was thought to be above invention. But when Coleman's letters came, to be read and examined, it got a great confirmation; since by these it appeared, that so many years before they thought the design for the converting the nation, and rooting out the pestilent heresy that had reigned so long in these northern kingdoms, was very near its being executed. Mention was oft made of the duke's great zeal for it. And many indecent reflections were made on the king for his inconstancy, and his disposition to be brought to any thing for money: They depended on the French king's assistance: And therefore were earnest in their endeavours to bring about a general peace, as that which must finish their design.

On the second day after this discovery, the king went to Newmarket. This was censured as a very indecent levity in him, to go and see horse-races, when all people were so much possessed with this extraordinary discovery, to which Coleman's letters had gained an universal credit. While the king was gone, Tonge desired to speak with me. So I went to him to Whitehall, where both he and Oates were lodged under a guard. I found him so lifted up, that he seemed to have lost the little sense he had. Oates came in; and made me a compliment that I was one that was marked out to be killed. He had before said the same to Stillingsfleet of him. But he made that honour which he did us too cheap, when he said Tonge was to be served in the same manner, because he had translated the Jesuits' morals into English. He broke out into great fury against the Jesuits; and said he would have their blood. But I, to divert him from that strain, asked him, what were the arguments that prevailed on him to change his religion, and to go over to the Church of Rome. He upon that stood up and laid his hands on his breast; and said, God and his holy angels knew that he had never changed, but that he had gone among them on purpose to betray them. This gave me such a character of him, that I could have no regard to any thing he either said or swore after that.

Godfrey is murdered.

A few days after this, a very extraordinary thing happened, that contributed more than any other thing to the establishing the belief of all this evidence. Sir Edmondbury Godfrey was an eminent justice of peace, that lived near Whitehall. He had the courage to stay in London, and keep things in order during the plague; which gained him much reputation, and upon which he was knighted. He was esteemed the best justice of peace in England; and kept the quarter where he lived in very good order. He was then entering upon a great design of taking up all beggars and putting them to work. He was thought vain, and apt to take too much upon him. But there are so few men of a public spirit, that small faults, though they lessen them, yet ought to be gently censured. I knew him well, and never had reason to think him faulty that way. He was a zealous Protestant, and loved the Church of England; but had kind thoughts of the Nonconformists, and was not forward to the laws against them. And he, to avoid being put on doing that, was not apt to search for priests or mass-houses. So that few men of his zeal lived in better terms with the Papists than he did. Oates went to him the day before he appeared at the council board; and made oath of the Narrative he intended to make, which he afterwards published. This seemed to be done in distrust of the privy council, as if they might stifle his evidence; which to prevent he put it in safe hands. Upon that Godfrey was chid for his presuming to meddle in so tender a matter. And it was generally believed, that Coleman and he were long in a private conversation, between the time of his (Coleman's) being put in the messenger's hands, and his being made a close prisoner: Which was done as soon as report was made to the council of the contents of his letters. It is certain, Godfrey grew apprehensive and reserved: For meeting me in the street, after some discourse of the present state of affairs, he said, he believed he himself should be knocked on the head. Yet he took no care of himself, and went about according to his own maxim, still without a servant: For he used to say, that the servants in London were corrupted by the idleness and ill company they fell into, while they attended on their masters. On the day fortnight from that in which Mr. Oates had made his discovery, being Saturday, he went abroad in the morning, and was seen about one o'clock near St. Clement's church; but was never seen any more. He was a punctual man to good hours: So his servants were amazed when he did not come home. Yet, he having an ancient mother living at Hammersmith, they fancied, he had heard she was dying, and so was gone to see her. Next morning they sent thither, but heard no news of him. So his two brothers, who lived in the city, were sent to. They were not acquainted with his affairs: So they did not know whether he might not have slept aside for debt; since at that time all people were calling in their money, which broke a great many, but no creditors coming about the house, they on Tuesday published his being thus lost. The council sat upon it, and were going to order a search of all the houses about the town; but were diverted from it, by many stories that were brought them by the duke of Norfolk. Sometimes it was said, he was indecently married: And the scue was often shifted of the places where it was said he was. The duke of Norfolk's officiousness in this matter, and the last place he was seen at, being near Arundel house, brought him under great suspicion. On Thursday one came into a Book-seller's shop after dinner, and said, he was found thrust through with a sword. That was presently brought as news to me: But the reporter of it was not known. That night late his body was found in a ditch, about a mile out of town, near St. Pancras church. His sword was thrust through him. But no blood was on his cloaths, or about him. His shoes were clean. His money was in his pocket. But nothing was about his neck. And a mark was all round it, an inch broad, which shewed he was strangled. His breast was likewise all over marked with bruises; and his neck was broken. All this I saw; for Dr. Lloyd and I went to view his body. There were many drops of white wax-lights on his breeches, which he never used himself. And since only persons of quality, or priests, use those lights, this made all people conclude in whose hands he must have been. And it was visible he was first strangled, and then carried to that place, where his sword was run through his dead body. For a while it was given out, that he was a hypochondriacal man, and had killed himself. Of this the king was possessed, till Dr. Lloyd went and told him what he had seen. The body lay two days exposed, many going to see it, who went away much moved with the sight. And indeed mens spirits were so sharpened upon it, that we all looked on it as a very great happiness, that the people did not vent their fury upon the papists about the town.

Oates made a new Discovery.

The session of parliament was to be opened within three days: And it may be easily imagined in what a temper they met. The court party were out of countenance. So the country party were masters this session. All Oates's evidence was now so well believed, that it was not safe for any man to seem to doubt of any part of it. He thought he had the nation in his hands, and was swelled up to a high pitch of vanity and insolence. And now he made a new edition of his discovery at the bar of the House of Commons. He said, the Pope had declared that England was his kingdom, and that he had sent over commissions to several persons: And had by these made lord Arundel of Wardour chancellor, lord Powis treasurer, sir William Godolphin, then in Spain, privy seal, Coleman secretary of state, Bellasis general, Petre, lieutenant general, Ratcliffe major general, Stafford paymaster general, and Langhorn advocate general, besides many other commissions for subaltern officers. These, he said, he saw in Langhorn's chamber; and that he had delivered out many of them himself, and saw many more delivered by others. And he now swore, upon his own knowledge, that both Coleman and Wakeman were in the plot; that Coleman had given 80 guineas to four ruffians, that went to Windsor last summer, to stab the king; that Wakeman had undertaken to poison him, for which 10,000*l.* was offered him, but that he got the price raised to 15,000*l.* He excused his not knowing them, when confronted with them; and said, that he was then so spent by a long examination, and by not sleeping for two nights, that he was not then master of himself; though it seemed very strange, that he should then have forgot that which he had made now the main part of his evidence, and should have then objected only reports upon hearsay, when he had such matter against them, as he now said, upon his own knowledge. And it seemed not very congruous, that those who went to stab the king had but 20 guineas a piece, when Wakeman was to have 15,000*l.* for a safer way of killing him. Many other things in the discovery made it seem ill digested, and not credible. Bellasis was almost perpetually ill of the gout. Petre was a weak man, and had never any military command. Ratcliffe was a man that lived in great state in the north, and had not stirred from home all the last summer. Oates also swore, he delivered a commission to be a colonel, in May last, to Howard, the earl of Carlisle's brother, that had married the dutchess of Richmond. But a friend of mine told me, he was all that month at Bath, lodged in the same house with Howard, with whom he was every day engaged at play. He was then miserably ill of the gout, of which he died soon after. Oates did also charge general Lambert, as one engaged in the design, who was to have a great post when set at liberty. But he had been kept in prison ever since the Restoration; and by that time had lost his memory and sense. But it was thought strange, that since Oates had so often said, what I once heard him say, that he had gone in among them on design to betray them, that he had not kept any one of all these commissions to be real proof in support of his evidence. He had also said to the king, that whereas others ventured their lives to serve him, he had ventured his soul to serve him: And yet he did suffer the four ruffians to go to Windsor to kill him, without giving him any notice of his danger. These were characters strong enough to give suspicion, if Coleman's letters, and Godfrey's murder, had not seemed such authentic confirmations, as left no room to doubt of any thing. Tillotson indeed told me, that Langhorn's wife, who was still as zealous a protestant as he was a papist, came oft to him, and gave him notice of every thing she could discover among them; though she continued a faithful and dutiful wife to the last minute of her husband's life. Upon the first breaking out of the plot, before Oates had spoke a word of commissions, or had accused Langhorn, she engaged her son into some discourse upon those matters, who was a hot indiscreet papist. He said, their designs were so well laid, it was impossible they could miscarry: And that his father would be one of the greatest men of England; for he had seen a commission from the Pope, constituting him advocate general. This he told me in Stillingfleet's hearing.

Bedlow's Evidence.

While things were thus in a ferment at London, Bedlow delivered himself to the magistrates of Bristol, pretending he knew the secret of Godfrey's murder. So he was sent up to London. The king told me, that when the Secretary examined him in his presence, at his first coming he said he knew nothing of the plot; but that he had heard that 40,000 men were to come over from Spain, who were to meet as pilgrims at St. Jago's, and were to be shipped for England: But he knew nothing of any fleet that was to bring them over. So this was looked on as very extravagant. But he said, he had seen Godfrey's body at Somerset House; and that he was offered 4,000*l.* by a servant of the lord Bellasis, to assist in carrying it away: but upon that he had gone out of town to Bristol, where he was so pursued with horror, that it forced him to discover it. Bedlow had led a very vicious life. He had gone by many false names, by which he had cheated many persons. He had gone over many parts of France and Spain, as a man of quality. And he had made a shift to live on his wits, or rather by his cheats. So a tenderness of conscience did not seem to be that to which he was much subject. But the very next day after this, when he was brought to the bar of the House of Lords, he made a full discovery of his knowledge of the plot, and of the Lords in the Tower: for all those against whom Oates had informed were now prisoners. The king was upon this convinced, that some had been with Bedlow after he had been before him, who had instructed him in this narration, of which he had said the night before that he knew nothing: and yet he not only confirmed the main parts of Oates's discoveries, but added a great deal to them. And he now pretended, that his rambling over so many places of Europe was all in order to the carrying on this design; that he was trusted with the secret, and had opened many of the letters, which he was employed to carry.

Other Proofs that seemed to support the Discovery.

Here were now two witnesses to prove the plot, as far as swearing could prove it. And among the papers of the Jesuits that were seized on when they were clapt up, two letters were found that seemed to confirm all. One from Rome mentioned the sending over the patents; of which it was said in the letter, that they guessed the contents, though their patrons there carried their matters so secretly that nothing was known, but as they thought fit. The Jesuits, when examined upon this, said, these were only patents with relation to the offices in their order. Another letter was writ to a Jesuit in the country, citing him to come to London by the 24th of April, which was the day in which Oates swore they held their consult, and that fifty of them had signed the resolution of killing the king, which was to be executed by Grove and Pickering. In the end of that letter it was added, I need not enjoin secrecy, for the nature of the thing requires it. When the Jesuit was examined to this, he said, it was a summons for a meeting according to the rule of their order: and they being to meet during the sitting of the parliament, that was the particular reason for enjoining secrecy. Yet, while mens minds were strongly possessed, these answers did not satisfy, but were thought only shifts.

Carstairs' Practices.

At this time Carstairs, of whose behaviour in Scotland mention has been made, not having met with those rewards that he expected, came up to London, to accuse duke Lauderdale, as designing to keep up the opposition that was made to the laws in Scotland, even at the time that he seemed to prosecute Conventicles with the greatest fury; because he had often drawn the chief of their teachers into such snares, that upon the advertisements that he gave they might have been taken, but that duke Lauderdale had neglected it: so he saw, he had a mind that Conventicles should go on, at the same time that he was putting the country in such a flame to punish them. This he undertook to prove, by those witnesses of whom on other occasions he had made use. He also confessed the false date of that warrant upon which Bailie had been censured. He put all this in writing, and gave it to the marquis of Athol; and pressed him to carry him to duke Hamilton, and the earl of Kincardin, that he might beg their pardon, and be assured of their favour. I was against the making use of so vile a man, and would have nothing to do with him. He made application to lord Cavendish, and to some of the House of Commons, to whom I gave such a character of him, that they would see him no more.

Staley's Trial.

While he was thus looking about where he could find a lucky piece of villany, he happened to go into an eating house in Covent-garden, that was over against the shop of one Staley, the Popish banker, who had been in great credit, but was then under some difficulties; for all his creditors came to call for their money. Staley happening to be in the next room to Carstairs, Carstairs pretended he heard him say in French, that the king was a rogue, and persecuted the people of God; and that he himself would stab him, if nobody else would. The words were writ down, which he resolved to swear against him. So next morning he and one of his witnesses went to him, and told him what they would swear against him, and asked a sum of money of him. He was in much anxiety, and saw great danger on both hands. Yet he chose rather to leave himself to their malice, than be preyed on by them. So he was seized on: and they swore the words against him: and he was appointed to be tried within five days. When I heard who the witnesses were, I thought I was bound to do what I could to stop it. So I sent both to the Lord Chancellor, and to the Attorney-General, to let them know what profligate wretches these witnesses were. Jones, the Attorney-General, took it ill of me, that I should disparage the king's evidence. The thing grew public, and raised great clamour against me. It was said, I was taking this method to get into favour at Court. I had likewise observed to several persons of weight, how many incredible things there were in the evidence that was given: I wished they would make use of the heat the nation was in to secure us effectually from Popery: we saw certain evidence to carry us so far, as to graft that upon it: but I wished they would not run too hastily to the taking mens lives upon such testimonies. Lord Hoſſis had more temper, than I expected from a man of his heat. Lord Halifax was of the same mind. But the earl of Shaftsbury could not bear the discourse. He said, we must support the evidence; and that all those who undermined the credit of the witnesses were to be looked on as public enemies. And so inconstant a thing is popularity, that I was most bitterly railed at by those who seemed formerly to put some confidence in me. It went so far, that I was advised not to stir abroad for fear of public affronts. But these things did not daunt me. Staley was brought to his trial, which did not hold long. The witnesses gave a full evidence against him: and he had nothing to offer to take away their credit. He only shewed how improbable it was, that in a public house he should talk such things with so loud a voice as to be heard in the next room, in a quarter of the town where almost every body understood French. He was cast: and he prepared himself very seriously for death. Dr. Lloyd went to see him in prison. He was offered his life, if he would discover their plots. He protested, he knew of none; and that he had not said the words sworn against him, nor any thing to that purpose. And he died, the first of those who suffered on the account of the plot. Duke Lauderdale, having heard how I had moved in this matter, railed at me with open mouth. He said, I had studied to save Staley, for the liking I had to any one that would murder the king. And he infused this into the king, so that he repeated it in the House of Lords to a company that were standing about him.

Yet so soon could the king turn to make use of a man whom he had censured so unmercifully, that two days after this he sent the earl of Dunbarton, that was a papist, and had been bred in France, and was duke Hamilton's brother, to me, to desire me to come to him secretly, for he had a mind to talk with me. He said, he believed I could do him service, if I had a mind to it. And the See of Chichester being then void, he said, he would not dispose of it, till he saw whether I would deserve it, or not. I asked, if he fancied I would be a spy, or betray any body to him. But he undertook to me, that the king should ask me no question but should in all points leave me to my liberty.

The Queen charged as in the Plot.

An accident fell in, before I went to him, which took off much from Oates's credit. When he was examined by the House of Lords, and had made the same narrative to them that he had offered to the Commons, they asked him, if he had now named all the persons whom he knew to be involved in the plot? He said, there might be some inferior persons whom he had perhaps forgot, but he had named all the persons of note. Yet, it seems, afterwards he bethought himself: And Mrs. Elliot, wife to Elliot of the bed-chamber, came to the king, and told him, Oates had somewhat to swear against the queen, if he would give way to it. The king was willing to give Oates line enough, as he expressed it to me, and seemed to give way to it. So he came out with a new story, that the queen had sent for some Jesuits to Somerset house; and that he went along with them, but staid at the door, when they went in; where he heard one, in a woman's voice, expressing her resentments of the usage she had met with, and assuring them she would assist them in taking off the king: Upon that he was brought in, and presented to her: And there was then no other woman in the room but she. When he was bid describe the room, it proved to be one of the public rooms of that court, which are so great, that the queen, who was a woman of a low voice, could not be heard over it, unless she had strained for it. Oates, to excuse his saying that he could not lay any thing to the charge of any besides those he had already named, pretended, that he thought then it was not lawful to accuse the queen. But this did not satisfy people. Bedlow, to support this, swore that being once at chapel at Somerset house, he saw the queen, the duke, and some others, very earnest in discourse in the closet above; and that one came down with much joy, and said, the queen had yielded at last; and that one explained this to him beyond sea, and said, it was to kill the king. And, besides Bedlow's oath that he saw Godfrey's body in Somerset house, it was remembered, that at that time the queen was for some days in so close a retirement, that no person was admitted. Prince Rupert came then to wait on her, but was denied access. This raised a strange suspicion of her. But the king would not suffer that matter to go any farther.

Coleman's Trial.

Coleman was brought to his trial. Oates and Bedlow swore flatly against him, as was mentioned before. He denied, that he had ever seen either the one or the other of them in his whole life: And defended himself by Oates's not knowing him when they were first confronted, nor objecting those matters to him for a great while after. He also pressed Oates to name the day in August, in which he had sent the fourscore guineas to the four ruffians. But Oates would fix on no day, though he was very punctual in matters of less moment. Coleman had been out of town almost that whole month. But no day being named, that served him in no stead. He urged the improbability of his talking to two such men, whom he had their own confession never seen before. They said, he was told that they were trusted with the whole secret. His letters to F. de la Chaise was the heaviest part of the evidence. He did not deny, that there were many impertinent things in his letters: But, he said, he intended nothing in them, but the king's service and the duke's: He never intended to bring in the catholic religion, by rebellion, or by blood, but only by a toleration: And the aid, that was prayed from France, was only meant the assistance of money, and the interposition of that court. After a long trial, he was convicted: and sentence passed upon him to die a traitor. He continued to his last breath, denying every tittle of that which the witnesses had sworn against him. Many were sent to him from both Houses, offering to interpose for his pardon, if he would confess. He still protested his innocence, and took great care to vindicate the duke. He said; his own heat might make him too forward: For, being persuaded of the truth of his religion, he could not but wish, that all others were not only almost, but altogether, such as he was, except in that chain; for he was then in iron: He confessed, he had mixed too much interest for raising himself in all he did; and that he had received 2,500 guineas from the French ambassador, to gain some friends to his master, but that he had kept them to himself; he had acted by order in all that he had done: And he believed the king knew of his employment, particularly that at Brussels. But, though he seemed willing to be questioned concerning the king, the committee did not think fit to do it, nor to report what he said concerning it: Only in general they reported, that he spoke of another matter, about which they did not think fit to interrogate him, nor to mention it. Littleton was one of the committee; and gave me an account of all that passed that very night. And I found his behaviour made great impression on them all.

He suffered with much composedness and devotion; and died much better than he had lived. It was given out at that time, to make the duke more odious, that Coleman was kept up from making confessions, by the hopes the duke sent him of a pardon at Tyburn. But he could not be so ignorant, as not to know that, at that time, it was not in the king's power to pardon him, while the tide went so high.

The nation was now so much alarmed, that all people were furnishing themselves with arms, which heightened the jealousy of the court. A bill passed in both Houses for raising all the militia, and for keeping it together for six weeks: A third part, if I remember right, being to serve a fortnight, and so round. I found, some of them hoped when that bill past into a law, they would be more masters; and that the militia would not separate, till all the demands of the two Houses should be granted. The king rejected the bill, when offered to him for his assent.

The King's thoughts of this whole matter.

I waited often on him: all the month of December. He came to me to Chilling's, a page of the back stairs; and kept the time he assigned me to a minute. He was alone, and talked much, and very freely with me. We agreed in one thing, that the greatest part of the evidence was a contrivance. But he suspected, some had set on Oates, and instructed him: And he named the earl of Shaftsbury. I was of another mind. I thought the many gross things in his narrative shewed, there was no abler head than Oates, or Tonge, in the framing it: And Oates in his first story had covered the duke, and the ministers so much, that from thence it seemed clear that lord Shaftsbury had no hand in it, who hated them much more than he did popery. He fancied, there was a design of a rebellion on foot. I assured him, I saw no appearances of it. I told him there was a report breaking out, that he intended to legitimate the duke of Monmouth. He answered quick, that, as well as he loved him, he had rather see him hanged. Yet he apprehended a rebellion so much, that he seemed not ill pleased, that the party should flatter themselves with that imagination, hoping that would keep them quiet in a dependance upon himself: And he suffered the duke of Monmouth to use all methods to make himself popular, reckoning that he could keep him in his own management. He was surprised, when I told him that Coleman had insinuated that he knew of all their foreign negotiations; or at least he seemed so to me. I pressed him much to oblige the duke to enter into conferences with some of our divines, and to be present at them himself. This would very much clear him of jealousy, and might have a good effect on his brother: At least it would give the world some hopes; like what Henry 4. of France, his grandfather, did, which kept a party firm to him for some time before he changed. He answered, that his brother had neither Henry 4's understanding, nor his conscience: For he believed, that king was always indifferent as to those matters. He would not hearken to this, which made me incline to believe a report I had heard, that the duke had got a solemn promise of the king, that he would never speak to him of religion. The king spoke much to me concerning Oates's accusing the queen, and acquainted me with the whole progress of it. He said, she was a weak woman, and had some disagreeable humours, but was not capable of a wicked thing: And, considering his faultiness towards her in other things he thought it a horrid thing to abandon her. He said, he looked on falsehood and cruelty as the greatest crimes in the sight of God: He knew he had led a bad life; (of which he spoke with some sense:) But he was breaking himself of all his faults: And he would never do a base and a wicked thing. I spoke on all these subjects what I thought became me, which he took well. And I encouraged him much in his resolution of not exposing the queen to perish by false swearing. I told him, there was no possibility of laying the heat that was now raised, but by changing his ministry. And

I told him how odious the earl of Danby was, and that there was a design against him: But I knew not the particulars. He said, he knew that lay at bottom. The army was not yet disbanded: and the king was in great straits for money. The House of Commons gave a money bill for this. Yet they would not trust the court with the disbanding the army, but ordered the money to be brought into the chamber of London, and named a committee for paying off, and breaking the army. I perceived the king thought I was reserved to him, because I would tell him no particular stories, nor name persons: Upon which I told him, since he had that opinion of me, I saw I could do him no service, and would trouble him no more; but he should certainly hear from me, if I came to know any thing that might be of any consequence to his person or government.

This favour of mine lasted all the month of December 1678. I acquainted him with Carstairs practice against duke Lauderdale, and all that I knew of that matter; which was the ground on which I had gone with relation to Staley. The king told duke Lauderdale of it, without naming me. And he sent for Carstairs, and charged him with it. Carstairs denied it all; but said, that duke Hamilton and lord Kincardin had pressed him to do it: And he went to the king and affirmed it confidently to him. He did not name lord Athol, hoping that he would be gentle to him for that reason. The king spoke of this to duke Hamilton, who told him the whole story, as I had done. Lord Athol upon that sent for Carstairs and charged him with all his foul dealing, and drew him near a closet, where he had put two witnesses. Carstairs said, that somebody had discovered the matter to duke Lauderdale, that he was now upon the point of making his fortune, and that if duke Lauderdale grew to be his enemy, he was undone. He confessed, he had charged duke Hamilton and lord Kincardin falsely: But he had no other way to save himself. After the marquis of Athol had thus drawn every thing from him, he went to the king with his two witnesses, and the paper that Carstairs had formerly put in his hand. Carstairs was then with the king, and was, with many imprecations, justifying his charge against the two Lords: But he was confounded, when he saw lord Athol. And upon that his villany appeared so evidently, that the part I had acted in that matter was now well understood, and approved of. Carstairs died not long after, under great horror; and ordered himself to be cast into some ditch as a dog; for he said he was no better. But I could never hear what he said of Staley's business.

The Trial of Ireland and Others.

In December, Ireland, Whitebread, and Fenwick, three Jesuits; and Grove and Pickering, two of the servant's in the queen's chapel, were brought to their trial. Oates and Bedlow swore home against Ireland, that in August last he had given particular orders about killing the king. Oates swore the same against the other two Jesuits. But Bedlow swore only upon hear-say against them. So, though they had pleaded to their indictment, and the jury was sworn, and the witnesses examined; yet, when the evidence was not found full, their trial was put off to another time, and the jury was not charged with them. This looked, as if it was resolved that they must not be acquitted. I complained of this to Jones: but he said they had precedents for it. I always thought, that a precedent against reason signified no more, but that the like injustice had been done before. And the truth is, the crown has, or at least had, such advantages in trials of treason, that it seems strange how any person was ever acquitted. Ireland, in his own defence, proved by many witnesses, that he went from London on the second of August to Staffordshire, and did not come back till the twelfth of September. Yet in opposition to that, a woman swore that she saw him in London about the middle of August. So, since he might have come up post in one day, and gone down in another, this did not satisfy. Oates and Bedlow swore against Grove and Pickering, that they undertook to shoot the king at Windsor; that Grove was to have 1500*l.* for it; and that Pickering chose thirty thousand masses, which at a shilling a mass, amounted to the same sum: they attempted it three several times with a pistol: once the flint was loose: at another time there was no powder in the pan: and the third time the pistol was charged only with bullets. This was strange stuff. But all was imputed to a special providence of God: and the whole evidence was believed. So they were convicted, condemned, and executed. But they denied to the last every particular that was sworn against them.

Dugdale's Evidence.

This began to shake the credit of the evidence, when a more composed and credible person came in to support it. One Dugdale, that had been the lord Aston's bailiff, and lived in a fair reputation in the country, was put in prison for refusing the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. He did then, with many imprecations on himself, deny, that he knew of any plot. But afterwards he made a great discovery of a correspondence that Evers, the lord Ashton's Jesuit, held with the Jesuits in London; who had writ to Evers of the design of killing the king, and desired him to find out men proper for executing it, whether they were gentlemen or not. This, he swore, was writ plain in a letter from Whitebread, the provincial, directed to himself: but he knew it was meant for Evers. Evers, and Govan, another Jesuit, pressed this Dugdale to undertake it: they promised he should be canonized for it: and the lord Stafford offered him 500*l.* if he would set about it. He was a man of sense and temper; and behaved himself decently; and had somewhat in his air and deportment that disposed people to believe him: so that the king himself began to think there was somewhat in the plot, though he had very little regard either to Oates or Bedlow. Dugdale's evidence was much confirmed by one circumstance. He had talked of a justice of peace in Westminster that was killed, on the Tuesday after Godfrey was missed: so that the news of this must have been writ from London on the Saturday night's post. He did not think it was a secret: and so he talked of it as news in an ale-house. The two persons, he said he spoke it to, remembered nothing of it, the one being the minister of the parish: but several others swore they had heard it. He saw this, as he swore, in a letter writ by Harcourt the Jesuit to Evers, in which Godfrey was named. But he added a strange story to this, which he said Evers told him afterwards; that the duke had sent to Coleman, when he was in Newgate, to persuade him to discover nothing, and that he desired to know of him, whether he had ever discovered their designs to any other person; and that Coleman sent back answer, that he had spoke of them to Godfrey, but to no other man: upon which the duke gave order to kill him. This was never made public, till the lord Stafford's trial. And I was amazed to see such a thing break out after so long a silence. It looked like an addition to Dugdale's first evidence; though he had been noted for having brought out all his discoveries at once. The earl of Essex told me, he swore it in his first examination: but, since it was only upon hear-say from Evers, and so was nothing in law, and yet would heighten the fury against the Duke, the king charged Dugdale to say nothing of it.

France discovers Godfrey's Murder.

At the same time a particular discovery was made of Godfrey's murder. France, a goldsmith, that wrought for the Queen's chapel, had gone from his house for two or three days, the week before the murder. And one that lodged in his house, calling that to mind, upon Bedlow's swearing he saw the body in Somerset-house, fancied that this was the time in which he was from home, and that he might be concerned in that matter; though it appeared afterwards, that his absence was the week before. He said, he went from his own house, fearing to be put in prison, as many were, upon suspicion, or on the account of his religion. Yet upon this information he was seized on, and carried to Westminster. Bedlow accidentally passed by, not knowing any thing concerning him; and at first sight he charged somebody to seize on him; for he was one of those whom he saw about Godfrey's body. Yet he denied every thing for some days. Afterwards he confessed, he was concerned in it: and he gave this account of it: Gerald and Killy, two priests, engaged him and three others into it; who were Green, that belonged to the Queen's chapel, Hill, that had served Godden, the most celebrated writer among them, and Berry, the porter of Somerset-house. He said, these all, except Berry, had several meetings, in which the priests persuaded them it was no sin, but a meritorious action, to dispatch Godfrey, who had been a busy man in taking depositions against them, and that the taking him off would satisfy others. Prance named an alehouse, where they used to meet: and the people of that house did confirm this of their meeting there. After they had resolved on it, they followed him for several days. The morning before they killed him, Hill went to his house to see if he was yet gone out, and spoke to his maid. And finding he was yet at home, they staid for his coming out. This was confirmed by the maid, who, upon Hill's being taken, went to Newgate, and in a crowd of prisoners, distinguished him, and said, he was the person that asked for her master the morning before he was lost. Prance said, they dogged him into a place near St. Clement's Church, where he was kept till night. Prance was appointed to be at Somerset-house at night. And, as Godfrey went by the water gate, two of them pretended to be hot in a quarrel. And one run out to call a justice of peace, and so pressed Godfrey to go in and part them. He was not easily prevailed on to do it. Yet he did at last. Green then got behind him, and pulled a cravat about his neck, and drew him down to the ground, and strangled him. Upon that Girald would have run him through: but the rest diverted him from that, by representing the danger of a discovery by the blood's being seen there. Upon that they carried his body up to Godden's room, of which Hill had the key, Godden being then in France. Two days after that they removed it to a room cross the upper court, which Prance could never describe particularly. And, that not being found a convenient place, they carried it back to Godden's lodgings. At last it was resolved to carry it out in the night in a sedan to the remote parts of the town, and from thence to cast it into some ditch. On Wednesday a sedan was provided. And one of the centinels swore he saw a sedan carried in: but none saw it brought out. Prance said, they carried him out, and that Green had provided a horse, on whose back he laid him, when they were got clear of the town, and then he carried him, as he believed, to the place where his body was found. This was a consisting story, which was supported in some circumstances by collateral proofs. He added another particular, that, some days after the fact, those who had been concerned in it, and two others, who were in the secret, appointed to meet at Bow, where they talked much of that matter. This was confirmed by a servant of that house, who was coming in and out to them, and heard them often mention Godfrey's name. Upon which he stood at the door out of curiosity to hearken: but one of them came out, and threatened him for it. The priests were not found: but Green, Hill, and Berry were apprehended upon it. Yet some days after this, Prance desired to be carried to the king, who would not see him, but in council: and he denied all that he had formerly sworn, and said it was all a fiction. But as soon as he was carried back to prison, he sent the keeper of Newgate to the king to tell him, that all he had sworn was true, but that the horror and confusion he was in put him on denying it. Yet he went off from this again, and denied every thing. Dr. Lloyd was upon this sent to him to talk with him. At first he denied every thing to him. But Dr. Lloyd said to me, that he was almost dead through the disorder of his mind and with cold in his body. But after that Dr. Lloyd had made a fire, and caused him to be put in a bed, and began to discourse the matter with him, he returned to his confession; which he did in such a manner, that Lloyd said to me, it was not possible for him to doubt of his sincerity in it.

Some condemned for it, who died denying it.

So, he persisting in his first confession, Green, Hill, and Berry were brought to their trial. Bedlow and Prance, with all the circumstances formerly mentioned, were the evidence against them. On the other hand they brought witnesses to prove, that they came home in a good hour on the nights, in which the fact was said to be done. Those that lived in Godden's lodgings deposed, that no dead body could be brought thither, for they were every day in the room that Prance had named. And the centinels of that night of the carrying him out said they saw no sedan brought out. They were, upon a full hearing, convicted and condemned. Green, and Hill, died, as they had lived, papists, and, with solemn protestations, denied the whole thing. Berry declared himself a protestant; and that though he had changed his religion for fear of losing his place, yet he had still continued to be one in his heart. He said, he looked on what had now befallen him, as a just judgment of God upon him for that dissimulation. He denied the whole matter charged on him. He seemed to prepare himself seriously for death: and to the last minute he affirmed he was altogether innocent. Dr. Lloyd attended on him, and was much persuaded of his sincerity. Prance swore nothing against him, but that he assisted in the fact, and in carrying about the dead body. So Lloyd reckoned, that, those things being done in the night, Prance might have mistaken him for some other person, who might be like him, considering the confusion that so much guilt might have put him in. He therefore believed Prance had sworn rashly with relation to him, but truly as to the main of the fact. The papists took great advantage from Berry's dying a protestant, and yet denying all that was sworn against him, though he might have had his life if he would have confessed it. They said this shewed it was not from the doctrine of equivocation, or from the power of absolution, or any other of their tenets, that so many died, denying all that was sworn against them, but from their own conviction. And indeed this matter came to be charged on Dr. Lloyd, as if he had been made a tool for bringing Berry to this seeming conversion, and that all was done on design to cover the queen. But I saw him then every day, and was well assured that he acted nothing in it, but what became his profession, with all possible sincerity. Prance began, after this, to enlarge his discoveries. He said, he had often heard them talk of killing the king, and of setting on a general massacre, after they had raised an army. Dugdale also said, he had heard them discourse of a massacre. The memory of the Irish massacre was yet so fresh, as to raise a particular horror at the very mention of this; though where the numbers were so great as in Ireland, that might have been executed, yet there seemed to be no occasion to apprehend the like where the numbers were in so great an inequality, as they were here. Prance did also swear, that a servant of the Lord Powis had told him that there was one in their family who had undertaken to kill the king; but that some days after he told him, they were now gone off from that design. It looked very strange, and added no credit to his other evidence, that the papists should be thus talking of killing the king, as if it had been a common piece of news. But there are seasons of believing, as well as of disbelieving, and believing was then so much in season, that improbabilities or inconsistencies were little considered. Nor was it safe so much as to make reflections on them. That was called the blasting of the plot, and disparaging the king's evidence; though indeed Oates and Bedlow did, by their behaviour, detract more from their own credit, than all their enemies could have done. The former talked of all persons with insufferable insolence: and the other was a scandalous libertine in his whole deportment.

The Lord Chief Justice at that time was sir William Scroggs, a man more valued for a good readiness in speaking well, than either for learning in his profession, or for any moral virtue. His life had been indecently scandalous, and his fortunes were very low. He was raised by the earl of Danby's favour, first to be a Judge and then to be the Chief Justice. And it was a melancholy thing to see so bad, so ignorant and so poor a man raised up to that great post. Yet he, now seeing how the stream run, went into it with so much zeal and heartiness, that he was become the favourite of the people. But when he saw the king had an ill opinion of it, he grew colder in the pursuit of it. He began to neglect and check the witnesses: Upon which they who behaved themselves as if they had been the tribunes of the people, began to rail at him. Yet in all the trials he set himself, even with indecent earnestness, to get the prisoners to be always cast.

Jennison's Evidence.

Another witness came in soon after these things, Jennison, the younger brother of a Jesuit, and a gentleman of a family and estate. He observing that Ireland had defended himself against Oates chiefly by this, that he was in Staffordshire from the beginning of August till the 12th of September, and that he had died affirming that to be true, seemed much surprised at it; and upon that turned Protestant. For he said, he saw him in London on the 19th of August, on which day he fixed upon this account, that he saw him the day before he went down in the stage coach to York, which was proved by the books of that office to be the 20th of August. He said, he was come to town from Windsor: and hearing that Ireland was in town, he went to see him, and found him drawing off his boots. Ireland asked him news, and in particular, how the king was attended at Windsor? And when he answered, that he walked about very carelessly with very few about him, Ireland seemed to wonder at it and said, It would be easy then to take him off: To which Jennison answered quick, God forbid: But Ireland said, he did not mean that it could be lawfully done. Jennison, in the letter in which he writ this up to a friend in London, added, that he remembered an inconsiderable passage or two more, and that perhaps Smith (a priest that had lived with his father) could help him to one or two more circumstances relating to those matters: But he protested, as he desired the forgiveness of his sins and the salvation of his soul, that he knew no more; and wished he might never see the face of God, if he knew any more. This letter was printed. And great use was made of it, to shew how little regard was to be had to those denials with which so many had ended their lives. But this man in the summer thereafter published a long narrative of his knowledge of the plot. He said, himself had been invited to assist in killing the king. He named the four ruffians that went to Windsor to do it. And he thought to have reconciled this to his letter, by pretending these were the circumstances that he had not mentioned in it. Smith did also change his religion; and deposed, that when he was at Rome, he was told in general of the design of killing the king. He was afterwards discovered to be a vicious man. Yet he went no farther than to swear, that he was acquainted with the design in general, but not with the persons that were employed in it. By these witnesses the credit of the plot was universally established. Yet no real proofs appearing, besides Coleman's letters and Godfrey's murder, the king by a proclamation, did offer both a pardon and 200*l.* to any one that would come in and make further discoveries. This was thought too great a hire to purchase witnesses. Money had been offered to those who should bring in criminals. But it was said to be a new and indecent practice to offer so much money to men, that should merit it by swearing: And it might be too great an encouragement to perjury.

Practices with the Witnesses discovered.

While the Witnesses were weakening own credit, some practices were discovered did very much support it. Reading, a lawyer of some subtilty but of no virtue, was employed by the Lords in the Tower to solicit their affairs. He insinuated himself much into Bedlow's confidence, and was much in his company: And in the hearing of others, he was always pressing him to tell all he knew. He lent him money very freely, which the other wanted often. And he seemed at first to design only to find out somewhat that should destroy the credit of his testimony. But he ventured on other practices; and offered him much money, if he would turn his evidence against the Popish Lords only into a hear-say, so that it should not come home against them. Reading said, Bedlow began the proposition to him; and employed him to see how much money these Lords could give him, if he should bring them off: Upon which Reading, as he pretended afterwards, seeing that innocent blood was like to be shed, was willing, even by indecent means, to endeavour to prevent it. Yet he freed the Lords in the Tower. He said, they would not promise a farthing: Only the lord Stafford said, he would give himself 2 or 300*l.*, which he might dispose of as he pleased. While Reading was driving the bargain, Bedlow was too hard for him at his own trade of craft: For as he acquainted both prince Rupert and the earl of Essex, with the whole negotiation, from the first step of it, so he placed two witnesses secretly in his chamber, when Reading was to come to him; and drew him into those discourses, which discovered the whole practice of that corruption. Reading had likewise drawn a paper, by which he shewed him with how few and small alterations he could soften his deposition, so as not to affect the Lords. With these witnesses and this paper, Bedlow charged Reading. The whole matter was proved beyond contradiction. And as this raised his credit, so it laid a heavy load on the Popish Lords; though the proofs came home only to Reading, and he was set in the pillory for it. Bedlow made a very ill use of this discovery, which happened in March, to cover his having sworn against Whitebread and Fenwick only upon hear-say in December: For being resolved to swear plain matter upon his own knowledge against them, when they should be brought again on their trial, he said, Reading had prevailed on him to be easy to them, as he called it; and that he had said to him that the Lords would take the saving of these Jesuits, as an earnest of what he would do for themselves; though it was not very probable, that these Lords would have abandoned Ireland, when they took such care of the other Jesuits. The truth was, he ought to have been set aside from being a witness any more, since now by his own confession he had sworn falsely in that trial: He had first sworn, he knew nothing of his own knowledge against the two Jesuits, and afterwards he swore copiously against them, and upon his own knowledge. Wyld, a worthy and ancient judge, said upon that to him, that he was a perjured man, and ought to come no more into courts, but to go home and repent. Yet all this was passed over, as if it had been of no weight: and the judge was turned out for his plain freedom. There was soon after this another practice discovered concerning Oates. Some that belonged to the earl of Danby conversed much with Oates's servants. They told them many odious things that he was daily speaking of the king, which looked more like one that intended to ruin than to save him. One of these did also affirm, that Oates had made an abominable attempt upon him not fit to be named. Oates smelled this out, and got his servants to deny all that they had said, and to fasten it upon those who had been with them, as a practice of theirs: And they were upon that likewise set on the pillory. And to put things of a sort together, though they happened not all at once: One Tasborough, that belonged to the duke's court, entered into some correspondence with Dugdale, who was courting a kinswoman of his. It was proposed, that Dugdale should sign a paper, retracting all that he had formerly sworn, and should upon that go beyond sea, for which he was promised, in the duke's name, a considerable reward. He had written the paper, as was desired: But he was too cunning for Tasborough, and he proved his practices upon him. He pretended he drew the paper only to draw the other further on, that he might be able to penetrate the deeper into their designs. Tasborough was fined and set in the pillory, for tampering thus with the king's evidence.

Reflections upon the whole Evidence.

This was the true state of the Plot, and of the Witnesses that proved it; which I have opened as fully as was possible for me: And I had particular occasions to be well instructed in it. Here was matter enough to work on the fears and apprehensions of the nation: So it was not to be wondered at, if parliaments were hot and juries were easy in this prosecution. The visible evidences that appeared, made all people conclude there was great plotting among them. And it was generally believed, that the bulk of what was sworn by the witnesses was true, though they had by all appearance dressed it up with incredible circumstances. What the men of learning knew concerning their principles, both of deposing of kings, and of the lawfulness of murdering them when so deposed, made them easily conclude, that since they saw the duke was so entirely theirs, and that the king was so little to be depended on, they might think the present conjuncture was not to be lost. And since the duke's eldest daughter was already out of their hands, they might make the more haste to set the duke on the throne. The tempers, as well as the morals of the Jesuits, made it reasonable to believe, that they were not apt to neglect such advantages, nor to stick at any sort of falsehood in order to their own defence. The doctrine of probability, besides many other maxims that are current among them, made many give little credit to their witnesses, or to their most solemn denials, even at their execution. Many things were brought to shew, that by the casuistical divinity taught among them, and published by them to the world, there was no practice so bad, but that the doctrines of probability and of ordering the intention, might justify it. Yet many thought, that what doctrines soever men might by a subtilty of speculation be carried into, the approaches of death, with the seriousness that appeared in their deportment, must needs work so much on the pity and candour which seemed rooted in human nature, that even immoral opinions, maintained in the way of argument, could not then resist it. Several of our divines went far in this charge, against all regard to their dying speeches; of which some of our own church complained, as inhuman and indecent.

OATES'S NARRATIVE.

A true NARRATIVE of the horrid PLOT and CONSPIRACY of the POPISH PARTY against the Life of his SACRED MAJESTY, the GOVERNMENT, and the PROTESTANT RELIGION: With a List of such Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, as were the Conspirators: and the head Officers, both Civil and Military, that were to effect it. Published by the Order of the Right Hon. the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled. Humbly presented to His Most Excellent Majesty.

To his Sacred Majesty CHARLES the SECOND, by the Grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, king, Defender of the Faith.

Great Sir; This Narrative of the present Horrid Plot against your majesty and government, which was first heard, and narrowly discussed before your Sacred Majesty and Council, and afterwards by both Houses of Parliament, with universal assent to the power of truth herein, is at last to appear abroad, for the satisfaction of these nations, and Europe perhaps, touching the mystery and consequence of such designs. I hope I have good equity on my side, to presume to dedicate the same to your royal name and patronage, and to no other; because I am well assured, both the rise and progress thereof, hath wholly sprung from an inbred indelible love and loyalty to your majesty and kingdoms, as its support and success to be owing (under God's extraordinary and miraculous appearance for his people in its defence) to your majesty's gracious pardon of several human frailties in the management.

Great and many are the arts and hoverings that have been, and may yet be used in vain both at home and abroad, to suppress and traduce the evidence, by those who are more zealous and industrious not to be thought or suspected, rather than really not to be very traitors and rebels against their king and country; whose many past treasons and encroachments upon several princes, for these last thousand years in the world, will prove their inclinations for future; whereof there are as many tragical instances against your majesty's own family and person, within fresh memory

(and to be made out by new proofs out of their own mouths and records, if need) as against any other of God's anointing and appointment.

Your grandfather king James, though he escaped their powder, is well known not to have escaped their poison. Your other grandfather, Henry the fourth of France, was basely and villainously stabbed in the heart, which he had designed and bequeathed after his death unto them, notwithstanding all the indulgences and immunities that the heart of man could wish or desire, which he had granted them in his life. Who besides these, were the first authors and contrivers of the late unnatural war, by their known diabolicall art of inflaming parties and passions against each other, and of your royal father's unspeakable sufferings and barbarous usage? It was these that brought him to his end, and flourished swords, and triumphed over his dead body, whom they durst not approach when living. What shall I say of him who then cried out, 'Now is the enemy of God and of his Church fallen? I believe your majesty hath been well-informed of the traitorous executioners, but hardly at all of the Putney-projectors, who were in most, if not all the councils that contrived his ruin. What broke the Uxbridge-Treaty, but the Romish interest and policy? Who continued to baffle all designs of peace and settlement to this nation, and prosperity to your majesty's family, but those incendiaries? It may not be inconvenient to remind with what zeal and interest they did persuade the Scots in 1650, to impose that upon your majesty which your royal law hath forbidden others; for the effecting whereof, some thousands of pounds were spent and given by them. After your majesty's escape at Worcester, how did they, above all men, endeavour to betray and sacrifice your majesty into the hands of your enemies? And who was it that was to pay the thousand pound promised for your being discovered and taken, but Father Joseph Simmonds, and Father Carleton Compton, both jesuits? It is true, that one or two of the Romish persuasion, amongst many loyal and faithful protestants, male and female, might then have contributed to your majesty's deliverance: But have not such been well lessened and reproached, and called fools by their own party, for this grain of loyalty, more owing to their English blood than Romish principles?

The popish lord is not forgotten, or unknown, who brought a petition to the late Regicides and Usurpers, signed by about 500 principal papists in England; wherein was promised upon condition of a Toleration of the popish religion here by a law, their joint resolution to abjure and exclude the family of the Stuarts for ever, from their undoubted right to the crown. Who more disheartened the loyalty and patience of your best subjects, than their confident scriblers, White and others? And Milton was a known frequenter of a popish club. Who more forward to set up Cromwell, and to put the crown of our kings upon his head, than they? Give me leave to tell your majesty, that his new fangled government was contrived by a popish priest, and Lambert, a papist for above these 30 years. Who betrayed your majesty's secrets and councils during your exile, but they, even the Benedictine Monks, whereof a whole convent was maintained with a large annuity by the late Usurper for such use and purpose? And he (Manning) that was caught and executed by your majesty's justice for such treachery, was of the same red-letter, and had Masses sung for him after his death, as an usual reward and plaister. After your majesty's escape from England, what promises did they make to Cromwell, to persuade the French king for your banishment out of France? and what interest they made use of in order therunto, can be made appear to their disgrace. I shall leave it to your majesty to call to mind their usage of your royal person when in Flanders: And a noble peer surviving, is able to speak aloud what was there intended against you, to prevent your majesty from your right to reign over us. The present relation upon oath, and most true to a tittle, and sir Edmondhury Godfrey's usage, is sufficient to convince all unbiassed judges, how little they have flattered or degenerated from their wonted principles and natures.

How little therefore the criminals concerned in this plot deserve from your majesty, the world will better judge, if they will but consider how graciously your majesty hath dealt with them, and connived at them, while the rigour of the law was let loose upon your other dissenting subjects, who yet continued more quiet and loyal under their pressures and provocations, than those under favours and the hearts and affections of your best subjects, and much of royal honour, in appearing for the late indulgence with frustration, to win and oblige, if possible, these everlasting holy cut-throats?

But what arguments of clemency and grace can persuade them to be true to their natural, who profess allegiance out of conscience to a foreign contrary sovereign? Or how can your majesty expect truth and sincerity, where treasons and lies are virtues and merits? They are by an orderly conspiracy wholly governed by priests, their priests by their bishops, and their bishops by their popes; the sum of whose religion, or ungodly ambition rather, or that which we call Popery, consists, in a word, in an Anti-christian pretence of a Fifth Monarchical Sovereignty over all the kings and princes of Christendom, as is of late irrefragably demonstrated by the right reverend and learned bishop of Lincoln; yea in an higher usurpation upon Christ's eternal and peculiar sovereignty over men's hearts and judgments, as is likewise evinced by another worthy pen and sufferer, in his treatise of The right Sovereign of the Heart. They therefore that brutishly and traitorously surrender their souls over into implicit slavery to an impostor, what allegiance can they reserve inviolable with all sober and true Christians, either to king, or Christ, or conscience?

I question not, great sir, but that he in whose hands are the hearts of princes, will in time fully convince your majesty of all their unworthy principles and practices, and of my integrity too, how strange soever some open or secret Papists, whom time also may discover, have endeavoured to represent me. Till that time I commit my cause to the most righteous and all-seeing Judge, with a resolution to persevere through his assistance in my truth and testimony against all discouragements or terrors, or blandishments either, to the last gasp.

And next to Christ and the truth, I shall with the utmost of breath and power, according to my oath and duty, in what place and station soever I am, endeavour to be found ever loyal and true to your majesty in all your rights and honours, as all good subjects and christians ought, and as I find this noble and loyal parliament are resolved to be to an hair, or an expression; and therefore cannot forbear to pray to God out of my sincerity and zeal for public peace and concord between king and people, that seeing your majesty must highly trust some or other for your necessary ease and help, that God would put it into your majesty's heart more to trust and rely upon your two Houses of Parliament (who will be most true to your laws, and consequently both to you and your people) than to any single minister or ministers whatsoever, unaccountably, who may pretend to more loyalty, or more comply with any humour, or human frailty of your majesty's, but are not true friends either to your majesty, or their country, or themselves therein; but erect and prefer an imperial paramount self-end, or lust, before all; which your majesty by their art must be brought unworthily to serve and promote, to public disturbance always, and the confusion of themselves and their posterity, most an end, by God's just vengeance.

It is a false suggestion which such tempters use, that a king that rules by will, is more great, or glorious, or strong, than a king that rules by law. The quality of the retinue best proves the state of the lord; the one being but a king of slaves, while the other, like God, is a king of kings and hearts. No prince was ever more absolute to have what he wished, than queen Elizabeth, who wished for nothing more than the subjects rights and welfare.

Your majesty being so often marked out for destruction by these conspirators, is, and ought to be as great a proof and demonstration to your people, that the Papists themselves hold you not their friend, as any act of parliament against tongues, but especially your generous resentment and proportionable royal indignation against these assassins of your person, and destroyers of our cities, murderers of your subjects, corrupters of christianity, and disturbers of mankind.

But nothing will make your majesty so amiable and acceptable in the eyes of God and man, and your name and memory blessed and glorious for ever, as the copying of the laws of our Saviour in your life, by a decent paternal example before the sons and daughters of your people, to increase the fear of God and its consequences amongst us: it being the chief end and work of all supreme powers, to suppress vice, and encourage virtue amongst their charge according to St. Paul, Romans 13, which is best done abroad, when first and effectually begun at home in your own house and family, according to the same apostle, 1 Tim. 3, by banishing all vicious livers from your presence and converse, and advancing the virtuous in their stead: by the neglect of which principal part of their royal trust and office, princes depose themselves, as useless before God and their own consciences whatever may be their state or glory in fact, and by human laws and power before men.

That your majesty therefore may long live to be a great asserter of laws, of the laws of Christ in your own soul, to your eternal, and of the good laws of this land, to the temporal high peace and felicity of your majesty and people, and abound in all the blessings of this and the other life, health, grace, wisdom, wealth, power, and victory over all your enemies and temptations, shall be ever the study and prayers of your majesty's most humble and most loyal subject and servant,
TITUS OATES.

Courteous Reader,

I here present thee with a short Narrative, or Minutes, till I may find an opportunity to put forth my larger Account and Journal; in which the whole mystery of this hellish Plot shall be more fully laid open. It is true, I did not absolutely design this for the press, had not the daily clamours of these execrable rotaries for the Romish interest stirred me up thereunto, by charging the Protestants with the horrid design; and the indirect course of a Bookseller, who falsely and imperfectly presumed to print the same, to my great wrong and detriment. It was presented to his majesty the 13th of August last, by the means and introduction of that worthy and honest gentleman Mr. Christopher Kirkby; as likewise sworn upon oath on the 6th of September following, before sir Edmond-bury Godfrey by myself; and the 28th of the same month, before the Lords and others of his majesty's most honourable privy council: and the proceedings afterwards made upon the same being sufficiently known, I shall not trouble thee with at present; but leave the whole to thy candid consideration, taking my leave of thee at present, and will ever appear thy hearty well-wisher and servant in Jesus Christ,

April 15, 1679.

TITUS OATES.

A true and exact NARRATIVE of the HORRID PLOT and CONSPIRACY of the Popish Party against the Life of his sacred Majesty, the Government, and the Protestant Religion.

I. Richard Strange, provincial, John Keins, Basil Langworth, John Fenwick, and Mr. Harcourt, jesuits, did write a treasonable letter to one Father Suiman, an Irish jesuit at Madrid, in the kingdom of Spain, in which was contained their plotting and contriving a rebellion in Scotland, of the presbyterians against the episcopal government: in order to which they had employed one Matthew Wright, and William Morgan, and one Mr. Ireland to go and preach, under the notion of presbyterians, and give the disaffected Scots, a true understanding of their sad state and condition, in which they were, by reason of the episcopal tyranny, exercised over them: and withal to tell them, they had now a fair opportunity to vindicate their liberty and religion; and that it could be done by no other way but by the sword; and that now the king was so addicted to his pleasures, that he would, and could take but little care in that concern. And in the said letter it was expressed, that they had gotten an interest in his royal highness, but they would deal with him as they thought fit; and that they were resolved to use all means to weaken the king of England's interest, by informing his friends of his own intent to betray them into the hands of a foreign power, to wit, to send them to fall by the sword in the French king's wars, against the confederate princes, which letter bore date of April 19th, O. S. 1677, and 29th, N. S.

II. That the persons abovementioned gave the deponent 10*l*. to carry the said letters to the said Father Suiman into the kingdom of Spain to Madrid; the said Father Suiman being their procurator general for the kingdom of England and Ireland; and in order to which message, the deponent embarked himself in the ship called the Biscay Merchant, whereof Luke Roch was then master, to go for Bilbao, and there took mules for Valladolid, but staying a day at Burgos in Spain, the deponent broke up the said letters, and found these contents in the same.

III. That they of the society of Jesus, in the English seminary at St. Omers, sent a mission of twelve students into the kingdom of Spain, viz, eight to Valladolid, and four to Madrid, (there being English colleges in both places) in order to study philosophy and divinity; which missionaries were sent by Richard Ashby, Richard Peters, Nicholas Blundell, and Charles Peters, as appeared by the patents of the several missionaries, by which they had power to demand admission in the respective colleges to which they were sent, which missionaries were obliged by the jesuits of the colleges, to renounce their allegiance to his majesty of Great Britain, in the hearing of the deponent; and those of Valladolid were taught by Daniel Armstrong, jesuit, minister of the English college at Valladolid, that the said oath of allegiance is heretical, antichristian, and devilish; and that Charles Stuart the king of England is no lawful king, but comes of a spurious race, and that his father was a black Scotchman, and not king Charles the First; this was delivered in a sermon, Sept. 29, 1677, to the students there, which sermon the deponent did hear, and in this sermon the said Daniel Armstrong in plain words did say, that the king of England was a bastard; now this Daniel Armstrong goeth in Spain by the name of Joseph Mundford, in Spanish, P. Joseph Montefortio.

IV. That the said Daniel Armstrong, alias Joseph Mundford, did bring letters, from St. Omers to the English college at Valladolid to the Fathers of that college, written in Latin (they being Spaniards) in which it was expressed and related from the Fathers of St. Omers, that the Father of the Society in London had procured one Father Beddingfield to be confessor to his royal highness, but if they saw his royal highness did not answer their expectations, they would dispose of him as they did intend to dispose of his brother the king, which they hoped to effect within a year: which letters bore date June 10, 1677, and subscribed by Richard Ashby, alias Thimbleby, rector of the English seminary of the Society of Jesus at St. Omers, Richard Peters, minister, Edward Nevill, prefect of the studies, Charles Peters, prefect of the sodality, Thomas Fermor, prefect of manners: which letters the deponent saw and read in the month of September at Valladolid in the kingdom of Spain.

V. That Father Suiman abovementioned wrote to the English college, to the Fathers there, that the king of England was poisoned, to the great joy of the English Fathers, and that they would serve king James so, if he did not give them good assurance of bringing in of the Catholic religion, and of rooting out Protestant religion; this letter bore date July 1, 1677, and was seen and read by the deponent at Valladolid, in the month of July, near the latter end.

* VI. That one Father John Blake, alias Cross, who went with the four students to Madrid, did bring letters from Richard Strange, provincial of the Jesuits, and one Father Grey a jesuit, and John Keines, to Father Suiman abovementioned, in which was specified, that all diligence was used by the said Richard Strange, Father Grey, and John Keines, to procure some persons to dispatch the king, and to put a period to his days, which letter bore date June 10, 1677, N. S. And now the deponent being sent to Madrid in the month of August, read it in Father Suiman's chamber, he shewing it also at the same time to James archbishop of Tuam, in the kingdom of Ireland.

VII. That the said Father Suiman received another letter bearing date July 20, 1677, N. S. from Richard Strange, Father Grey, John Keines, Basil Langworth, John Fenwick, Father Ireland, and Father Harcourt, in which they did manifest, that they were very sorry for informing him, that he might assure himself that the business was done, their man William being faint hearted, could not then do it, though he had 1,500*l.* promised him for his pains; of which letters the English missionaries were one by one informed; those at Madrid by John Cross, alias Blake, and those at Valladolid, by Daniel Armstrong, jesuits: Which letter of the 20th of July, the deponent saw in the chamber of the said Suiman at Madrid; at the same time when he saw the letters of July the 10th, mentioned in the 6th paragraph or number.

VIII. That on the 3rd of November, N. S. Father Pedro Jeronymo de Corduba, provincial of the jesuits in New Castile, did write to Richard Strange, and John Keines, that if the business of dispatching the king of England could be effected, they should have 10,000*l.* for their pains; which letter the deponent brought from Valladolid to Bilbao, and embarked in a ship within five days after his arrival thither, and in five days more arrived at a little town near Exeter, and in six days more came to London, and delivered the letter to Richard Strange, and when opened, it was written in Latin, and read by the said Strange; and he said, that all means should be used to answer father Pedro's expectation. And in the letter to Strange was one enclosed to this Keines, by the name of Juan de Neoporto de la Compania de Jesu; which letter the said Keines offered the deponent to read, but being written in Spanish, the deponent did not well understand the letter, and could make but little of it by reason of the Spanish abbreviations; therefore the said Strange did give the deponent the letter directed to himself, saying, he thought the deponent did understand Latin better than Spanish; so that the deponent read the said letter, and in it the contents above mentioned; and the said Strange being then ill upon Keines's bed, said, that he hoped God would strengthen honest William's heart to do his work. Now this honest William is a servant to the Society in London. This Strange did then lay at one Mrs. Saunders's house, a part of Wildhouse in Wild street, where the deponent heard this discourse from the said Strange and Keines.

IX. That the said Richard Strange and John Keines, Basil Langworth, Father Harcourt, John Fenwick, Father Ireland, Father Grey, Father Jennison, Father Saunders, and Father Ecclesdon, did write a letter, and subscribed it, and sent it to St. Omers, to Richard Ashby, rector of the English Seminary there; in which he and the rest of the Fathers were given to understand that the king was altogether given to his pleasures, and that they had an intent to procure one to stab him at his court of Whitehall; and if that could not be conveniently done, they would employ one of his physicians to poison him; for which work they had 10,000*l.* in the hands of one Worsly, a goldsmith in London; which money was procured for them by one Father Leshee, a French jesuit, and confessor to the French king; which letter the deponent saw and read, and saw it subscribed by the persons above mentioned, and carried it to St. Omers. He went to Dover by coach, a place in which was taken up for him by the said William their servant, whose name indeed is John Groves. The letter that the deponent carried bore date the beginning of December, O. S.

X. That letters were inclosed in this letter aforementioned to the said Leshee, in which thanks was given him by the said Fathers that had subscribed the said letter to Richard Ashby, for his great charity to them, and his care for the propagating the catholic religion; and that all means should be used to destroy the opposers of it, both root and branch; which letters bore date either the 6th or 7th of December, and the deponent carried them inclosed in those of Richard Ashby to St. Omers, and from St. Omers to Paris, and delivered them into the hands of the said Father Leshee, about the 18th of December, as near as the deponent can remember.

XI. That other letters bearing date December 12, 1677, were sent from Richard Strange, and others of the Society in London, to those of the Society in the English Seminary at St. Omers, and in them letters were enclosed to Father Leshee, in which they told him, that they had stirred up the presbyterians in Scotland to a rebellion; and that 20,000 would be in arms, if that his majesty of France would break with the king of England; and that a way also was made for the French king's landing an army in Ireland: And further, that the Irish catholics were ready to rise; in order to which there were 40,000 black bills provided to furnish the Irish soldiers withal: Which letters were subscribed by Rich. Strange, John Keines, and John Fenwick, and the outside letter directed to Richard Ashby, rector; which letter was shewed to the deponent at his return from Paris to St. Omers, by the said Richard Ashby; and told the deponent that the letters to Leshee were carried by an especial messenger to the said Father Leshee, for which the said messenger had ten patacoons or royals of eight, as the said Ashby informed the deponent: And the said messenger was a drummer, in the town of St. Omers.

XII. That another packet bearing date December 18, 1677, in was specified that the Father General of the Society of Jesus had written from Rome, and had removed Richard Strange from being provincial, and had conferred the provincialship upon Thomas White, alias Whitebread, and the said Thomas Whitebread ordered, that one Father George Coniers should preach on St. Thomas of Canterbury's day, in the Sodality church, in the English Seminary, against the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; and that he should exhort the Fathers to stand by the new provincial, who would be as zealous to promote the bringing in of catholic religion into England, as ever his predecessor was; and would not leave one stone unturned to promote the same: Which said letter was directed to, and received by Richard Ashby, and communicated by him to the deponent about the 24th day of December.

XIII. That in another packet bearing date December 26, it was ordered by Thomas Whitebread, Richard Strange, John Keines, Basil Langworth, John Fenwick, Father Gray, Father Harcourt senior, Father Harcourt junior, Father Micho, Father Bennifield, Father Ireland, Father Blundell, Father Jennison, and some others of the society, that Father Leshee should be written unto by Richard Ashby, and the Fathers of St. Omers, and informed that the Fathers before mentioned had met together to contrive the advancement of the design of the happy disposal of his majesty of Great Britain, and of his royal highness, if he should not appear to answer their expectations. But the former giving no hopes at all, they would endeavour his dispatch with all speed that might be, that he might not hinder their designs in bringing in catholic religion. And if they could not find an opportunity to take him from his kingdom they would soon take his kingdom from him; which letter the deponent saw in the hands of Richard Ashby, and desired to read it, but the said Richard would read it to him in his chamber on January 2.

XIV. That in the said letters of December 26, it was specified, that Richard Nicholas Blundell, was constituted by patent from the provincial, to be ordinary at Newgate, to go and visit the condemned prisoners, and to reduce them to the catholic faith and religion; and to catechize some youth in the city of London; and every day in the week he hath his several places where he teacheth the youth treasonable and mutinous doctrines against the interest and person of his sacred majesty, and giveth certain sums of money to their parents.

(If poor) to encourage them to send their children to be thus instructed; which passage was contained in the aforesaid letters, and afterwards practised in London.

That another Packet came to Richard to Saint Omers, from Thomas White, John Keines, and others of the society of Jesus in London; in which letters, from them and others, were inclosed letters to Father Thomas Stapleton, procurator at Brussels, to persuade the Father Confessor of duke de Villa Hermosa, to inform, that his majesty of Great Britain did not intend to assist his majesty of Spain, but to stand a looker on till he was ruined by the French king, which letter, being not sealed, was seen and heard read by Richard Ashby then rector of Saint Omers; in which it was further ordered, that if the said Father Confessor should not be ready to comply with the said Stapleton, that messengers should be forthwith sent to Father Suiman at Madrid to inform his majesty of Spain of the said concern, and to make the same relation of the business to the archbishop of Tuam in the kingdom of Ireland, now at the court at Madrid, that he the said Swiman, and he the said archbishop might jointly give an account to the king of Spain of the motion made or to be made, to the said Father Confessor of duke de Villa Hermosa, and also to advise the Spanish king to seize the estates of the English merchants in the several factories in his dominions; for that they had endeavoured to transport their estates, and did transport them to England, which would tend highly to the prejudice of the kingdom of Spain, and for the confirmation thereof they procured letters from one Fonseca, sometimes an agent in London, to attest the same, to which the said Fonseca willingly condescended and sent his letter to Saint Omers, to be sent to the court of Spain, that the Fathers might give their approbation: which letter was long and large attestations therein made against the merchants resident in their several factories, concerning the matter of fact before mentioned, and also other letters to Daniel Armstrong at Valladolid, and to John Cross at Madrid, in the which they were ordered to confirm this affirmation made or to be made by the Fathers in England, and of the English Seminary at St. Omers, and of the said Stapleton, together with that of the said Fonseca, the above mentioned Spanish agent, who now liveth at Bruges in Flanders. All which letters bore date the first or second of January 1678, N. S. and all of them the deponent saw at Saint Omers; and in the two letters to those two fathers in Spain, viz. Daniel Armstrong and John Cross, was contained an especial order, that the former, if he could not go to Madrid, should send his attestations to Don Juan of Austria, for the carrying on of which 200*l.* sterling was transmitted by bills of exchange to the said Father Suiman and the said English Fathers.

XVI. That when the letters came from England about the business afore-mentioned to Saint Omers, Edward Nevil and Thomas Fermor did say, that they would not let this black bastard go to his grave in peace (meaning the king of England) for that he had cheated them so often, and that now they were resolved to be served so no more. But the deponent standing by, said, what if the duke should prove slippery! They both replied, his passport was ready whenever he should appear to fail them. These words were heard by the deponent on the 3rd of January in the afternoon, in the library of the Jesuits of Saint Omers.

XVII. That on the 4th of January, 1678, N. S. letters were sent by Richard Ashby, Edward Hall, Edward Nevil, Charles Peters, Michael Constable, William Busby, James Janion, and Thomas Fermor, Jesuits of the English seminary at St. Omers, as also Francis Williams rector of Watton, and master of the novices there, sir John Warner baronet alias Clare, Father Sanches alias Ditchling, to the Father Confessor of the emperor's majesty, to advise the emperor's majesty, that his majesty of Great-Britain had treacherously plotted the ruin of the confederates, especially of the German empire, and of his catholic Princes under him, and had under hand stirred up the Hungarian rebels against his imperial majesty, and found them money to go on with their rebellion, and that his design was not to keep any alliance with his imperial majesty, but only in shew, that he might advance his nephew the prince of Orange and make him absolute, and therefore prayed that the States of Holland might be acquainted with it. Which letter was seen and perused by the deponent, it being written in Latin, all which letters were sent away by a lay-brother that was a Dutchman, and when these letters were sending away, one of the lay-brothers whose name was George, did say, that the prince of Orange was more fit to rob an orchard than to be general of an army.

XVIII. That letters bearing date January 1, 1678, N. S. arrived at St. Omers, January 20, from Talbot arch-bishop of Dublin, wherein it was expressed, that the Fathers of the Society in Ireland, were very vigilant to prepare the people to arise, for the defence of their liberty and religion, and to recover their estates, and that if the parliament that was to sit in England should join with the king in declaring war against France, that a place should be open to receive the French king's army in Ireland, when his most christian majesty should think fit to land one there: And in the letter he advised the Fathers of St. Omers to advertise Father Leshee of the same, and other Jesuits that had an interest in the French king: and that his majesty of Great Britain was brought to that pass, that if any mal-content amongst them should not prove true to their design his majesty would never give ear to their information, and therefore prayed them to be diligent, for now was the time or never: which letter the deponent saw and read, and in order to the Fathers compliance with the letter of the said archbishop, they dispatched away letters to Father Leshee to Paris; and appointed Edward Nevil and William Busby, to carry and deliver them to the said Leshee, which letters were answered with all speed by the aforesaid messengers, Jesuits as above, the one of them being the prefect of studies, and the other procurator for the seminary, and by them wrote letters to Thomas White provincial, and to the rector of St. Omers, viz. Richard Ashby; Of that to the provincial the deponent can give no account, but of that to Ashby the deponent saith, that there was in it expressed, that the Father General of the Society of Jesus, would contribute 800,000 crowns to be paid in the month of June next ensuing, and that his holiness, the pope, would not be wanting to supply them, when they had made some progress in that glorious attempt.

XIX. That another packet arrived at St. Omers directed to Richard Ashby, rector of the English seminary there; The date of which is not well remembered by the deponent, but as near as he doth remember, it was about the beginning of the parliament, for there came the speeches of the King and lord Chancellor, and the votes of the parliament, which were put into ridiculous phrases, in contempt of the king and both Houses of parliament, for the Fathers and Scholars to laugh at, and then translated into the French tongue, and presented to the governor of St. Omers, who sendeth them to the French king his master: and in the packet was contained an account of the attempt of one Pickering, a lay-brother; that waits upon the Jesuits lying at Somerset house, to shoot the king as he was walking in St. James's park, when he was at some distance from his nobles and attendants, but the flint of his pistol being somewhat loose, he did defer the action till another opportunity, and if he had done it and had suffered, he should have had 30,000 masses said for the health of his soul: Which letters were signed by Thomas White alias Whitebread provincial, which letters, when read, the Fathers of the English seminary were in great trouble, for the negligence of the said Pickering, and the deponent saw and read them in the latter part of January, and the votes put into such mock phrases, as also the speeches of the king and lord Chancellor in the month of February.

XX. That the deponent, went on the 29th of January to know of his confessarius, whether he might keep the 30th of January as a fast, the confessor replied, that the account with them was on the 9th of February, because the account of England did differ from the account on that side the water: The deponent asked him, whether then he might keep the 9th of February as a day of fasting? The confessor asked him, why? The deponent replied, because of the martyrdom of the late king, the confessarius answered, that the late king was no martyr but an heretic, and withal added, that he was none of king James's son, but a bastard begotten upon the body of Ann of Denmark by her taylor. This confessarius is a Jesuit, and his name Charles Peters, perfect of the sodality.

XXI. That letters bearing date February the 1st, N. S. from Thomas Whitebread, John Keins, John Fenwick, Father Ireland, and Father Micho to Richard Ashby rector of St. Omers, (then ill of the gout) and to the English Fathers there, did let them understand, that they had sent William Morgan into Ireland to see how affairs stood in that kingdom, and expected his return by the end of March next, and that he set out the 26th of January, and that they had given him instructions to order the affairs in hand, and to encourage the Irish natives to defend their religion and liberty: And his companion was one Father Lovel, who was to go into the North of Ireland to see the Fathers of the Society there; and carried 2,000*l.* to supply their present wants and to promise them 4,000*l.* more in case there should be any action.

XXII. That another packet came from Thomas White alias Whitebread, Father Micho, Father Ireland, Father Harcourt and others of the Society in London, bearing date February the 7th, 1678, N. S. in which was contained an account of the Fathers' progress in Berkshire, Oxfordshire, and Essex; in persuading the Catholics that were votaries for the order of Saint Ignatius to contribute for the Irish rebellion, and maintaining a civil war in that kingdom, in case the French king should break with the king of England: and also that they had received letters from Scotland, in which they were informed that the people would rise to oppose duke Lauderdale, and the royal party in that kingdom, and also that they would endeavour by themselves, their agents, and their purse to provoke the Scots against the English, and withal told the Fathers of Saint Omers to whom this packet was directed, and by whom it was received, that they should be glad to effect such a design. Which packet the deponent saw and read, letter by letter.

XXIII. That the Fathers of St. Omers, viz. Richard Ashby rector, Edward Hall, Edward Nevil, and others of the English Seminary, did write to Thomas Whitebread and other Fathers, in which was expressed that it was now apparent, that the Catholic Religion was to be brought in the same way, that they had used for the destruction of the father of this king, and as that could not be effected till much blood was spilt on both sides, so this must be effected by effusion of blood. And withal prayed them to prosecute their design in taking away the king; and if his royal highness should not comply with them, to dispatch him too: for they did fear that never any of the Stuarts were men for the effecting of their ends and purposes. And in this letter, instructions were given to the Fathers to feel how his royal highness stood affected. Which letter bore date, February the 10th, N. S. and was signed by the persons above named in the presence of the deponent, who did compose these letters for them, according to direction given him by them, which Letter was to the deponent's knowledge carried into England by one Father Every, who then went for England.

XXIV. That an answer of the aforesaid letters of February the 10, N. S. dated February the 20th O. S. came from Thomas White, John Keines and Basil Langworth, Richard Peters, John Fenwick, Father Ireland, Father Harcourt, Father Blundell, Father Matthew Wright and Father Thomas Wright, Father Jennison, and one Father Simmons, who some time belonged to Somerset house, who also signed with the rest, the said answer, which told the Fathers at St. Omers (viz. Richard Ashby to whom the letter was directed and the rest) that they had found, that although the duke was a good Catholic, yet he had a tender affection to the king, and would scarcely be engaged in that concern, and if they should once intimate their designs and purposes unto him, they might not only be frustrated of their design but also might lose his favour. Which letter the deponent saw and read in the month of February.

XXV. That the Fathers of the English Seminary at St. Omers did oblige one brother George a lay brother in the said Seminary to go for Ghent in Flanders to the English Jesuits there with a letter from St. Omers dated February 26, O. S. In which they had an account of that letter of February 20, and the said brother George arrived there February 28, O. S. and the Jesuits there advised the Fathers in one of March the 1, O. S. that the secular clergy should be treated withal about the business but they finding them at that time to be men inclined to live in peace and obedience to their prince, the Fathers, viz. Thomas White, &c. answered them in one of March 10, O. S. that the clergy were a sort of rascally fellows that had neither wit nor courage to manage such a great design; and did pray them of Ghent and them of St. Omers to be of good cheer, for their designs went on well both in Scotland and Ireland, and the fatal blow should be given to the black boy at Whitehall with all the speed that might be. Which Letters to them at Ghent, and from them at Ghent to the provincial (they being brought back to St. Omers before they went to the provincial) and also these of March 10th the deponent saw and read.

XXVI. That there was an attempt to make an assassination upon the person of his sacred majesty in the month of March several days as he was walking in the park, and once as he was going to the parliament-house, by this honest William and Pickering, but opportunity did not offer itself, for the which the former, viz. honest William, was chidden, and the latter had a penance of 20 strokes with a discipline on his shoulders, it being judged by the Fathers the effect of his negligence: which passage the deponent saw mentioned in a letter from Thomas White to Rich. Ashby, bearing date March the 26th, 1678.

XXVII. That of the 5th of April letters came from Thomas White, and the Fathers in London, to Rich. Ashby and those of the English Seminary at St. Omers; in which the Fathers at London did give them of St. Omers an account that Will. Morgan and Father Lovell were returned out of Ireland, who gave them to understand, that the Irish were ready to rise at ten days warning, with 20,000 foot and 5,000 horse, and would let the French king into that kingdom if he should come to land an army there, and that Father Lovel did give an account that 15,000 horse and foot would rise in the North of Ireland, and that the people were very patient but very resolute; and that the duke of Ormond, now Lord Lieutenant, is in a great perplexity to see Catholic Religion thrive so well in Ireland, and that there are persons that have secretly taken commissions from the general of the society of Jesus, by virtue of a breve from the pope, dated Oct. 1, 1673, and that they resolve to cut the throats of the Protestants again, when once they rise. And in the said letters to the provincial summoned a general consult to be held in London, and therefore commanded the Fathers on the other side of the water to be present. In which letter the deponent did see himself summoned to assist at that consult, as a messenger from Father to Father. This letter the deponent saw in the month of April.

XXVIII. That in order to this command, on April 24, 1678, N. S. Father Warren, rector of Leige, sir Thomas Preston, bart. Father Marsh, rector of Ghent, Father Williams, rector of Watton, and master of the novices, sir John Warner, bart. (Rich. Ashby, rector of the English seminary at St. Omers, being sick of the gout could not go) but out of the said seminary went sir Robert Brett, bart. Father Poole, Edward Nevill; there were in all with the deponent about nine or ten who met in London in consult with Tho. Whitebread, Father Harcourt, senior, and Father Harcourt, junior, John Fenwick, Basil Langworth, William Morgan, John Keines, Father Lovell, Father Ireland, Father Blundell, Rich. Strange, Father Mico, Father Gray, and others, to the number of fifty Jesuits, met at the White-horse Tavern, in the Strand, where they plotted their designs for the society, and ordered Father John Cary, who was also there, to go Procurator for Rome: At which consult, thus held in the month of May, the deponent was present to attend the consulters, and delivered their concerns from company to company; and then a little after they left the White-horse Tavern, and divided themselves into several clubs or companies. Some met at Mrs. Saunders' house, in Wild-street; others at Mrs. Fenwick's, at Ayre's house, in Drury-lane; others at Mr. Ireland's, in Russel-street near Covent-garden, and in other places; all which, though in several companies, five or six in a company, did contrive the death of the king: In order to which, there were papers sent from company to company, which the deponent carried, containing the opinions of the timing their business, and the manner how it was to be done: and within three or four days after, the deponent went to St. Omers with the Fathers that came from the other side of the water.

XXIX. That on the 10th of June, N. S. came Thomas White to St. Omers, in order to visit his colleges in Flanders and Germany; and in his chamber the 11th day, where the deponent was present, together with Rich. Ashby, rector, he there told the deponent and the said Ashby, That he hoped to see the fool at Whitehall laid fast enough; and that the society need not fear, for he (that is the king) was grown secure, and would hear no complaints against them, and if the duke should set his face in the least measure to follow his brother's footsteps, his passport was made to lay him to sleep.

XXX. That the said Thomas Whitebread, on the 13th of June, did tell the rector of St. Omers, That a minister of the church of England had scandalously and basely put out the Jesuits Morals in English, and had endeavoured villanously to render them odious to the people, and asked the said rector whether he thought the deponent might possibly know him? and the rector not knowing, called the deponent, who heard these words as he stood at the chamber door of the said provincial, and when the deponent went into the chamber of the said provincial, he asked him, If he knew the author of the Jesuits Morals? the deponent answered, his person, but not his name. The said Thomas Whitebread demanded then, Whether he would undertake to poison or assassinate the author? which the deponent undertook to do; having 50*l.* reward promised him by the said provincial, and appointed to return to England. And the deponent doth farther testify, that at the same time the said provincial did in his chamber say, That he and the society in London would procure Dr. Stillingfleet to be knocked on the head, and also Poole, the author of Synopsis Criticorum, for writing some things against them.

XXXI. That Rich. Ashby, rector of St. Omers, being ill that evening with the gout and stone, viz. June 13, desired the company of the deponent, and did tell the deponent, That Father Warren, who is now rector of the college of Jesuits at Leigh, did, when he was procurator at Paris, reconcile the late lord chancellor Hyde to the church of Rome upon his death-bed; which words were occasioned by the deponent's taking notice of the duchess of York (daughter of the said lord chancellor) dying a papist. And the deponent, when he heard the said Ashby speak these words, replied, That he never heard any thing of the return of the said lord chancellor: answer was made, That he, the said Ashby, was certain that the said lord chancellor was reconciled by the said Warren.

XXXII. That on the 23rd day of June, in the morning, N. S. the deponent had express orders presently to go for Calais, and then to take the packet boat, and so away for England, to attend the motions of the Fathers in London, and to remain in London till he had orders from the provincial to the contrary, and gave the deponent 4*l.* for his charges, and promised him 80*l.* for services already done for the society in Spain and elsewhere. And the deponent saith, That he obeyed the orders, and that night got to Calais, and there met with four Jesuits that were ordered for London; and on Friday the 24th, N. S. the deponent saith, they took the packet boat together, and arrived safely to Dover on Saturday morning, where the deponent met with John Fenwick, who had brought eight students to Dover to transport them to St. Omers: And the deponent further saith, That the four Jesuits and Fenwick who were at Dover by the name of Thomson, and he the deponent took coach about 11 o'clock at noon; and at Borton, six miles on this side Canterbury, the coach was stopped, and a box was seized of the said John Fenwick's by the searchers of that place, and when by them opened, in it they found beads, pictures, images, and Agnus Dei's, which were to be given by Blundel the catechist, to young children, to encourage them to come to his catechising schools, and to be catechised by him. Accordingly there was a direction on the said box fixed, as, To the honourable Rich. Blundel, esq. London: Which box remaineth so seized by the said searchers; and if they had searched the pockets of the said Fenwick, they had found such letters upon him, as the said Fenwick confessed to the deponent, might have cost him his life; they being, saith he, the concern in hand; but the said letters the deponent did not see.

XXXIII. That in the month of July, Richard Ashby came to London with instructions from the said Thomas Whitebread or White, that the 10,000*l.* procured by father Leshee, and then in the hands of the society in London, should be put into the hands of one Worsly their banker; and that the said Richard Ashby, with other Fathers, should treat and agree with sir George Wakeman about the concern of poisoning the king; and that if he would undertake it he should have the 10,000*l.* which the said Richard Ashby told the deponent, shewing him the said instructions, by way of memorandum, in writing. In which memorandum was contained an item given by the said Thomas Whitebread, for the procuring the assassination of the right rev. father in God Herbert, [Croft] lord bishop of Hereford; for the said bishop had been educated in the Popish religion, and was fallen, and they were resolved not to pity nor spare any apostate from the Roman faith. The said Richard Ashby asked the deponent, whether the said bishop were not a forward man against Catholics? and the deponent not knowing the said bishop, told the said Ashby he could not tell; and the said Ashby did say, That times now being ready to change, they would be ready to give not only apostates, but also those heretics that had obstinately opposed the proceedings of the society and their agents, in propagating the faith and interest of the Church of Rome, a just reward for their apostacy and infamous obstinacy; and though the parliament have taken away the act for burning heretics, they should not escape the vengeance of Catholics.

XXXIV. That in the month of July, 1678, Richard Strange, the last provincial of the Jesuits, came to the lodgings of Mr. Richard Ashby, who, before he went down to the Bath, lay in the new provincial's lodgings at Mrs. Saunders's house, a part of Wildhouse in Wild-street, and finding the deponent with the said Ashby, did desire the deponent to meet him at his chamber at Mr. John Groves in York-street, near Covent-Garden, and after a short stay at Ashby's lodgings, took his leave of the said Ashby, and presently after the deponent took his leave also of the said Ashby, and followed Strange, and got to his chamber presently after him; where the said Strange did encourage the deponent to go on in assisting the society in carrying on the design; and thereupon told the deponent that they got 14,000*l.* in the Fire of London, in the year 1666. The deponent asked the said Strange how they came to effect that great and famous business? The said Strange replied, That himself and one Gray, and Pennington, and Barton, Jesuits, with some others, together with one Keimash, a Dominican friar, joined with one Green, and met at one William West's house, who kept the Green Dragon in Puddledock: The said West was by trade a taylor, whom they employed to make them some clothes, and there they did debate about the manner of firing the city, and where they should begin, and did attempt it in February, 1664 5. But not being provided of assistance enough, and the Thames being frozen over and the sickness coming on apace, they then altered their purpose: And in January, 1665-6, they met with this Green again, who closed in with them in this design. And that they might ingratiate themselves with this Green, furnished him with 30*l.* (he being poor) yet they found him an active man, and fit for their purpose. And the more to engage him the said Green, they pretended to hold many of the Fifth Monarchy principles; which when Green perceived, judging them to be real, brought them acquainted with 8 others, who were zealous in the business. The aforesaid Jesuits were earnest to have the business done in February, before the return of the inhabitants to London; but Green did pray these persons, viz. the Jesuits, to suspend that resolution because that then they should be sooner discovered, and such a design must have an uproar; and besides all this, the king would not be much in town, if at all, till the plague was more abated, whom Green did say must be cut off too, when the people were in a hurry by reason of the fire: And this motion pleased the Jesuits and Dominican well, and so it was put off. In a very little time after the said Green, and the rest of those Fifth-Monarchy men, together with the four Jesuits and Dominican above-named, were suspected by the said West that kept the said house in Puddledock, and were forewarned his house. And presently after Green and his eight acquaintance were clapped up in prison (but for what the said Strange did not tell the deponent.) And upon the imprisonment of these nine persons, the said Jesuits and Dominican did go to St. Omers, and there remained till the May after the execution of eight of these persons thus imprisoned. (Green dying in Newgate.) But one Fitz Gerard, an Irish Jesuit, and one Neale of Whitechapel, did write to Strange, as the said Strange informed the deponent, that none of the Fathers' names was mentioned in the business of these men, and thought they might safely return. So in the latter part of May they set forth for England, and got to London in the beginning of June; and then, concealing their names and lodgings, they began afresh to consult about this fire, which was still carried on by the society in the absence of these persons, and determined by them in the fire-time to cut off the king, that the number of the beast might be accomplished. In the uttering of which words, the said Strange broke out into a great laughter. But, said the said Strange, to be short, we got fifty or sixty Irish to ply the work, and one Edward Everard was very diligent to preserve their fireworks which they had made, and put into granado-shells: And the more to palliate this their design, they procured this Everard a place in the king's service, to look after the ammunition that was to be carried down to the fleet, it being in the time of the first Dutch wars. And the said Strange told the deponent, That great attempts were made on the Tower, but without effect. But, said Strange, To return to our ordering our affairs, we were in fellowship also with several Frenchmen, who were faithful in the business: And all things being ready and the place pitched upon, Strange removes his quarters, and got to lie at a house in Fenchurch-street, and went by the name of Walker; and this he did in the month of August, 1666, and with him he took Keimash, the Dominican, and lodged together. And Pennington and Barton lay at an apothecary's shop in Shoe-lane; and Gray and Fitz Gerard lay at Neale's house in Whitechapel; which Neale was one to see the fire carried on through Thames-street, and so to the Tower. In a word the said Strange told the deponent, that they spent 700 fire-balls, and when the fire-merchants were at work, then others, men and women were employed to plunder what they could; and they had a warehouse in Wild-street, where some things so plundered were laid; and other things they concealed in Somerset-house, as hollands, cambrics, fine cloth, and some considerable quantities of plate, and a box of jewels: the owner gave the box to these men to carry away, and ordered his servant to go along with them, but they having increased their number, ordered the servant to be knocked down; but the servant being afraid he should be killed, ran away. This was the greatest plunder of one sort they got; for, as the said Strange informed the deponent, there were 1,000 carraets of diamonds, lapped up in several papers for several goldsmiths, and the diamonds were conveyed away to St. Omers, the first opportunity they met withal: but the deponent asked the said Strange how one man should trust him with so much goods, for never any jeweller had so many jewels at one time. The said Strange replied, that he could not tell, but it was certain they met with them, and sold them for 3,500*l.* sterling in Flanders; and had a fish-dinner into the bargain at the Salutation Tavern in Holborn at the return of the money. The deponent asked Strange, how the fire began? and he told him, that Neale came and knocked him up at 12 o'clock in the night, and before he was dressed the fire was begun. The deponent further asked the said Strange, how many servants the society employed? He said, about 80 or 36, he could not tell well which. The deponent asked how the king came to escape? The said Strange replied, indeed they were resolved to have cut him off, when at work in person about the fire, but then they were not secure of the duke, who then was but a well-wisher to them, and besides, they seeing the king so industrious, could not find in their hearts to do it. Whilst this discourse was in hand, a gentleman knocked at the door, and so we broke off, beginning at nine o'clock in the morning, and ending at almost eleven that forenoon. And the deponent went to his lodging, which was then in Drury Lane.

XXXV. That Richard Ashby, the day before he went down to the Bath, which was in the month of July, had conference with Father Harcourt, Father Fenwick, Father Ireland, Father Keines, Father Strange, Mr. Jennison, Father Blundell, and others of the society, by order from the provincial, to send new messengers into Scotland, to promote the commotions there, and to inform the people of the great tyranny they did lay under, by reason of their being denied then liberty of their conscience, and that not being to be procured but by the sword, they must take that course to purchase their liberty. By which means (said the Fathers thus assembled) we shall weaken both the presbyterian and episcopal faction. At which conference the deponent was present, and heard these words.

XXXVI. That in the month of July, the said Richard Ashby went down to the Bath, in order to be cured of his gout, and on the morning he went away, the deponent being then in the chamber of the said Ashby to take his leave of him; Father Harcourt, rector of London, came to him, and told him, that if after he left the Bath, he could make a progress into Somers-setshire, to inform those of the society of the intended design, it would do well, and withal desired the said Ashby to hasten to town after he had finished the said information. All which the deponent did hear.

XXXVII. That on the first of August, came letters from Thomas Whitebread, bearing date July 22nd, to John Fenwick, in which was, that he would that 15,000*l.* should be proposed to sir George Wakeman, if he refused 10,000*l.* But whether sir George hath been treated with about that concern, the deponent cannot inform here in this article; but sir George Wakeman hath been divers times in the company of the said Ashby; and he saw the letters to John Fenwick on the 4th of August, 1678.

XXXVIII. That letters arrived to London, bearing date August 5, 1678, from Thomas White or Whitebread, provincial, to John Fenwick from St. Omers, in which he did inform the Fathers, that he had made his visit within his province, and that he had ordered twelve Jesuits to go for Holland, and to inform the Dutch that the prince of Orange did intend to assume the crown of a king, and that he resolved to bring them under another government. Which missionaries took their leave of the said Thomas White on St. Ignatius's day, July 31, but got no further than Wotton, by reason of a nuchance they met withal upon the way. By which mission the said Thomas White did design to beget in the Dutch an evil opinion of the prince of Orange, and to cause a commotion there amongst the Dutch, against the said Prince and his party. Which letter the deponent saw and read in Mr. Fenwick's chamber on the 11th of August.

XXXIX. That another letter of the 10th of August, came to Blundel and the Fathers in London, from Thomas Whitebread, in which he blamed the Fathers in London for not giving him an account of what progress they had made in their proposal, made or to be made unto sir George Wakeman; and if made, how he resented it; if not made, to make it quickly, for it would not be convenient to defer it; and told them, Ireland was safely arrived to him at St. Omers, who only told him, That the king was very secure; and therefore, he, the said provincial, admonished the Fathers to be very vigilant. Which letter Blundel shewed the deponent on the 19th of August.

XL. That another packet of the 15th of August came from St. Omers, from Thomas White provincial, to Father John Fenwick, in the which were letters inclosed to Father Harcourt, Jennison and others, which the deponent did not see; but that to John Fenwick the deponent did see and read it. Therein the said Thomas White did say, that the figure 365 should lie as low as ever 666 did; and if poison would not take the king away, fire should, for catholic religion would never flourish unless I H S took this course. Now the deponent saith that 365 is to be understood Westminster, and the figure 666 London, they being the ciphers for both those places, and the letters I H S Jesuits, they using it always.

XLII. That the deponent was informed by the said John Fenwick and others of the society, then in his chamber, that the Jesuits have 60,000*l.* per ann. good rents, and 100,000*l.* in Bank, and that he and the rest of the Society have in the name of their Trustees lent out money at 50*l.* per cent. the improvement of which money in Bank is used about these practices; and that it costeth them 4,000*l.* per ann. in intelligence, besides their daily special messengers, on which vast sums of money are spent, and besides another part is transported beyond the seas by Bills of Exchange, which the deponent himself knoweth in a great part to be true, and of the rest they themselves have informed him at several times: All which tends highly to the damage of the kingdom.

XLIII. That on Monday the 5th of August, Father Harcourt, Father Keines, John Fenwick, and another of the society whose name the deponent doth not remember, did say, that they did intend to raise a commotion in the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales; which also did appear to the deponent by several letters which the deponent did see and read: The date of which letters the deponent doth not well remember, but saw them in August 1678.

XLIII. That two new messengers were sent into Scotland, on the said 5th of August; one by the name of Father Moore, and the other by the name of Father Saunders alias Brown, with instructions to carry themselves like non-conformist ministers, and to preach to the disaffected Sects, the necessity of taking up the sword for the defence of liberty of conscience. These the deponent saw dispatched and ordered to go by Father Harcourt in the name of Thomas White provincial.

XLIV. That they have several times communicated, and do still communicate what secrets they can have revealed to them of the king, which they purchase by giving money, and then send them over to Leshee the French king's confessor. And the deponent hath seen several particulars (as they pretend) how the king standeth affected, for war or peace: And this they do by one Smith, who daily lurketh about White-hall, and in parliament time about Westminster-hall and the lobby. And the said Smith did say, that he was in fee with the clerks of the parliament, who give him the intelligence, and with the clerks officers of the privy council and cabinet council. The deponent saith further, that one Coleman formerly secretary to her royal highness doth assist this society with private intelligence, as John Keines, Jesuit, and this Smith, have told the deponent several times in the months of July and August.

XLV. That these Jesuits drive several trades in town, as merchants, tobaccoists, goldsmiths, scriveners, and by means of their scriveners, they come to the knowledge of several estates of several persons of quality; And by other scriveners, of their religion and practices: By which means they take an estimate of the strength of the nation, their scriveners having great practice in the city of London, as John Keines informed the deponent in the month of August.

XLVI. That on Friday the 9th of August, came letters of the 16th N. S. by an especial messenger from Thomas White provincial, and subscribed by the Fathers at St. Omers; in which they did rejoice very much that sir George Wakeman had taken the business into his hand, and if he did it, the 15,000*l.* should be paid, but ordered, that Pickering and his companion, viz. Honest William, should not desist their endeavouring to assassinate the king's person: Which letters the deponent read, and asked Fenwick, how the provincial came to understand that sir George Wakeman had undertaken the business? He the said Fenwick told the deponent, that they had dispatched away a special messenger, and that the said messenger brought this answer, and withal the said Fenwick did tell the deponent, that it cost 10*l.* to send him word of it.

XLVII. That because one William Berry, now a secular priest, who had formerly been a Jesuit, had written and was about to print some sheets of paper in vindication of the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and in it persuaded Roman Catholics to a more charitable compliance with protestants, Basil Langworth, and others of the society, did offer 10*l.* to the deponent to kill the said Berry; and if the deponent dared not to do it himself, to procure some other to do it, assuring the deponent, that whosoever did it, and were questioned for it, should have a pardon. This was proposed August 9, 1678.

XLVIII. That on the 9th of August in the evening in the chamber of John Keines, Jesuit, in Warwick-street, where John Fenwick and the deponent were together, there came one Rich. Heath, a lay-brother of the society, who after some discourse about the design of killing the king, did say, That he was a bastard, and did endeavour to rule by the sword. Which words the deponent did hear, and so did Keines and Fenwick, who after one another replied, The bastard should not trouble the world long.

XLIX. That on the 10th of August, N. S. the deponent did meet with John Groves in Wild street in the afternoon, and as near as the deponent can remember, it was about five o'clock, and he having made several promises to give him an account of the fire of Southwark in the year 1676, the said Groves took the deponent into Wild-house Garden, and thus began: He said that he had certain fire works made for that very purpose, and he with three Irishmen, that were his assistants, went into the Borough, and not finding an opportunity nor a fit place, went to St. Margaret's-hill, where they found an oil-shop, which the said Groves bragged he fired. The deponent asked the said Groves how he came acquainted with the said Irishmen? He said his acquaintance with them was not much, but they were procured by Dr. Fogarthy, the Irish doctor, for which the society (Richard Strange then provincial) gave them 1,000*l.* viz. 400*l.* to Groves, and 200*l.* a piece to the three Irishmen. And the said Groves told the deponent, that the society got at least 2,000*l.* by that fire, which was also told the deponent at another time by Richard Strange.

L. That on the 11th of August being Sunday, the deponent saw letters from St. Omers, bearing date August 17th, New-style, written by Father Ireland, in the name of the provincial Thomas White alias Whitebread, to John Fenwick, in which letter, by the contents thereof, there were letters to John Keines, Mr. Jennison, and Mr. Blundel, and others, which the deponent did not see, but in this to John Fenwick it was specified what diligence was used for the destruction of the duke of Ormonde, and for the procuring another demonstration of zeal for the promoting the Catholic religion and interest in that kingdom, and that which arguments could not effect the sword should, to the great vexation of the Protestants there; and he intimated the great joy that he had, that there was yet great hopes, that the disaffected Scots would not lay aside their endeavours for and after the defence of their liberty and religion, and that the Catholics of Scotland had promised to use the utmost of their interest to keep up the commotions there; and the said Father Ireland had the said Fenwick exhort the Fathers to be earnest in their designs, for now was the time that the English nation was to be reduced. And furthermore ordered, in the name of the provincial, that letters should be written to all the society in England, that they made it their business to encourage the friends to braveries of mind, for that God had hitherto given them such a hopeful prospect of things, and that no opportunity on his part was or should be lost, and that they in London (if they thought it fit to communicate these things) should have a care that they did it to no more than to one at a time, lest they should be baffled in their enterprise. Which letter, when read by the deponent, the said Fenwick, to whom the letter was directed, told the deponent, that it was his duty to offer up a mass or two, that God would prosper those holy endeavours of the Fathers of the society, in promoting Catholic Religion and Faith; and told him further, That if he, the deponent lived till Christmas, he should see a good change of things, either that forty eight should be taken from the world, or the world (especially the little he was concerned in) should be taken from him: and one that was a Catholic should play such a game, as never was plaid since the conquest. All which the said Fenwick told the deponent in his chamber; and the deponent asked the said Fenwick, Who this Catholic was? And Fenwick said it was the duke of York. And the deponent saith, the Ciphers 48 are put for the king.

LI. That on the said 11th of August in the evening, the deponent went to the lodgings of John Keines, where he found another Jesuit with him, whose name the deponent doth not remember, in whose presence the said John Keines told the deponent that the provincial had taken great care of keeping alive the difference betwixt the disaffected Scots and duke Lauderdale, and that the affairs in Ireland went on with great expedition, and that all means were now used to beget a difference betwixt the Dutch and the prince of Orange, and if that could be effected, there was no question to be made, but that the Protestant interest would fail in Holland, and that Forty Eight would not last long in England, for it was high time to hinder Forty-Nine from being effected: that Barley-broth-trade should grow dead, and Twelve would be cut off, and that Mum and Chocolate should be put down, and the order of the Magpies should be turned into their primitive institution and habit. Now the deponent saith, that the words [hinder Forty Nine from being effected] is an odd expression, that is amongst them used for the cutting off the king, that he may not live to be compleat forty nine years of age, and by Barley-broth, is meant the House of Commons, which shall be turned out and sit no more. And by Mum and Chocolate, is meant the Protestant Peers; which, if not destroyed, shall never have any vote in the House of Peers more, after the death of this king. And by Magpies, they understand the bishops, whose habit in parliament is black and white, which shall be changed into purple. And by Twelve, is meant the duke of Monmouth.

Whilst the said Keines with the other Jesuit entertained the deponent with these treasonable expressions, Mr. Jennison came to the said Keines, and told him, that he had lost a letter which he had received from Thomas White, the provincial of St. Omers, in a walk he took to Islington, and would give 10*l.* to any friend that would give it him, and was afraid that some inconvenience might follow, if found by some Heretic: which words put the said Keines into such a consternation, that he asked him, Whether he had a mind to ruin them all: but Jennison had the said Keines be quiet, for none could understand it; which words the deponent did likewise hear.

LII. That Mr. Keines on the 12th of August, determined to go for Windsor, in order to settle some business therein and towards the dispatching Forty-eight (which the deponent saith is by them understood the king) at Windsor, if the king should go down thither. And it was judged that the said Forty-eight would go to Windsor, to make his abode there for some weeks, but the said John Keines told the deponent, that he might chance to fall short of his return again. These words were spoken by John Keines to the deponent in his own chamber: but the said Keines did not go down to Windsor so soon, as afterwards it appeared to the deponent.

LIII. That Smith, within mentioned, lieth in Drury Lane, at one Mr. Lowds a taylor, in Cockpit-alley in the aforesaid Lane, and is also employed to go from house to house to see how the Catholics stand affected: and Jennison said, That if the Catholics had courage enough, they might rise and cut the throats of a hundred thousand Protestants in London; which expression of the said Jennison's, the said Smith did tell the deponent, asking the deponent's opinion of the same: to which the deponent did say, That Mr. Jennison talked like a person that had more heat than light. The said Smith did at the same time tell the deponent, that the Society did give him 50*l.* per annum for his intelligence that he getteth of the affairs of the Court, and of the king's actions, words and counsels, and transmitteth the same to John Fenwick, which the said Fenwick transmitteth to St. Omers, and there it is translated into the French Tongue, and sent to Father La Chaise, the French king's confessor: which daily intelligence the deponent did daily see from the said Smith, he lodging in the same house with the deponent. And the said Smith, did at the same time tell the deponent, that he was a lay brother, of the society of Jesus, and was of the order of the Politians, as they term it, and attended Father Blundel to Newgate, in order to convert the prisoners. All which the said Smith did tell the deponent on August 12, 1678. And likewise the said Blundel did say as much to the deponent, who hath seen the said Blundel and Smith go together to Newgate.

LIV. That one Matthew Medburn, a player in the Duke's theatre, and Mr. Penny, Mr. Mannock, Mr. Sharp, Mr. Seddon, William Smith school-master at Islington, and Mr. Edw. Everard, meeting in a club on Thursday nights, and Sunday nights, with one Jones a priest, and Kemash within mentioned, and all these are employed by the Jesuits to vilify the House of Commons, and go about the city of London to incense the people against them and against the bishops of the nation; and they deliver this treasonable position; That the Commons assembled in parliament are the devil's representatives and not the nation's. Which treasonable and detestable words, the deponent did hear in the said club (which is kept at the Pheasant in Fullers Rents near Grays Inn) in the month of August. And the deponent was ordered by the Jesuits in London, to give the said persons great respects, and in their names to thank the club for their faithfulness to them in that particular.

LV. That Mr. Jennison did on the 12th of August say and boast, that he had put several out of love to the king's interest, and would so continue, if that the king did not turn a Roman Catholic, and if the king did not become R. C. he should not be C. R. long.

LVI. That a Packet on Aug. 29th, N. S. arrived in London from Thomas White, provincial, Mr. Stapleton, Mr. Nevil, Mr. Peters, Mr. Bushy procurator, together with the masters of the Humanity-schools, to John Fenwick, in which it was specified, that the twelve Jesuits were gotten into Holland, and would use all their skill and interest to make a commotion there: and that Apple-tree Will, (which the deponent saith is meant the prince of Orange) should not be great, and that they hoped that the Fathers in London would follow their business closely there. Which letter the deponent saw and read.

LVII. That a Packet went from London, dated August 12, in which the provincial was informed by John Fenwick, and the rest, that the king was gone, or going for Windsor, and that the Fathers and honest William were ready to attend the court there, as the deponent was informed by John Fenwick abovenamed.

LVIII. That on August 13, in the afternoon, about six of the clock, a sermon was preached by John Keines to twelve persons, men in poor habits, yet men of quality, as the deponent doth suppose by the whiteness of their hands; in which sermon he delivered, that Protestant and other heretical princes were ipso facto deposed, because such; and that it was as lawful to destroy them as an Oliver Cromwel, or any other usurper. At which Sermon the deponent was present, not designedly, but by accident.

LIX. That on the 15th of August John Keines and John Fenwick, went to a gentleman in or about Westminster, and persuaded him to remove from his quarters, lest God should destroy him with the sinners of that city; for God had raised him and others of that society to do such things against that city, as should make a man's ears ring that should hear it. The same day towards the evening the said John Keines and John Fenwick told the deponent the said story, and laughed to think what a fright the said gentleman was put into. And they told the deponent the name of the said gentleman, but he hath forgot it.

XL. That John Keines came to the lodging of the deponent, on Saturday August 17, and said it was endeavoured to dispatch Forty-eight at Windsor, if possible (by which number the deponent saith, they mean the king) and withall told the deponent, that Mr. Howard, prior of the Benedictines, and Mr. Hitchcock sub-prior, and Mr. Skinner, Mr. Corker, and other Benedictines, had promised to assist them with 6,000*l.* in order to the design. The said Monks did then lie at or near the Wardrobe behind the Savoy; which report the deponent did believe, because the said Mr. Howard, prior of the Benedictines, and Mr. Hitchcock sub-prior, told the deponent in the morning, August 17, that they had promised such a sum, and withal that the securing of his majesty's person in his flight from Worcester was the worst days work that ever simple Jack Huddleston did in all his life. But now it was their business to get the Stuarts out of the way: which the deponent related to John Keines, and then Keines did tell the deponent, that if he would undertake to assist in the dispatching of the king, he should be well rewarded, if not here, in heaven: and the deponent replied that he never shot off a gun in his life, and withal told Keines that he could not be guilty of such a thing for the world. And then the said Keines did farther inform the deponent, that Mr. Coniers a Benedictine monk was resolved to pursue the design of dispatching the king, which did appear to be evidently true to the deponent, because he did hear the said Coniers on the 14th of August lay a wager of 100*l*. with a gentleman not known to the deponent, in the Benedictine Convent in the Savoy: ten guineas were deposited in the hands of Hitchcock sub-prior of the Benedictines. Now the wager which Coniers did lay was, That the villain, the king, should not live to eat any more Christmas pies; and the other gentleman did lay that he would: so that the deponent saith, that Keines told him no more of the concern of Coniers, than the deponent had heard of the said Coniers before, on the 14th of August. But the deponent before he parted from Keines, asked him, what news about the town? Keines replied, that all the news about the town was, war with the French: and Keines did say that if that held true, then have at the rogues of the House of Commons, they should be remembered for all their long bills against the Catholics. The deponent replied, that (with submission) he thought the revenge proposed against them would not do the business, and therefore not a resolution consistent with a Catholic spirit, for the enterprise must be more noble: and withal the deponent urged, that he feared the death of the king would scarcely do the business and effect the design, unless his R. Highness would pardon those that did the business, and stand by them in it. To which the said Keines replied, that the duke was not the strength of their trust, for that they had another way to effect the setting up the Catholic Religion: for when they had destroyed the king, they had a list of 20,000 Catholics in London, that were substantial persons and fit for arms, that would rise in twenty four hours time and less: and if James did not comply with them, to pot he must go also.—It being late in the night the said John Keines prayed the deponent to come to him the next morning and he would have one hour's discourse with him before he went to mass, and being about to take leave of the deponent, asked him, what he meant by those words (he could not be guilty of any such thing, as to assist in dispatching the king) there being no guilt in the case; the deponent smiled and said, he could not be guilty of so much courage. Besides the deponent saith, that he told the said Keines, that it was his opinion, that it would be more safe to let Mr. George Wakeman try his skill, and then the people would not apprehend it so much.

LXI. That the deponent went to the chamber of the said Keines about eight or nine in the morning, on the 18th of August, but he was gone abroad, and ordered the deponent to call upon him about four in the afternoon, and then he would have some discourse with him: And the deponent accordingly went, but met with the said Keines in the Mews, who told the deponent that he was to meet with some Fathers in Covent Garden, and there would meet them some Dominicans, and would have the deponent go along with him, and at the house where they were appointed to meet, the Dominicans were already met, viz. Mr. Vincent, provincial of the Dominicans in England, Joseph David Keimash, Mr. Dominick, Mr. Collins, Mr. Fedding, Mr. Mansel, Mr. Lumsdale (as they said) in the name of all the rest of the order in England, to consult and comply with the Fathers of the Society to propagate the Catholic Faith; and when John Keines was set, with the Fathers of the Society by him, all of a side, viz. John Keines, Father Harcourt, Father Fenwick, Father Wright, Father Blundel, the said John Keines propounded to the Dominicans to contribute to the design of killing the king, and carrying on the business of England and Scotland: The Dominicans replied by their provincial, that they were poor and not able to do much, for they had little or no money, but they would let them have their personal assistance and counsel, and would procure what interest they could, but as for money they could not part with any at all, for they were in debt, and had scarce 400*l*. in stock, and the most they could make per annum of their estate, was not above 360*l*. At which consult the deponent was to and fro, and what was more said he cannot tell, for he was sent with the proposals to the Carmelites, viz. Dr. Handson, Mr. Kimbal, Mr. Trevers, and they said that they had not one penny in stock, nor any income besides what the Spanish ambassador allowed them for assisting in his chapel.

But they by the deponent did present their service to the Fathers met together, and bid the deponent tell them, that their prayers to God and our blessed lady should not be wanting: All this was acted by order from the provincial of the society.

LXII. That the deponent went to see John Fenwick on August, the 19th in the afternoon; and whilst he was with him, in came John Keines, and presently after him Mr. Blundel; and after a salutation was passed, they asked the deponent, What news? The deponent them, he heard none but what was in Gazette: And Blundel said, he had been with his workmen, and they wanted oil: What was the meaning of this was, the deponent cannot say, but he says it was sheep's fat; and the Blundel would not tell the deponent his meaning when asked by him. The deponent asked Keines, When he was for Windsor? He replied, The court was scarcely settled as yet; but said, that Mr. Conyers and one Anderson was to go down on the morrow Aug. 20, in the morning: and if they did any thing as to the business in hand, it would hasten his going down; and therefore as yet could not be certain when. The deponent asked further, How honest William did? Keines replied, that he was troubled with a sore throat, and was very bad with it; and so indisposed, that he could not ride down to Windsor; and that it would be dangerous for him to go by water, lest a cold being by that means contracted, he should be unfit for service. And then the deponent took his leave of them, it being near six of the clock in the afternoon, and went to the Monks convent, and enquired of one Rumly a lay brother of that order, for Mr. Conyers; he said, he was not within, but not far off; however, not to be spoken withal, for he was with some of the Benedictine Fathers about business, and would go out of town to morrow betimes in the morning: and so the deponent left him, and being but a little way from the place met the said Conyers; who laughing upon the deponent, told him, That the Illi People were fools, to set upon 48 at Windsor, because he was seldom in a posture to receive their kindness: but he would see his worship, and talk with him in some other language than in Tormentillo: The deponent asked, How? He replied, that if the shirt on his back should know, he would burn it. But if that should not take effect, no opportunity should be neglected in order to the dispatch of 48. He further told the deponent, he was in haste, and his time was short, and his business great; but told him also, that honest William and Pickering should stay in town, seeing the party concerned was hic et ubique, never long in one place.

LXIII. That on Wednesday the 21st of August, a consult was held by the Jesuits then in London, with certain Benedictine Monks, about three of the clock in the afternoon, concerning a paquet that came from Talbot, archbishop of Dublin, to the Fathers of the Society. In which they were given to understand, that four Irish Jesuits had undertaken the death of the duke of Ormond; and that the Irish were ready to rise.

In this letter he told them, that a Legate was arrived in Ireland, and had asserted the Pope's right in that kingdom; and that the kings of England being no longer Catholics, they did cease from being concerned there; it being given to them during the good pleasure of his holiness; and therefore did encourage the said archbishop to contrive and use all means for the recovery of the said kingdom out of the hands of the English. And in the said letter it was mentioned, that if opportunity did not permit the said Jesuits to do their business, that then they should send one Doctor Fogarthy, now living at Mrs. Blundells, the widow of Blundells an apothecary, in Drury-lane, and that he and the Fathers in Ireland, together with the said Fogarthy, would find out an expedient way for the death of the said duke. And furthermore he did specify, that they had procured several Irish to be made commission-officers in the garrisons in Ireland; and that he and the rest had dispensed with them to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. And that the Irish, who had gotten commissions by means of the archbishop, had promised to betray their interest into their hands, when the business should be ripe; and desired the Fathers to be as diligent in England, as he and the rest of the clergy were in Ireland: which letter John Keines did shew the deponent, and was read by the deponent; And Keines and Blundell gave him an account of the consult; and the said Fogarthy did himself tell the deponent the same; and on the said 21st of August, did say, That he had a great interest in the court of Ireland.

LXIV. That the said Fogarthy is a main agent in this hellish-plot, and hath promised, That if this bishop Talbot will make use of him, he will do all the service he can: which the deponent is ready to justify to the face of the said Fogarthy; who did tell the deponent, that he and Coleman were in the consult, when Wakeman was contracted withal in order to poison the king; and said, That if he had the interest in the king, as Wakeman had; he would have undertaken it himself. And all this was told the deponent on the 21st of August, in the chamber of the said Fogarthy. And furthermore, the said Fogarthy then and there did tell the deponent, That he had hired four Irish ruffians, whose names he did neither tell the consulters that met on the 21st of August, nor the deponent; and these Irish ruffians were to mind the king's postures at Windsor: But the deponent telling the said Fogarthy, that he heard the king was going to Portsmouth, he was wonderfully troubled at it, and said, It did very much impede their design, and nothing would be attempted so long as he was absent from Windsor.

LXV. That the lord ambassador, sir William Godolphin, at the Court of Spain, holdeth great correspondence with Hieron Swiman the Irish-jesuit (who as beforementioned, was procurator for the jesuits of the kingdom of England and Ireland) and with the Irish archbishop of Tuam now at Madrid; and is a friend in this business, as the said Swiman did inform the Society in one of July the 30th New-style; and likewise in one to the deponent, wherein he did specify, that sir William was as industrious as any man could be, to answer the expectation of the Society; and that he had but one protestant-servant then in his house, viz. the cook, and the parson (when there) made up a goodly And the deponent knows, that Godolphin is a papist, and hath perverted a kinsman of his own; and the deponent knoweth, that the said Ambassador is very familiar to the said persons, the Irish jesuit at Madrid, and the Irish archbishop of Tuam. And the deponent doth verily believe, that Mr. Hodges, sometimes chaplain to the said lord Ambassador, can, if required, testify as much; and the deponent doth further say, That when he was at Madrid, the said chaplain of the Ambassador left the employ, because of the Ambassador's being a papist; and the deponent hath seen the said Ambassador at Mass; and he hath a jesuit that comes to his house, who hath read both philosophy and divinity to the said Ambassador; of which the deponent was personally informed by the said Hierome Swinnan an Irish jesuit, and by the said Irish archbishop when at Madrid: but the letters of which the deponent speaks, he saw and read them at Mrs. Sanders' house in Wild street the 22nd of August.

LXVI. That on the 22nd of August, money was sent from the society, by a servant of theirs, to supply the expences of the four Irish ruffians above-mentioned, who were gotten to Windsor on the 21st at night; and the sum so sent was 80*l.*, which the deponent saw told: And they were written to, and informed, that if more were wanting, they should have it. And they were bidden not to be frequent in one another's company, and always to profess but small acquaintance one with another. Which order and money was dispatched away by Harcourt, rector of London, in the name of the provincial and whole society.

LXVII. That the deponent went to the chamber of the said John Fenwick, who told him, that he was to go to St. Omers with some students thither, (about 10 or 11, as near as the deponent can remember:) and the said Fenwick was to attend the provincial, and was to return, as he said, within 10 or 12 days, together with Mico and the rest. And whilst the deponent was with the said Fenwick, a messenger came in, viz. John Grove, with order from Harcourt rector of London, John Keines, Richard Blundell, Mr. Jennison, Mr. Wright, Basill Langworth, and four other jesuits that lay at Somerset-house, to pray the provincial that he would write to Leshee the French king's Confessarius, and give him to understand how well the business in Ireland stood: and that in his letters to Leshee, he should pray him to certify the French king thereof. The deponent asked Grove where those Fathers were met? Who said, they met again at Mrs. Sanders' house. And the deponent, after he had read the order or memorial, (as indeed the title was) and saw their names, about two in the afternoon, went to the house of Mrs. Sanders, where the deponent saw those Fathers, who told him of the said order, and after a short stay, took his leave of them; and by them was ordered to meet them at 4 of the clock at Mr. Keines's chamber. And at four of the clock the deponent met; where he saw Dr. Fogarty, who shewed him a letter written to Mr. Bedingfield by his own hand. And likewise the deponent saw letters from Blundell and John Fenwick, with one from Father Ireland, at St. Omers. That of Dr. Fogarty to Mr. Bedingfield, did contain in it an account of 80 letters that were written to the jesuits in England; some of which were delivered to the Post-office in Russel-street; others to the Post-office General; others were sent by private messengers; and one to Mr. Peters a jesuit, that liveth now with sir Charles Shelly in Sussex, that married the relict of the baron of Abergavenny: In which the said Peters was ordered to meet the provincial at London, about the design in hand; which if it took not effect at Windsor speedily, then John Keines was to go to Windsor to meet with Coniers, who was designed to go out of town on the 20th of August with Mr. Anderson to 440, (which number is by them put for Windsor:) And after their business was done in Keines his chamber, the deponent left them.

LXVIII. That the deponent being to meet with Dr. Tonge on the 22nd of August, at the King's head in Grays-Inn-Lane, about six of the clock at night, accordingly went; and finding that the said doctor was not there, he walked in Grays-Inn-walks, and there he met with Coniers, who was supposed to be gone to Windsor. The deponent asked him, how it happened that he did not go his journey? he replied that his horse fell so lame, that he could scarce carry him five miles on the way, and so was forced to return; and that he himself was taken ill with the sciatica, which had given him great trouble for all the night before. The deponent was then urgent with him to tell him how he would kill the king, seeing he did laugh at the means the Fathers intended to use, viz. by shooting him. Then the said Coniers, by reason of the deponent's importunity, shewed him a dagger or knife two edged, with a very sharp point; and it was broader and broader towards the haft, which was of buckhorn, and was a foot long in the blade, and near half a foot in the haft. With this (said he) the villain shall fall to the ground, if possible. Coniers demanded of the deponent, what he thought it might cost him? the deponent said, he could not tell: Coniers replied, 10*s.* or thereabout. The deponent told him it was too dear: he replied, nothing could be too dear for the king. The deponent asked him where he bought it? Coniers replied, of the old cutler in Russel street. The deponent asked him why he would have it so long? he replied, that the villain might fall by it. The deponent asked, how? he replied, through my clock will I stab him. The deponent asked him how he thought to escape? Coniers answered, that he doubted not but to obtain a pardon, if he were not knocked on the head upon the place. The deponent, after some discourse, went to the King's head, where he met with Dr. Tonge between six and seven of the clock.

LXIX. That the deponent did on the 22nd of August, about nine o'clock, meet with dell; and seeing him have a sword, asked him what he had? and he replied, a sword and tard-balls, a notable biting sauce, and would furnish Westminster when he had enough of them. The deponent saith, that by Tewsbury mustard-balls, we are to understand, fire-balls.

LXX. That on the 24th of August, Blundell told the deponent in Fenwick's chamber, that it would be so ordered by the society, that the catholics of England would advance the design of shortning the king's days; and bade the deponent be of good cheer, for Protestant religion was on its last legs.

That the deponent met with Blundell on August the 30th, who told him, that he must shew him what Westminster, and the houses on both sides the water, were to be done withal; and carried him to Fenwick's chamber, and there drew out of a paper case a paper, in which was the manner of firing Westminster and Wapping, Toolies-street, Barnaby-street, and St. Thomas Apostles. First for Westminster, if the wind blew northerly, then they were to begin at the next house to the Palsgrave's head tavern, where the Jesuits and their agents were to carry on the fire to the Savoy; and then the Benedictines and they to carry it on both sides to Charing-cross; and then the fire was by them and their agents to be carried to Whitehall: and near the end of the stone-gallery another company is to begin and carry it on to Kings-street and Channel-row; which was first designed to be acted in the time of the great frost, in the year 1676, but then they were not assured of the French king's assistance, of which they are now assured by Leshee, the French king's confessor. At the same time Wapping, and the ships in the river, were to be burnt: and the said fire (in case the wind blow up the river) is to begin at a place near Bugbies-hole or Limehouse-hole, and is to be carried on by four men (of whom they had made choice) to Wapping middle stairs, and then four or five more were to carry it up higher. And the deponent found himself with seven more, ordered to ply about the Armitage; and his business was to encourage the seven men committed to his care; and for his reward 1,000*l.* was therein promised him, besides 80*l.* for his former services. But the deponent saith if the wind stood contrary, they were to change the commencement of the fire. At the same time others were to have the charge in Barnaby-street, Tooley-street, and St. Thomas Apostles on the other side of the water, committed to them; and the fire was to begin at Rotherhithe when it was begun on Wapping-side: And this is to be done when the water is low, that the ships might not get off from the keys. In order to the deponent's managing that part of the fire that was to be begun about the Armitage, he was ordered to remove his lodging into Wapping as afore; his order was given him, and he should have a priest come and say mass unto him in his chamber every day for a good success on the design. But the deponent saith, he did not know he was to be an agent in the business till he saw that paper; which paper was signed by the provincial Tho. White, in the name of the whole society.

LXXII. That the deponent saith, the Pope hath issued out a Bull, a copy of which Blundell shewed the deponent on the said 30th of August; and as near as the deponent doth remember, it bears date either the month of November or December last; in which the Pope hath been pleased to order and dispose of bishoprics of England, and other dignities of the same, as followeth:

ARCHBISHOPS.

Canterbury. Cardinal Howard, with an augmentation of 40,000 crowns per annum, for the maintenance of his legantine authority.

York. Perrott, superior of the secular priests: he hath power of probats of wills, licenses for marriage, and all episcopal jurisdiction; ordination and confirmation only excepted.

BISHOPS.

London. Corker, President of the Benedictines.

Winchester. White, Provincial of the Jesuits.

Durham. Strange, last Provincial of the Jesuits.

Salisbury. Dr. Godden.

Norwich. Napper, a Franciscan friar.

Ely. Vincent, Provincial of the Dominicans.

Exeter. Wolfe, one of the Sorbon.

Peterborough. Gifford, a Dominican.

Lincoln. Sir John Warner, bart. a Jesuit, and confessor to lord Powis.

Chichester. Morgan, a Jesuit.

Bath and Wells. Dr. Armstrong, a Franciscan friar.

Carlisle. Wihmot, alias Quarterman, a secular priest.

Chester. Thimbleby, a secular priest, now canon of Cambray.

Hereford. Sir Thomas Preston, bart. a Jesuit.

Bristol. Mundson, a Dominican.

Oxon. Williams, rector of Watton, and master of the novices, a Jesuit: he is also to have the deanery of Christ-church, and is to preside over the professors of divinity in that university, and peruse their letters before they read them publicly.

St. Davids. Belson, a secular priest.

St. Asaph. Jones, a secular.

Bangor. Joseph David Keimash, a Dominican friar.

ABBOTS.

Westminster. Dr. Sheldon, a Benedictine monk.

Sion-house. Skinner, a Benedictine monk.

DEANS.

Canterbury. Bettup, a Sorbonist.

St. Pauls. Leybourn a secular, and secretary to the cardinal.

Windsor. Howard, with twelve Benedictine canons.

Chichester. Morgan, a secular.

Winchester. Dr. Watkinson, President of the English college at Lisbon.

Many dignities of the church, not here mentioned, are to be supplied with Spaniards and other foreigners, because they have not clergy enough to be professors: nor are there any prebendaries or other places undisposed. And in the same Bull it was ordered, That the Jesuits should read philosophy and divinity in all great towns and places where they had colleges: but not give degrees. And whilst the English Jesuits were employed in instructing youth in humanity and philosophy, and others reading divinity, and preaching and catechising, they should be supplied with Spanish Jesuits and other foreigners, to assist them at the altar, and in the care of the colleges.

LXXIII. That the deponent on the second of September, saw a packet out of Scotland, directed to John Grove, dated August 10, 1678, in which the Fathers met at Edinburgh, from thence did tell the Fathers here, That they had not much to write, but that 8,000 Catholics were ready to rise and assist, when the business should grow hot; and would join with the disaffected Scots, when required by the Scotch Jesuits there. And in the said letter was mentioned, That one Westby was destroyed by one that was servant to Lovel the Jesuit, for endeavouring to detect the rebellion, with its authors and contrivers, to the council in Scotland.

LXXIV. That the deponent saw on the said 2nd of September, O. S. letters of the fourth N. S. from St. Omers, written and subscribed by Thomas White provincial; in which notice was given to Richard Blundel, to whom they were directed; that 12 Scotch jesuits were sent into Scotland by order from the general of the society, and have 1,000*l.* given them by Leshee the French king's confessor, to keep up the commotions in Scotland, that the French king might land an army: And that the said jesuits had instructions given them to carry themselves like Nonconformist ministers amongst the Presbyterian Scots.

LXXV. That on the 3d of September, the deponent saw a letter from the provincial at St. Omers, dated December 1, by which the deponent did perceive, that though the letter was dated from thence, yet it came not from thence, because it was Old Style; and did believe, that the said provincial was then in England. And in this letter directed to Blundel, it was specified, that the provincial was informed of some discovery that was made, at which he was somewhat surprized. But upon second thoughts, he ordered the said Blundel, not to desist the business in hand, but to write to Bedingfield not to take notice of what Keines said; it being but a conjecture of his own. And the said Blundel did on the third day write to Bedingfield, and did advise him of the provincial's thoughts concerning what had passed about that concern. And in the letter of the provincial to Blundel, it was ordered by the said provincial, That thanks should be given to Dr. Fogarty for his care in the business of Forty-eight (which is the king) and for his forwardness to assist those in Ireland: and ordered letters to be written with all speed into Ireland to give them his thanks, and to tell them, That he would not cease to pray for their good success.

LXXVI. That the provincial came to London the third day at night; and the deponent went to the provincial's lodgings, and was ordered to wait on him the next day in the morning.

LXXVII. That the deponent went on the 4th of September in the morning, according to the aforesaid order given him over night; and when the provincial saw the deponent, he asked him, With what face he could look on him, since he had played such a treacherous trick with them? And struck the deponent three blows with his stick, and a box on the ear; and charged him with being with the king, and a minister with him whom he suspected to have informed the king of those things: because that Bedingfield had related in a letter to Blundel, that the Duke of York had related some such thing to him; and did therefore judge, that it must be the deponent that must have been drawn in by some persons to the same. But at last the provincial told the deponent, that he was willing to be reconciled to him, if he would discover what the person was, his name and place of abode, to the end they might be secure of him; and were resolved to kill him. And in the mean time the deponent was ordered to make himself ready to go beyond the seas within 14 days, as he the provincial said. And that the deponent might not cheat them, they were to pay for his coach hire, and ordered his entertainment at Sittingburn, and in other places upon the road to Dover, and there Mr. Conyers, master of the Kings-Head, was to pay for his passage to Calais; and the muster of the Feathers in Calais to pay for his passage to St. Omers, where the deponent was to remain till farther order from the provincial. And Richard Blundel was to take care of carrying on the fire in Wapping in the deponent's room.

LXXVIII. That on the 6th of September, Mr. Pickering told the deponent, that Conyers was gone for Windoor, and he said, that after ten days stay there, he would go to the lord Brudenal's house.

LXXIX. That at night the deponent attending at the door of the provincial, and about to go in, heard White, and some others (whom the deponent supposed by their voices to be Mr. Mian, and one Mr. Poole) consulting about the disposing of a person, whom the deponent supposed to be himself. Their words were these: 'This man hath betrayed us, and therefore we will give a coach-man 20*l.* to take him up, and carry him directly to Rochester to see Les's house, who lives near the tower; and from thence to Dover, by some by-way, because he is acquainted at Sittingburn; and said, that if they could, but get him on the other side of the water, they would reward him till he had confessed to them; who is was 'that had been with the king, and informed him of the business.' When the deponent heard these words, he went down the stairs with all the speed he could make, and durst not return to his lodgings that night, but lay in another place.

LXXX. That the deponent, on the 7th of September at night, returned to his lodging, where he intended not to lie; but only to take some necessaries for his use the next day; but meeting with one Grigson, a papist, at whose house he had formerly lodged, near the Red-Lion, in Drury-Lane, who told him, 'the jesuits were displeased with him, because he had not answered their expectations, in being true to them; and that the jesuits were dangerous persons, and would ruin him (the deponent) if they could.' And the said Grigson said further, 'That he had known their roguery these 12 or 14 years.' And the deponent being, through discourse, detained by the said Grigson, was forced to lie in his lodging in Drury-Lane; and when he was lain down in his bed, one Stratford (a person utterly unknown to the deponent, and whom he never discoursed or any way provoked) endeavoured to break open the house where the deponent lay; and did break down a door to get into his lodging, but was forced to retreat, because he saw himself observed by some of the servants of the house.—And when he saw he could not come to assassinate him (as the deponent verily believes) he reviled him, and broke several quarries of glass in a window, under the lodgings of the deponent.—And therefore being verily persuaded, that the said Stratford was employed by the said Jesuits to do him a mischief, made his escape thence early on Sunday morning; and did not return thither again, because the said Stratford threatened to kill him. Now, the house in which the deponent lay, was a school, where the within mentioned Blundell used to catechize every Sunday in the afternoon.

LXXXI. The 8th day, being Sunday, whilst that the deponent was going to attend the public worship of God in the city, a papist, who goes by the name of Nevil, as the deponent remembers, met him in the Strand, and told him: 'That there was a very great murmuring amongst the jesuits against him, because of a complaint that was made against them by some persons, of whom they suspected him to be one.' And said further; 'That the deponent must either destroy the jesuits, or the jesuits destroy the deponent.' And told him moreover; 'That the bishop of Rochester was made acquainted with the complaint, and would lead them such a dance as they never followed since the fool their founder appeared in the world.' To which the deponent made no reply, suspecting this person to be a trepan; and when at parting, he asked the deponent where he lodged, the deponent gave him not that account as he desired.

A List of such Noblemen and Gentry, as are in this Conspiracy, whose Names occur at present.

Lord Arundel, of Wardour, lord chancellor.
Lord Powis, lord high treasurer of England.
Sir William Godolphin, lord privy seal.
Coleman, secretary of state.
Stafford, a principal secretary of state.

The Sea-Officers were named to the deponent, but their names being most French and some Irish, occur not.

MILITIA.

Lord Bellasis, lord general.
Lord Peters, lieutenant general.
Sir Francis Radcliff, major general.
John Lambert, adjutant general.
Langhorn, advocate general.
Mr. Arundel of Wardour, commissary general.

All these had their commissions or patents stamped by the general of the Jesuits Johannes Paulus d'Oliva, and sent from Rome to Langhorn; and were delivered to them with plenary indulgences sent also from Rome, and additional patents stamped by the provincials, Strange or White: White and his seal are taken.

COLONELS.

Who have their commissions from the provincial.

Lord Baltimore, colonel of horse; at whose lodgings 500 case of pistols, &c. were found, as is reported.

Colonel Thomas Howard, deceased, confessed he had received and accepted his commission.

Lassels, Roper, Winter or Witter, received their commissions from the deponent, and accepted them.

CAPTAINS.

Roper, son to the colonel afore-named; Radcliff, esq. Mcburn, the player; Penny; Carl, Junior, and Townly, did also receive their commissions from the informant, and accepted them.

Sir George Wakeman, physician to the army.

IRISH OFFICERS.

Lord Legate, bishop of Cassal in Italy:
Peter Talbot, lord chancellor.
Richard Talbot, esq., lord general.
Viscount Mountgarret, lieutenant-general.
His office to be executed by Mr. Butler his son.
John Pipard, esq., colonel.

Note, That the major part of the colonels appointed for the English army, are also Irish.

Note also, That Mr. Pierson, secretary to the lord Powis, did in the informant's presence, promise on the behalf of his Lord, that he should raise and furnish 300 horse, and had 300 armed men, ready to rise in less than 24 hours. These words were spoken a little after the consult, to White the provincial, at Wild-House.

The said lord Powis hath also contributed 300*l.*, towards the Jesuit design.

Note, That lord Stafford is a principal officer of state, and a chief conspirator; having contributed several sums of money, not remembered by the deponent.

TITUS OATES.

September 27, 1678.

Sworn before me Sir Edmund-Bury Godfrey; one of his majesty's justices of the peace for the County of Middlesex.

(Witnessed)

EDM. B. GODFREY.

Ex. Tonge, Chr. Kirby.

The General Design of the Pope, Society of Jesus, and their confederates in this Plot, is, the reformation, that is, (in their sense) the reduction of Great Britain and Ireland, and all His Majesty's Dominions by the Sword (all other ways and means being judged by them ineffectual) to the Romish Religion and obedience.

To effect this Design;

1. The Pope hath entitled himself to the kingdoms of England and Ireland.

2. He hath sent his legate the bishop of Casul in Italy into Ireland to declare his title, and take possession of that kingdom.

3. He hath appointed Cardinal Howard his legate for England to the same purpose.

4. He hath given commission to the general of the Jesuits, and by him to White their provincial in England to issue, and they have issued out, and given commissions to captains, generals, lieutenant generals, &c. namely, the general of the Jesuits hath sent commissions from Rome to Langhorn their advocate-general for the superior officers: and White hath given commissions here in England to colonels, and inferior officers.

5. He hath by a consult of the Jesuits of this province assembled at London, condemned his majesty, and ordered him to be assassinated, &c.

6. He hath ordered, that in case the duke of York will not accept these crowns as forfeited by his brother unto the pope, as of his gift, and settle such prelates and dignitaries in the church, and such officers in commands and places civil, naval and military, as he hath commissioned as above, extirpate the protestant religion, and in order thereunto ex post facto, consent to the assassination of the king his brother, massacre of his protestant subjects, firing of his towns, &c. by pardoning the assassins, murderers and incendiaries, that then he be also poisoned or destroyed, after they have for some time abused his name and title to strengthen their plot, weakened and divided the kingdoms of England, Scotland and Ireland thereby in civil wars and rebellions as in his father's time, to make way for the French to seize these kingdoms, and totally ruin their infantry and naval force.

Besides this papal, there appears also another French plot or correspondence, carried on by sir Ellis Layton, Mr. Coleman, and others.

More particularly, 1. The royal family of Stuarts are condemned to be cut off root and branch, and namely the king, duke of York, and prince of Orange, because that family hath not answered their expectations, nor have they any hopes that any of them will comply fully with this their bloody design, when fully discovered to them.

1. The king's person which stands in their way they more especially, and in the first place design to remove with all possible speed, by dagger, pistol or poison.

To stab him, Conyers and Anderton Benedictine Monks, and four Irish ruffians are employed.

To shoot him, Groves and Pickering are furnished with jointed carabines.

To poison him, 5,000*l.* hath been told out, entered in their books, and adured to be paid to sir George Wakeman, in part of 15,000*l.* upon a contract made with him in presence of Dr. Fogarthy and Mr. Coleman.

2. The duke of York, notwithstanding they acknowledged his sincerity and affection to their religion, and the society, and his demonstration thereof by his taking Beddingfield, a Jesuit, for his confessor, they design to dispose of him as is above said.

3. The prince of Orange is also condemned and designed against by name, and twelve missionaries sent into Holland have in charge to put that people in mutiny against his person and government.

4. The conquest and subduing of his majesty's dominions is designed and contrived in this manner.

1. The Conquest of Ireland and subduing it to the tyranny of the Pope and French.

1. By a general rebellion and massacre of the protestants as formerly, which they term another demonstration of zeal for the catholic faith; This to be done immediately upon the assassination of the duke of Ormond, as the watch word, for which four Jesuits are employed.

2. By the pope's nuncio sent thither, and commissions there given out by the provincial of the Irish Jesuits, &c. to a general, lieutenant general, &c.

3. By arms and money already sent, whereof 800,000 crowns by the pope.

4. By traitorous officers who are dispensed with by the archbishop of Dublin and the clergy there, to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, upon promise to betray their garisons and other trusts.

5. By the assistance of the French forces to be landed there, and received by 25,000 Irish ready to join them.

6. England and Scotland are to be divided, weakened, wasted and exhausted of their Infantry, Naval force and wealth, by civil war, rebellion, &c. and finally exposed to foreign force of French, &c.

To attain to this design, they apply themselves

1. By incessantly questioning and denying the king's legitimacy, and consequently his present right and title to his crown, and so exposing him as a tyrant without title.

2. By confusing and weakening as much as possibly they can the obligation of the oath of allegiance and supremacy, causing them to be renounced, rendering them very odious, as blasphemous and heretical, and terrifying all of their communion from writing for them, offering money to have Berry the priest murdered for writing in favour of them.

3. By disaffecting the king's best friends at home and abroad, and subjects, against his person and government.

1. Charging him with tyranny and designs of oppressing, governing by the sword, and without parliaments, and exposing his most faithful and valiant subjects to be wasted and slain in foreign service.

2. By aspersing, deriding, exposing and declaiming against his person, councils and actions in parliament and elsewhere; and particularly scoffing at his security and confidence in them, and by this means animating and encouraging their party and assassins, especially to attempt upon his life, and to hasten his ruin.

3. By disclosing the king's councils to France, by Coleman, Smith, and others.

4. By misreporting and raising false news of his affairs, &c.

5. By disaffecting his majesty's allies, Holland, Spain, and the German emperor and princes, by false intelligence, &c.

6. By disturbing trade.

7. By seditious preachers and catechists set up, sent out, maintained, and directed what to preach in their own or other private or public conventicles and field-meetings.

8. By setting up pretended false titles to the succession of the crown, and animating different parties one against another on this or such like false pretences to arm, and put the people in blood upon the king's death.

9. By firing and plundering our best cities and towns, by Irish, French, lay-brethren and others, disguised in frocks and otherwise, directed by order under the provincial's hand how to carry on these designs.

10. By poisoning and assassinating by picked quarrels or otherwise, those whom they suppose to be ready or able to detect or otherwise obstruct their designs; of whom they kept catalogues in their books.

11. By horrid, worse than Jewish interest, transportation of trading people, stock and money, adulterating money and plate. To which ends they have bankers, brokers, merchants, goldsmiths and other traders, whom they stock and set up with money of their society, of which they boast to have 100,000*l.* in cash, &c.

12. By suborning felons condemned, by Blundel their Newgate Ordinary, through hopes of pardon or transportation, to turn pagans, and then putting such as they find fit and desperate, on firing houses, plucking and mischief

Mr. SAMUEL ATKINS's Account of his Examination before the Committee of Lords, appointed to examine the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey. [From the MSS. of Samuel Pepys, esq. formerly Secretary to the Admiralty, which are preserved in Magdalen College, Cambridge.]

November 1st, 1678, being Friday, in the afternoon, about five o'clock, Mr. Smith, one of the king's messengers, came to Mr. Lawrenson's, at the Rhenish wine house in Westminster, (in company with Mr. Hanch, chamber-keeper to Mr. secretary Coventry) and sent from thence to Derby house, to speak with me; who being then not in the way, Mr. Walband went over, supposing he might have done what business they came about; but he presently returning, upon their telling him their business was with me, I went over to them, and after I had a very little while, Mr. Smith told me, his errand was to desire me to go with him to Mr. secretary Coventry, to which I assented most readily; and asked him, if he knew what the occasion of it was, he told me, no, and then pulled a warrant out of his pocket, for the apprehending me; but told me, he had commands from Mr. Secretary, not to tell me of it, or put it in execution, unless upon my refusal to go with him; to which I answered, There should be no occasion for the warrant, being very free to go with him; which I thereupon presently did, and coming to Mr. Secretary's office, I met Mr. Thinn, and enquired of him, If he knew the reason of Mr. Secretary's message to me? he answered, That it was grounded from a letter he had newly received from a Committee of Lords appointed to examine after the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, desiring him to find out, and send to them one Samuel Atkins. After a little stay at Mr. Secretary's office, he came in, and immediately gave orders for the preparing a letter to the Committee, to accompany me thither, which was accordingly done, and I went under the care of the aforesaid messenger, to the said Committee, then sitting at the lord marquis of Winchester's house, in Lincoln's-Inn-fields; when being come, and the letter from Mr. Secretary sent in to them, I was instantly called for before them, who were the duke of Buckingham, lord Shaftsbury, lord Halifax, lord M. Winchester, lord Essex, lord bishop of London. And sir Philip Howard, attending. And the following questions were asked of, and answered by, me.

Ld. Shaftsbury. Pray, Mr. Samuel Atkins, do you know one Mr. or Capt. Charles Atkins?

Samuel Atkins. Yes, my lord.

Ld. Shaftsbury. How long have you known him?

S. Atk. About two or three years, I think.

Ld. Shaftsbury. Are you related?

S. Atk. No, my lord, only for name-sake have called cousins.

Ld. Shaftsb. Do you know, or believe, he has any reason to do you a prejudice?

S. Atk. No, my lord, I know of none, nor ever gave him occasion to have any.

Ld. Shaftsb. Did you ever tell him, upon discourse about the plot, that there was no kindness (or a want of friendship, I think it was) betwixt Mr. Pepys and sir Edmundbury Godfrey?

S. Atk. No, my lord, I never mentioned sir Edmundbury Godfrey's name to him in my whole life, upon any occasion that I remember; nor ever talked with him about the plot.

Ld. Essex. Do you know one Child?

S. Atk. No, my lord; I have heard of such a man's being concerned in the victualling of the navy, but, to my knowledge, never saw him.

Essex. No, no, this is another sort of a man, and one whom you will be found to know very well.

Atk. My lord, if upon seeing him I shall so, I shall not stick to own it.

(Hereupon, Child was called for in, and appeared to be an ordinary sort of a seafaring man.)

Essex. Now, pray, don't you know this man?

Atk. No, sir, I never saw him in my life, to my remembrance.

Essex. No! What say you, Child, don't you know him?

Child. No, my lord, I never saw him in my life.

(Then Child was presently carried out of the room, and capt. Atkins called for, who came in at another door of the room, and after mutual salutations betwixt us, the following questions were asked.)

Ld. Shaftsbury. Pray, capt. Charles Atkins, what did Mr. Samuel Atkins tell you about Mr. Pepys and sir Edmundbury Godfrey?

C. Atkins. My lord, he told me there was a difference betwixt his master and sir E. Godfrey, and I asked him, If sir E. Godfrey was a parliament man, or no? he said, No. I asked him, Whether the difference was upon an occasion of Mr. Pepys being formerly accused for a Papist in the House of Commons? and whether sir E. Godfrey might not be concerned in doing that? he answered, No; and that it was upon this occasion.

S. Atkins. My lord, I guess not at what has led capt. Atkins to say this; I assure you I never told him in my life one word of it, never talked to him about the plot, or mentioned sir E. Godfrey's name to him (as I member) on any occasion, I am sure I never made him a subject for any discourse.

Ld. Shaftsbury. Did you not ask capt. Atkins, Whether this Child was a man of courage and secrecy, and bid him send Child to Derby house, to enquire for your master, but be sure not to ask for you?

S. Atk. No, sir, not in my life, one word like it.

Capt. Atkins then answered me, You know, Mr. Atkins, this discourse was between us in the Lords room, at Derby house, in the window.—Capt. Atkins, says I, God, your conscience, and I, know it is notoriously untrue: the last time I saw you at Derby house was, as I remember, on a Monday, Mr. Beverly (late lieutenant of the Montague) being there present; which I well remember, because we all three came out of Derby house together, about one o'clock at noon, and parted in King-street; I went to dinner, and you two towards Whitehall: Mr. Beverly, to whom I talked all the way going, having invited me to dine the next day at his house, being Tue-day, which I accordingly did. All that passed between us then (our stay alone together, as I believe Mr. Beverly remembers, being not half a quarter of an hour), was, That coming all three out of the little office together, into the Lords room, you pulled me to the window next the office door in the said room, and asked me to lend you a crown, to which I assented: and so going down stairs, I staid back, Mr. Beverly going down first, and pulled you by the coat, and put the crown into your hand, to prevent Beverly's observing. This passed the last time I saw you; the time before was about the middle of August, a little before Bartholomew Fair, when you came to me in the Lords Room, with one capt. Hurst (your familiar, but a stranger to me, having never but once, that I know of, seen him before,) and told me, there was a friend of capt. Hurst's (possibly you might name his name, and it might be Child, but I don't remember it) that wanted the employment of a purser in one of the king's ships, and had applied himself to capt. Hurst, to do him what kindness he could, and offered him ten guineas to be assistant to him. Now, says capt. Atkins to me, Pray let's bring the man to you, and upon your promising to do him what kindness you can, capt. Hurst and I shall have the ten guineas, and you know five guineas, says he, will do very well for me, this Bartholomew-fair-time. I then asked you, What the man was? Whether he had been at sea? and whether he had good certificates? you answered me, You could not tell, being a stranger to you, but you would bring him to speak with me: I then bid you so to do; and told you, all I could, or had in my power to do for him, was to lay his papers before the secretary, who, if he appeared a good man, would then, with others, before the king, when they were read: you replied then, That that was enough, and all you expected. After that, I called you (as I know you remember) to the other side of the room, from capt. Hurst, and told you my desires were, you should not engage me in this matter, to get the poor man's money, for that I would not do it for any consideration: You said, indeed, you would not, nor would have me do any thing, untill I had seen and discoursed with the man. You then called to capt. Hurst, and invited him and me to come to dinner on the morrow, to your lodging; to which I agreed, and asked you where you lodged; you said, you had told me oft enough, but I had never been so kind to come to see you, and then told me where it was, which I have now forgot, but think it was in or near Wild-street. After this discourse, you know, we parted, and you and capt. Hurst left me at Derby-house, and expected me, I suppose, at dinner next day; but, I, indeed, desirous to be quit of any thing that appeared so ill as the business proposed to me, came not to you, nor ever heard more of it from yourself, or capt. Hurst; nor saw you again, till the aforesaid 21st of October. This, capt. Atkins, you know, is all true; I appeal to yourself if it be not.

Ld. Shaftsb. Come, come, Mr. Atkins, you are a seeming hopeful young man, and, for aught I see, a very ingenious one: capt. Atkins has sworn this positively against you, to whom he bears no prejudice, or malice, but has acknowledged several obligations from you; and to tell you truly, I do not think he has wit enough to invent such a lye; be ingenious prithee, with us, and confess what you said.

S. Atk. I assure your lordship, upon my faith, which I am ready to bind with my oath, if you please, I never said one word in all my life like it.

Ld. Shaftsb. Indeed, we believe capt. Atkins to be a man that has loved wine and women, and been a debauched man; but whence would you have us to think him to be a rascal?

S. Atk. Why, my lord, I would offer this, and submit to you to judge how far a coward is to be reckoned so.—And hereupon, I related at large the surrendering of the king's ship basely to the Turks, and being now a prisoner. To which no answer was given.

Ld. Shaftsb. Pray, Mr. Atkins, what religion are you of?

S. Atk. A Protestant, sir, and my whole family ever so.

Ld. Shaftsb. Did you ever receive the sacrament, or take the oaths?

S. Atk. No, sir; but was under an intention to do it on Sunday next.

Ld. Essex. It is indeed time.

Ld. Shaftsb. Now, I am sure you won't do it; you can't forgive capt. Atkins?

S. Atk. Yes, my lord, I assure you I can, and do; and to shew it to you, I also remit to him the money he owes me, about fifty shillings, and am ready to receive the sacrament with a clean conscience. I confess I have not done it, as not thinking myself obliged by any employment I had to do it, and many thousands of my age, (good Protestants) will be found not to have done it.

Ld. Shaftsb. How long have you lived with Mr. Pepys?

S. Atk. Four years last August.

Ld. Shaftsb. How old are you?

S. Atk. Twenty one years, the 29th of that month.

Ld. Shaftsb. Where did you live before you came to Mr. Pepys?

S. Atk. I lived, Sir, formerly with commissioner Middleton.

Lord Shaftsb. Then I am sure he was a Protestant; but now you are brought into business, and have access to St. James's; 'tis to be feared you may be otherwise, for we are apt to suspect people inclining to the sea.

S. Atk. I never had temptation from within, or without, to alter my religion, and hope in God I never shall.—Then the Duke of Buckingham came from the other side of the room towards me, and said,

D. of Buck. Well, Mr. Atkins, I never saw you before that I remember; but I swear you are an ingenious man: I see (putting his finger to his forehead) the great workings of your brain, and would gladly, for your own sake, have you declare to us what you know of this matter.

S. Atk. My Lord, I can never say otherwise than I have, (I thank your Lordship for your good thoughts of me) nor do I know one word more.

And to this effect, one after another, did most of the Lords of the Committee urge me to say somewhat, repeating very often their good opinion of me, and their great sorrow for my obstinacy, which would bring the prejudice to myself, while by a confession I could not injure, but advantage myself; Captain Atkins joining with them to urge me to it, with promises of making my fortune thereby: I still gave the same answer, declaring my utter inability to say one word, and avowing I never had to captain Atkins.

Hereupon we were both ordered to withdraw, which we did, and after a little stay without, they called me again to them, and my lord Shaftsbury began.

Ld. Shaftsb. Mr. Atkins, truly we are, every Lord of this Committee, very sorry to be thus plain with you, but here being so positive an oath against you, we cannot answer to the parliament the doing less than committing you to Newgate.

S. Atk. What your lordships please; if you send me to be hanged, I can say no more, or otherwise.

Then they again repeated their advices severally to me, to declare what I knew, and greatly pitied me in the ill fortune which otherwise would attend me. I as often repeated what I said at first, of my knowing nothing of what captain Atkins had sworn. At last sir Philip Howard (who stood by all this while) told me, I could not have lived so long time in an office of business, but I must know the laws of this nation to be such as would bring me under severe punishment, if I should be found to conceal this matter, which I am well persuaded you must know of, (says he,) for that I have so seriously and very strictly examined capt. Atkins about it, and I know he would not tell me a lye. Besides he has no reason to do it towards you, and being a gentleman, son of sir Jonathan Atkins, my nephew, otherwise well related, and won't want an estate of his father (if he pleases) when he dies, he can't be thought to attempt to do it against any body. I told him, I very well knew the laws of this nation in that point, and as well knew the laws of God to be such as would draw a worse punishment upon my head, if I could tell a lye, or invent any thing to the prejudice of another man, and that I must do, if I said any thing in this matter different from what I have done.

After this, I was ordered to withdraw, and captain Richardson keeper of Newgate, (who waited without with the aforesaid Child,) called in, and a Warrant delivered to him in the following words, for his keeping me in his custody, viz.

"You are herewith to receive the body of Mr. Samuel Atkins, for suspicion of Felony, in concealing the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and him safely to keep, until he shall be thence delivered by due course of law: and for so doing, this shall be your warrant sufficient. Given under our hands and seals this 1st day of Nov. 1678."

(Signed) BUCKINGHAM, WINCHESTER,
P. HOWARD.

"To the keeper of the gaol of Newgate, for the City of London, and County of Middlesex."

Memorandum. The Deposition made by captain Atkins against me, from whence these Examinations proceeded, and my being committed to prison was grounded, hereafter follows in the express words, thereof, as they were reported by the Committee to the House of Lords, and entered in their book, viz.

November 12, 1678.

"The Examination of Charles Atkins, esq. taken upon oath before me, one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the County of Middlesex, and liberty of Westminster, this 1st of November, 1678.

"Saith, That in Derby-House, being in discourse with Samuel Atkins, [clerk to Mr. Pepys, Secretary of the Admiralty] the said Samuel did say, That sir Edmundbury Godfrey had very much vilified his master, and that if he lived long would be the ruin of him; upon which the said Samuel did ask this Examination whether he did think Child to be a man of courage and secrecy; to which this Examination did reply, That the said Child had been at sea, and had behaved himself very well, as he had been informed: upon which the said Samuel bid this examinant send the said Child to his master, Mr. Pepys, but not to him the said Samuel, for that he would not be seen to know any thing of it. This examinant did endeavour to find out the said Child, but did not meet with him till the day after this discourse had happened betwixt him and Samuel Atkins, at the Three Tobacco-pipes in Holbourn, where this examinant did tell Child, that Secretary Pepys would speak with him; and the next time that this examinant did see the said Child, (after that he had given him that direction) he the said Child, did endeavour to engage the said examinant to join with him in the murder of a man. The particulars of which, this examinant hath declared before the king and council, Wednesday last past.

Upon this Deposition was grounded the afore-recited Warrant for my commitment, by virtue whereof, capt. Richardson carried me presently to prison, where I remained in a room of his own house, without having liberty to write, to see, or speak with any body, till Wednesday the 6th of November, 1678, when having well ruminated on what had past at my late Examination, I desired capt. Richardson to acquaint the lords of the Committee, that at their next meeting I would pray to be brought before them; which he promised to do, and did; and on the said 6th of November, 1678, being Wednesday, I was carried by him to the Committee, consisting of the same Lords as before, then sitting at the Lord Privy-Seal’s chamber by the Parliament-House, where the following questions were asked:

Ld. Hulifax. Well, Mr. Atkins, we hope you have considered of this business, and are ready to give us some light in it.

S. Atk. My lord, I have well indeed considered of it, and I hope am prepared to shew your lordships that nothing is to be expected from me, and so my liberty will not be denied me.

Ld. Hulifax. Nay then Mr. Atkins, if you come to that, you must stay till we send for capt. Atkins, if it be aught you would say against him, or his accusation.

S. Atk. My lord, I hope I shall confute him in several circumstances, which I have better considered, and clear to you my innocence.

Ld. Hulifax. Why, Mr. Atkins, captain Atkins declares to us he has much more against you, and several other circumstances, by which, he says, you’ll appear the worst man living.

S. Atkins. My lord, if you please, I desire he may be sent for.

Upon this I was ordered to withdraw, and captain Atkins being sent for to sir Philip Howard’s in Scotland-Yard, came in about half an hour, and meeting me in the passage leading up the stairs to the chamber where the council was sitting, I observed his countenance altered extremely, and took notice of it to him: He passed by me, and went up the stairs, and staying there in expectation of being called, I went to him with my keeper, (Mr. Lion,) and discoursing together I asked him what had induced him to bring this mischief upon me, and whether he designed to ruin me, that had preserved him from it? He answered, No, no, not he. I further asked him, if I looked like one that had done or knew of any murder; and whether he thought in his conscience I did? No, faith, says he, I dare swear for you for that matter, only these words past between us; Well, says I, you say it was between us, so it is impossible to contradict your oath; but God, you and I know, it was not so. Hereupon, after some little other discourse, he went down stairs, and I following him, asked him over again, Whether he had any thing more to say against me, or whether indeed he thought I knew any thing of the murder? To which he answered (as before,) no, not he, he did not think it; of which I desired Mr. Lion to take notice; and presently after this the lords called for us both in, and said;

Ld. Shaftsb. Well, Mr. Atkins, What is it you have to say?

S. Atkins. I desire, my lords, if you please, that captain Atkins’s information may be read to me, or else I shall repair to my memory to repeat it.

Lords. Do, repair to your memory.

Then I recited it as it is herein before mentioned, and answered to it thus: As to his positive oath, my lords, about the difference he says I told him was between sir E. Godfrey and Mr. Pepys, that can admit of no more than my denying it; and being ready and desirous, if you please, to swear to the truth of what I say. As to his question, Whether sir E. Godfrey was a parliament man or not, and the answer he says I should give him, that he was not, I am also as ready to depose, that to this minute I don’t know whether he was so or no, and so could not make him that answer. Then as to the rise of the difference to be, as he calls it, ‘upon this occasion,’ the last time I saw capt. Atkins (before sir E. Godfrey’s death) was about the middle of August, a little before Bartholomew fair time, and long enough before any discovery was made of the Plot; so pray what means he by ‘upon this occasion?’ Besides, I assure your lordships, I did not know till after the death of sir E. Godfrey, that he took any depositions, or was otherwise instrumental in discovering any part of the plot; and the first notice I had of it, was from my fellow clerk, Mr. Walbank, who told me (I think on the Monday) in this manner of it: Poor sir E. Godfrey! Why, says I, pray what’s the matter with him? Why, they say, replies he, he is murdered by the Papists, having been gone from his house, and not heard of this day or two: Lord, says I, why should he be murdered, a very good and honest gentleman? I but (says Walbank) the reason of it was, as it is said, because he was the first that took the Depositions, &c. about the Plot. Upon this the Lords all cried out, they did not believe it was possible I that lived in an office of so great business, should not hear of his taking the Depositions till after his death, since they were done, (I think they said a month before the king went to Newmarket) and carried to the council. I answered, and industriously asserted, what was really truth, that I did not. But my lords, says I, pray suppose (what is so utterly in fact untrue) I had said to capt. Atkins what he swears I did; I must now declare I had no ground to say so; and that it must arise purely from my own invention, and if I invented a lye, I must suffer for doing it; And pray, my lords, what will come on't? Nay, nay, says my lord Shaftsbury, leave us to make the use of it; do you but confess it, you shall be safe, and we'll apply it. My lord, says I, I can't do it; I hope I never shall tell a lye to any man's prejudice, though I meet with ne'er so great danger. My lord Shaftsbury answered, Indeed, Mr. Atkins, ten then may swear against you, and for aught I know all belye you; And are you innocent? You're most unfortunate, and captain Atkins the greatest villain in the world. Pray, look one another in the face, (so we gazed very earnestly) and my lord Shaftsbury went on, speaking to captain Atkins: Come, captain Atkins, confess truly and ingenuously, Have you belyed Mr. Atkins, or no? May be you may have mistaken; pray consider it, and remember the injury you'll do this young man, if this be not true: You won't have more to answer for before God, if you should waste and destroy an emperor and his country, than you'll have if you wrongfully ruin him, who is in himself as (every man is) a little emperor. After this sort my lord Shaftsbury pressed capt. Atkins very home, and while he was doing so, and we looking stedfastly upon each other, captain Atkins's countenance changed very white, which I taking notice of, and observing to the lords, my lord marquis of Winchester cried, Where, where? I don't see it. My lord says I, I humbly conceive it is very apparent: I, I, where? says his lordship, turning his head away: the other lords said nothing. Then captain Atkins having a tobacco-pipe rolling about in his fingers upon the table, threw it down, and said, Why should I say so, my lords, if he had not told me? Thereupon I grew indeed angry, and pressed very hotly for my liberty, avowing my innocence with several protestations; but all was too little. My lord bishop of London (whom I took to be more tender hearted than the rest) I applied myself to, and talked about my religion, and of my having never gone to mass, nor ever known, or seen any priest in my life that I remembered. He at last was pleased to say, Truly I believe you are a protestant; but this oath is greatly against you: and he still affirms it positively. My lord, says I, it is very strange I should invent such a lye to tell captain Atkins of my master; I hope I shall not be found so faithless a servant, when I never in my whole life heard Mr. Pepys mention sir E. Godfrey's name, that I remember, but upon an occasion (which I mentioned at large) of our going before him about some money lost from Mr. Pepys's house, and then they appeared as great friends as could be, and shewed mutually very great expressions of kindness and respect. It is strange I should ask him of the courage and secrecy of a man I never saw; and as strange to bid him send him to my master, who will, I suppose, declare whether I ever spoke to him about any such man, as I am sure I did not, nor could. At last, my lord, says I, I avow to you, Mr. Pepys never in his life committed any secret to me of any kind, nor ever mentioned, upon any occasion one word about sir E. Godfrey. And this your lordship would easily believe, if you knew how tottering I stand in his opinion, having been once parted from him, and at this moment I believe remain under his ill apprehension. Why, says my lord bishop, are you given to drink, or debauchery? No, my lord, I thank God not. But Mr. Pepys is very severe in his house, and for the least absence from it without his knowledge, will discard any of his servants from his favour: I coming very young to him, was inclined, through boyishness, to too much desire of ease and liberty, and so begot and continued his severity towards me.

While I was thus talking to my lord of London, captain Atkins was discoursing to the other lords, at the other end of the room; and my lord Shaftsbury observing what we both said, turned towards me, and stopped my going on: Why, you talk, Mr. Atkins, (says my lord) it will be made appear, that you are the greatest favourite he has; you read all his letters, read to him by night; and what say you, if I can prove, from the servants in your own house, that you are reputed a papist? My lord, says I to that, if your lordship can do that, or any man in the world, prove I am in the least wise, or ever was inclined that way, I'll be contented to be hanged, without saying a word more. My lord Shaftsbury goes then on again; Pray, Mr. Atkins, What books did you use to read to Mr. Pepys? My lord, says I, I have not lately read any to him; but formerly I have read the Bible, and other good books; sometimes History, other times Divinity. Never any Popish books? No, never in my life, I assure your lordship, never any; but, as I remember, one book of an English divine's; about their error in their doctrine of transubstantiation, but the book's name I forget.

After all this, I found I must return to prison; I offered bail, which being denied me, I prayed liberty, that my sister might come to see me; which was granted she should for one time, the keeper of the prison to be by while she stayed with me; and after that I withdrew, and captain Atkins together; he, as soon as I was out, stepped in to the Lords again, and (as I understood afterwards) desired the Judges might have orders for his coming to me, upon his suggestion to the lords, he would bring me to confess, which was granted he should; and so I was recarried to prison, and remained there till Friday the 8th of November, without having heard from, or seen any person, saving my sister who came to me the day before, and remained in the room half a quarter of an hour, with captain Richardson.

Friday morning, being the 8th of November, captain Atkins comes up to my chamber (with captain Richardson, in whose house I still remained), and finding me in bed, throws open the curtain, and bids me good-morrow; I seeing who it was, leaped out of the bed, and returning his good-morrow, called to captain Richardson, who was going down stairs again, and prayed I might speak a word with him, and so taking him into the next room, For God's sake, says I to him, don't leave me alone with this man, who having already sworn falsely against me, will, for aught I know, go back to the lords, and swear any thing more he lists; capt. Richardson answered, The lords had directed he must, and he must be alone with you: Oh! pray, says I, suffer it not, for I vow I won't speak one word to him alone. Notwithstanding this, captain Richardson pulled to the door, and left us both together, promising to return immediately. The door was not sooner shut, and captain Richardson gone than captain Atkins wringing his hands, and crying with the tears upon his face, said to me, Oh! Mr. Atkins, we are both undone! How undone? says I, Oh Lord! says he, there's a man come to town last night, lay at Mr. secretary Williamson's, was examined two hours by the king, and has sworn positively against you, That you were, or were to have been at the murder of sir E. Godfrey; I am not, says he, very perfect whether. Well, says I, God bless him: But how pray, are you undone? It is I am so, if this be true: Says he, (still crying, and laying his hand upon his breast) I am undone. That's true indeed, says I, your guilt upon your conscience, in bringing this falsely upon me, has undone you to the purpose. But, pray, who is this man? Do you know him? I don't know his name, says he, nor ever saw him but once before, and that was in Essex buildings; the woman of the house being arrested where we were, he and I rescued her from the bailiffs. It is strange, says I, he should come and enquire for you and find you out as soon as ever he came to town, and you not know him, nor ever saw him but once. It is so says he; he came to me, to enquire about a gentleman we had business with before he went out of town. Well, I answered, I can't help what he has done; I thank you for all this, but won't doubt, if twenty swear against me, I shall appear innocent, I am sure I shall, to the last moment of my life. Pray, Mr. Atkins, says he, consider of it: My uncle, Phil. Howard, bid me come to you, to tell you of it, and pray confess, before it is too late, and you repent you did not; there is no can hurt you, but your fortune may be made by it; and what need you care for your master? Pray, says I, why don't you as well ask me to forgo my salvation? a thousand deaths shall not extort a lye from me; and you know I can say nothing: pray, consider you of it, and repair the injury you have done me, as well as you can. In the middle of our discourse, walking together in the room, he suddenly stood still, and turning toward me, You did not tell me, says he, your master had a house at Roan, in France, neither, did you? Oh strange! says I; why, have you sworn that too? no, not I, replied he, what should I swear it for? but you told me so. At which, being greatly surprised and amazed, I could not presently say any thing to him, and while I was silent he goes on. And you know, says he, you desired me to impeach your master about this murder, because he should keep it off from the duke of York. Oh! Lord of Heaven! says I, and have you deposed that too? no, not I, says he; what should I swear it for? but you know you told me so. Mr. Atkins, says I, you are the greatest villain, and worst man in the world, and I am sure you will repent the cursed mischief you have endeavoured to do me, by your damned false invention and oaths: and while I was, after this sort, talking to him, he interrupted me, bidding me consider of it against the afternoon, when he said I should be called for before the Committee of Lords; and so took his leave, and went away.

In the afternoon of the said Friday, being the 8th of November, 1678, capt. Richardson sent for me out of my chamber, and causing a pair of irons to be put upon my legs, he searched me, and took what papers he found in my pockets, into his possession, and immediately carried me to the Committee of the same Lords as before at my lord privy-seal's chamber, adjoining to the parliament-house; where having waited without some time, the Lords sent for me into the room, where I found a person standing on the far side of the table, with a blackish perriwig, and a campaign coat (and whom I since understand to be Mr. Bedlow); he came toward me at my coming in, looked me earnestly in the face, saluted me, which I returned, and so went again to the further side of the table; and these questions were asked and thus answered:

Ld. Shaftsbury. Mr. Atkins, do you know this gentleman?

S. Atkins. No, my lord, I don't know I ever saw him in my life.

Bedlow. I believe, Sir, I have seen you somewhere, I think, but cannot tell where: I don't, indeed, remember your face.

D. of Buckingham. Is this the man, Mr. Bedlow? (Pointing to me.)

Bedlow. My lord, I can't swear this is he; 'twas a young man, and he told me his name was Atkins, a clerk, belonging to Derby-House, but I cannot swear this is the same person.

Ld. London. Where were you, Mr. Atkins, on Monday the 14th of Oct. last, between nine and ten at night?

S. Atk. I can't well remember, my lord, but I suppose at home, for I am seldom out at that time of night.

Ld. London. Were you in the Pall-Mall, or that way, that you remember?

S. Atk. No, my lord, I believe verily not.

[Hereupon, the gentleman, Mr. Bedlow, was ordered to withdraw; and my lord Shaftsbury calling me to him, said to me;]

Ld. Shaftsbury. Mr. Atkins, if you are innocent, you're the most unfortunate wretch living. Pray attend to what I say; I assure you, 'tis good news for you. There remains but one way in the world to save thy life, and that I would have you make use of; and you may do it without injury to yourself, if you will. Confess all you know, and make a discovery of this matter, and your life shall be saved.

S. Atk. My lord, had I any to make; could I say one word, more or less, in this matter; or were I at all guilty in any part of it, I suppose you'll please to believe, that the horror of my conscience, and the punishment I should justly expect from God and man, for such offence, would lead me to make an ingenuous confession, to save my own life, that I might thereby get time to repent, and beg forgiveness from God Almighty. But as I am innocent in every part of what is said about me, I hope you'll neither advise or desire me to go about to wrong my conscience, or stain my soul, to endeavour to live a few moments in this world, and to avoid death for a time, which will, at length, overtake every body. I assure your lordships, my prayers are to God Almighty, to give me grace and strength to go through to the last, and rather suffer a thousand deaths, than as much as tell a solemn lie to the prejudice of any person.

Ld. Shaftsb. Then I tell you what, Mr. Atkins, and that I ne'er said to you before; since you are so gallant, I assure you, you'll either be hanged or knighted; if the Papists rise and cut our throats, you'll be knighted; if not, you'll be hanged. Here's first what you said to Mr. Atkins, and then this gentleman's oath, which, though not positive, yet with such circumstances against you, as I doubt, whether a jury in this case, won't find you Guilty; besides other collateral circumstances there may be: And another thing there is, that there are several others, well known to this Mr. Bedlow, to have been concerned in it.

D. Buck. And are here in the House, in custody.

Ld. Shaftsb. And if one of those swear you were in it, all the world cannot save you.

S. Atk. My lord, my prayers are and shall be, that one person may but be detected who was really in the murder, and I am sure I shall be acquitted; and I cannot suffer, but from the thing's being misplaced.

D. Buck. Oh, he'll confess nothing, he expects a pardon.

Ld. Shaftsb. I'll secure him from that, I warrant you; there's three hundred to one.

S. Atk. My lord, I expect no pardon, but desire death when I am found to deserve it: I have nothing to trust to but my innocence, next to the goodness and justice of God Almighty, to whom I commit myself.

[After this I was directed to withdraw, and the Keeper ordered to carry me back to prison, which was accordingly done.]

Memorandum, The Deposition made this 8th of November, 1678, before the Lords of this Committee, by Mr. Bedlow, concerning this matter, hereafter follows in the express words thereof; as they were reported by the said Committee to the House of Lords, and entered in their Journal Book, viz.

“ Die Martis, 12 Novembris, 1678.

“ The EXAMINATIONS taken, November the 8th, 1678, at the Committee of Lords, for enquiring into the Murder of Sir Edmundsbury Godfrey, were read as follows:

“ William Bedlow being sworn in the Lords' House, was called in and examined, saith on his oath, That this examinant being treated with by Mr. Leefaire and Mr. Welch, who are two Jesuits, about the beginning of Oct. last, they offered him a reward of 4,000*l.* if he would be one of the four or six that should kill a man that was a great obstacle to their design; he, this deponent, promised to be one to do it, upon their giving him notice. Afterwards (viz. the Friday before sir Edmundsbury Godfrey was missing) Mr. Leefaire met him, this deponent, about four o'clock, in Grays-Inn-Walks, and appointed to meet him again in the same place about four o'clock the next day, to do that business: That upon taking the Sacrament to do it, he, this deponent, should have the money paid to himself, or any friend he should name; but he, this deponent, not liking the design, failed of meeting him: The next night after, being Sunday, he met Mr. Leefaire, again, by accident, in Fleet-street, going into Red-lion-court, about five o'clock; Mr. Leefaire then desired him not to fail of meeting him the next night (being Monday) about the same hour, at the Palgrave's-head tavern, that he might employ this deponent in some other special business; but this deponent came rarer than the time appointed, and so failed to meet him there, but left word at the bar of that tavern, that he would meet him at eight o'clock in the cloister of Somerset-house court; and accordingly, betwixt eight and nine o'clock, this deponent came thither and found Leefaire walking there, who said, he had stayed almost an hour for him; they passed the time there about half an hour, Leefaire telling him how much the Church of Rome and the Pope were obliged to him, and what rewards he should have for his secrecy and fidelity to them.

“ Afterwards he desired him, this deponent, to walk into the midst of the court, where he, the said Leefaire, might, say something to this deponent, and nobody over-hear it; and there he told this deponent, that the person whom he was to kill, was killed, and his body then lay in Somerset-House; and that he did believe, that the excuse which this deponent had made him before, for not coming to the murdering of him, was real; and that he knew his fidelity was such, that he should have half the reward, if he would help to carry the body to a place where they had chose to lay him.

"This deponent asked to know first, Who were to be the persons that were to go with him? Leefaire told him, they were himself, Mr. Walsh, the lord Bellasis's gentleman, Mr. Atkins (Pepys's clerk,) and one that he had often seen in the queen's chapel: Then Leefaire brought this deponent by the hand, in the dark, through the entry, unto that room, which he shewed the duke of Monmouth, and knocked softly with his finger at the door; and when it was opened, Leefaire led this deponent into it, which was dark; Leefaire then pulled a dark lanthorn from under his coat, and shewed a small light in the room, where this deponent saw the persons he before-mentioned: of whom this deponent knew Leefaire, Mr. Walsh, and the other person he saw often in the chapel; and the other two owned themselves, the one to be the lord Bellasis's servant, and the other to be Mr. Atkins (Pepys's Clerk).

"And this deponent saith, That they did agree to carry the body in a chair to the corner of Clarendon-house, and there to put him in a coach, to carry him to the place where he was found. Having concluded this, they agreed to carry him off at eleven of the clock the same night: Then some of them turning about, they throwed off a cloak that lay upon him, and shewed this deponent the body. This deponent asked them, who it was? They told him, it was an old man, that belonged to a person of quality, who had taken some examination: tending to the discovery of their design. This deponent asked them further, Why it was not proper to kill the person of quality himself? They answered, No; for this man had the examinations in his own custody; and that their design of getting him thither, was to get him to send for them by fair means or foul, and then they did not question, but the next examination would be so contrary to that, that it should, upon their trials, appear two several stories; and when they should be brought to trial, upon the latter examination, they would produce the former to contradict it, that it might seem partiality to the world: Upon which reasons, this deponent seemed satisfied, and asked them, Where they killed him? they told him at Somerset-house. Then this deponent begged pardon for half an hour, and he would wait upon them again; but this deponent went away, and came no more; But the next day, about eleven of the clock, this deponent met Leefaire by accident, crossing Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and then they went together unto the Greyhound tavern in Fleet-street; Leefaire (putting his cane up to his nose) said, He had something to say to him; Leefaire there charged this deponent for not coming the last night, according to his promise; this deponent told him, He was not willing to come, because he knew the person: Leefaire then asked him, Who it was? This deponent told him, it was justice Godfrey; Leefaire then acknowledged it was so, and he was willing to dispense with this deponent's not coming, if he would assure him of his fidelity.

"This deponent then asked Leefaire, How they got him thither, and where they found him? Leefaire told him, That himself, Walsh, and the lord Bellasis's gentleman, met him by the King's-Head inn, in the Strand, crossing the street, in the evening, before five of the clock, and told him that if he would please to go with them so far as Strand-Bridge, they would bring him to a place near St. Clement's church, where there were a company met, principal plotters of that design, against the king, and there (if he would go presently) he might take them, and the principal of their papers; he answered, That he thought it not convenient to go himself, but he would send his warrant, and the constable: They told him, If he did make so much delay, they might be gone; and that if he would walk up so far as Strand-Bridge, one of them would go and call a constable to him there, and he might give his order presently: Whereupon, he walked with them so far as Somerset-house, and there they made a halt: They told him, it would be less observed, if he walked in Somerset-house, than to stand in the street; and thereupon, two of them walked in with him, and the other pretended to go call a constable; and when they had walked a turn or two in the court, two more persons came forth, and shewed him into a room, and when they had him secure there, they held a pistol to him, threatening, if he made a noise, they would shoot him, but if he would answer their expectations, they would do him no harm. Then they asked him to send for those examinations he had taken about those that were committed; he answered, They were not in his power, for he had sent them to Whitehall. Upon that, and refusing to answer other questions, they seized him, and stifled him with a pillow, and so they thought he had been dead; but coming into the room some time after, they found him struggling, and then they strangled him with a long cravat (which cravat this deponent saw the Monday, at night, about his neck). Then this deponent asked Leefaire, Why they carried him into the fields? Or what they designed by it? He answered, that they had made a wound in his body, and laid his sword by him, that it should seem he had killed himself; and that they did not question, that the discovery of killing him would ever have been made; neither did they doubt, but that their design would have its effect. Then Leefaire told this deponent, That as he would be answerable to Christ Jesus, at the last day, he should be faithful to the cause; and so they parted.

"The same time, Mr. Atkins being called in before Mr. Bedlow, Mr. Bedlow saith, That he is, in all things, very like the person he saw in the room with sir Edmundbury Godfrey's dead body; and he doth verily believe it was him that owned himself to be Pepys's clerk; but because he never saw him before that time, he cannot positively swear it, but he doth verily believe him to be that man."

On Friday, the aforesaid 8th of Nov. in the evening, I was brought back to prison in irons (which I kept on till the Monday following, but were then, by the favour of captain Richardsou, taken off), and remained that night in capt. Richardson's house; the next day was removed thence into the Press-yard, where I continued kept very close till Monday the 11th of November, 1678.

Monday morning being the 11th of Nov. capt. Atkins made me a second visit, and saluting me with the good-morrow, asked if I had been before the Lords? I told him, Yes I was, last Friday, and saw a person there I knew not, nor he me, nor did he swear any thing (that I knew) against me: Ay, says he, but he has since that, in the House of Commons, on Saturday night, swore, that you were at Somerset-house when sir E. Godfrey's body lay there; and my uncle, Phil. Howard, bid me come to you, to tell you of it, that you may consider, and confess what you know before it be too late. After which sort he earnestly seemed to press me to say somewhat. I told him, My last breath (if I suffer) must and shall agree with what I said at first, of my being unable to say any thing of this whole matter, more than the unborn child. Pray, capt. Atkins, who is this man? Why, says he, his name is Bedlow. Who is he, pray? Is he a man of any good fame? No, answered he, I think of no very good fame. Do you know him, pray? Yes, says he, I have known him three or four months, but have no very great acquaintance with him (observe, he at first told me, he never saw him but once). Pugh, says he, I do not believe a word he says; they are all shams; he is certainly hired by those that did it. Do you think so, says I? Ay, ay, says he, trouble not yourself about it. And so he took his leave of me; telling me, he believed I should be called again before the Lords.

The next day morning, being Tuesday the 12th of November, four gentlemen of the House of Commons came to me to Newgate (two of whom only I knew, Mr. Sacheverel, and col. Birch), and having sent for me to them in capt. Richardson's house, they told me the occasion of their coming, and in what a desperate posture my life lay in, so as there seemed no possibility to expect the saving of it, but by pouring myself out in a confession to them: and so aggravated the murder, with its (indeed) ill circumstances, and asked me, what I had to say? I first told them, I heartily wished I could give them any light in it, I should deem myself very happy, to be so enabled to acquit myself of the debt I owe to his majesty, and the interest of this nation; but I was purely innocent, and whatever hath been sworn against me (let it be more or less, and by more or fewer hands), might with the same truth be sworn against a man who never was on this side York: So desiring their patience, briefly run over to them what had happened at my several examinations before the Lords. They asked me then, Whether I knew one Welch, or Prichard? I told them, No, nor ever heard of them that I remembered. Whether I remembered no circumstance on Monday about a dark lauthor? My answer was, No; that I had not seen one, as I remembered, many months. Whether I was not then at Somerset-house? I said, No; neither then, nor any time before or since in my whole life. How, and where, I spent my time the Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the 12, 13th and 14 of October? I answered, I could not presently tell, but could soon recollect. They told me, I did not seem to have so ill a memory. I said, I supposed most would be found to have as ill to answer such a question. Some other little questions they asked, and I made true answers to, though not to their satisfaction; and so they left me, asking me over again, just at their departure, very seriously, if I knew any thing of the murder, or the plot? I avowed with several asseverations, I did not.

Upon my returning to my chamber, I considered, and brought to my perfect remembrance, how I had passed almost every hour of those aforesaid three days: And so I remained there without hearing from, seeing or speaking with any creature, till Thursday the 21st of November, 1678.

On Tuesday morning, being the 19th of November (in the interval), my keeper comes to me, and bidding me rise, and dress myself, which I accordingly did, he puts a great pair of irons on my leg, and told me, I must go then to have my trial at the King's-bench bar. Lord, says I, I wonder I had no forehand notice of it; I have no witnesses ready: He answered, He could not help it, but go I must. After I had been ready about an hour, expecting their calling me down, my keeper comes up, and informs me of the mistake, the order being for one Mr. Staley to be brought up, and not me; but that on the morrow I should prepare to go. The morrow comes, I hear nothing of it.

The following day, being Thursday the 21st of November, my sister and a gentleman of my acquaintance (having relation to the law) Mr. Hayes, came to see me with a keeper, by order from my Lord-Chief-Justice, and brought me ill news of what Bedlow had sworn against me, and the little hopes there remained of saving my life; but that they were doing all they could for me, towards the making my defence, and so shewed me a paper they had drawn up (by collections they had made from several people in whose company I spent the time), of my passing the 12th 13th and 14th days of October, which agreed with what I had done in my memory in substance, and different in no essential circumstance: And so they left me, bidding me consider what I had to say, for that my trial would be in a day or two.

Accordingly, having the use of pen, ink and paper given me, by order from my Lord-Chief-Justice, I set upon drawing up in writing, what I had to say in my defence, and did it in a little time as well as I could. In the mean while a grand jury was summoned, and a bill found against me at the King's-bench, for a principal in the murder of sir Edmondbury Godfrey; but (upon what occasion I know not) my trial came not on this term. Presently, after it was over, capt. Richardson sent for, and took from me (by order I suppose) all the papers I had drawn up preparatory to my trial, and carried them (I have great reason to believe) before the committee of Lords, who, I suppose, from thence having learnt who were the witnesses I should have to prove the expence of the evening on Monday the 14th of October, the very time Mr. Bedlow accuses me to have been at Somerset-house; found out where they lived, sent for them by a messenger to attend them, and in Mr. Bedlow's presence, and the king's counsel, having put them all to their oaths, examined them distinctly and crossly, about all they could say relating to me, and my passing my time, where, and with whom, on the said Monday night.

I remained in prison till the following term (two sessions of gaol-delivery having passed), beginning the 23d of Jan. 1679, and desisted from moving in court for my trial, till the latter end of it, being in expectation I should be brought to it without trouble or charge to myself.

But finding no intention, or preparation for it from the Attorney-General (whom we consulted in it, and desired not to oppose us in our motion in court for a trial), on Thursday, being the 6th of February, a motion was made for my being tried before the end of the term, and granted; the king's counsel declaring their being ready on his part: pursuant thereto, another motion was made, the next day, being Friday, for my being brought to the bar on the morrow after to be arraigned, in order to my trial.

Accordingly on Saturday morning, I was brought thither and arraigned upon a bill found against me, just before my coming to the bar, as accessary to the murder of sir E. Godfrey: After the indictment was read, I asked the court when my trial would come on? And was answered by my Lord-Chief-Justice, that he thought on Monday: Then I moved his lordship and the court, that a rule of court might be granted for the bringing in thither against my trial, such papers as were in the hands of either of the secretaries of state, clerk of the House of Lords, or recorder of the city of London, relating to my affair; and had for answer, that it was not proper to grant a rule of court for it; but they doubted not, if I had the Attorney-General attended about it, he would see I should receive all that was just and fit for me therein. After I had done speaking, my Lord-Chief-Justice asked, if I was, or ever had been a papist? To which answering No, I was directed to withdraw, and so went back to prison.

On Monday morning I was brought again to the Bench-bar, in company with Mr. Hill, Green, and Berry, three persons accused by Mr. Prance, as actors in the murder of sir E. Godfrey, and after a short stay there, the court directed I should be carried aside, till the trials of those three persons were over; and accordingly I was so. About three of the clock in the afternoon, their trials being ended, I was called to the bar, and my Lord-Chief-Justice told me, their trials had taken them up so much time, and it being so near the end of the term, I must be content to stay till the sessions for mine; and so asked me if I had bail ready, and my liberty should be had thereupon. I answered, I was better prepared for my trial, than with bail, and insisting upon the hardship I had endured in a long imprisonment, earnestly begged for my trial. His lordship told me, their business could not all be put off for mine, and I must be contented. I thereupon was proposing bail to the court, while captain Lloyd, one of my witnesses, stood up and told them, he was, and had been detained a considerable time in town to give evidence for me, and could not possibly be in England at the next sessions; which I also backed with assurances, that it was his and several other of my witnesses cases, whose occasions indispensably called them away: Upon which, the morrow-morning, very early, was appointed for my trial, and so I was directed to withdraw, and went back to prison.

On the morrow-morning, being Tuesday, the 11th day of February, 1679, I was accordingly brought to the bar, and arraigned with two indictments, one as principal, the other as accessary to the murder of sir Edmondbury Godfrey, and after a very full hearing of the Evidence against me, and being suffered to say very little of the great deal of matter I had to urge in my defence, the jury (who were all gentlemen of quality of the county of Middlesex), without stirring from the bar, gave their verdict in, Not Guilty: And I was thereupon immediately ordered to be discharged.

The Examination of Captain WILLIAM BEDLOW, deceased, relating to the Popish Plot; taken in his last Sickness, by Sir Francis North, Chief Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas. Together with the Narrative of Sir Francis North, at the Council-Board: and the Letter of Sir Francis North, to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, relating to this Examination. Perused and signed to be printed, according to the Order of the House of Commons, by me, William Williams, Speaker.*

The EXAMINATION of Capt. WILLIAM BEDLOW, taken upon oath before the Lord Chief Justice North, at Bristol, on Monday the 16th of August, 1680.

The Examinant saith, That the duke of York hath been so far engaged in the Plot, as he hath seen by Letters in Cardinal Barbarini's secretary's Study, that no part that hath been proved against any man already, that hath suffered, but that to the full those letters have made him guilty of it; all but what tended to the king's death. And at Rome I asked Father Anderton, and Father Lodge, two Jesuits, What would the duke do with his brother when he was king? and they answered me, They would find a means for that; they would give him no trouble about it. Then I told them, I believed the duke loved his brother so well, he would suffer no violence to be done to him: they said, No; if the duke could be brought to that, as he had been religiously to every thing else, they might do their work; their other business was ready; and they might do it presently. But they knew they could not bring him to that point, but they would take care for that themselves. They had not begun with him, to leave him in such scruples as that, but they would set him into his throne, and there he should reign blind-fold three or four days; for they had settled some, they should pitch the action upon, should clear their party, and then should fly upon them with the sword of revenge.

And this Examinant doth further add, That the queen is not, to this examinant's knowledge, nor by any thing that he could ever find out, any way concerned in the murder of the king, but barely by her letters consenting and promising to contribute what money she could to the introducing the Catholic Religion. Nay, it was a great while, and it made her weep, before she could be brought to that.

Aug. 16, 1680, WILLIAM BEDLOW.
(Curae Me.) FRA. NORTH.

* Bedlow having been so remarkable a witness in the several Trials of the Popish Plot, it is thought proper to insert here what he declared upon oath to the Lord Chief Justice North, four days before his death, (which happened August 20, 1680.

The NARRATIVE of sir FRANCIS NORTH, Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, at the Council Board.

At my first coming to Mr. Rumsey's house, where I was to lodge at Bristol, upon Monday the 16th day of August in the afternoon, being the first day of the assizes, sir John Knight came to me, and said, That Mr. Bedlow lay dangerously ill of a fever, and had little hopes of life; and desired that I would give him a visit, that he might impart something of great consequence to me before his death. I told him, I would give him a visit that night after supper, about nine o'clock, if I might be satisfied of two things: 1. That there was no infection in his distemper: 2. That the time would not be inconvenient, but he might discourse to me without prejudice to his condition. After a little while, two physicians came to me, and assured me, that there was no danger of infection, and that the time I had appointed would be most proper; for commonly he took his repose in the afternoon, and at nine o'clock he would, in all probability, be refreshed, and fit to discourse with me. Thereupon, I declared my resolution of going, and desired the company of the two sheriffs, and my brother, Roger North, and appointed my marshal, William Jones, to go with me. As we were upon the way, Mr. Crossman, a minister in that city, told me, Mr. Bedlow had desired him to come with me to him: I said, It was very well, and I should be glad of his company. Whereupon we went all together: and being come into the room where Mr. Bedlow lay, I saluted him, and said, I was extreme sorry to find him so ill; I came to visit him upon his own desires: I did imagine he had something to impart to me, as a privy-counsellor, and therefore if he thought fit, the company might withdraw. He told me, that needed not yet, for he had much to say which was proper for the company to hear: and having saluted the Sheriffs, and Mr. Crossman, he discoursed to this purpose.

That he looked upon himself as a dying man, and found within himself that he could not last long, but must shortly appear before the Lord of Hosts, to give an account of all his actions. And because many persons had made it their business to baffle and deride the Plot, he did, for the satisfaction of the world, there declare upon the faith of a dying man, and as he hoped for salvation, That whatever he had testified concerning the plot, was true ; and that he had wronged no man by his testimony, but had testified rather under than over what was truth ; that he had nothing lay upon his conscience upon that account ; that he should appear cheerfully before the Lord of Hosts, which he did verily believe he must do in a short time. He said, he had many witnesses to produce, who would make the plot as clear as the sun ; and he had other things to discover, which were of great importance to the king and the country. Hereupon, he making some pause, I told him, The plot was so evidently made out that no reasonable man, no protestant, I was sure, could doubt of the truth of it : but he ought not to have concealed any thing that concerned the king so highly ; he ought to discover his whole knowledge in matters of treason, that traitors may be apprehended and secured, who otherwise may have opportunity to execute their treasonable designs. To this he replied, That much of that which he had not discovered, was to corroborate his former testimony, that he had concealed nothing that was absolutely necessary to the king's preservation ; that he thought it not fit to accuse more persons, till he had ended with those whom he had already accused. He expressed great grief and trouble at the condition of his poor king and country, (so he termed them) whom he knew at that time to be in imminent danger from the Jesuits, who had resolved the king's death ; and he was sure they would spare him no longer than he continued to be kind to them. He said, he was privy to their consultations at Salamanca and Valladolid, where they used to observe the favourable conjuncture they had to introduce their religion into England ; which consisted in their having a head, who must be set up, whatever came of it ; and, if they let slip that opportunity, they should never have such another ; for without a head, they could do nothing. He said further he knew the wickedness and resolution of the Jesuits ; they struck at nothing to compass their own ends : they had attempted to poison him, but he had escaped.

When he had finished this discourse, (which lasted about a quarter of an hour) I asked him if the company should now withdraw ? And he said, Yes ; and ordered his nurses to go out, and only his wife to stay to tend him and thereupon, all went out, saving Mrs. Bedlow, myself, and my servant William James. Then I told him, I thought it convenient that what he should then say unto me, should he upon oath : he replied, that it was necessary it should be so ; and called for a bible ; but my servant having brought a book with him, administered the oath to him ; and laying his paper upon a chair by the bedside, writ down his deposition as he delivered it.

When Mr. Bedlow had concluded, and said, That was all he had to inform me of, I took the paper, and read it over distinctly to him.

and he approved it, and signed it, laying the paper upon a pillow.

I thought it not fit, considering his condition, to perplex him with questions, but took his information as he offered it, and held no discourse with him when the company was withdrawn, but concerning the true setting down his depositions ; and when he seemed to be weary, to mind him of taking cordials, which his wife reached to him as he desired them.

The next day, Mr. Bedlow's brother came to me, and told me, that his brother desired a copy of the Deposition he made before me : but I told him I had well considered it, and could not give him a copy without the king's leave ; but I would move the king in it, and if he gave leave, I would take care to send one to him ; and Mr. Bedlow's brother then told me, That it was his brother's desire that I should represent to his majesty his condition, and that his sickness was very chargeable ; and move his majesty on his behalf for some supply of money for his subsistence ; which I promised to do.

This is all that I can recollect of what passed upon this occasion, and is in substance true ; but the very words, or the order, I cannot positively remember. FRA. NORTH.

To the Right Honourable Sir Lyonell Jenkins, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.

" Sir ; I always intended to write from hence, to pay my thanks for the whole circuit, which was much more pleasant, by your favour of holding correspondence with me. But now I have business of some importance : for as soon as I came to this city, I received a message from Mr. Bedlow, by sir John Knight, that he being very ill, and, in the judgment of physicians, in great danger of death, had some business of great moment to impart to me. I knowing the man, and the season, would not refuse the pains to give him a visit ; and being satisfied by physicians that there was no contagious quality in his distemper (though I did not much fear it), I went well accompanied ; and in the presence of the company he declared, That whatever he had said relating to the Plot was true ; and he being a dying man, had nothing lay upon his conscience upon that score. The greatest trouble he had was the danger the king (whom he loved above all things) was in from the Papists at this time, who would attempt his life as soon as ever he should cease to be kind to them ; and many other expressions of this kind. After this, I asked, if he had any thing to impart to me in private : he told me, he had. And having made the company withdraw, all but my clerk, I took the enclosed examination upon oath. You may imagine I was not curious to perplex him with questions : I took it just as he delivered it. Of what signification it will be, I leave to wiser men. I think my duty is to send it to you, that you may inform his majesty of the truth. I shall wait upon you at Windsor, upon Sunday next, to receive your further commands. Your most humble and faithful servant,

"FRA. NORTH."

"Ten at night. The copy enclosed is hastily and ill taken. I shall bring the original with me."

The following curious Passages are published by Sir JOHN DALRYMPLE, as Extracts from Lord Keeper North's MS.

Extract from the Lord Keeper North's manuscript Memorandum.

"1st. The parliament was to meet the beginning of October, and the discovery was in the middle of August, time enough to blazon it abroad to irritate the minds of men, but not to do any thing for the trial.

"2d. Dr. Tong (the first mover) would not have it exposed so much as to the council before the parliament met, but said it was fitter for the parliament: and when it was objected that Papists might kill the king in the meantime, he said, care should be taken, for that they should be watched so narrowly they should not be able to do it.

"3d. There was but one witness before the parliament met, which is not sufficient in treasons, so the council could not order a trial, though they might commit, except in case of Coleman, whose letters were produced under his own hand.

"4th. No lord or person of quality, but only inferior people and priests were named before the parliament met, that the court might not be startled, but might engage in the prosecution of those despicable people, for whom no man would have regret, but they might be bountifully thanked for it by the House of Commons.

"5th. To make the ministers of state less suspicious and more easy, they were courted, not only in the applications of the discoverers, but in the discovery, viz. that the Papists intended to kill the king, duke of Lauderdale, duke of Ormond, &c. which made the earl of Danby not only give way to the prosecution of it, but to press the belief of it in all places and to all persons; and the Duke of York was not only acquitted of all design, but was to be killed himself if he did not comply.

"In the month of September it (the plot) had its full course, and so much countenance at Whitehall, that a great many thought it a court stratagem to pretend fears and dangers to keep up the army that had been raised, and was by act of parliament to be disbanded before 30th August.

"And within a little time, by the murder and exposing the body of sir Ed. Bury Godfrey in the middle of October, the violence and rage of the people was grown to that height against the Papists, that no reason could be heard, but every foolish story against them passed for gospel; and when all force seemed bent against the papists, it was reported sir Ed. Bury Godfrey was seen last at Somerset-House, and by others at Arundale-House (the Duke of Norfolk's;) it was also whispered that he was seen at the Cockpit (the earl of Danby's) and threatened by the earl of Danby.

"It was cunningly done to spread these reports, that it might be known what these persons could say in defence of themselves, and that they might be ready (especially the Cockpit and Arundale-House) to toss the fire from one to the other. It was wondered at that the Lord Treasurer was so soon glanced at, who had been so earnest to follow the discovery. But afterward he was found to be forward in it to carry it to the parliament for fear he should be struck at directly, and it should find belief. It is certain the Church of England men joined in this cry as heartily as any else, for they were always most eager against Popery, although they had friendship with the Cavalier Papists, and many considering men seeing an army kept up against an act of parliament were really zealous that settlers might be put upon the king, and therefore would join in shewing any discontent.

"By this means the outcry was so very great that the court, who thought before, they might play with the plot, now saw plainly it would be no easy matter to get rid of it, and therefore it was thought the best way to shew a confidence in this loyal House of Commons, who would be sure to take notice of it themselves; and therefore the king mentioned it in his speech at the opening of the session of parliament as a plot of the Jesuits, but with that caution that he would leave it to law, and give no opinion of it for fear of saying too little or too much.

"And therefore it was an unpardonable folly to give force to a design that was formed and conducted by the opposite party, as this must be concluded to be."

Extract First.

"They let none know the bottom of the accusation; for then no further use can be made of it; but they let the people press to have it searched to the bottom; and then they can manage and improve it as they please, and bring whom they will into the snare; and at first the discovery must not be made to the ministers of state, but to some justice of peace, mayor of a great city, as London, Bristol, &c. or committees of parliament for the better case, and that it may not be suppressed, and they take care to have some forensical sciolist, a lawyer, who shall manage and direct the accusations, so as they may be skilful and agree with the rules of law."

Extract Second.

"Godfrey's murder they shall contrive as a stratagem of mischief: so that if there be two or three adverse parties, they may all be thought guilty. Then will they, to avoid the odium, quarrel, and lay it upon one another; and laying it upon which the faction please, they shall have the help of all the rest."

Extract Third.

"They took advantage of Popery by a good law to exclude the Popish Lords out of parliament, and by working upon some great families to come into the Church of England, as Norfolk's heir, Shrewsbury, Cardigan's heir, Lumley, &c."

Extract Fourth.

"And the anti-court party was very great even in the court itself: and all trimmers then were called the party volant in the House of Commons, and now declared and voted against the court in all things; and no wonder; for the king's affairs were looked upon at home as very declining, and most men thought if there should break out any troubles, it might endanger the monarchy; and men were willing to be safe at least, if they could not find their account in a change."

Extract Fifth.

"The most loyal pretence that ever was thought of was that of the king's safety: who could be sure of that but such as had him in possession? which directly tends to his destruction."

Extract Sixth.

"The republicans applied themselves to all methods of sedition, and were so open in it that they had public councils for carrying it on, as the King's Head club in Fleet-street was, (though I doubt not but they had cabals of a more dark and dangerous nature) and many coffee-houses both in city and country where they vented news and libels, and proceeded with that success, that in 24 hours they could entirely possess the city with what reports they pleased, and in less than a week spread it all over the kingdom."

"They could give out that any man who was averse to them was a Papist: and when the king did any thing pleasing to the people, they would discredit it before it could be known; and could put what colour they pleased upon foreign affairs, which they did by the help of foreign ministers. They had correspondents in all parts of the kingdom of the most active and greatest credit, so that when any members of parliament were to be chosen, they could disgrace every loyal person, and recommend whom they pleased; and they were most industrious in parliament time, when by having divers members in their councils, and those who were not members being always near the bar, possessing the world with news they had fitted for the time, and arguing the questions that were in debate in the House, and taking care that all the members should be minded to repair to their seats before the question should be put.

"By these means they influenced elections not only in the country, but upon disputes in the house. And they came to that boldness, that when this parliament could not be prevailed upon to pass an act of comprehension, or to undermine the crown, they possessed the people that it was time to dissolve them, that the minds of the people were changed since their choice, and that they were a grievance; and were about to have grand juries to represent it to the judges at the assizes; but that was not ventured for fear when the parliament should be punished. But upon a prorogation of more than a twelvemonth, they attempted to have the parliament declare themselves dissolved; but the members would not drive that nail into their own flesh, which set the game a little back."

"I thought it wonderful that when these things were visible, the House should suffer such a combination of men to sit openly, who made it their business not only to traduce the king's government but even their actions: and I concluded that when they were so negligent of their own frontiers, and did not preserve their credit by destroying these enemies of it, they could not be long lasting, and so it happened. For they (that is the major part of them) joined in thwarting the king in every thing he designed, and in laying obloquies upon his government to that degree that it was not to be borne; and at last procured their dissolution to their great surprize, who thought the king would never have made so bold a step, and to the great joy of the King's Head club, who fell to work with all diligence to model the next House of Commons by their correspondencies in the country."

Extract Seventh.

"That incredible fictions should ever pass in courts of justice, without the courts making just observations upon them, was extraordinary: but care was taken to terrify the judges with shouts and acclamations on the one part, and hissings on the other, by which they were to be persuaded, not only of the sense of the people, but of their violent desires, whereby they might imagine dangers to themselves if they should appear to check the stream."

* From the following reports of the Trials, it may be doubted whether the judges required the influence of these shouts, acclamations, and hissings, to stimulate them to severity against the prisoners whom they tried. Mr. Hargrave, in his very learned unpublished "Opinion and Argument, as to the right of Lady Anastasia Stafford Howard to the new Barony of Stafford," [See Lord Stafford's Case, infra], has inserted a review of the History of the Popish Plot, with some important remarks upon it.

Extract Eighth.

"Tradesmen, if such are not considerable, they are not worth notice; but if one be he who hath great power by the many that live under him, and having grown in riches by outwitting other men, and arrived at the government of the place, as mayor, alderman,

&c. the faction may easily persuade him that the world is best governed that way, which makes him a commonwealths-man: when they have their ends, and raised a force, they may fright him into any thing: for know that he is the most insolent fool and cowardly knave that is in nature."

243. The Trial of WILLIAM STAYLEY, Goldsmith, at the King's Bench, for High Treason: 30 CHARLES II. A. D. 1678.*

MR. STAYLEY being accused of High-Treason on the 20th day of November, 1678, brought from Newgate, and arraigned at the King's-bench bar, and the next day was brought to the same place to receive his trial; where being come, and the jury impanelled, the court told the prisoner, that if he would challenge any of the jury he must speak unto them as they came to the book to be sworn, and before they were sworn; the prisoner challenging none, the jury were sworn, &c. viz. Sir Philip Matthews, sir Reginald Foster, sir John Kirke, sir John Cutler, sir Richard Blake, John Bisfield, esq. Simon Middleton, esq. Thomas Cross, esq. Henry Johnson, esq. Charles Umfrevil, esq. Thomas Egglefield, esq. William Bohee, esq.

The Indictment read: You stand indicted by the name of William Stayley, &c.

Crier. If any can give evidence on the behalf of our sovereign lord the king against William Stayley, let him come forth, and he shall be heard.

Sir Creswell Levinz. The Prisoner stands indicted as not having the fear of God before his eyes, being led by the instigation of the devil, not minding his allegiance, but traitorously endeavouring the death and destruction of our sovereign lord the king, he did on November the 14th, in the 30th year of the king, falsely, wickedly, and traitorously compass, imagine, devise, and invent the killing the king; that he did maliciously contrive, (I say) the death of our lord the king of England.

To this he hath pleaded Not Guilty. You are to try whether he be Guilty or not.

King's Serjeant, (Maynard.) The offence is as great as can be, and will be proved as clear as can be. Call the Witnesses to prove the offence.

* From a pamphlet, entitled, "The Trial of William Stayley, Goldsmith, for speaking Treasonable Words against his most sacred majesty: and upon full Evidence found Guilty of High-Treason, and received Sentence accordingly on Thursday November 21, 1678. London, Printed for Robert Pawlet at the Bible in Chancery-Lane near Fleet street, 1678."

"November 20, 1678. I do appoint Robert Pawlet to print the Trial of William Stayley: and that no other presume to print the same."

'WILLIAM SCHOONES.'

Att. Gen. Sir William Jones. It would be fitting, before we enter upon the evidence, to give some account, why (among so many offenders, some of them of greater quality than William Stayley) we chose first to bring this man to trial. It is not unknown to any man that lives in England, what discoveries there have been of horrid and damnable designs against the king's person and the Protestant Religion. There are a sort of men in the world, that endeavour what they can to cry down this Discovery, as that it was altogether supposititious, and a fable. It is true, some are so charitable as to think the Roman Catholics in England do promote the Roman Catholic Religion, but the design against the king's person is a fiction. But they shall do well to take warning by the trial of this man, and imprisonment of so many offenders, as that even since this Discovery made, some have had this treasonable mind, and traitorous attempt against the king, and said those words for which in the Indictment he is charged with. This prisoner by religion, is a Roman Catholic, he calls himself so; in plain English he is a Papist; and finding that since this plot was discovered, his trading decayed, (being one that dealt in monies) he was one of their party, he grew enraged their money was called so fast for, being in the company of one Fromante, a foreigner, at a cook's shop, and were considering of matters of trade, this man was complaining his money was so fast called in for. Taking notice of the Discovery of the Plot, (being a very great well-wisher to it) entered into a great passion, and spake these words of the king: 'That he was the greatest Heretic in the world, that he was a great Rogue' for his part, holding up his hand, clapped it then upon his heart, and said 'I will with this hand kill him.' These words were heard by the gentlemen that were present spoken in French.†

William Castars, a Witness.

Att. Gen. Acquaint the court and jury what you know of any word spoken by the prisoner about killing the king.

Witness. So far as I know, or can give an account, it was about eleven of the clock in the day, on the 14th day of this month he called for a pot of ale, and a slice of roast which when it was called for, his landlord said it should be brought him; there was another Frenchman with Stayley, a stranger to me: they discoursed together in French, and Stayley then said twice over, 'The king was a grand Heretic,' making this demonstration with his hand upon his breast, and stamp'd five or six times with his foot in great fury. The old man, Fromante, his friend, said, 'That the king of England was a tormentor of the people of God;' and he answered again in a great fury, 'He is a great heretic, and the greatest rogue in the world; there is the heart, and here is the hand that would kill him; and the king and parliament think all is over, but the rogues are mistaken.'

Sir William Scroggs,* L. C. J. Did you know Stayley?

Witness. No, my Lord, I had never seen him before.

L. C. J. What did you do upon this?

Witness. I did not know what to do, being ignorant of the laws of the country. I thought it was a great matter, and being sensible that Stayley was gone out, I caused one to attend him, and came to his father's shop, and looked up and down, and the next day I apprehended him.

L. C. J. Are you sure (looking upon the prisoner) that was the man?

Witness. Yes.

L. C. J. Did you see him when he spake the words?

Witness. Yes, I saw him; there was no more distance betwixt the two doors, but just as far as that gentleman and me; his face was straight towards us.

L. C. J. Were you in the same room?

Witness. No, but just over against it; the doors were open.

L. C. J. How near were you to him?

Witness. Seven or eight foot from the place where I was and where he was. He was standing at one door, and I at the other. In French the words were spoken, he making a demonstration, stamping with his foot, 'I would kill him myself' (which the prisoner would have added by saying, the words signify I would kill myself.) The prisoner farther said, that the king and parliament thought all was over, but the rogues were beguiled and deceived.

Alexander Southerland, Witness.

Mr. Southerland, tell what you heard the prisoner at the bar say. Were you there?

Witness. Yes.

L. C. J. Which was nearest to him, he or you?

Witness. He was nearest to him, and I just by the gentleman. He said afterwards when a word or two past betwixt them, 'The rogues are deceived, they think the business is done, but they are deceived.' The old man said, 'That the king of England was a tormentor of the people of God;' the prisoner answered, 'The king of England is the greatest heretic, and the greatest rogue in the world, and the king and parliament think their business is done, but the rogues are mistaken.'

Prisoner. I said (replied the prisoner) I would kill myself.

L. C. J. Would you kill yourself because you said the king was a heretic? You acknowledge yourself to be a Roman catholic.

Pris. And in that faith I intend to die.

Att. Gen. Here the prisoner doth not deny but he said, 'The king of England was a great heretic;' and can we imagine him to be in such a passion, that he would kill himself? Whether that be a natural conclusion from the premises, I must submit to—

L. C. J. Did you see Mr. Stayley perfectly? Was the door open?

Witness. I saw him perfectly.

L. C. J. Did you know him before?

Wit. I never saw his face before.

L. C. J. Did you write the words presently?

Wit. I writ them down presently, as God shall be my witness.

L. C. J. Look upon the writing, is it your hand?

Wit. It is; and it was written the 14th of November, 1678. About 11 o'clock they came to the Black-Lion in King street, and called for a quart of ale, and a slice of roast beef, and it was answered, it should presently be had. William Stayley said, having struck on his breast, and stamping with his foot five or six times, 'I myself would do it.'

L. C. J. Did you write all that is in the paper at that time?

Wit. I writ the words in French, as I heard them from him, then formed it as to the person and the time, afterwards, when I was gone.

L. C. J. Who told you it was Stayley the goldsmith?

Wit. We asked the man of the house; and we found he went to his father's house in Covent Garden; we asked his father's name, and his name; and that is the very man.

L. C. J. He confesseth he was in this place at that time with the old man. He acknowledged that he spoke some words, but denied he spake those: That he was the man he doth not deny.

Att. Gen. The third man is a gentleman that does not understand the French tongue, he was in the company of these two men at that time; we do not call him to prove the words, because he doth not understand the language.

L. C. J. There is no mistake of the person, the prisoner doth not deny he was there. Call the third person to know what he hath to say.

Philip Garret, third Witness.

Wit. All that I can say is this: my captain, William Castars, came to me in a great passion, and said, I cannot suffer this, I will run upon him, I cannot be quiet.

* See his character as drawn by Burnet in his account of the Popish Plot, ante, p. 1406, and see more of him in a note to the case of June 11, 1680, post.

L. C. J. What are those words he charged upon him?

Wit. That he would kill the king himself: It is impossible to suffer it, I will run out for a constable presently, this cannot be suffered. I went to enquire for his name: the answer was, he was a goldsmith, and that his name was Stayley. That is the very man (looking upon him) I saw there, and heard him speak.

L. C. J. What were the first words?

Wit. [The French words were spoken twice, in English thus] The king is a grand heretic. [French again] 'Here is the hand, here is the heart, I would kill him myself.'

L. C. J. What can you say to this?

Prisoner. My lord, the matter of fact happened thus: This gentleman, Mr. Southerland, comes over to me in the morning when I was in the shop, and said, Sir, I would have a red button like this; I said I had none of that nature, you had better go to the Exchange. I would have one of a true stone. You must (I reply'd) go to the jewellers, I have none of these. Upon that I dismissed him; he went over, and presently comes, in a quarter of an hour after, and tells me, that an honourable person would speak with me: I went over; this gentleman makes a great many ceremonies to me, and reads me this paper; he tells me, you see what the gentleman reads, I would advise you to look to it, then taking me aside by the window, I said, I do not understand you, I am innocent you must not put any bubble upon me; with that the captain runs out in a fury, and fetcheth a constable, and carrieth me to the Gate-house. I was in my shop the day before, which very day I did intend to go out with a friend into the country, and prepared myself accordingly; and Mr. Fromante, the old man that was the friend of mine, comes saying to me, the constable would have something, I know not what it is, come and assist me; I went to the place, the constable told me, that I was to appear by ten of the clock; with that comes the old man out. I owed him a little money, I went and paid him the money which I owed him. I came back, and sat down by the window out of sight, the old man sat at the right hand, so we sat and discoursed as innocently, as I thought, and (before God) as ever I spake in my life.

L. C. J. What discourse had you?

Pris. Our chief discourse was about the materials of our business, and it was about the king of France his usurpation over his subjects, and the happiness of our little people, the commonalty of England, that was indeed usually our discourse when we met together.

L. C. J. Did you say you would kill the king of France? and that he was a great heretic? Do you believe the king of France is an heretic?

Prisoner. I know not what his opinion is, that is to his own conscience.

L. C. J. Did you name the word heretic?

Prisoner. Not to my knowledge, upon my soul, not of the king of England; I might have discoursed of the happiness and the difference of their governments. I have been thought a person of some intelligence, and of some understanding in the world, and not to expose myself to speak in a public large room, the door being open, with so high a voice that these gentlemen being in the next room should hear me in French, and in a street where almost all are Frenchmen, to speak these blasphemous words, words that I abhor. I have been a great admirer of my prince.

Court. Read the statute of Decimo tertio, &c.*

* It was St. 13 Car. 2. c. 1, intitled 'An Act for safety and preservation of his majesty's person and government, against treasonable and seditious practices and attempts,' the first clause of which is as follows:

"The Lords and Commons assembled in parliament, deeply weighing and considering the miseries and calamities of well nigh twenty years, before your majesty's happy return, and withal reflecting upon the causes and occasions of so great and deplorable confusions, do in all humility and thankfulness acknowledge your majesty's incomparable grace and goodness to your people, in your free and general pardon, indemnity and oblivion, by which your majesty hath been pleased to deliver your subjects, not only from the punishment, but also from the reproof of their former miscarriages which unexampled piety and clemency of your majesty hath enflamed the hearts of us your subjects with an ardent desire to express all possible zeal and duty in the care and preservation of your majesty's person, (in whose honour and happiness consists the good and welfare of your people) and in preventing (as much as may be) all treasonable and seditious practices and attempts for the time to come: (2) And because the growth and increase of the late troubles and disorders, did in a very great measure proceed from a multitude of seditious sermons, pamphlets and speeches, daily preached, printed, and published, with a transcendent boldness, defaming the person and government of your majesty and your royal father, wherein men were too much encouraged, and (abuse all) from a wilful mistake of the supreme and lawful authority, whilst men were forward to cry up and maintain those orders and ordinances, oaths and covenants, to be acts legal and warrantable, which in themselves had not the least colour of law or justice to support them; from which kind of distempers, as the present age is not yet wholly freed, so posterity may be apt to relapse into them, if a timely remedy be not provided: (3) We therefore, the Lords and Commons in parliament assembled having duly considered the premises, and remembering that in the 13th year of the reign of queen Elizabeth of ever blessed memory, a right good and profitable law was made for preservation of her majesty's person, do most humbly beseech your

L. C. Speak the words in English about the king, speak them all.

Pris. That the prisoner's companion did say, 'The king was a tormenter and persecutor of the people of God.' The prisoner's words were again, 'The king of England is the greatest heretic, and the greatest rogue in the world; here is the heart, and here is the hand that would kill him; I myself.'

Pris. Here is the hand, and here is the heart which would kill myself: Not, would kill him myself.

L. C. J. What Jesuit taught you this trick? It is like one of them. It is the art and interest of a Jesuit so to do.

The Statute read.

L. C. J. Have you any thing more to say for yourself than what you have already said?

Court. Sir John Kirk, do you understand French?

One of the Jury. I do, my Lord; the words have been interpreted all right.

L. C. J. Let me ask you one question: When you said the king was 'a great heretic' and a rogue, and here is the heart, and here is the arm that would kill him myself; was it not the king you would kill?

'most excellent majesty, that it may be enacted: (4) And be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords and Commons in this present parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, that if any person or persons whatsoever, after the 24th of June, in the year of our Lord 1661, during the natural life of our most gracious sovereign lord the king, (whom Almighty God preserve and bless with a long and prosperous reign) shall within the realm, or without, compass, imagine, invent, devise, or intend death or destruction, or any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maim or wounding, imprisonment or restraint of the person of the same our sovereign lord the king; (5) or to deprive or depose him from the stile, honour, or kingly name of the imperial crown of this realm, or of any other his majesty's dominions or countries; (6) or to levy war against his majesty within this realm or without; (7) or to move or stir any foreigner or strangers with force to invade this realm, or any other his majesty's dominions or countries, being under his majesty's obeisance: (8) And such compassings, imaginations, inventions, devices or intentions, or any of them, shall express, utter or declare, by any printing, writing, preaching, or malicious and advised speaking, being legally convicted thereof upon the oaths of two lawful and credible witnesses, upon trial, or otherwise convicted or attainted by due course of law, then every such person and persons, so as aforesaid offending, shall be deemed, declared and adjudged, to be traitors, and shall suffer pains of death, and also lose and forfeit, as in cases of high treason.'

Prisoner. I have this to say in justification of myself, and allegiance to my prince and king, that I never thought, nor imagined or contrived any way, but have been a true subject to the king upon all occasions; I am sorry it proves so, God's will be done, my soul depends upon it; I am a dying man by the Statute; never with intention, or any thought or ill-will, spake any word about this matter.

L. C. J. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks; the Statute hath been read, which hath made it criminal.

Call a Witness for the prisoner.

Witness for the Prisoner. One Anselm spake.

They came to my house, where I lived at the Cross-keys in Covent-Garden, about 8 o'clock in the morning, these two gentlemen; the day they took him away, was the day after these words were spoke, and he was kept prisoner from 8 till 11 of the clock without any constable; they had 5 bottles of wine, and bespake meat, but they did not stay to eat the meat.

L. C. J. How came you to stay so long?

Wit. I was two hours in looking for a constable; they would not come with me, without a warrant from a justice of peace.

L. C. J. Who told you you had best take it up?

Pris. The middlemost man, the first witness.

Wit. We were about three long hours, I sent out this gentleman for a constable, in the mean time the prisoner's father sent his maid for him to come home; I told him he should not go, if he desired to eat we would eat there. I sent to White-Hall and desired a guard, the officer of the guard told the messenger it was a constable's part.

Court. Call another Witness for the prisoner.

Witness for the Prisoner.

I have heard him often declare as much loyalty to his prince as any person. One day we fell into a discourse of these affairs, the business of the Jesuits, which are a people he did as much condemn as any; for in Padua he saw so many cheats, that he forsook the Jesuitical Religion, and if he knew any of the persons concerned in this Plot, he would be the executioner himself, and whoever comes to reign afterwards, they shall never enjoy so much peace as now; and I heard him often say he would lose his blood for the king, and heard him speak as loyally as I ever heard any man speak in my life.

L. C. J. That is when he spoke to a protestant.

Court. Have you any thing else to say for yourself, or have you any more witnesses that you would have examined on your behalf?

Prisoner. No.

Lord Chief Justice's Speech.

"The Statute hath been read, which was made since the king came in, for the preservation of his person, and during his life: The parliament thought it reasonable, even to make desperate words to be Treason, although there was no other thing but words, that is, such words, as if the thing had been done would be Treason, the speaking it is Treason. When we come to observe the manner of this speaking, methinks there is no great difficulty to satisfy the jury that they were spoke advisedly and maliciously. They were in a public house, and by accident heard: They concealed them not a moment, and not from the man that did not understand French. To hear a man say in a great passion, That his king was a heretic; and the greatest rogue in the world, and that he would kill him, to write down the words presently, they slept not upon it, they found out who he was, the next day they came to attach him; they kept him, for what? Till they could get a constable. So that here is nothing doubtful either in the circumstance or substance of his case: So that you cannot have a plainer proof in the world than there is in this. For my own part, when it is in the case of a man's life, I would not have any compliance with the rumours or disorder of times, that should be an evidence against him, but would have a Verdict depend upon the Witnesses that swear the fact downright upon him. You and we all are sensible of the great difficulties and hazards that is now both against the king's person, and against all protestants, and our religion too, which will hardly maintain itself, when they have destroyed the men; but let them know, that many thousands will lose their religion with their lives, for we will not be papists, let the Jesuits press what they will (who are the foundations of all this mischief) in making proselytes, by telling them, Do what wickedness you will it is no sin, but we can save you, and if you omit what we command, we can damn you. This they will not own when it comes to be an objection and penal upon them, but they will never get the Pope of Rome to declare he hath not a power to excommunicate what he calls a heretic king, and if he does, that the subject is not discharged from his obedience; they would do great service to their papist friends, if they could obtain such an edict. They print, preach, dispute, and maintain otherwise, and thereby lead people to their own destruction and the destruction of others. Excuse me if I am a little warm, when perils are so many, their murders so secret, that we cannot discover the murder of that gentleman, whom we all knew so well, when things are transacted so closely, and our king in so great danger, and religion at stake. It is better to be warm here than in Smithfield. But that the man might have justice done him, he hath had his witnesses, and might have had this old man, if he had named him to Mr. Richardson; and to shew what fair play he has had, Mr. Attorney tells you the old man hath been examined upon oath, and offers him the copy of his examination to use, but he thinks not fit to use it for his defence, therefore nothing is smothered. The offence you have heard in words plain enough, unless the sense is perverted by Jesuitical cunning and equivocation, the best part of their learning and honesty. They swear it expressly, 'That the King was a heretic, and the greatest rogue in the world, and here is the heart and hand, that he would kill him himself;' and hath and can have no other signification. The statute saith 'advisedly' and maliciously.' The manner of speaking, and the words spoke, prove both. When a papist once hath made a man a heretic, there is no scruple to murder him. Whoever is not of their persuasion are heretics, and whoever are heretics may be murdered, if the Pope commands it, for which they may become saints in heaven; this is that they have practised. If there had been nothing of this in this kingdom, or other parts of the world, it would be a hard thing to impose it upon them; but they ought not to complain, when so many instances are against them. Therefore discharge your consciences as you ought to do; if guilty let him take the reward of his crime, and you shall do well to begin with this man, for perhance it may be a terror to the rest. Unless they think they can be saved by dying in the Roman faith, though with such pernicious and traitorous words and designs as these are; let such go to heaven by themselves. I hope, I shall never go to that heaven, where men are made saints for killing kings."

William Stayley, Hold up your hand.

Cl. of Cr. Is William Stayley guilty of the high treason whereof he hath been indicted?

Jury. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. What goods, chattels, lands, or tenements?

Jury. None.

L. C. J. Now you may die a Roman Catholic, and when you come to die, I doubt you will be found a priest too.

K. Coun. I pray judgment according to the verdict.

Cl. of Cr. You have been indicted of high treason, you have put yourself upon your country, which country have found you guilty, what have you to say for yourself, wherefore the Court should not proceed to judgment against you?

Pria. I have nothing to say.

L. C. J. I pronounce Judgment upon you. You are here found guilty by the jury of high treason, for saying you would kill the king, with other irreverent words; but the matter which makes you a traitor is proved upon you by most apparent evidence. The matter, manner, and all the circumstances of it make it plain; you may harden your heart as much as you will, and lift up your eyes, but you seem instead of being sorrowful, to be obstinate; between God and your conscience be it, I have nothing to do with it, my duty is to pronounce judgment upon you according to law, which is this: 'You shall be turn to the prison, from thence shall be drawn to the place of execution, where you shall be hanged by the neck, cut down alive, your quarters shall be severed and be disposed of as the king shall think fit, and your body burnt, and so the Lord have mercy upon your soul.'

November the 20th he was executed at Tyto the Sentence.

An Account of the digging up of the Quarters of WILLIAM STAYLEY, lately executed for High Treason, for that his relations abused the King's mercy. Imprimatur Nov. 30, 1678. William Scroggs.

Whereas William Stayley, being found guilty of High Treason at the King's-bench bar, on Thursday the 21st day of November, 1678, received then his Sentence to be drawn on a sledge to the place of execution, there to be hanged by the neck, cut down alive, his quarters to be severed and disposed of as the king should think fit, and his bowels burnt; which Sentence, on Tuesday next following, was accordingly executed at the common place of execution: and his quarters were brought back and left at Newgate in order to their being set up on the gates of the city of London, and his head on London-bridge, as traitor's quarters usually are. But the said William Stayley having behaved himself very penitently, from the time of his conviction until the time of his execution, which was attested by the several ministers that visited him, during that time: and the relations of the said William Stayley humbly petitioning his most sacred majesty, that he would be graciously pleased that his quarters might be delivered back to them to be privately buried, and not to be set up on the gates of the city. Which his most sacred majesty, out of his princely clemency and compassion, was pleased to grant, and ordered the sheriff of the county of Middlesex to deliver the quarters to his friends, by them to be disposed of, as aforesaid; which were delivered accordingly: but since that (to the great indignity and affront of his majesty's mercy and favour) the friends of the said Stayley caused several Masses to be said over his quarters, and used other ceremonies according to the manner of the church of Rome, and appointed a time for his interment, viz. Friday the 29th of November 1678, in the evening, from his father's house in Covent-garden, at which time there was made a pompous and great funeral, many people following the corpse to the church of St. Paul's Covent-garden, where he was buried: which his majesty hearing of was justly displeased, and commanded the coroner of the liberty of Westminster to take up the body of the said William Stayley, and deliver it to the sheriff of the county of Middlesex, and that the said sheriff should cause the quarters to be set up on the gates of the city of London, and his head on London-bridge.

The coroner, according to his majesty's command, did immediately go to the churchwardens of St. Paul's Covent-garden, and caused the body of the said William Stayley to be taken up, and the coffin to be broken open, to see that he had the right body, which when he had done, he caused the body to be carried to Newgate, and there delivered it to the sheriff of Middlesex to be disposed of, as aforesaid.
